At first sight, this did not seem to be a very tempting offer; but, after a momentary consideration, Jonathan Wild determined to accept it.

Mr. Noakes was surprised that he should do so, but said nothing, being quite content, as usual, to leave the direction of all things to his companion.

"We are ragged and dirty, I know," replied Wild; "but the accommodation, bad as it is, will do for us, providing you do not charge too much."

"I only want that guinea."

"You shall have it if you find us with food and drink as well."

"Agreed."

"You will do so?"

"I will."

"Lead the way, then."

"Go under the gateway," replied the landlord; "you will see the stables then in front of you, and you can go up into the loft."

"And you?"

"I will follow close with something to eat and drink."

With these words, the landlord turned on his heel, and entered the inn, and Jonathan, quite reconciled to his lot, made as speedy a disappearance under the gateway as he possibly could.

He half dragged his companion after him.

As they had been told, they found the stables just in front of them.

Anxious to get out of sight, Jonathan crossed the yard hastily.

But before they could do much more than enter the stables, the landlord appeared at the back door of the inn, carrying quite a large quantity of provisions in his hands.

Jonathan waited for him to approach.

"Up with you!" he cried. "There are the steps. Go first—I will follow!"

Following with his eye the direction of the landlord's finger, Wild saw a perpendicular ladder against the wall.

Up this ladder he ascended with great speed and agility.

Mr. Noakes followed as well as his exhaustion would allow him.

The landlord brought up the rear.

The scent from the hay in the loft was quite pleasant, and when he saw how well stocked the place was, the thief-taker did not doubt that he should be able to make himself comfortable.

The Governor sat down with a sigh.

"Now for your guinea!" exclaimed the landlord.

"Give us the provisions!"

"Not first! I sha'n't trust you any further than I can see you!"

"Why not?"

"You are no good, either of you. Anyone could see that at a glance! However, what you have done makes no odds to me—it's none of my business!"

"I wish everybody was of your way of thinking!" growled Wild.

"Come—the guinea!"

"Here it is!"

[JONATHAN WILD IS WARNED FOR THE SECOND TIME.]

"And here is something to eat and drink! Cut off now wherever you like! You won't be in my debt!" So saying, the landlord quitted the loft.

Wild and the Governor were both famished and thirsty, and although their position was so truly dangerous, they at first thought about nothing but satisfying their natural cravings.

At last Mr. Noakes ventured to ask:

"How long do you think we shall be able to stop here?"

"How the devil do you think I know? As long as our foes will let us!"

"But—but don't you think we are dangerously situated?"

"We cannot well hope to be safer."

"But, Mr. Wild?"

"What?"

"Now that we have satisfied our hunger, don't you think we had better stow the remainder of the provisions about us, and be off?"

No. 116.—BLUESKIN.

"No, I don't!"

"Why not?"

"I intend to have some rest and sleep, and you had better have some too."

"I—I dare not!"

"We will keep watch by turns, and by that means we shall be safer. You shall take the first sleep, and I will watch."

"But if the officers come?"

"I will awake you."

"But how shall we escape?"

"Hold your row, and leave things to me! Do as I tell you!"

"But sleep will be impossible in this place!"

"Then you can keep watch."

With these words, Wild stretched himself at full length upon the hay, and, closing his eyes, seemed to fall immediately into a deep slumber.

There was little fear about the Governor keeping watch.

Crawling to the circular aperture in the wall, which was the only place from which a view of the exterior could be obtained, he peeped forth.

After a time, when he found what a profound stillness reigned all around the inn, his apprehensions gradually subsided.

He began to think that he was really alarming himself without due cause.

After what had happened he was forced to come to the conclusion that the officers would have to be much more clever than they had shown themselves to be if they succeeded in getting upon their track.

But his greatest source of dread was that the landlord should mention the fact of their being in the loft—perhaps to some police officers in the neighbourhood, who would, of course, have their suspicions excited.

Two hours passed slowly away.

Although it was now fairly day, there was no more sign of bustle and activity about the inn than there was when they first halted before it.

The silence of the place seemed suggestive of security.

It had a sleepy tendency also.

In spite of what he had said, Mr. Noakes found his eyes gradually closing.

At last he resolved to wake his companion, and did so.

"Lie down and sleep, Noakes!" he said. "Sleep till I wake you; and I only hope you will feel as much benefited as myself!"

Mr. Noakes was only too glad to obey this injunction.

Jonathan watched for some time, when, finding how profoundly silent all around him was, he resolved to descend into the stable and reconnoitre a little.

Any information thus gained could not fail to be of service to him.

The only occupants of the stable were a couple of horses.

Jonathan approached and examined them with a critical eye.

He was much surprised to find horses of such excellent quality in such a place.

But he was far from displeased.

Pursuing his researches still further, he discovered the harness-room, which contained the necessary trappings to fit the horses in readiness for the road.

CHAPTER DXLV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES TAKE POSSESSION OF THE TWO HORSES IN THE STABLE.

"Good—good!" he exclaimed, rubbing his hands together. "I feel quite contented now, and shall fear nothing!"

Wild left the harness-room, and crept towards the door of the stable.

It would have pleased him very much to have made himself familiar with the whole of the premises, but this he did not care to do, lest he should be seen by some one, though there did not appear to be anyone about.

He made his way into the loft again, and, seating himself close to the circular aperture of which we have spoken, he waited for his companion to awake.

More than once the thief-taker's eyes closed in slumber, and he would wake with a sudden start, fancying his foes were close at hand.

In this manner the day gradually passed by.

Towards evening the landlord paid them another visit.

"So you are here still!" he said. "I think it's high time you tramped off again!"

"We are going," said Wild, still preserving his humbleness of demeanour; "but we are hungry. Can you not bring us another meal into this place? And after we have eaten it, we will depart."

"Yes, if you will make it worth my while to serve you. I feel more convinced than ever by your looks that you are no good! You have been up to something you ought not!"

"You said, when you were here before," remarked

Wild, "it did not signify to you what we were, or what we had done."

"It is no business of mine," said the landlord; "but I may be running a risk by having you in the place, so, in order to make amends, you must pay well for accommodation!"

"I don't mind doing that! Will you bring us another meal?"

"Yes, if you will pay me well."

"How much do you want?"

"A guinea."

Wild at once took the coin mentioned from his pocket, and handed it to the landlord, who pocketed it with evident satisfaction.

He then retired, and Noakes said:

"What an extortionate rascal he is!"

"You're right!" said Wild. "But it will not do for us to offend him. It would be bad policy on our part."

"Of course."

"But never mind," continued Wild, with one of his old chuckles—"never mind!"

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing, except that I intend to have my money's worth out of him, and perhaps something more!"

"How?"

"Wait and see! Hush—he's coming!"

The landlord reappeared, bringing with him a very substantial meal, which, however, was very dear at the price.

"Perhaps you won't mind letting us stay for an hour after we have eaten this?" said Wild, respectfully.

"Indeed I shall, though—I shall insist upon your leaving at once!"

"But that is scarcely fair."

"I don't see that! However, I have told you my price, and if you like to pay for stopping, you can!"

"You are very hard upon us!" said Wild. "We are very badly off, and if you demand any more money, you will take all we have!"

"Which won't matter much," said the landlord, "for you look just the sort of man to knock anyone down on the road, and take his purse from him!"

"You are too hard!" said Wild again. "But tell me how much money you will require to allow us to remain here until dark."

"If you will give me another guinea," said the landlord, "I won't trouble you again; and you can stop here all night if you like; but if not, you must take yourselves off at once!"

"Here it is!" said Wild, with a heavy sigh, giving the landlord the guinea, for he wished to produce in his mind the impression that it was almost the last coin he possessed.

The landlord received it with a grin, and as he descended from the loft, congratulated himself upon having done a very good day's work indeed.

"They bleed well!" was the remark. "I wish I knew who they were, and whether there was much reward offered for their apprehension! If there was, I'd go in for a share! Now, there's Jubbins, the parish constable—I'll go over to him, and ask his advice!"

"What's that you intend doing next?" asked Mr. Noakes, rather more cheerfully than usual, for the sleep and food he had had produced a beneficial effect upon his spirits.

"Don't trouble your head about that," said Jonathan, "but leave it all to me! Don't eat all this, however. We will carry as much away with us as we can. It may prove useful."

"A good thought!" said the Governor, who ceased eating at once.

Jonathan Wild now waited with extreme impatience for night to come.

He was anxious to get still further from the ruined barn, but he knew well it would not be wise to take his departure while there was a chance of his being seen.

At last the welcome darkness spread itself over the earth.

"Now, Noakes," cried Jonathan, "just follow me, and I'll show you something that will please you!"

Wondering at what his companion alluded to, for he had not noticed the horses in the stable below, Mr. Noakes descended the ladder.

"There," cried the thief-taker—"do you see those nags?"

"They are just right for the road—well rested, well fed, and in excellent condition! I think we have got them rather cheap!"

"Do you mean to ride away with them?"

"Of course I do! Why did you ask that ridiculous question?"

"But we shall be seen or heard—we shall be discovered—I am sure of it!"

"Bah! Go straight on, and you will see a door! Open it, and against the wall you will see two saddles and bridles—bring them here, and quickly!"

Mr. Noakes obeyed, though he trembled at the thought of what might be the consequences.

In a very few minutes both horses were saddled and bridled ready for use.

"Mount in the stable," said Jonathan, "and then follow me with all speed! I shall make a rush for it, and it will be your own fault if you get into trouble by lagging behind!"

While speaking these words, Jonathan seated himself in the saddle.

Mr. Noakes followed his example.

"Now!" cried Wild. "One—two, and away!"

The stable door was wide open, and they dashed out into the yard with terrific speed.

As they did so, a loud shout struck upon their ears.

It came from the lips of the landlord, who, in company with his friend, the parish constable, was about to enter the stables.

The latter had advised the landlord to take them into custody, and chance the consequences.

The anger of the landlord, when he saw them both dash by at full speed on the two horses, is a thing which could be imagined much better than it can be described.

He stamped and swore, and, taking off his hat, dashed it frantically upon the ground, and then jumped on it.

These demonstrations of rage, however, did no good.

His horses were gone, and he knew perfectly well that he stood but a slight chance of ever seeing them again.

The loss, of course, was a serious one, for both horses were of first-rate quality.

The parish constable in vain endeavoured to console him.

Indeed, the landlord turned round upon his old friend, for he said:

"Shut up, you old idiot! If you were any good, you would run after and catch them, and bring me my horses back!"

"Me run?"

"Yes, you old swilling vagabond! Here have I got to pay taxes to keep you, and I wonder what good you are, after all! Bah!—hold your row, I tell you!"

With these words, the landlord picked up his damaged hat, and, pulling it low down upon his brows, strode back into the public-house.

Scarcely had he crossed the threshold than he heard the loud trampling of horses' feet on the road outside, and then, with great suddenness, the sound ceased.

"Hallo! House—house!" cried a voice.

In far from an amiable humour the landlord went to the front door, and there he saw a good-sized troop of mounted police officers.

"Ah!" he yelled, in a furious tone of voice, "you have come just in time! After them—after them! Curse the villains, they have stolen two horses worth a hundred pounds! Why don't you all go after them, I say?"

The landlord spoke so excitedly, and behaved himself altogether in such an extraordinary manner, that the police officers began to think that what they had taken for an inn was in reality a lunatic asylum, and that the landlord was one of the patients.

Of course they made no movement.

"Curse you all!" cried the landlord. "Why don't you go when I tell you? I'm a subject of this realm, I pay my rent, and I pay my taxes! After them! Don't you understand what I mean?"

"Oh, go to the devil!" cried the officer in command. "We don't want to listen to your rubbish! Go and call the landlord!"

"You pitiful scoundrel!" was the reply. "You're no better than the rest of them! Me go for the landlord, indeed!"

"Yes; why shouldn't you?"

"Because I'm the landlord myself!"

"Oh, are you? Well, I should have taken you for a madman."

"Damnation!" cried the landlord. "Don't I tell you to go after them? Don't I tell you they have stolen two horses out of my stable, and galloped off down the road, about five minutes ago?"

"Who—who?" cried the officer, anxiously, believing that he was about to learn important intelligence. "Was there two of 'em?"

"Oh, I see you're coming to your senses at last!" replied the landlord. "Of course there was two of 'em! Do you think three men could gallop away on two horses?"

"There was a general laugh at this, in which even the landlord himself faintly joined.

"Come—come!" cried the commanding officer, "we will do what we can to look after the men who, I take it, have stolen your horses! But we are completely knocked up, and must have something to drink first, and so must our horses."

"But you will lose them altogether if you wait."

"No, we shan't. Leave me to know my business; and while we are drinking the ale you can give me some particulars about these two men, or else how shall I know them when I see them?"

"Oh, of course—of course!"

The parish constable had followed closely at the heels of the landlord, and stood just behind him on the threshold of the inn.

Turning round, the landlord beheld him.

"Now, then, fat-paunch, turn round and fetch some ale, while I tell the officers all the particulars! Be quick! Try for once in your life if you can't make yourself useful, you great lump of good-for-nothingness!"

The parish constable threw himself into a defiant attitude, and, placing his clenched fists against his sides so that his arms stuck out akimbo, he cried:

"Do you think I am a lass, Mr. Muggleton? I say, do you think I am a lass? Remember the dignity of a parish constable! Fetch your beastly ale yourself!"

"Beastly ale, do you call it?" cried the landlord, greatly enraged at the epithet. "Take that; and I'll take jolly good care you never drink another pot of it!"

With these hastily-uttered words, he gave the parish constable a sharp crack on the nose, which not only drew blood, but made that fat functionary sit down upon the floor in a very undignified manner.

The officers were all vastly amused at this encounter.

"I tell you what it is, Mr. Muggleton," cried the constable—"you shall smart for this! I won't forget it!"

"Do you want any more?" cried the landlord, dancing round, his discomfited adversary. "If you don't, you'd better shut up!"

Thus admonished, the constable became silent, and occupied himself by rubbing his nose in a very doleful sort of way.

Attracted by the noise, the landlord's wife came to the front door, and found her husband in a state of high excitement.

"Ale—ale!" he yelled. "D—n it, are these gentlemen to stand all night at the door waiting for a drop of ale? D—n it all! Why don't you make haste?"

"Fetch the ale yourself, you lazy, idle, good-for-nothing vagabond!" retorted the landlady. "Do you think I'm going to wait upon you hand and foot? No, indeed—not if I knows it!"

So saying, the landlady turned on her heel, and disappeared almost as abruptly as she had come.

"Was ever a man so cursed as I am?" cried the landlord. "It's all through you!" he added, addressing the parish constable, who was struggling to regain his feet.

"Take that, and be d—d to you!"

Another sharp crack was administered, which resulted in laying the constable quite prostrate.

In such a state of anger that he hardly knew what he was about, the landlord turned back into the inn, and appeared directly afterwards with a couple of large cans of ale.

"There you are, gentlemen," he cried. "I rather think I have been expeditious. Everything's happened to vex me to-day. The very tap wouldn't run, so I had to pull out the bung, and that's the reason the cans are filled so quick!"

For some moments nothing was said.

All the officers occupied themselves in drinking the ale, and even the landlord took a drop himself.

It had a slightly soothing effect upon him, so that the officer stood a better chance of obtaining rational replies from him.

"Look here, landlord," he said—"we are down here after a couple of notorious rascals, and we are very anxious to catch them, because, you see, a large reward is offered for them. I rather fancy they must be the very chaps that have stolen your horses."

"Oh, curse it! I wish they had never come near the spot! Two horses, gentlemen, worth, at the very lowest penny, fifty pounds apiece. They'd fetch it if they were put up at auction this very minute."

"Well, we are in pursuit of Jonathan Wild, well known as a thief-taker, and a man named Noakes, who was formerly Governor of Newgate. Listen, and I will describe them to you, and then you will be able to say whether you think they are the same who robbed you of your horses."

CHAPTER DXLVI.

JONATHAN WILD IS ATTACKED BY A TRAVELLER ON THE HIGHWAY.

THE chief police officer now gave to the landlord a tolerably accurate description of the appearance of Jonathan Wild and his companion.

"That's them!" cried the landlord, slapping his thigh. "Oh, d—n the villains! They ought to be boiled in oil!"

"And you say they were actually here at this inn?"

"Yes, up in the loft over the stable, and there they have been a precious long while. What fools you must be! Why the devil didn't you come here a little bit earlier? If you had, you might have caught 'em here, and I should not have lost my horses!"

"I am sorry we didn't," said the chief officer; "it would have been a good round sum in the pockets of all of us. But come on, my boys—they cannot be far off along the road, and if we push on, we shall come up with them, no doubt! Forward!"

"My horses!" screamed the landlord, as the little troop set itself in motion—"my horses! Bring me back my horses, and you may drink every drop of ale there is in my cellar!"

So soon as ever the chief police officer had satisfied himself that he was so close upon the track of Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes, he lost not a moment in giving chase.

Leaving them, however, to push on at the best speed their horses were able to make, we will follow for a time the proceedings of the fugitives.

At a headlong gallop, Jonathan and the Governor tore along the road.

Mr. Noakes did not attempt to control his horse in any way, but let the reins fall loosely on his neck.

By the mere force of example, probably, it kept pace with its companion, which Jonathan urged onwards by repeated blows.

At last, when he imagined he had got far enough from the inn, he drew rein, and proceeded at a gentler rate.

"Now, Noakes," he cried, exultingly, "what do you think of the aspect of affairs now? Have I not managed things cleverly, eh?"

"You have, Mr. Wild, indeed! Things look brighter now than they have done for a long time past."

"Yes. I should not feel surprised if we were to throw the officers off the track altogether. You must remember a long time has elapsed since we last saw or heard anything of them."

"Very true!"

"It is that which makes me hopeful."

"Do you still intend to carry out your original intention of getting into the heart of the country?"

"Yes, for I don't know what I can do better."

Mr. Noakes was silent, from which circumstances it may be surmised that he was quite agreeable that this plan should be adopted.

"We are very short of funds," added Wild, "but that is only a trifle. We can repair that inconvenience easily."

"Not very easily."

"Why not?"

"Because if you stop some one on the highway—and I suppose that is your intention—it will at once ~~2570~~ be the effect of putting the officers on the scent again."

"No—no! Long before they could communicate with any of them I should be far away. Hark! I thought then that I could hear the sound of horses' feet. Hark!"

Wild stopped his horse as he spoke, and his companion did so likewise.

Then most unmistakably there came upon their ears sounds which betokened the approach of a horseman.

"Some one is coming," said Wild.

"Yes, there's no doubt of that. But shall you stop him?"

"Yes, certainly! It would be folly to allow him to pass by."

"I would rather not."

"Then you shall not. In such affairs as these you are of no service. Draw back—conceal yourself as well as you can under the shadow of the hedge, and leave the traveller to me!"

Mr. Noakes hesitated.

"Go!" repeated the thief-taker, in a tone of voice that showed he was getting angry—"go, I say, and leave me here!"

Mr. Noakes knew better than to refuse, and so he obeyed his companion's mandate.

Wild remained perfectly still in the centre of the road, waiting for the traveller to approach.

The traveller seemed to notice Wild and his horse standing in the middle of the road, and he slightly slackened his pace.

"Hallo, friend!" he shouted, as he came nearer. "Can you tell me whether I am going right for Northwick? I don't know these cross-roads very well."

"Northwick?" repeated Wild, disguising his voice, and pretending to consider.

"Yes," said the traveller, unsuspectingly, and continuing to come closer.

"Northwick?" repeated Wild. "I know the name, and yet I am almost at a loss to tell you which way to go. Oh, yes! I remember!"

Just at this moment the traveller reined-in his horse beside Wild's.

The thief-taker saw that he was a young man of muscular build.

But he did not hesitate to attack him.

He had managed, as he thought, to get unsuspectingly side by side with him, and suddenly changing his voice, he exclaimed:

"Now, then, my fine fellow, hand over every valuable article you possess this moment, or I will blow your brains out!"

He produced a pistol as he spoke.

"No, you won't!" cried the traveller, with remarkable coolness. "I have got you at last! I know you, Jonathan Wild! You're my prisoner!"

So saying, the traveller, with a sudden movement, dashed the pistol from Wild's hand, and clutched him tightly by the throat.

So sudden and unexpected was all this, that Jonathan Wild was quite taken by surprise, and it was a moment or two before he could recover his ordinary self-possession.

"Surrender!" cried the traveller, sternly. "You are caught, and so you may as well give in with good grace! I have resolved to make you prisoner single-handed, and I have done it! You thought you could deceive me, did you not? But, instead, you have been deceived!"

"Curses on you!" exclaimed the thief-taker. "You'll understand that I'm not caught yet!"

With these words he grappled with the traveller, and a desperate struggle took place.

Wild was not long in making the discovery that this traveller was stronger than himself, and that he stood a good chance of getting the worst of it.

"Noakes!" he cried—"Noakes, you villain! Would you stop there and see me captured? Help—help, I say!"

"Ah! rascal, you are not alone, then!" exclaimed the traveller. "I must make short work with you!"

And as he spoke, he made a sudden and desperate effort to pull Wild out of the saddle.

But he failed.

"Shoot him!—stab him!" screamed Wild, at the top of his voice. "Be quick, or you will be too late!"

Tremblingly, Mr. Noakes advanced to take part in the contest.

Being well aware that anyone approaching from behind would attack him with great disadvantage to himself, the traveller was compelled, in self-defence, to release his hold of Jonathan Wild.

As soon as he was released, the thief-taker let go also.

The first thing he did was to draw another pistol and fire.

The shot was an effectual one, though it was by chance only, for he fired before he had time to take proper aim.

With a strange, gurgling cry, the traveller clasped both his hands over his face, and tumbled backwards from the saddle into the road.

Wild laughed hideously.

"You had made up your mind to capture me single-handed, had you?" he cried, mockingly. "Well, then, you deserve what you have got for your pains!"

Just then his eye fell upon Mr. Noakes, and his anger was suddenly kindled.

"Curses on you, you cowardly wretch!" he shouted. "You would have stood by and seen me captured without attempting to raise your hand in my defence!"

"You told me you didn't want me!" cried the Governor. "As soon as you spoke and cried for help, I came!"

"Bah! You're a coward, and you know it! I think it would be a mercy if I were to send you to your account as well as this fool here!"

Wild had alighted from his steed, and as he spoke these last words he dealt the prostrate traveller a savage kick.

A groan followed.

"I must see what he has about him," he said. "I will make the adventure profitable, if I can."

Accordingly he stooped down, and began to rifle the traveller's pockets.

While thus engaged, he heard a sound which made him pause.

Mr. Noakes heard it at the same moment.

It was the heavy tramp of the officers' horses.

"D—n them!" yelled Wild, furiously. "They are still upon my track! Can I never elude them?"

"Mount—mount! Be quick!" cried Mr. Noakes. "They are frightfully close at hand! If you hesitate, you will be unable to escape!"

"Keep your cowardly tongue between your teeth!" was the reply. "Do you think I'm going to leave this man here with money in his pockets, even if the officers are close at hand? Hold!" he continued, seeing that Mr. Noakes was about to take flight. "If you stir till I am ready, I will fire a bullet after you!"

In an agony of fright, Mr. Noakes stopped at once.

He could not despise the threat which had just been uttered.

There lay the traveller on the ground, and he knew that Jonathan would not scruple to shoot him also if he did not obey.

With nimble fingers, Jonathan Wild transferred the contents of the traveller's pockets to his own, and then mounted his steed.

By the time he had done this, the officers were very close at hand indeed.

"Forward!" he cried. "Make good speed! Our horses are fresh! We shall outrun them yet!"

At a wild gallop they dashed onwards.

As the reader already expects, the approaching officers were those who had stopped at the inn so shortly after the departure of the two fugitives.

They came on with great swiftness; but the one who was riding in advance caught sight of a horse standing still near the middle of the road.

He pointed the object out to his companions, and they began to reduce their speed.

Directly afterwards, they all formed a circle round the spot where the encounter we have just described had taken place.

Lying on the ground in quite a pool of blood was the young man who had made so courageous an attack upon the thief-taker.

"Hallo!" cried the chief officer. "This seems as though the rascals were not far off! Dismount, one of you! We must see to this!"

He sprang from his own horse as he spoke.

"What a lucky thing it was," he continued, after a momentary inspection, "that this horse stood still! Release the gentleman's foot from the stirrup! If his horse had started off he would have been bruised to death on the road!"

This order was obeyed, and the movement caused by it made the traveller groan faintly.

"He isn't dead, then!" was the next remark. "Perhaps he may speak and tell us something!"

The traveller's hands were still clasped over his face, and so tightly, that the officer was not strong enough to remove them.

Finding this to be the case, he desisted from the attempt, and, bending his head down close to the wounded man's, he said:

"If you are able to speak, tell us who has wounded you thus!"

The traveller made a desperate effort to speak, and his struggles in consequence were frightful to witness.

But he failed to articulate a word.

"Was it Jonathan Wild?" suggested the chief officer.

The traveller uttered a gasping groan, which with difficulty might be construed into an affirmative.

"Has he gone down the road?"

There was another groan.

"Long ago?"

The traveller remained silent.

"Are you sure that it was Jonathan Wild?"

The traveller groaned again, and this time louder than before.

It was dreadful to witness his condition.

He lay there on the ground, sensible to all that was taking place around him, and able to hear all that was said, and to comprehend it; and he lay there, too, suffering the most exquisite torture that can be imagined.

Speak he could not, though he would have given much for the power to utter a few words.

"You had better remain here and see to the gentleman," said the chief officer, addressing the one who had dismounted. "In the meanwhile, we will continue the pursuit."

The condition of the hapless traveller produced a deep effect upon the officer in command.

"My lads," he said, "is this sort of thing to be permitted to go on? Shall such villains live? Forward!—follow me closely! They cannot be far off, and we shall have them yet!"

The officers uttered a responsive shout, and, plunging their spurs deep into their horses' flanks, renewed the chase after the fugitives with additional vigour.

CHAPTER DXLVII.

JONATHAN WILD HAS A HORRIBLE ADVENTURE AT THE TOLLGATE.

ALTHOUGH very little time was consumed by the officers' halt, it enabled Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes to get a considerable distance in advance.

The thief-taker heard them stop, and exclaimed:

"They have found the body on the road. They will examine it, of course. 'On—on with all speed! We must make the most we can of this opportunity!'"

The Governor did not reply, but kept as close behind his companion as he could.

Shortly, the sounds of hoof-beats in the rear struck distinctly upon their ears.

It was now that the excellence of the horses they had stolen made itself apparent, for the sounds behind, instead of increasing in loudness, grew fainter and fainter by degrees.

This encouraged Wild to urge them to still greater exertions.

Away they went at a headlong pace down the narrow, devious, lonely country lanes, luckily without meeting with a single person.

The landlord of the inn had certainly not exaggerated when he spoke of the value of the horses.

There were few, indeed, that could have equalled them in speed and endurance.

At last Jonathan commanded a halt.

Descending from the saddle, he laid himself down at full length upon the roadway, with his ear pressed closely to the earth.

Here he remained listening for some moments, and at last he rose with a chuckle of satisfaction.

"We've beat them again!" he cried, "I can't bear a single sound, so they must be miles behind us at the very least! Now then to consider which road to take."

Wild remounted, and, standing in the stirrups, took a long and careful look about him.

On one side, a succession of large, smooth meadows stretched out as far as the eye could reach.

The first of them was only separated from the cross-road in which he stood by a low hedge, which the horses could easily overleap.

After some deliberation, he determined to take this course.

"Follow!" was all he said, and, at the same moment, he turned his horse round, and leaped into the meadow.

Mr. Noakes followed, but somehow or other, in descending on the opposite side, he lost his balance and fell heavily to the ground.

As the turf was soft, he sustained very little injury, and Jonathan, by stretching out his hand promptly, secured the steed, which otherwise would probably have run away.

Mr. Noakes lay perfectly still for several minutes, for the fall had knocked nearly all the breath out of his body.

A shout from the thief-taker, however, made him presently scramble to his feet, and he remounted.

"How did that happen?" asked Wild, with a derisive laugh. "Why didn't you stick on?"

Mr. Noakes held his peace.

He knew if he replied he should only lay himself open to the jeers and taunts of his companion.

With even greater speed than they had yet made, the horses galloped across these meadows, and in half an hour they had placed a considerable distance between them and the spot where Noakes had had his fall.

Jonathan began to feel much easier in his mind, and to think that for this time at least he had got quite clear of his foes.

By pushing on steadily into the interior of the country, he hoped to reach a spot where he could remain for a time unmolested.

At last the termination of the meadows was reached.

Wild pulled up, and found he was divided from a broad and level high-road by a stout, thickly-planted hedge.

He remained a little while looking about him and listening.

But a profound silence reigned all around, and the high-road was perfectly deserted.

"I think we cannot do better than push along there," he said, pointing with his finger. "It is certainly the best way we can take. What do you say to another leap over this hedge, eh, Noakes? If you fail, you will find the road harder than the turf!"

"Is there a gate?" growled Noakes.

"I don't know. Look and see."

"Yes—there's one a few yards lower down."

"We will go through that, then," said Wild, "for the horses might injure themselves in some way in taking the leap, and there is really no necessity for it."

Accordingly they passed through the gate Mr. Noakes had mentioned.

At what is termed a hand-gallop they pushed on along the high-road.

They travelled several miles, and all the way it preserved its deserted appearance.

They did not meet with or overtake a single traveller, nor did they once come within sight of a human habitation.

Presently, however, they saw something straight before them in the distance, which the darkness rendered confused and indistinct.

It was a mass of something white.

Upon closer approach it resolved itself into a toll-gate.

The toll-house adjoining it was built of wood, and painted white, as was the gate itself, so that the whole had a somewhat ghastly and ghostlike appearance.

The gate was shut.

Upon reaching it, Jonathan cried in a loud voice for the tollman, and, after a minute or two's delay, a nightcapped head was projected from a window.

"Open the gate!" roared Wild—"come down and open the gate! We are in a hurry!"

"Wait till your hurry's over, then!" growled the gate-keeper, as he slammed the window, and leisurely proceeded to dress himself.

Jonathan shouted and knocked, but all to no purpose.

At last the door opened, and the man came forth.

"Tuppence—tuppence!" he cried. "Give me the money before I let you through!"

"Here is a shilling," cried Wild. "Now be quick! Did it ever strike you that it might be something in your pocket if you were to make haste and open the gate when any gentleman came?"

"Mind your own business, and I'll mind mine!" was the surly response.

"Very well, then—open the gate!"

"I am agoin' to, ain't I? What a blessed hurry you must be in, to be sure!"

With a lantern in one hand and a key in the other, the tollman walked towards the gate for the purpose of unlocking it, but just then a cry arose of such a hideous and unearthly character, that he started back several paces in affright.

Mr. Noakes, too, was greatly terrified, as was evidenced by his white face and trembling limbs.

His horse, too, grew restive and unmanageable, and so did Jonathan Wild's, and the thief-taker himself was not a little discomposed by the suddenness with which this horrible cry had risen upon the night air.

All the blood in his veins seemed to rush all at once back to his heart, and when there to congeal and turn to ice.

Then the awful cry came again.

Instinctively the strange and little group turned their eyes in the direction from which it came.

Then they saw dimly revealed by the tollman's lantern something which looked like a human form.

The resemblance, however, was but very slight.

By accident more than design, the tollman raised his lantern, so that most of its beams fell upon this strange and weird figure.

As though fascinated, Jonathan Wild fixed his eyes upon it.

Like the witches in "Macbeth," it "looked not like an inhabitant of the earth, but yet was on 't."

At first it could not be made out whether the figure was male or female.

The fluttering of some tattered garments in the wind seemed to show that it was a woman.

She came forward a step, and then sprang upward.

She seized hold of the top bar of the gate and clung to it with one arm, while with the other she pointed full in the countenance of the thief-taker.

She could now be seen with much greater plainness.

The loose flowing garments she had on were torn to shreds, and flapped against the woodwork to which she clung.

Her hair was long and matted, and of a silvery hue.

She was emaciated to the last degree, and the arm which she extended to the thief-taker was absolutely devoid of flesh.

The bones seemed to shine through the closely-fitting skin, so that the arm and hand appeared to belong to a skeleton, and not to a living creature.

When the tollkeeper saw all that we have just described, his terror naturally increased, and muttering something about a witch, he drew still further back.

As for Mr. Noakes, who was never stout-hearted, he was absolutely paralysed with fright, and from the manner in which he swung from side to side in the saddle, he appeared every instant about to fall to the earth.

And Jonathan Wild—that bold, bad, reckless man—was affected strangely by this hideous apparition.

He trembled from head to foot—the flesh seemed to creep upon his bones, while his heart beat so feebly that the blood flowed only sluggishly through its accustomed channels.

It was strange that such an effect should be produced upon such a man.

But, as we have before remarked, Jonathan Wild was superstitious, and, what was more, he recognised the horrible, unearthly-looking creature clinging to the gate.

In a shrieking tone of voice, the figure cried:

"Man of villany and blood, we have once more met! Again—again I warn you! Since we met you have had many wonderful escapes! The end is coming, I see. It has been protracted, but it will surely come at last!"

"Peace!" roared Wild, making use, by a strong effort, of his powers of speech, and speaking in a tone so loud as to drown the voice of the weird woman.—"peace, hag! Begone, or I will slay you!"

A loud and hideous laugh was the only response that was made to this threat.

"I tell you the end is coming!" screamed the hag—"I tell you it is not far off! I see it always before me, in the darkness and in the daylight! I see the hangman's cart—I see the trembling wretch within it! I see the triple tree at Tyburn—the huge crowd—the executioner; and I see Jonathan Wild standing beneath the fatal beam! That's your fate! The death to which you have doomed so many poor and helpless ones—that death shall you die!"

A cold sweat burst out from every pore in Wild's body.

He was absolutely paralysed with fear.

Never, probably, in the whole course of his life had he been so overcome with superstitious terror as he was then.

"Do you hear me?" shrieked the hag again. "You tried to scoff and jeer when I warned you last; but since then remember what has happened! You are no longer in power, as you were then. Part is already accomplished, for you are a fugitive, and the officers are at your heels! You may struggle—you may try to get away; but all your struggles will avail you nothing, for you are doomed—doomed—DOOMED to be strangled on Tyburn Tree!"

Wild drew a long breath, and then, in a cracked, unnatural tone of voice, he cried:

"Begone—depart, or I will shoot you!"

"Ha, ha!"

Wild took a pistol in his hand, but he trembled so excessively with fright that he could not possibly have taken aim.

Actuated by a second thought, he turned the muzzle towards the trembling tollkeeper, and yelled:

"Open the gate—open the gate, villain, and let me through! Open the gate, or you are a dead man!"

"Off—off!" shrieked the hag, waving her skinny arm, as the tollkeeper, in obedience to Wild's commands, stepped forward a few paces. "Approach not, at your peril!"

It would seem that the tollman had more dread of the unknown powers of mischief possessed by the hag than he had of the pistol; for, although Wild still pointed it towards him, he stood still.

With an oath, the thief-taker raised his arm.

By a sudden effort, he levelled the pistol at the shadowy figure at the gate.

For half a second his hand was steady, and he took advantage of that instant to pull the trigger.

The report was terrific, and a cloud of smoke hid, for a few moments, all objects just in front from view.

Trembling with dread of he knew not what, Wild looked in the direction where the figure had been.

It was there no longer.

It had disappeared as suddenly and completely as the smoke caused by the explosion of the gunpowder, not a vestige of which could now be perceived curling up in the air.

Oh, what an exquisite relief it was to the terrified soul of that bad man when he found that his eyes no longer rested on that figure which had for him unnumbered terrors!

As if by the effect of enchantment, he suddenly recovered himself, and assumed his old demeanour.

With an angry yell, he turned round, and, fixing his eyes upon the gatekeeper, he said:

"Villain, it is through your stupidity that all this has taken place! Open the gate, or, so surely as you now live, I will blow your brains out if you hesitate or refuse!"

There could be no mistaking the terrible earnestness of Wild's tones; and though he was in an extremity of fright, the tollman hastened to obey this command.

He scarcely dared to turn his eyes towards the spot where the old hag had been.

He fully expected to see her lying at his feet weltering in blood.

But, to his surprise, not a trace of her remained; she had disappeared completely.

Reassured by this, his hand grew steadier, and thrusting the key into the lock, he turned it and pushed the gate open.

No sooner did it recede upon its hinges, than Jonathan Wild plunged the spurs deeply into his horse's sides and dashed by.

Mr. Noakes followed, or rather his horse, for he was incapable of guiding him in the least.

But both creatures were greatly terrified, and it seemed a relief to them to gallop along the broad highway at the very top of their speed.

CHAPTER DXLVIII.

RETURNS TO GEORGE WILD, AND DESCRIBES HOW HE FARED WITH THE TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND POUNDS.

IN following uninterruptedly the fortunes of Jonathan Wild, and his companion in crime, Mr. Noakes, the late Governor of Newgate, we have, of necessity, lost sight, for a considerable period, of the other characters in this history, in whose fate, it is presumed, the reader feels the greatest possible amount of interest.

So long a time has elapsed since a word has been said about either of the other personages, that it is necessary for us to take a retrospective glance, and call to mind the exact positions in which they were last placed.

First, then, there are Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

It will be remembered that when we saw them last was when they were seated in a carriage along with the Lord Chancellor.

This was after they had made a full disclosure of all they knew respecting Edgworth Bess, and after they had, to some extent, established her claim to the name of Donnull.

Then Edgworth Bess herself, who was last left in that house in an obscure street in Westminster, where she was waiting anxiously for the return of her two friends.

Then there is another character of whom for a long while we have heard nothing, but who some time back figured somewhat prominently in these pages.

It is to this character and to his proceedings that we intend first of all to turn, as they were productive of serious consequences, as will be quickly seen.

We allude to George Wild, that bad son of a bad father.

He inherited all the vices and villany of his parent, without one redeeming qualification.

A more thoroughly heartless wretch than Wild junior it could be scarcely possible for the imagination to conceive.

He was of so base and treacherous a disposition that he could not by any possibility deal straightforwardly and fairly with anyone.

Although so many events have been since described, the reader will be able to remember how Jonathan Wild forgave the former misdoings of his son, and took him entirely into his confidence.

It will also be remembered how from the first George Wild had studied the means by which he could defeat his father, and reap the whole benefit of his nefarious schemes himself.

Partially he failed, but to a very great extent he was successful.

We allude now to his transaction at the bank.

He had discovered what the thief-taker imagined to be a secret locked within his breast, and George Wild, as soon as he found things were going wrong, drew out the whole of this money without the least remorse, and absconded with it, leaving his father to manage as best he could.

Elated with joy at obtaining so much money with so little trouble, Wild junior, as soon as he quitted the bank, made up his mind to leave England for ever in the smallest possible space of time.

At the time of which we write, however, this was not done so easily and so quickly as at the present day.

Two courses were open to him.

He might take his place in a Dover coach, and travel to the sea coast in that way; and the other was to ride as far as Gravesend, and get on board a vessel there that would take him at once to his destination.

After some hesitation, he resolved to adopt this last-mentioned mode of proceeding.

Indeed, believing that he was less likely to be noticed on water than on land, he took passage in a small boat as far as Gravesend.

Here he embarked on what was considered in those days a fast-sailing vessel, which was bound for the port of Lisbon.

It mattered little to him where he went, so long as it was out of England; and when he placed his foot upon the deck of the clumsy bark, a feeling of great exultation came over him, for he fully believed that he had entirely accomplished his design.

The twenty-four thousand pounds he had all safe enough in his pocket, and with such an amount as that, he knew very well he could live like a prince for the remainder of his days in any foreign land.

The prospect before him was truly a delightful one, and the rascal amused himself by speculating on all his future proceedings.

With the first favourable wind that sprang up, the vessel dropped down the river to Sheerness.

Afterwards it stood fairly out to sea, and when Wild junior saw the white cliffs of England receding from his view, he made doubly sure that all was well.

For the first day or two he found his voyage pleasant enough.

All objects were quite fresh, and his thoughts were busy.

But after that time, the monotony of life on board ship began to tell seriously upon him.

He could no longer enjoy his own thoughts as much. Strive as he would, he could not fix them upon the future, but they pertinaciously reverted to the past.

And in that past there was nothing that he could remember with any degree of satisfaction.

In this extremity, he began to look around him at the different faces on board, in search of some one that he could make a companion of.

He first of all made advances to the captain, but in this direction he met with no success.

This probably was because the captain was a bluff, open-hearted man, and certainly not the character to associate with one of George Wild's stamp.

One evening, as he was sitting upon the deck, whiling away the time with a pipe, the steward accosted him.

What qualification it was that had gained for this man his present situation we cannot say, but certainly it was not his good looks.

Indeed, a more repulsive countenance than he possessed could scarcely have been found.

He had thick lips and large projecting teeth; his eyes were deeply sunk into his head, and overhung with huge shaggy eyebrows, and his forehead receded in a manner that looked very strange when his hat was off.

Wild junior was glad enough to take advantage of the opportunity of joining in conversation, and as they stood together they certainly seemed a fitting pair.

"I should think you are tired of being on deck staring about," said the steward—"you look so, at any rate."

"I am," was the reply; "but what else am I to do? Where can I go?"

"Well, there's my room," replied the steward. "You might find it a change to go down there. We might be able to amuse ourselves."

"How so?"

"Oh, in many ways!" was the evasive answer.

"Now, look here," said Wild—"I want something to occupy my mind. Have you got any cards with you?"

The steward's eyes brightened as he answered:

"I have an old pack, not quite complete. It's done good service in its time. I'll try and find them for you, if you like."

"Good! Then we will have a game together."

With these words the two men descended to the steward's room.

After some search the cards were found, and at the same time a large can of grog was placed upon the table.

"Ah, this is something like!" said Wild junior, as he shuffled the cards. "I never thought about this before. The time will pass pleasantly enough, for if the stakes are moderate, you can never get tired of playing at cards."

"I am fond of a hand now and then myself," said the steward, "though I can't get much opportunity."

"I suppose not."

"Nor have I much money to spare, so you must be content to play for low stakes."

"As you will," replied George. "Low or high, it makes no difference to me."

Matters being thus arranged, a guinea was placed upon the table, and the game began.

Gambling was just the kind of vice in which such a one as George Wild would be likely to indulge.

And the only wonder is he did not think of it earlier.

Game followed game with varying results.

After a time, Wild junior got to his last guinea.

He had to get change for a five-pound note, in order to lay down his next stake.

He pulled one of the little rolls from his pocket, which, though it did not represent one twentieth part of the money he had about him, was yet sufficient to make the steward's eyes sparkle with avarice.

No remark was made by him, however.

He took the note, examined it, and placed it in his pocket.

But, after the grog-can had been for the second time replenished, the steward ventured to remark:

"I suppose, sir, that you are going abroad entirely for your own pleasure?"

"Oh yes, entirely!" said George. "I intend to travel about from one foreign place to another, and enjoy myself."

"Ah, such a thing as that must be very pleasant indeed, providing you only have the means!"

"Very," replied George—"very!"

"I have often wished," continued the steward, "that I had had the opportunity; but some are lucky, and others the reverse. Now, I have had to spend nearly all my life on board ship."

Wild junior only nodded, and went on with his game.

"You will find it an expensive thing to follow up," pursued the steward, anxious to obtain all the information he could.

"It won't reach the bottom of my pocket, nohow," said George, in reply.

"Then it's a deep one," mentally remarked the steward. The conversation was then changed, and the play proceeded.

At last, in sheer disgust at his ill-luck, Wild junior threw down the cards and left the steward's room, some twenty pounds poorer than he was when he entered it.

"D—n him for a cheat!" he muttered, in a thick voice, as he retired to his own berth. "He must have cheated me! I'll play no more; I was a fool to begin it! There's no end to gambling, and if I have ever so much money it will soon all melt away!"

This was a prudent resolution, but one that has been taken over and over again by those who have once yielded themselves up to the fascination of play.

True to his determination, George Wild on the following day kept as clear of the steward as he could, and amused himself in the best manner he was able.

But as evening came on the old weariness returned.

It was then that the steward approached him again.

At first Wild junior resolutely refused to accompany him to his cabin, but in a few minutes the temptation became too strong for him to resist.

Once again, then, he seated himself at the table, and the play began.

The first can of grog was disposed of, and another mixed by the steward.

A quarter of an hour elapsed, during which George, in his excitement, had drunk rather deeply of the grog.

The steward's glass was before him on the table, untouched.

"D—n it, man," he cried, "why don't you drink?"

The steward licked his lips and glanced furtively at George under his shaggy brows.

"I can't drink when I am winning! Fortune is again on my side!"

"Yes, d—n her for a jade!" replied Wild, in a voice which was thick and husky. "I am in ill-luck again to-night!"

"Play!" cried the steward, and once more the stakes were placed upon the table.

Another game was played, and this time Wild junior won.

Delighted with his success, and believing the tables

[JACK SHEPPARD IS FILLED WITH DISAPPOINTMENT AND DESPAIR.]

were about to turn, he entered into the game with fresh spirit.

But his brain began to grow confused in spite of all his efforts to concentrate his ideas.

"D—n it! what's this?" he cried, placing his hand to his forehead. "My head turns round like a top!"

"You've laid in too much grog," said the steward, with a sinister smile.

"That be d—d!" was the almost inarticulate reply. "I could drink four times as much without feeling as I do now! Curse me! I—half suspect—that—"

George struggled painfully to his feet. But just then the vessel gave a sudden lurch, and he fell down, striking his head with great violence against a locker.

He became insensible at once.

The steward rose, and approached him with a stealthy step.

No. 117.—BLUESKIN.

"That's done the business!" was his exclamation. "I thought I was going to have some trouble with him; but he's right enough now! He began to suspect before he had drunk grog enough; but that topper on his head-piece has made up for all!"

Wild junior lay like one dead on the floor of the steward's cabin.

Cautiously the steward went to the door, and secured it in the best way he was able.

Then he returned to the prostrate form and bent over it.

"Now my dream will be realised," he muttered in an excited voice. "What I have hoped for and longed for for this twenty years is within my reach! He has money—heaps of money! No doubt the greatest part of it is about his person. I don't believe that he came honestly by the money, no matter how much it is; but what's that to me? Nothing—nothing at all! I will have it!"

With trembling fingers the steward began to search in the pockets of George Wild.

Roll after roll of bank-notes was produced, and each one that he handled only served to increase the excitement of the plunderer.

"Oh, what a fortune is here!" he exclaimed. "Thousands upon thousands! Now I am rich! I will keep all this wealth a secret, and the first time we touch the land I'll desert the ship. Yes, I am rich! And now to dispose of this rascal!"

While speaking these words, the steward had carefully possessed himself of all the valuables which Wild junior carried about him, and having made them up into one large parcel, deposited it in his sea-chest.

Then, going to the door of his cabin, he listened, in order to ascertain whether anyone was near.

But, with the exception of the watch on deck, everybody in the ship had retired to rest, so there was no likelihood of his villainous scheme being interfered with.

It was a cold-blooded, treacherous deed that he had perpetrated and was about to bring to a consummation, though, of course, none of our readers can pity such a one as George Wild.

Having secured his ill-gotten wealth, all that remained for him to do was to get rid of the body, and how he did this we will now proceed to relate.

CHAPTER DXLIX.

DESCRIBES WHAT THE STEWARD DID WITH THE BODY OF WILD JUNIOR.

THE reader no doubt suspects the true reason of the sudden stupor which seized upon George Wild.

It was not owing to the quantity of strong grog he had drunk, for his constitution was so well seasoned that he could have imbibed a much greater quantity with impunity.

It was because the steward had mixed with the second can a drug which he had stolen out of the medicine chest in the surgeon's room.

His motive for doing this deed is also self-evident.

It was in order to obtain possession of the money George carried about with him.

Not that the steward by any means expected that Wild junior had about his person so large a sum as twenty-four thousand pounds, though, from the sight of the roll of bank-notes, and from the manner in which George had behaved, the steward came to the conclusion that the amount was considerable.

All his life he had been a needy man.

As he had said himself, he had been compelled to spend most of his time on the ocean.

Not that he by any means liked a seafaring life.

Quite the reverse.

But it was the only course open to him by which he could gain employment, for on shore his character was about as bad as anyone's could be.

With regard to his poverty, however.

This was not because he did not earn good wages. He always received a large sum at the conclusion of every voyage, but it vanished in no time—so that, in order to obtain the necessities of life, he was obliged to go on board ship again.

It was always with regret, however, that he left his native land.

Unfortunately for one in his position in life, he possessed extravagant and luxurious tastes, and he did not care so long as these were gratified.

Villanous and unscrupulous in disposition, and desiring wealth above all other things, he did not hesitate to commit murder in order to obtain it.

With this explanation we resume.

George was now insensible and unable to make the least resistance, so it is not to be supposed that the steward would have any great difficulty in disposing of him.

He crossed his cabin, and drew back the shutter which covered an opening in the ship's side, made for the purpose of allowing fresh air to enter when the sea was calm.

The spray dashed in, but, unheeding of this, the steward crept towards the spot where his victim lay at full length.

Seizing George by the arms, he dragged him along the floor, and then, by a sudden exertion of strength, raised him up, and thrust him through the porthole.

Had it been the result of magic, the disappearance of George Wild could not have been more sudden than it was.

The steward closed the shutter again.

His lips were white, and there was a strange look about his eyes.

In a trembling voice, he said:

"That's over—it is all over now! I shall never be troubled with him any more! He is gone, and the money is mine!"

He looked about him carefully, in order to get rid of any trace that might remain of the villainous deed that he had committed.

In falling against the sharp edge of the locker, George had cut his head slightly, so that on the floor there were a few drops of blood.

These were easily enough removed.

With the steward, however, we have at present no more to do.

We must return to Wild junior.

There is an old proverb which says that "the man who is born to be hanged can never be drowned," and this seemed to be the case with George Wild; for in what other manner could his miraculous escape be accounted for?

The sudden shock which the immersion in the cold water produced, partially restored him to his senses.

His brain was confused. He had no clear idea of where he was or what he was about.

But, with the instinct of self-preservation, he struck out, and sustained his head above water.

The fall against the locker was a most favourable circumstance for him, so far as the preservation of his life was concerned.

The amount of blood he had lost was just about sufficient to counteract the effects of the narcotic that had been administered to him in the grog.

It will be remembered that the steward at first fancied his victim had not drunk enough to produce the desired effect; and this was actually the case, for Wild's suspicions were aroused just in time to save himself.

The sudden plunge into the cold water, then, combined with the loss of blood from his head, had the effect of restoring him to consciousness.

By degrees the conviction dawned upon him that he was floating on the ocean.

How he came to be in his present position was a profound mystery.

As his intellects gradually recovered their proper use, he looked around him, as well as the darkness of the night would permit.

Just visible as a dusky mass of something was the ship in which he had embarked.

Even as he gazed upon it, its outline became blurred and indistinct, and he lost sight of it altogether.

Truly was his position now a perilous one.

Alone on the ocean, with nothing to support himself with save his own muscles, and he knew that in a little while they would tire.

He was weak, too, and not in a condition to make much exertion.

Therefore he did nothing but attempt to keep himself afloat on the surface of the water.

He was miles and miles away from land, and it was folly for him to think of making the attempt to swim towards it.

He would only exhaust himself if he tried to do it.

Of all this George Wild was conscious.

He shouted aloud and screamed for help, in the hope that his voice might be carried to friendly ears; but there was no prospect of coming help, and presently, hoarse and tired, he became silent.

Then his ever active brain went to work to solve what was at present an inscrutable problem.

How came he in the water?

He fixed his recollections upon one point which he could distinctly remember.

This was, accompanying the steward to his cabin, and playing at cards.

By many severe mental efforts he then managed to call to mind, little by little, everything that had taken place up to the moment when the conviction came upon him that he had been drugged.

He could remember trying to stand upon his feet, and failing in the attempt.

Of course, after that, everything was a total blank.

The next thing he could remember was being in the water.

He tried in vain to fill up the gap by memory, and at last he endeavoured to do it by speculation.

Wild junior got so far, and then another thought presented itself to his imagination, of so horrible a character that it seemed to paralyse all his faculties, mental and physical.

"It's that steward!" he thought; "I know d—d well it is! He's drugged me, and thrown me overboard!"

Up to this moment he had not suspected that he had been robbed of all the wealth he carried about him.

Now, however, in seeking for a motive for the steward's behaviour, it was suggested to him.

While in his present situation, of course he could not conveniently ascertain whether his money was still safe or not.

But the more he thought, the more certain did he feel that all had been taken from him, and that he had not a penny left.

Such an effect did this produce upon him, that he almost felt as though he could then and there abandon all attempts to save his life, and quietly sink to the bottom of the ocean.

What could he do now that, by one stroke, he had been robbed of all that which he had earned with so much skill and trouble?

Of what use would life be to him without the twenty-four thousand pounds?

This despairing feeling began at length to pass away.

He strove hard to buoy himself up with the hope that things were not so bad as they seemed to be.

"He may have taken some," he said, "but surely not all my wealth!"

This was a forlorn hope, but still it served to sustain him. Just then he felt some object strike against him with considerable violence—indeed, he could not refrain from uttering a cry of pain.

He looked around.

It was some dark, black object floating on the surface of the billows, which had come in contact with him.

No sooner did he make this discovery than the hope sprang up in his breast that, if he could overtake this object, whatever it was, and seize hold of it, it would enable him to sustain himself upon the water with much less exertion than he had hitherto been compelled to make.

The occurrence of this thought and the endeavour to get hold of this floating object were simultaneous.

It was a difficult undertaking, and several times it slipped through his fingers when he thought he had secured it.

But he had every incentive to make repeated trials, and at length, when almost overpowered, he succeeded.

The floating object was a small cask, which will at once account for the difficulty there was in grasping it.

It was light and buoyant, and while he could keep hold of it, there was no fear of his sinking.

He clung to it with both hands.

His head was easily sustained above the water, and he was drifted onwards and onwards by the billows, he knew not whither.

When he was thrown overboard, the night was already far advanced, and yet it seemed to Wild junior that the morning would never come.

But, with their accustomed speed, the hours passed by, and morning broke upon the ocean.

Then the sun rose, and as soon as he was able to do so, George took a long look about him, in the hope of being able either to catch sight of the land or of some approaching vessel.

But he was disappointed.

From his position, his head being on a level with the water, he could not command a very extensive view; in fact, it was only when he was sustained for a moment by the crest of some swelling billow that he was able to see at all.

He strained his eyes, and looked around him in all directions.

But the result was the same.

Nothing but water was around him on all sides.

During the long hours of darkness, George had buoyed himself up with the hope that, as soon as ever the sun rose, he should be able to see some vessel.

Now that he was deceived in this expectation, his heart sank with despair.

He felt almost inclined to abandon all effort to prolong his life.

He was fearfully exhausted by his buffetings with the waves, and his arms, clasped round the cask, and retained in one position so long, got terribly cramped, and he was afraid each moment that he should have to let go his hold.

He was, moreover, sick and faint from the effects of the drug.

By-and-by he began to wonder whether this cask to which he clung contained anything or was empty.

He fancied the former would prove to be the case, more especially from the size and appearance of the cask, which he set down at once as being a brandy keg.

If so, his encounter with it would indeed be a most fortunate circumstance.

How was he to ascertain it? and, supposing it to be filled with spirits, how was he to partake of any of it?

He knew that he had a large knife in his pocket; but then, how was he to take it out, and at the same time retain his hold?

At length he decided upon the somewhat hazardous experiment of supporting himself with one hand and arm alone, while with the other he attempted to take the knife from his pocket.

He succeeded better than he had dared to anticipate.

He took out the knife, and held it with a tenacious grip; for if he once let go, it would sink to the bottom of the ocean and be entirely beyond recovery.

The knife was closed, of course; but this was no great difficulty.

With his teeth he pulled open the large blade, and then, with one arm encircling the cask, he set to work to cut a small hole in the side.

This was a long and tedious operation, but yet it had a beneficial effect, for the time seemed to pass away more quickly.

Every now and then he would pause in his work, and look around him, but at last he grew disheartened, for the result was always the same.

After more than an hour's labour, consequent upon the awkwardness of his position, he managed to cut a small hole completely through the cask.

Through this hole, to his joy, he then saw some dark fluid slowly oozing.

That it was brandy he firmly believed, and congratulated himself upon his caution in having made the hole so small that it could not escape in any large quantity.

He restored the knife to his pocket, and after many efforts, placed his lips over the hole.

His heart bounded with joy.

It was indeed brandy, and he drank a considerable quantity.

The fiery beverage endued him with a spurious and fleeting kind of strength.

It banished for a time all those despairing feelings which had found a home in his heart, and he looked about him more hopefully and in better spirits than he had yet done.

He believed he must be dreaming, or that the liquor had produced an extraordinary effect upon him, for in one direction he could count no less than seven vessels and nearly all of them of large size.

He closed his eyes, believing this to be some delusion of his senses, but he opened them and was convinced that what he saw was real.

The ships were all at a short distance from each other, and going in the same direction.

Wild junior's heart beat fast as he wondered what means he could adopt to make those on board aware of his perilous situation.

They were a long way off yet, and he could scarcely decide in his own mind whether they were approaching him or not.

To have shouted aloud would have been vain.

He knew it, and was silent.

All that lay in his power was to fix his eyes upon the vessels, straining his vision to the utmost, in order to make quite sure whether they were coming nearer to him or not.

CHAPTER DL.

GEORGE WILD HAS ANOTHER NARROW ESCAPE FROM A WATERY GRAVE.

AN hour passed away, and at the expiration of that time the seven vessels had sensibly diminished in size.

For a long time George Wild had been aware that the vessels were going further away from him, but he blinded himself from this knowledge as long as he was able.

At last he was unable to delude himself with this idea any longer, and broke forth into a torrent of vain and useless imprecations.

Then he applied himself afresh to the brandy keg, and so the day passed away, and darkness once more covered the deep.

Now Wild junior began to feel severely the want of sleep.

Yet he dared not close his eyes, for fear his slumber should grow profound, in which case he would probably let the cask slip out of his arms.

Still, strive as he would, in the long hours of the night his eyes would gradually close, and he would fall off into a slight, uneasy slumber.

Then he would suddenly awake with a start, as he fancied he was about to lose the cask.

Without it he felt he could not for any length of time preserve himself upon the surface of the water—these few staves of wood alone connected him with life.

No incident of any particular moment occurred during the whole of the night, and the sun, when it rose, found Wild junior in a terrible condition.

He suffered greatly from the want of sleep—he was hungry and thirsty, too.

A kind of delirium caused by drinking the strong brandy had taken possession of his brain.

He was so frightfully weak that he could scarcely raise himself up by the aid of the cask, so as to be able to look around him.

He felt quite certain that he could not possibly survive many hours longer, and, unless help came, and very speedily, he should perish.

The water by degrees grew calmer than it had been since the time of his immersion, and consequently he was able to see still further around him.

A hideous, shrieking cry burst from his lips as he saw not far off a small, clumsy-looking vessel.

He believed it was near enough for his voice to reach those on board, and he continued to scream out incessantly.

No notice, however, of his cries seemed to be taken.

It was necessary, then, that he should adopt some means of attracting their attention.

After a moment's thought, he altered his position slightly, and held the cask with one hand.

With the other he took off his white neckcloth.

This he raised in the air as high as he possibly could, and waved it repeatedly.

This signal was more effective than the other, though he was just beginning to give up in despair, when he heard an answering shout from those on board the little vessel.

He was seen, and the knowledge came upon him with such an overpowering effect that he almost lost his senses.

Then there was an interval, which seemed an age, that was occupied by the boat making its way towards him.

It was only a little fishing boat, such as are never seen except within a short distance of the shores of England.

But Wild junior was not in a state of body or mind to notice this.

It was a ship, and that was enough.

With much difficulty he was got on board.

He was almost insensible, and yet he managed to gasp out:

"The cask—the cask! Get that too—it is full of brandy!"

There was an immediate commotion among the fishermen on board the little bark, and they all looked eagerly after the prize.

The cask was soon got on board, and then prompt steps were taken to recover Wild junior.

He got better rapidly, and as soon as he was able to do so, he related the events which had befallen him.

In reply, he was told that the little vessel to which he owed his preservation happened to be in her present situation by mere chance.

The wind which had sprung up some hours before had carried her out of her course, and they were now so far away from the land that they were apprehensive whether they should ever be able to reach it again.

"It all depends upon the weather," said the owner of the vessel, who was in command of it. "If the wind is fair, all will be well—if not, we shall go to Davy Jones's locker!"

This was not reassuring intelligence, but the worst was conveyed by it.

After having depended for so long upon nothing better than a brandy keg to save him from drowning, the fishing-boat seemed to George Wild an ark of safety, so he troubled himself very little about the communication the master fisherman had made.

He was also in a terribly exhausted condition, and not fit to take an interest in anything.

Food was administered to him, however, and before many hours had elapsed he was almost himself again.

But such a change had come over Wild junior as quite defies any description.

Perhaps the reader can imagine what would be his feelings when he found his worst forebodings realised, and that of the large sum of money he had with him not even the smallest coin now remained.

His cursing and blaspheming was truly awful to listen to, and more than once the master of the vessel, who was not a little alarmed at their critical position, besought him to be silent, lest their vessel should be lost.

But these solicitations at first only made Wild junior more violent than ever, and it was not until they all threatened to heave him overboard again that he became quiet.

Oh! how he longed to have revenge upon the villainous steward, and how he imprecated his own folly and blindness in having fallen so easily into the snare laid for him!

He was able to call philosophy enough to his aid to be aware that all regrets were perfectly useless now.

He must, in a manner of speaking, begin life afresh, but there is little hope that any amendment will be perceived in it.

He learned with satisfaction from the master of the boat that they were making their way in as direct a line as possible to Portsmouth.

This landing-place would suit Wild junior excellently, because he should be able to get to London readily.

It was towards the latter place that his thoughts immediately turned, that being the only place that was large enough for the exercise of his talents, and the only place where he could hope to repair his severe loss.

It was hard to bring himself to think that he had all his schemes to go over again; but, like his father, George possessed an indomitable will, and did not suffer himself to be cast down by the misfortune that had come upon him.

Perhaps this was because he could so clearly see that he was greatly to blame himself.

The clumsy bark made but slight progress through the water; and on the following day George strained his eyes to the utmost, but failed to perceive any indication of land.

He was assured by the master, however, that England was not far off.

As the day advanced, the weather began to present an unfavourable aspect.

The clouds in the sky above formed themselves into dense masses.

The wind howled with a peculiar and mournful cadence among the masts and rigging.

The sea rose and fell, and there was every token of the approach of a severe storm.

This was what the master had all along dreaded.

"All is lost, I fear!" he said, addressing George.

"Why so?"

"This little vessel of mine, after the injuries she has already sustained, could never weather through a storm."

"Let us hope that it may be nothing serious," said George.

The master shook his head, and went away, in order to see that every preparation should be made.

His prognostications were quite correct.

Just after sunset, a terrific storm broke out.

Until then, George Wild had no idea of what a storm at sea was like.

He was terrified.

Every moment seemed as though it would surely be his last.

The timbers in the little bark groaned and creaked, and every sea broke over her.

By the advice of the master, George Wild allowed himself to be securely lashed to the mast.

But for this precaution, he would certainly have been swept away.

Several of the crew, who had secured themselves in the best way they were able, were washed overboard.

The man at the helm was lashed there, and the captain clung tightly to the iron windlass on deck.

But the storm showed no signs of abatement; on the contrary, its violence increased.

Then one wave, larger, and heavier, and stronger than any Wild junior had seen, or had been able to form the least conception of, came rolling towards them like a huge wall of water.

It burst upon the deck.

No vessel, however well-constructed, could stand such a shock as that.

George Wild had the sensation of being overwhelmed with water, and the next thing he was conscious of was that he was struggling in the waves.

Of the bark and its occupants not a single trace remained.

He had good cause to congratulate himself upon having followed the captain's advice.

The ropes which had been bound round his body still held him to the mast, and the huge piece of wood kept him afloat easily.

"I'm doomed to be drowned!" he thought, and prepared to resign himself to his fate, which he believed was inevitable.

He struggled no longer, but lay quite still.

As it turned out, this was the best thing he could do under the circumstances.

His head was above the water, and the force of the wind and waves drifted him rapidly onwards, but whither he knew not.

If landward, then there was some chance of escape; if seaward, he was lost.

In his present position, Wild junior was quite at a loss to ascertain in which of these two directions he was going.

He remained in a horrible state of anxiety and dread.

Throughout the whole of that night the storm raged; and although it abated towards daybreak, yet when the sun rose the ocean was rough and turbulent.

With much pain and difficulty, for he was numbed and cramped with exposure to the cold, George raised himself slightly.

He took advantage of a time when he was high up on a billow to look about him.

A cry of joy and surprise burst from his lips.

The land seemed within half a mile of him.

But he lost sight of it in an instant, as the piece of wood to which he was attached sank down into the trough of the sea.

When he rose again, he believed himself nearer, and such was really the case.

It seemed to him to take a tedious time to go over such a little distance; but there was no means by which he could increase his speed, for, in his present exhausted condition, it would have been folly on his part to have made the attempt to swim ashore.

At last, however, about noon, he found himself so close to the land that he could touch the bottom with his feet.

Then he tried to release himself from the mast to which he had been bound.

But the fishermen had performed their task too well.

He could not separate himself from it.

Consequently, he was forced to resign himself to the action of the waves, and it was fortunate the beach upon which he was cast was of a sandy character.

Had it been rocks, he must have been dashed to pieces.

As it was, he was severely bruised; and, at length, so greatly did his suffering increase—as he was first drifted on to the sand, and then washed back again—that he became insensible.

When he opened his eyes again, and became conscious of existence, he found that the waves had washed him high up on the beach, and there left him.

He was in a most awkward position, and the wet ropes pained him exceedingly.

As well as he could he looked around him, but he appeared to be on a very lonely part of the coast.

There was not so much as a fisherman's cottage in sight.

Under these circumstances, he was forced to rely upon his own exertions for success.

After infinite toil, he succeeded in releasing himself.

He was then so tired, and cramped, and stiff, as scarcely to be able to move a muscle or a joint.

Mechanically his eyes wandered over the huge expanse of water presented to his gaze, and as he did so an angry cry rose to his lips.

Then, in something like his own tone and manner, he muttered:

"If I trust myself on the sea again, may I be d—d! I am on land at last, and nothing shall compel me to quit it!"

The tightness of the ropes had, to a very great extent, impeded the circulation of his blood.

Now that they were removed, however, he rapidly experienced a change for the better.

In a little while he was able to rise, and then to walk.

He had scarcely any portable articles with him save his clothes.

That he was penniless the reader has already been informed.

He was famished, too, and his mouth, from the quantity of salt water which had forced itself down his throat, was dry and parched.

"I must find some place of shelter!" he said. "And yet, where am I to look for it while in this state of poverty? I must beg!"

He seemed to have a weary journey before him, for, although he scanned the beach for many miles up and down, he was unable to catch a glimpse of the meanest habitation.

He had no resource but to bend his steps landward.

Presently, in the distance, he perceived a house of large and pretending appearance, which stood alone in the centre of extensive grounds.

The place had evidently been lately built.

As it was the only habitation in sight, George Wild was forced to make his way towards it, there to solicit assistance and support.

Upon drawing nearer, he found that the large gates leading into the grounds were closed and fastened.

A strong wooden fence enclosed the house and grounds, and, in his present enfeebled state, George knew that it would be foolish for him to attempt to climb over it.

He was almost in despair, when he happened to perceive the handle of a bell.

It was almost beyond his reach, and it was in consequence of it being so high up that it had escaped his notice.

With a last effort of strength, he stretched his arm as high above his head as he could, and grasped it.

A loud, clanging sound immediately followed, and, breathless and exhausted, he waited for a response to his summons.

CHAPTER DLI.

WILD JUNIOR PROVES HIMSELF TO BE A MONSTER OF INGRATITUDE.

His brain spun round and round, and he fancied for a time that existence was slipping from him.

Remembering where he was and what he had to do enabled him, however, to recover himself, though it cost a severe effort.

Then the doors were unclosed, and he heard a voice say, in kindly tones:

"Who is it, Reuben—who is it?"

"A poor, miserable-looking object, sir!" was the reply. "He looks like a drowned dead rat!"

"Help—help!" cried George Wild, faintly—"help me, or I shall die at your gates!"

"Die at my gates?" said the kindly voice again—"die at my gates? Oh, good gracious!—the idea of such a thing! Help him in, Reuben—help him in! He shall be properly attended to! Cheer up, my good fellow!" he added, addressing Wild in the same pleasant voice. "Be of good heart! You shall not perish, if it lies in my power to save you!"

"Thanks—thanks!" said George, more faintly than before.

The man Reuben was employed by the owner of the house to perform a multitude of services, among which, answering the gate was one.

"What shall I do with him, sir?" he asked, addressing the white-haired, benevolent-looking old gentleman who stood by his side, and who was the owner and occupier of the house beyond. "Where shall I put him, sir?"

"Take him up to the house, of course—take him up to the house!"

"If you will assist me a little," said George, "I can walk; but I am very weak! I have been face to face with death!"

"You look as if you had," said the old gentleman. "But come along—all's right now!"

His words produced a soothing effect upon Wild junior, and served also to infuse additional strength into his enfeebled limbs; and, with more firmness and ease than could have been expected, he walked slowly along the broad, winding path that led from the gates up to the front door of the house.

The old gentleman followed close behind, with compassion and love for all his fellow-creatures in distress beaming from his face.

Long before the front door was reached, it was thrown open, and an old lady, whoseemed the fitting and worthy mate of such a one as the old gentleman, made her appearance.

Several servants followed her.

There was no necessity for her to ask a single question.

No one knew her husband's charitable disposition better than she did herself.

One glance at the pallid, trembling, wet figure, supported by Reuben, was a sufficient explanation.

No one in distress or want ever presented themselves at those large gates and went away unrelieved.

By the assistance of the domestics, George Wild was carried into the house and placed in a bed.

Every possible attention was paid to him, and no effort was spared to recover him from his dreadful condition.

As it was little else than hunger, thirst, and the effects of being so long exposed to cold and wet that ailed George Wild, and as he was naturally of a strong constitution, he soon got better.

On the next day he was well enough to get up and walk about, though he was still feeble to a degree.

Every possible kind of nourishment was forced upon him by the hospitable inmates of the house, and George Wild had good cause to rejoice that fortune had been so kind to him as to throw him in the way of two such people as these were.

At their request, he gave a full account of all his sufferings.

It was not quite true, but nearly so.

For instance, he did not say that by a base stratagem he had obtained possession of twenty-four thousand pounds belonging to his father, and had fled the country with the amount; but he stated he had taken passage, of his own free will, on board a vessel bound for the port of Lisbon, and that he had been thrown overboard by the steward for the sake of what wealth he carried about with him.

For the rest, all he said was no more than the truth; and when the old gentleman and his wife heard the story of his incredible sufferings, they were filled with wonder and compassion.

He informed them that he wished to reach London, and the old gentleman said:

"I know not and care not who you are, but I feel sorry for your sufferings. As soon as you are well enough to take the journey, you shall leave this place, and I will provide you with a few necessaries for the journey."

Wild junior was profuse in his acknowledgments and thanks; in fact, the manner in which he expressed his gratitude was rather irksome to the good people than otherwise.

But in all that he said George was perfectly sincere.

On this occasion he showed that he had a heart, and that the behaviour of these strangers to him had touched it.

For a few days George remained here in peacefulness and silence.

By slow and insensible degrees his evil nature began to gain the ascendancy over him.

To a great extent, he forgot the immense benefits that had been showered upon him by the good people of the house; at any rate, the grateful feeling which had held possession of his heart waned exceedingly.

He began to look about him—at the various plain but costly articles contained within the house, and also to speculate upon what was the probable amount of wealth possessed by his benefactor.

The more he pursued these thoughts and speculations, the more did the evil in his nature gain the supremacy.

"In this world," he said to himself, a day or two before the time that had been fixed for his departure—"in this world there is nothing but a perpetual struggle going on between the strong and the weak—the wary and the unwary. Of course, those who are strongest and possess the most cunning are the best off, while the weak and the scrupulous go to the wall. I have been entrapped and plundered of all I had without remorse. This old man, who has been thrown in my way by chance, possesses plenty, and would not miss a little. To be sure, he has said he would provide me with some necessities for my journey, which is all that could be expected from a man in the way of charity; but I want something more. I have been robbed of that which I had, and I will rob to make up the deficiency!"

That, in the angry state of his mind, and with so little consideration for the things of others as he always had, Wild junior should come to some determination like the present is not surprising.

But that he should contemplate plundering the man who had rendered him such essential service in the hour of need, and who had done everything in his power to ameliorate his condition, was truly heartless and horrible.

Still, it is no more than might have been expected from the son of Jonathan Wild.

He was tolerably strong,—it might be said that he had recovered from the effects of his late adventures; and the more he pondered upon the idea of making such an ungrateful return for the benefits which had been so unworthily showered upon him, the more determined he became to carry it out.

"It is just what I need to put me right," he said to himself, "and why should I scruple to take it? Such a man must have enough and to spare."

After this, Wild junior's resolve became settled.

He was allowed to roam at will over every portion of the house, and consequently he had every opportunity of planning his villainous design.

He had every chance in his favour.

There were only a few domestics in the house, so that he did not apprehend any difficulty from them.

On the very next night he made up his mind to carry out his purpose.

He had ascertained that the owner of the house kept his plate and jewels, and what ready money he had, in a large and strong iron chest.

This chest he invariably kept under his bed, and slept with the keys beneath his pillow.

To know this was a great deal, but still there were so many difficulties in the way of carrying out his nefarious plan that it would not have been surprising if he had hesitated.

But he did not.

On the night he had selected for his black design, he retired to his own room, and sat patiently near the window. He waited until every sound had died away, and until he felt almost certain in his mind that every inhabitant of the house was sound asleep.

He then rose silently to his feet, and crept with the greatest caution towards the bed-room door.

He opened it without making a sound, and projected his head into the corridor beyond.

He listened intently, but all was still.

Reassured by this, he made his way with slow and cautious steps towards the door of the room in which the old gentleman slept.

It must be understood that Wild junior had no tools with him requisite for such an expedition as the present.

Therefore, if the bed-room door had been locked, it would have been a formidable, if not an insuperable, obstacle to the success of his purpose.

But in the security he felt in his own bed, and in the confidence he had in human nature generally, the owner of the house never for one moment thought of fastening his door in any way.

When Wild junior had reached it, he paused for a few seconds on the threshold.

But reassured by the continued silence, he placed his hands upon the latch, and gently raised it.

He allowed the door to open only a very little way, and then he stopped to listen again.

Of course if an alarm was given there would be an end to his plan entirely.

Failure would be fatal.

Then, as he listened, he was presently able to distinguish the light, regular breathing of persons in slumber.

"All is well!" he said, mentally—"all is well!"

The silence and darkness of the spot produced some slight effect even upon the callous heart of George Wild.

But the influence this excited was so slight as to be scarcely perceptible to himself.

Like a ghost he glided into the chamber.

Upon a little bracket just above the dressing-table a small lamp was burning.

It just served to make the different objects in the room distinguishable, and that was all.

George Wild was thankful for it, for he was enabled to guard against coming in contact with any article of furniture.

There was the bed, beneath which was the wealth he had determined to become the possessor of.

For an instant he hesitated whether he should attempt to draw the box out first or to take the keys from underneath the pillow.

The former was the course he adopted.

Sinking down upon his hands and knees, he crept noiselessly over the thick carpet with which the apartment was covered.

He crept partly under the bed, and almost immediately his head came in contact with the iron box.

He took hold of it and tried to pull it out, but the weight was too great.

Although he put forth his utmost strength, the box did not move in the least degree.

The perspiration started out in bead-like drops upon his skin, for he began to fear that, after all, he should fail in his design.

He placed his hand upon the top of the box, and then raising it, he found that there was some little distance between the lid and the bottom of the bed.

This inspired him with fresh hope, for he believed he should be able to open the box and abstract the contents without the necessity of removing it from its position.

He passed his hand rapidly round the side of it and soon found the keyhole.

He was now content, so far as that was concerned.

The next thing he had to do—and this was by far the most difficult of all—was to obtain possession of the keys that lay underneath the pillow.

He would have to abstract them with so much secrecy as not to awaken the sleeper.

To this task he now immediately addressed himself.

He crept round to the side of the bed, and then raised himself slowly to his full height.

His benefactor was slumbering peacefully and gently.

But the sight of this sweet repose made Wild junior's heart swell with anger.

He stretched forth his hand, and as he did so he muttered:

"He had better not awake; if he does, let him look to it himself!"

His eyes glittered with an ominous brightness.

Gently and slowly he insinuated his hand beneath the pillow.

The old gentleman moved once uneasily in his sleep, and one inarticulate word came from his lips, but what it was George Wild knew not.

He paused a moment, and then renewed his attempt.

Presently, to his joy, the tips of his fingers touched the keys.

He took hold of them, and then—most difficult operation of all—began to draw his hand slowly backwards.

But the slumber of the old gentleman was as profound as ever, and George Wild's heart beat high with hope.

Another second, and he had them securely in his grasp.

But the old gentleman awoke suddenly with a start.

He opened his eyes widely, and caught sight of Wild junior standing by his bedside.

Guessing in an instant the purport of his visit, he uttered a loud cry.

Or rather he half uttered it, for, with the suddenness of thought, George clenched his fist, and struck him a violent blow on the mouth.

But the old gentleman, in spite of his years, possessed good courage and strength, and resolved to do battle with his midnight visitor.

He rose up in bed, and, with the blood streaming from his lips, gasped out another cry for help.

Wild junior was now furious.

"Silence!" he cried, in a low, hoarse voice—"silence! I don't want to take your life, but you will force me to it if you are not still!"

Then, with a low, half-stifled shriek of terror, the old lady awoke.

"Thieves—thieves!" she cried. "Help—mercy—help!"

George Wild was now more furious than ever.

Let us do him the credit to say that, when he first projected this expedition, the worst injury he had intended to inflict upon his benefactors was robbery.

Now, however, through this unexpected and unfortunate discovery, he was forced to adopt one of two alternatives.

He must either forego his villainous attempt, or else he must add murder to his original crime.

He was conscious of this without requiring to pause for reflection.

Nor did he hesitate—his mind was made up so quickly that it did not seem as though he had paused to reflect at all.

CHAPTER DLII.

AFTER MANY PERILS AND VICISSITUDES, WILD JUNIOR ARRIVES IN LONDON

HE gave one hasty glance around in search of some weapon that would answer his diabolical purpose.

Within reach of his hand was either an iron bar or a poker,—he did not stop to look which.

He seized it with the speed of thought.

Then, with this fearful weapon, some horrible crashing blows were dealt, and then, in a second afterwards, George Wild was the only living person in the room.

His benefactor and benefactress lay upon the bed a ghastly and hideous sight.

Dropping the murderous instrument, George Wild, with nervous haste, took hold of the keys, and went to the iron box.

So great was his agitation, that it was some time before he found out which was the right key, and turned it in the lock.

He listened in an agony of apprehension, for each moment he expected to hear some sounds from the other inhabitants of the house, who, he thought, could scarcely fail to be aroused by the tumult.

But all was still.

And as time passed by without his meeting with any interruption, his courage revived.

Now that there was no longer any fear of arousing those who occupied the bed, he roughly pushed the bedstead on one side, so that the box was disclosed.

Without doing this, he found it was impossible to get at the contents.

The box was nearly full of miscellaneous articles, all doubtless of a valuable description, but valuable in different ways.

There were papers, and deeds, and parchments of various sizes and kinds, but to these Wild junior paid no sort of attention, but impatiently tossed them on to the floor.

Some heavy, massive articles of plate which he knew he could not carry away with him, as it would be too great an encumbrance to his flight, he likewise placed upon the floor, but he regretted the necessity of leaving them behind.

A number of small silver articles that he could carry about with him in his pockets he took charge of, and also a considerable sum in gold, silver, and notes.

It was wonderful to see the rapidity with which he did all this.

In less time than anyone could have believed possible, he had ransacked the box, and was making preparations for his flight.

But suddenly he paused, and the blood retreated to his heart with a sickening rush.

A faint rustling sound came upon his ears.

Then followed a faint tapping sound against the door of the chamber.

Then George remembered that he had not fastened it.

He gave one bound, and then his hand was on the lock.

He turned the key instantly.

But the sudden force with which he came against the door, and the sharp click of the bolt of the lock, had an alarming effect upon the person outside.

A shrill scream and loud cries for help broke the silence of the mansion.

Then hasty trampling of feet followed, and all those noises which would indicate that the whole of the inmates were alarmed and astir.

Wild junior bitterly cursed his ill-luck.

Retreat in the direction of the door was impossible.

Nothing but the window remained to him.

This was a considerable distance from the ground, and in dropping from it he might sustain a serious injury.

Then he knew that there were several dogs about, who in all probability would commence an attack upon him.

But there was no help for it—he must either try the desperate hazard of escaping in that manner or give himself up without resistance.

It was not likely that he would do this.

He dashed open the window, and scrambling through, hung for an instant at the full length of his arms, and dropped.

He reached the ground with a sudden and smart shock, which for awhile deprived him of breath.

Then he struggled to his feet, and looking back, saw that lights were flitting to and fro in the house, and there were loud cries, evidently proving that the murders had been discovered.

In a moment or two, doubtless, the two men-servants would be in pursuit of him.

This sudden discovery was a thing he had not anticipated, nor had he looked forward to having to run for his life.

Yet that was what he had to do, and he started off across the grounds at all the speed he could make.

But he was not in good physical condition for such exertion, and, moreover, the plunder he had stowed about his person weighed him down.

The grounds, too, were of great extent, and it was some time before he reached the high, strong, wooden fence with which they were surrounded.

At last he came to it, but it is doubtful whether he would have succeeded in climbing over, but for the aid which was afforded him by a tree that grew conveniently near.

He climbed up the trunk of this, and crept along one branch that stretched out in a horizontal direction.

He was thus enabled to lower himself into the road.

He felt his feet touch the earth, but he did not stop to recover himself, nor to look around him, nor to listen whether his pursuers were very close behind him or not.

On he flew at a speed that was truly remarkable, and which threatened to set pursuit at defiance.

At last, panting and exhausted from his violent exertion, he found himself unable to run any further, and so came to a dead stop.

Thoroughly worn out, he sank down by the wayside.

Two or three moments thus elapsed, and then the clattering of a horse's feet along the road he had just come struck upon his sense of hearing.

His first impulse was to spring to his feet and run on again.

But even as he made the effort to rise, he felt his limbs tremble under him.

"No—no!" he cried. "I can run no further! I must stop here where I am, and run the risk of being seen!"

He crouched down still lower in the empty ditch, in the hope of being able to escape the observation of the person who was coming.

That he should suppose this was some one in pursuit of him is nothing to be wondered at; but he was deceived.

The person approaching at such a furious gallop was, indeed, one of the servants from the house.

But he was not in pursuit of the murderer.

He was on what he considered a far more important errand, and this was to pay a visit to the nearest surgeon, and apprise him of the dreadful events which had occurred.

Therefore, Wild junior had the satisfaction of seeing this man pass him in his hiding-place at full gallop.

In a little while the sound of his horse's hoofs grew fainter and fainter, and then altogether ceased.

The villain then began to congratulate himself upon the ease with which, after all, he had accomplished his purpose.

But this feeling did not long continue, for, from the direction of the house, he could hear shouts and cries; and directly afterwards he beheld in the distance a number of small, moving, twinkling lights.

Then an angry curse came from his lips, and again he endeavoured to rise.

This time he succeeded, for, although he had sat there for such a little time, he had greatly recovered his strength.

The cunning of his disposition prompted him to change the course he had been pursuing, and accordingly he turned off at right-angles.

The sky was covered with dense black clouds, and not a single star could be perceived, so that there was nothing which could serve him as a guide as to the direction he ought to take.

He still wished and intended to make his way to London with the least possible delay.

He had now money enough in his pocket to answer his immediate purpose.

There was no fear of his being in want.

Presently, as he ran onwards, he came to the high-road.

He hesitated whether he should make his way along it or cross over.

Then he heard a rumbling sound in the distance.

"The stage-coach," he murmured, after listening for a moment; "doubtless on its way to London."

He hailed this as a fortunate event, but directly afterwards he muttered:

"No, no—it will not do! Second thoughts, they say, are best, and certainly they are in this case. I shall have to make my way to London with the greatest care and caution. If I get into this coach, I shall be noticed by the guard. Inquiries will of course be made after me, and then the officers will be on my track at once. No, no! I must not think of that!"

Not being able to hear anything of his pursuers in the rear, he concealed himself behind the hedge, and waited until the coach should come by.

He had not very long to wait.

With a rush and rattle, the cumbersome machine rolled by.

There was a flash of light, a whirl of wheels, and then the stage-coach was away down the road.

Wild junior looked after it with longing eyes.

He thought how glorious it would be to travel at such a rate as that from the scene of his late exploits.

He was now already worn out with fatigue, and the distance he had to go was very great.

But he had no other resource than to summon all his energies to get out of that part of the country before day-break.

A terrible crime such as he had committed would not be allowed to pass away unnoticed.

[JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN IN PURSUIT OF JONATHAN WILD.]

The strongest efforts would be made to overtake and capture the criminal.

When he entered London, he doubted not all would be well.

Once there, he knew he should be able to obtain such a disguise as would render detection an impossibility.

Wearied and tired, he trudged on, taking the greatest pains to elude observation, and over and over again cursing his ill-luck.

He had money in his pocket, but the curse of ill-got wealth appeared to cling to it.

He might have bought or hired a horse several times during his long walk, but he was afraid to do so, because in the event of a pursuit that incident would form a clue, and enable his foes to get upon his track.

There was no help, then, but to perform the journey on foot.

At last morning came, and he looked about him in the hope of being able to espy some place of concealment.

No. 118.—BLUESKIN.

A large expanse of country, dotted here and there with little habitations, was spread out before him.

Many of the occupants of those dwellings would willingly allow him to enter and rest himself, but Wild junior did not dare ask one of them.

Not only was he tired down and unable to go any further, but there was another and still more cogent reason why he should conceal himself.

This was in consequence of the daylight.

Various people would, of course, be abroad, pursuing their usual daily avocations, and by some of these he would certainly be seen.

The only place he could see that seemed at all likely to answer his purpose was a hay-stack.

In this he fancied he should be able to conceal himself, and if he succeeded, no one would find him there.

He looked about him, but could see no one.

Cautiously he approached the stack.

When close to it, he found that on one side it had been cut, and a small quantity of loose hay was lying on the ground hard by.

His mind was soon made up.

Going to the side of the stack opposite to that which had been cut, he began with great industry to pull out the hay, so as to leave a place where he could conceal himself.

At last, however, this task was accomplished.

The quantity of hay he had displaced was considerable.

Carefully he gathered every morsel of it up, and placed it on top of the heap of which we have already spoken.

The next thing was to creep into the haystack, and this appeared to be the most difficult part of the undertaking.

After a brief deliberation, he resolved to push himself in feet foremost.

He succeeded in this attempt with more ease than might have been expected.

At length he fairly got his head inside the stack.

With his hands, then, he pulled down the hay in front of him, so as to conceal the opening.

He did this with great skill; and without a very close examination indeed, or without it was suspected that he had hidden there, he stood a good chance of escaping discovery.

Still, in spite of its apparent security, Wild junior found it to be a very disagreeable place to remain in, for the hay above gradually settled down upon him, and the weight of the superincumbent mass was something terrific.

He gasped painfully for breath, and moved about uneasily.

CHAPTER DLIII.

WILD JUNIOR DISCOVERS THAT HIS HIDING-PLACE IS A VERY DANGEROUS ONE.

AFTER a time, Wild junior became accustomed to the pressure, and then, thoroughly exhausted by all that he had gone through, he sank off into a profound sleep, which lasted for many hours, despite the uncomfortable and peculiar nature of the place he was in.

It is quite certain that the callous-hearted wretch never felt any remorse or compunction for the barbarous crime he had committed.

On the contrary, he experienced a feeling of very great satisfaction.

In his pockets he had money and valuables to a considerable amount.

In fact, he was quite prepared to re-enter London.

And so, although his soul was so deeply stained with blood, the villain slept.

Slept the calm repose of innocence and youth.

Slept as though no sin could be laid to his charge.

He awakened, however, with a start of alarm.

Voices reached his ears.

Persons engaged in conversation were evidently somewhere close at hand.

For a moment, Wild junior's intellects were somewhat confused.

He could not make out where he was.

But recollection soon returned, and then he prepared himself to listen with all the intentness he could command.

"Why, do you mean to say you have not heard of it?" exclaimed a voice, in tones of great surprise.

"No," was the reply; "I have heard no more than you have just told me!"

"Lor, now! Well, to be sure!"

"Tell us—tell us?"

"All about it?"

"Yes."

"It is a most awful case. Such a murder was never heard of before!"

In spite of his callousness, a cold perspiration burst out all over Wild junior's body when he heard the word "Murder" pronounced.

With the readiness of a guilty conscience, which is ever its own accuser, he jumped to the conclusion that the murder alluded to was no other than the one committed by himself.

This was highly improbable, as a moment's calm reflection might have told him.

In those days there were no means by which intelligence could be rapidly transmitted, as there is now, and therefore it was extremely unlikely that those he heard conversing knew anything about the double murder committed at the house by the sea.

But, as the greatest poet has truly said

Suspicion ever haunts the guilty mind—

perfectly breathless, Wild junior waited to hear what the other had to say.

"A most awful murder," were the next words that reached his ears. "Such a one as has not been heard of for years back. It makes my very blood run cold when I even think of it!"

"Does it, though?"

"It was horrible! And there was robbery as well!"

"Robbery?"

"Yes; the murderer carried off along with him a great deal of valuable property!"

"And he has not been caught?"

"No; though active search is being made. They have got some kind of a clue to his whereabouts, I fancy."

"Well, I only hope he will be hung, as all such wretches ought to be! They are not fit to live!"

"Nor to die either!"

"No—truly! However, that is no business of ours."

"No; but I know what is."

"To cut the hay for the cattle?"

"Yes! We have been here gossiping longer than we ought to have been. We must make haste, or the gaffer will want to know what we have been about!"

"But you have not told me the particulars of the murder."

"No; and I must not stop to do so now."

"Tell me as we go back to the house."

"Very well, I will. Now, then, get the knives—we must cut the stack!"

Here was horrible news for George Wild.

The men were about to cut the stack.

Wild junior had seen the operation performed many a time.

The long, keen, heavy knife used for the purpose would make its way through everything.

Whereabouts the men were going to cut the hay, of course, he could not tell, but it appeared to him most probable that it was somewhere close at hand, because he could hear their words with so much distinctness.

Here was a horrible position.

If it by chance happened that any part of his body should be underneath where the knife would come down he would be either killed outright, or deprived of some of his limbs.

His body would afford no more resistance to the passage of the knife than would the hay itself.

Wild junior trembled with fear.

If he remained where he was he would be running what was truly an awful risk.

In fact, it was insanity—suicide, to think of retaining his present position.

But, then, if he crawled out, he could not fail to be seen by the two men.

He might be able to overpower them, or he might not, for they would assuredly have the advantage over him in more ways than one.

At the best, he would be seen, and if he escaped these men he would have to run.

They, of course, would know what direction he took, and so would set his pursuers on his track.

"They know all about the murder," he thought, "and no doubt they will recognise me at once!"

Wild junior was in a serious dilemma.

To remain where he was, however, was simply impossible.

No matter what the danger and risk of leaving his place of concealment might be, it must be done.

He drew a long breath, and then muttered some horrible curses between his teeth.

Still he lingered.

Lingered until it was not safe to do so any longer.

A horrible crushing noise, which made the blood in his veins turn as cold as ice, came upon his ears.

It was the knife.

Cutting its way through the mass of hay above him.

He must creep out.

In another moment it would be too late.

Perhaps it was too late already.

Lower and lower—closer and closer came the keen and heavy blade.

Wild made a desperate effort to creep out.

But he could not move.

The hay had settled closely all around him, and though he put forth his utmost strength he was not able to move a limb.

He made a mighty effort.

But to no better purpose than before.

He was immovable.

And still the knife continued to come down.

There was no time for deliberation.

He was sure by the feel of the hay that the knife was just above him.

Perhaps it was only separated from his body by a few inches.

Horrible fate!

Down—down it came.

But he might just as well have tried to crawl out from under a mountain.

He had but one resource.

Even that might fail.

It was to call out for assistance.

He must disclose the secret of his presence there to the three men.

Either that or perish

And in his case, discovery was almost as bad as death itself.

As rapidly as he could, he moved the hay from before his mouth.

Then in a wild, shrieking, unnatural tone, he cried:

"Stop—stop! Do you wish to murder me? Stop—stop, I say!"

His voice sounded strangely—he did not even recognise it himself.

This was partly in consequence of the intense terror under which he was labouring, and also in consequence of his being so closely surrounded by the hay.

It allowed his voice to escape, but it totally changed its tones.

The progress of the knife suddenly ceased.

Wild junior heard a loud shout and cries of alarm.

Then there was a rushing of footsteps.

Afterwards all was still.

For a moment the danger was over, and Wild junior was so completely prostrated and overcome that for several moments he could not summon up strength to attempt to make a movement.

Then he murmured:

"They are terrified—they are frightened! I have scared them away! Now, if I can only creep out and hide myself somewhere else, all will be well!"

The two men who had been engaged in cutting the hay were in truth terribly frightened.

They had been conversing with each other about a murder that had been lately perpetrated in the vicinity until their boorish minds got into a very morbid condition.

Then all at once they heard a hideous, muffled sound, such as had never before come to their ears.

At first they stood stock still, suspending their labour as if by magic.

Then, as the sound continued and increased in loudness, they, believing that some ghost or other hideous apparition was at hand, uttered loud cries of terror and fled.

Where, they scarcely knew.

The silence that prevailed around had a reassuring effect upon Wild junior.

He was of a buoyant disposition, and never allowed himself to be long cast down.

"I must creep out," he said—"I must creep out; but how?"

The hay pressed upon him, and it seemed as though there were tons and tons above him; he had still some use left in his arms, and by clutching hold of the outside of the stack he tried to drag himself out.

After incredible toil, he at length succeeded in effecting his purpose, but he was so exhausted that he lay down on the ground close to the stack incapable of motion.

In a little while, however, he recovered himself sufficiently to look around him.

Then he observed with surprise that night had almost come.

The sun had set, and the trees and meadows around were fast becoming involved in gloom.

He had, then, despite the uncomfortable nature of his situation, slept for very many hours in the stack.

Now that all things had turned out so well, he felt glad that he had awoke.

Time was precious to him, and he must now push on with all speed towards London.

The sooner he reached the metropolis the better.

The prospect of shortly being in comparative safety produced a wonderful effect upon George Wild.

The exhaustion and fatigue to which he had been compelled to succumb disappeared as if by magic.

He sprang to his feet.

As he did so, his eyes happened to fall upon the rude apparatus made use of by the men to cut the hay.

An uncontrollable curiosity made Wild junior approach in order to see whether his danger was in reality as great as he had imagined it.

The knife was buried deeply in the haystack, but yet he could see the end of it, and form a tolerably accurate idea of its position.

He shuddered.

His fears had not deceived him.

The knife was close down over the spot where he had concealed himself.

If he had hesitated any longer about uttering that cry, or if the men had caused the knife to descend only a little lower, he would have been seriously injured.

A sigh of relief unconsciously escaped his lips, and then he turned away.

As he did so, he fancied the sound of distant voices came upon his ears, and, with a sudden start, he turned round and looked in the direction from which the cries came.

He then perceived in the distance a number of moving lights.

They looked strange at first; but as he continued to gaze, he was able to make them out.

A rather large body of men, carrying lanterns either in their hands or else fixed upon the top of long poles, were coming at a rapid rate across the meadows.

It was pretty evident that their destination was the haystack.

"I must be off," muttered George, as he beheld them—"off to London! It will be folly for me to linger here!"

CHAPTER DLIV.

GEORGE WILD ARRIVES IN LONDON, AND PAYS IN ADVANCE FOR HIS LODGINGS.

THE body of men that George Wild saw came from the farm-house to which the two men belonged.

Upon reaching it, they had given an alarming account of the horrible sound they had heard proceeding from the interior of the haystack, and the farmer and all the men employed about the place were quickly on the alert.

With greater courage than might have been expected from such people under the circumstances, they had determined to proceed to the haystack with all possible speed, in order to solve the mystery.

Accordingly, they provided themselves with lanterns, and armed themselves with offensive weapons of various kinds, such as pickaxes, spades, flails, and other such articles; but, of course, they found nothing, and the whole affair remained an inscrutable mystery.

As for Wild junior, he crouched down, and, in a curious, stooping posture, made his way at a rapid rate across the fields.

In a few minutes he gained the high-road, and then he slackened his pace.

Not a single individual or vehicle of any kind was in sight, so he resolved to walk at a rapid pace along the highway.

He would be able to make better speed upon the level road than he would in attempting to push his way in a straight line across the country.

He walked on at a very rapid speed; but presently he began to feel greatly fatigued, and at length was compelled to sit down upon a stile and rest himself.

He was now at a considerable distance from the haystack, and did not fear any interruption from the persons he had seen advancing towards it.

How long he sat there he scarcely knew. It must have been for a considerable time.

Still, he felt dreadfully tired, and quite incapable of continuing his walk.

"How shall I reach London?" he asked himself. "Curse this weakness! I could never have believed that what has taken place could have had such an effect upon me. My strength seems quite gone."

He remained for a long time in deep thought, wondering by what means he could reach London secretly, and without fatiguing himself.

This was a problem he was unable to solve.

He must either walk or ride.

He could not do the latter without the knowledge of some one who would see him, and then there would be a clue to the course he had taken.

While thus ruminating, he heard the sound of heavy wheels in the distance.

He listened, and presently looking down the road he perceived in the distance a large, covered waggon drawn by three horses.

He fixed his eyes upon this cumbersome vehicle that was journeying along at the wonderful speed of about two miles an hour.

Then the waggon came up.

As he sat on the stile, Wild junior noticed what strong, beautiful horses were harnessed to it.

High up on a seat was the waggoner.

He held the reins listlessly and mechanically in his hands, and it was pretty evident that the horses received no sort of guidance from him.

Indeed, by the manner in which the man's head bent forward upon his breast, and the manner in which his body swayed to and fro, it was tolerably certain that he was asleep.

George watched the waggon go by, and gazed after it.

He then saw that it was loaded with sacks containing some kind of grain.

He fancied flour from the whiteness of the sacks and the white dust that was powdered all over the hind part of the vehicle.

"If I was to walk quickly," thought Wild, "I could easily overtake that waggon and climb in at the back, and lie down on some of the sacks without the driver being one bit the wiser. I should be resting myself and getting towards London at the same time."

With these words, Wild junior got up off the stile, and walked along the road after the waggon.

It was then that he became more than ever sensible of his extreme weakness.

He had not to go far, and yet, by the time he reached the tail of the waggon, he was very tired.

To pull himself up by the aid of a chain was not a very difficult task, and, having accomplished his purpose so far, he crawled over the tops of the sacks until he got to the front part of the waggon.

Here he was in total darkness.

Evidently, the driver was quite unaware of what had taken place.

In the same half-sleepy style he continued to drive his horses along the road.

George stretched himself at full length upon the sacks, and made himself as comfortable as he could.

He was not in want of sleep, but he desired rest; it was necessary that he should recover as much as possible his exhausted energies.

The fact was, a great many hours had elapsed since he had last taken food, and this was the cause principally of his exhaustion.

He had not felt the pangs of hunger once—he had been too excited; but now, as he lay down upon the sacks in comparative safety, he felt as if famished.

It was scarcely likely, however, that in the waggon he should be able to find anything by which he could appease his hunger.

As time passed by, however, this increased to such an intolerable extent, that he could bear it no longer.

As he expected, the sacks contained wheat.

He opened one of them, and then, with an eagerness remarkable to witness, he began to devour handful after handful of the dry flour.

It was but a poor repast for anyone, yet there was nourishment and sustenance in it.

After a little while, he felt wonderfully better than he had done hitherto.

Without the recurrence of any accident whatever, the long winter's night gradually wore away.

The waggoner stopped several times at various public-houses on the route; but George Wild, squeezing himself down close among the sacks, escaped observation.

All at once the idea occurred to him that, as he was now much stronger and better, he might crawl out of the waggon just before it stopped at one of those inns, and enter it.

He would then be able to satisfy his thirst, which was truly terrific, and by walking sharply, or even running, if it was necessary, he should easily be able to overtake the waggon again.

With this view, he crept to the end and looked out.

It was a long time before he saw the least sign of any habitation, but at last he caught sight of a wayside inn.

He descended at once.

He did not know whether the waggon would stop at this inn or not.

He had to run the risk of that.

When he got down into the road he found that his clothes were very much covered with flour, and it took him several minutes to free himself from the white dust.

He was only able to succeed to a partial extent.

Then he walked on, keeping the waggon just in front of him.

To his satisfaction, the vehicle came to a standstill in front of the inn, and the waggoner, without getting down from his seat, drank a jug of old ale which was brought to him, while his horses were refreshed with a little hay and water.

In the meanwhile, George entered the inn.

It was a very late hour, and there was scarcely anyone in to be seen.

A middle-aged woman was standing at the bar, and she regarded Wild junior rather curiously as he came in.

He was unable to get anything but ale; so he was obliged to content himself with a jug of sour stuff. He would greatly have preferred brandy, or some other fiery beverage, but it was not to be had.

"I am on the tramp," he said to the landlady, "and have been for a goodish bit."

"But you're all over flour," said the landlady.

"I am," replied George. "A man with a waggon of flour was kind enough to give me a lift a little while ago. Have you got any bread and cheese?"

"Yes."

These articles were brought, and George Wild bought rather a large quantity of both, which he tied up in a handkerchief.

He then paid his reckoning and took his leave.

Upon leaving the inn, he found that the waggon had already started, and was a long way off down the road.

He walked on at a rapid pace, and presently came up with it.

In the same way as before, he scrambled inside, and laid himself down on the sacks.

Things seemed to look much more favourable than they had done for some time past, and Wild junior was quite in good spirits.

It so happened that the waggon he had crawled into was on its way to London, and after a tedious journey, but as rapid a one as, under the circumstances, he could hope to make, George Wild at length found himself in the vicinity of the metropolis.

He had managed to escape observation so far, and just when London appeared in the distance, he resolved to get down and walk the remainder of the distance.

He did so.

It was just growing dusk, and before he reached the Thames it was quite dark.

Now that he was in London, George Wild felt greatly relieved.

He did not imagine himself to be in the least danger, and he boldly entered a small house of public accommodation near the river side.

As a matter of course, Wild junior was profoundly ignorant of all that had taken place in London since his departure, and he was not a little curious to know what had happened.

Still, he did not like to ask any questions, for fear of attracting too much notice to himself.

He kept his ears open, however, and listened attentively to the conversation of the persons present.

It turned upon the escape of Jonathan Wild from Newgate, and, very much to George's astonishment, he found that his father and the Governor of Newgate were still at liberty, having set all efforts for capture completely at defiance.

This was news indeed for George.

He fully expected—and, indeed, if the truth must be told, quite hoped—that his father had been comfortably put out of the way at Tyburn, and that he should have nothing to dread on that score.

Now, however, that he was at large, it would be necessary for him to behave with the utmost caution, as George did not doubt that his father had discovered all about the abstraction of the money from the bank.

He could tell to a trifle what his rage would be.

He was also aware that it would be unwise and dangerous in the extreme for him to cross his path.

One thing he now had to attend to more particularly than anything else, and this was to keep out of the way of his parent.

George sallied forth into the night air.

"I must think," he muttered to himself, as he strode rapidly along—"I must think! My position is still difficult! Let me think what I had better do!"

This occupied him for a long time.

Just at present, however, we cannot make the reader aware of the precise nature of his meditations—it must suffice to say that at last George became much more composed than he had been.

His face assumed quite a different expression, and he rubbed his hands together as though he had hit upon some very good scheme indeed.

"Yes, yes," he said—"that is it! I must do it! It's the only chance I have!"

He looked around him, and found himself in one of the poor districts of London.

He had wandered on without paying any particular attention as to where he was going.

"I can do nothing to-night," he said. "I must have time to mature my plans. I will get a night's lodging somewhere. This seems to be a capital place. I shall not be found here, or suspected. Yes, as chance has brought me to this quarter, I will stay here for a time."

He looked up and down the street, and then, one by one, at the various windows.

In those days, the people were not so genteel and refined as they are now.

At the present day, everybody who has a little, miserable, ill-furnished room to let calls it an "apartment;" but in those days they were in the habit of calling a spade a spade; and so, at length, in one of the windows George found the terse announcement—"Good lodgings to let."

"That will do," he said to himself. "I will apply here."

He rang the bell as he spoke.

The door was opened by one of those wretched little female objects who are generally to be found in a lodging-house, and who are ridiculously called "servants."

"I want to look at the lodgings," said George, in an abrupt and business-like tone.

"Missus," cried the girl, without leaving the front door, "you're wanted!"

A sharp-featured, angular-looking specimen of feminine humanity now made her appearance.

"Are you in want of lodgings, sir?" she said, in an oily tone of voice.

"Yes," said George.

"Please to walk in, sir, and you can see them."

George obeyed, and a candle having been procured, the lodging-house keeper led him upstairs on to the second floor.

"There's two rooms to let," said the landlady. "One's a bed-room and the other's a sitting-room. You can have one or the two, whichever you think proper."

George reflected a moment, and then he said:

"I will take the two."

"Very well, sir, of course. The rent will be six shillings a week, paid in advance, and two references required."

"I have only just come up from a distant part of the country," said George, "and don't know anyone in London; therefore I can't furnish you with the references you require."

"Oh, indeed!" said the landlady, looking him very hard in the face. "Well, my rule is to have references, and I can't make any exception to it."

"I have some references in my pocket," said George, "which may perhaps suit you. I'll take the rooms for a month, and here are a couple of guineas in payment."

Quite a sudden change came over the landlady.

"Oh, my dear sir, you are too good—much too good! I can tell now that you are a gentleman from the country; but in London it is necessary that we should be so very particular!"

"Of course—of course!" said George. "I have heard that it is a dreadful place!"

"It is. But, for my part, I would sooner let lodgings to people from the country than I would to Londoners—that is to say, if I'm satisfied they are not deceiving me."

"Just so!" said Wild junior. "I suppose I can take possession of the lodgings at once?"

"You can, sir, with all the pleasure in the world! What can I have the pleasure of getting for you? Or would you prefer to go out and buy the things yourself?"

"No, that be d—d!" said George. "Bring me something to eat and drink, but don't bother me about it!"

"Very good, sir," said the landlady, with quite a pleasant smile, for, like all lodging-house keepers, as a matter of course, she liked to provide for her lodgers.

"A nice supper is what I want," said George; "I am not particular what it is; and bring a pint of brandy."

George sat down in a chair.

"All right, sir," said the landlady, "you shall be attended to at once. I will send the servant up to light you a fire, for the room seems chilly."

"It is d—d cold!" said George, "that's what it is!" and he rubbed his hands together as he spoke.

The landlady was not at all displeased with his swearing—in fact, how could she be displeased with a lodger who had taken the rooms for a month at six shillings a week, and paid her two guineas in advance?

CHAPTER DLV.

RETURNS AT LENGTH TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD.

ONCE more we return to chronicle the proceedings of these two personages in our story, in whom it is presumed the reader feels a greater amount of interest than in any others.

We allude, of course, to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

The tide of events has for so long carried us away from them, that we may be excused if we here refresh the mind of the reader as to the circumstances under which we last saw them.

Strange—and, as it seems, incredible—to say, they were, when we saw them last, seated in the Lord Chancellor's own private carriage, along with the Lord Chancellor himself.

The remarkable circumstances which brought them into this position cannot be forgotten.

The carriage was rolling rapidly on its way to that lodging-house in Westminster where Edgworth Bess was staying.

Blueskin, it must be borne in mind, had already declared his identity to the Chancellor, who, having all occurrences, and particularly those of the past, fresh in his remembrance, had promised to use what influence he had to obtain a pardon.

But Jack Sheppard he did not know.

It would have been dangerous in the highest degree to have uttered even the faintest whisper to the effect that this daring depredator had been resuscitated.

But there was a pleased and delighted feeling about the hearts of our two friends.

They saw clearly enough that the end they had been so long toiling for was at last within view.

Jonathan Wild—disgraced, doomed to death—was flying over the country a miserable fugitive.

His capture would certainly in a short time take place.

Whether it did or not, however, there was the great consolation to think that Edgworth Bess had no longer anything to fear from his machinations.

The thief-taker possessed the will doubtless to do an injury to the poor girl, but he had not the power.

In a few minutes the lodging-house would be reached, for the carriage rolled along with great swiftness, and the distance was but short.

Blueskin and Jack would have the satisfaction of handing the persecuted heiress into the protection of the Lord Chancellor.

When once that functionary took her by the hand, she would be, to all intents and purposes, quite safe.

They would no longer have occasion to trouble themselves about her welfare, but they would be able to turn the whole of their attention to an important subject.

That was no other than to hunt down Jonathan Wild.

They had both decided upon it, and felt sure that nothing in the world would induce them to alter their determination.

Jonathan Wild had hunted them with the ferocity of a wild beast—he had mocked at and derided their sufferings, and used all the power he possessed to compass their destruction.

He had made them both miserable fugitives, and, to a great extent, caused them to be amenable to the laws, simply because they refused to give him their aidance in his nefarious schemes—simply because they would not join him in working the ruin of a poor, helpless girl, who from her youth had known nothing but misery, when she ought to have known affluence, and who could not so much as raise a finger in her own defence.

That was the great cause of the animosity which existed on Jonathan Wild's part towards our friends.

Now, however, as they told themselves over and over again, all that was at an end.

Jonathan Wild was no longer the bold, unscrupulous thief-taker, possessed of power of which scarcely anyone knew the limits, but he was a miserable fugitive, hiding and skulking in corners, and occupied incessantly in avoiding the many officers of justice who were sent out upon his track.

That they had failed in their attempts to capture him, Blueskin and Jack thought but little of.

In their own minds they felt convinced that, however great an incentive a reward might be, yet it would not urge the officers forward with the same energy and determination as their own burning for revenge would.

Jonathan had much to answer for at their hands.

They would be avenging themselves at the same time that they were rendering society at large a most valuable service.

Such was the substance of the thoughts that passed through the minds of Blueskin and Jack, as they sat facing the Chancellor.

That individual had greatly moderated his opinion with regard to Blueskin, after the confessions that had been made to him that night.

Fortunately for Blueskin, the Chancellor was already in possession of many facts connected with the case; and all those things which Blueskin said, were, in some way or other, corroborated by what had been said by others, and those others were certainly no friends of his.

Therefore, the Chancellor was right in placing implicit reliance upon all that had been told him.

The satisfaction which Blueskin could not help feeling, at the prospect of his story being at last believed, was somewhat damped by the knowledge that belief had come too late.

He was now a ruined man—bankrupt in everything; and so far as his worldly position was concerned, it mattered little whether justice was rendered to him, or not.

Still, a pardon would be the greatest reward he could possibly receive.

When that had been granted to him, he should be able to live for the remainder of his life in peace and comfort, in his native land, and, as he hoped, in the service of his old and much-loved master's daughter.

Then, as for Jack Sheppard, the belief that he had been executed and was no more, was deeply rooted, so much so, indeed, that in a few months' time there would be little fear of his being in any danger of detection; and so, in the future, everything promised to go well.

While they were thus busy felicitating themselves upon the prospect spread out before them, the carriage stopped.

Looking up, Blueskin and Jack saw that they were in the right street.

They at once alighted from the vehicle.

Jack was full of impatience, and he hastened to the door, and rung the bell violently.

He was delighted to think that Edgworth Bess was about to be so happy.

They would be parted, probably, for ever, but he did not care for that.

The door was opened by the landlady.

Jack took the candle from her hand, and led the way up the staircase.

Blueskin and the Chancellor followed.

Somehow, Jack's heart beat strangely when he stood upon the threshold of the room in which he had left Edgworth Bess.

But he thought nothing of the feeling, believing it to be merely caused by the prospect of a separation.

He paused for a moment before he opened the door, and this enabled Blueskin and the Chancellor to overtake him.

Then he turned the handle and opened the door.

The apartment was plunged in total darkness.

This seemed strange.

Again Jack's heart fluttered.

"What's the meaning of this?" cried Blueskin. "Why, it's dark!"

A horrible foreboding now came over Jack Sheppard; nevertheless, he managed to gasp out:

"It's all right! Come in—come in! I have a light!"

He strode forward as he spoke, and held the candle above his head, so that its beams should be diffused as much as possible.

He gave one hasty glance around the room.

Blueskin did the like.

"Why," said the latter, "she is not here!"

"No—no, she is not here!" said Jack, endeavouring to speak calmly, but failing altogether; "but she cannot be far off! She is in the inner room—that's where she is, of course!"

He tried to speak in a tone of confidence, as though he would cheat himself into believing the words he had uttered.

He strode across the room, and opened a door.

"Bess—Bess," he cried, "where are you?"

There was no response.

This room, like the other, was in total darkness.

"Is she not there?" said Blueskin, in a hollow voice.

The Chancellor looked around him suspiciously.

The conduct of the two men, in whom he had begun to place great faith and confidence, seemed strange.

"What is the meaning of all this?" he said. "Explain it!"

In spite of the horrible fears which struggled at his heart, Jack Sheppard still endeavoured to put a good face on the affair.

"She—she must have gone out!" he stammered. "She cannot have gone far—she must be close by!"

"But we cautioned her expressly against leaving," said Blueskin. "I begin to fear that something terrible is amiss!"

"I know it—I know it!" said Jack, with a deep groan; "my heart told me so from the first!"

He sank down in a chair as he spoke, and, covering his face with his hands, sobbed violently.

Blueskin trembled.

"This must be explained," said the Chancellor, in a stern voice. "I fear there is some treachery here—something is wrong."

He appeared to anticipate some personal danger, for he advanced quickly across the room to the window, and dashed it open.

In the street below was his carriage.

"Thomas," he cried, "and you, John—here—come quickly! I am in danger!"

The two footmen he addressed at once rushed into the house.

"You have nothing to fear, sir," said Blueskin, in a broken voice. "Something dreadful has happened!"

"What—what?"

"I will solemnly swear to you, sir, before all the whole world, that when I left this room, an hour or two ago, I left the heiress in it—left her, too, after saying that I should shortly return, and after strictly enjoining her on no account to go abroad."

The footmen now appeared at the door of the room.

"It's all right!" said the Chancellor. "Wait there outside until you hear me call."

Then, turning to Blueskin, he said:

"And now she is not here?"

"No—as you see."

"You can give no guess as to the cause of her disappearance?"

"None whatever."

"But the people in the house—can they not give any information?"

"I had not thought of that," said Blueskin. "The shock was too great for any calm reflection."

"Wait, then," said the Chancellor. "Perhaps I can to some extent dispel the doubt I feel. Thomas!"

The footman opened the door instantly.

"Call up the landlady at once! I will question her," said the Chancellor, turning to Blueskin, "and I hope I shall be confirmed in the good opinion I have formed of you."

Blueskin did not speak, but went towards Jack, and put his hand upon his shoulder.

The landlady, like all the rest of her race, was excessively curious to learn anything that concerned her lodgers.

She was close at hand, and there was but little delay in her making her appearance.

"Now, my good woman," said the Chancellor, "are you the occupier of this house?"

"I am, your worship, if you please, sir," said the woman, curtsying at every word, for she had conceived a very great idea of the Chancellor's importance, without knowing who he was—she had seen the magnificent carriage at the door, and the servants in their splendid liveries.

"That is enough, then," said the Chancellor. "Just answer the questions I shall put to you as briefly as possible—that is all I require."

"I will, sir," said the landlady, with two more curtsies.

"Then, when these two persons went out a little while ago," indicating Blueskin and Jack Sheppard as he spoke, "did they leave anyone else in the room?"

"Yes, yer worship, a young girl—or, I might say, a young woman."

"You are sure they left her here?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Have you seen her since they left?"

"Yes; once, when I came up into the room."

"How long ago is that?"

"An hour, sir, or melbbe two."

"And she was here then?"

"Yes, yer worship—standin' by the winder."

"Well, where is she now?"

The landlady looked at her interrogator in blank astonishment.

The Chancellor repeated his question.

"I don't know, sir," she stammered. "Is she not here?"

"No."

"Then she must have left the house."

"That seems pretty clear; but how, or why, and when did you see her go? Answer me at once, and without prevarication! The matter is more important than you may perhaps imagine!"

A change came over the lodging-house keeper's face; she was evidently alarmed at the stern, abrupt manner in which the Chancellor spoke.

CHAPTER DLVI.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN RESOLVE TO SET OUT IN PURSUIT OF WILD.

"If—if—if you please, yer worship—" began the landlady, stammeringly.

"No hesitation!" said the Chancellor. "Speak at once!"

"Well, yer worship, she may have left the house, and she may not. I can't take upon myself to say. I didn't see her go. I haven't seen her since about two hours ago, when I came up into the room."

"And you mean clearly and positively to say that you have not seen her since?"

"No, yer worship, I haven't."

"Nor heard her depart?"

"No."

"You see, my lord," said Blueskin, advancing, "I have told you the truth. The girl was here; but, by some means or other, which I am at a loss to comprehend, she has been spirited away."

When the lodging-house keeper heard the Chancellor addressed as "my lord," she began dropping curtsies at a fearful rate, and seemed as though she would never leave off.

"My good woman," said the Chancellor, "make every inquiry. Perhaps some one in the house can give intelligence about her."

"She may be in some other room," said Jack Sheppard, starting up, and dashing the tears impatiently from his eyes. "Perhaps, after all, we have been alarming ourselves without reason."

"That's a frail hope, Jack, and one that I am afraid will not be realised."

"Never mind! Let us accompany the landlady into every room in the house. Surely then we shall find some trace!"

"I will come too," said the Chancellor.

The landlady picked up the candle, and then remained in a state of great doubt and uncertainty.

She did not know whether she ought to precede or follow a lord, and she had the idea in her head that, if she made a mistake either in one way or the other, the consequences would be very serious.

She was relieved from her anxiety by the Chancellor himself, who said:

"Now, then, lead the way, and don't keep bobbing up and down in that extraordinary manner! You will put the candle out!"

"I would suggest," said Blueskin, "that we begin at the top of the house first."

"As you will."

The little party, followed up by the two footmen of the Chancellor, made their way up to the top of the house.

Nothing was found in the attics, which were two in number, and which were used as bed-rooms.

On the second floor were also two rooms.

They paused on this landing.

"If you please, yer ludship," said the landlady, "this floor is occupied by a gentleman. Perhaps he wouldn't object to your looking over 'is rooms."

"We can ask him," said Blueskin. "Knock at the door."

The landlady obeyed.

For a moment there was no response, and then some one said, in a thick, husky voice:

"Who's there? What do you want?"

"If you please, sir," said the landlady, "there's 'is ludship 'ere wishes to know if you 'ave a girl in your room."

A curious growling sound was heard by way of reply.

Although their minds were so seriously bent, yet all those who heard the landlady put her question so strangely could not forbear from smiling.

"What the devil is it to do with his lordship, or anyone else, whether I've got a girl in my room?" said the voice again.

"I'm afraid," said the landlady, in a terrified way, "that my lodger will be offended and leave. He is a very good lodger, your ludship—a little bit hodd at times. I shouldn't like to lose 'im."

"It will be all right," said Blueskin. "I will put the question to him, and no offence shall be given."

Blueskin knocked at the door.

"What now?" said the growling voice again.

"We are searching for a young girl who has mysteriously disappeared," said Blueskin. "If you have no objection, we should like to search your rooms, without you will say that you have seen nothing of her."

"I have seen nothing of her," said the growling voice, "nor don't want to. I'll open the door and let you in, or I'd come out and talk to you, only you'll understand it's a queer time of night, and I'm not exactly in a condition to receive visitors."

"Never mind," said Blueskin. "If you have not seen her, that's all we require to know."

"I have not seen her," was the reply. "Wait a minute—I'll get up."

"No matter, sir," said Blueskin. "We are very sorry indeed for having disturbed you. It is quite sufficient. You need not trouble yourself."

Some more growling words followed, but what they were our friends did not know, for they could not stop to listen.

The next floor was the one which Blueskin and Jack had occupied.

This floor was thoroughly searched.

One thing they discovered for certain—that was, that Edgworth Bess was not there.

There were many traces of her late presence, but nothing that would serve them as a clue to her disappearance.

"She's gone!" said Blueskin—"gone as completely as if she had vanished into the air!"

Once more Jack sank down, overcome by his grief.

This was almost more than he could bear.

After making up his mind that all was well at last, it was indeed a bitter disappointment to find that she was gone. The house was searched, but without any result being produced.

All the persons in it were one by one interrogated, but no tidings whatever could be gleaned respecting the disappearance of the heiress.

The mystery was profound.

With sad and heavy steps they ascended to the room again.

"This all seems very strange," said the Chancellor, "and I know not what to think. I am half suspicious—but no matter—no matter! I am safe; no harm has been done to me. And as the girl you speak of cannot be produced, I have no more business here. Good night!"

He turned on his heel abruptly as he spoke these words, and descended the staircase rapidly.

Blueskin could not command himself to speak, nor could Jack Sheppard either.

They were stunned—bewildered by what had taken place.

Blueskin was the first to recover his composure, though some moments elapsed before he did so.

Jack Sheppard, with his hands clasped over his face, still sat in an attitude of the deepest dejection in the chair.

"Come—come, Jack," said Blueskin—"rouse up! To give way thus to grief is the merest folly! Be a man, Jack—be a man!"

There was no reply.

"This mystery must be cleared up," said Blueskin. "It seems impenetrable, but I trust it will not prove so."

Jack sprung to his feet.

"I see it all now!" he cried, in startling tones. "The whole is spread out clearly enough before me!"

"What do you mean, Jack?"

"Just what I say! Do not your own thoughts travel in the same direction as my own?"

"No—I am all abroad."

"This is Wild's work!" cried Jack, in an excited voice.

"I am sure of it! By some means or other, the villain has found out that Edgworth Bess was here, and has taken advantage of our absence to spirit her away!"

"But how—how?" cried Blueskin. "No—no, you must be mistaken—it cannot be!"

"It is—it is!"

"But he could not have taken her away without the knowledge of some of the people in this house!"

"He is no common man," said Jack. "Besides, you might as well say she could not have left the house at all without the knowledge of the people in it, and yet she is gone!"

"True," said Blueskin, in a changed tone.

The conviction began to come over him that Jack was right.

"Yes," continued Jack Sheppard, in more excited tones than he had hitherto employed, "this is Wild's work; I feel sure of it! He has been here—he has dealt this blow at the last moment!"

"But we ought to have some proof!" said Blueskin.

"Proof?" was the reply—"how can we wait for proof?"

We must act at once; every moment may be worth a lifetime!"

"What can be done?" asked Blueskin. "Where can we go?"

"That I know not! You remember our original intention? It was to hunt the villain down, and not to rest until we had placed him into the hands of the officers of justice! That is what we will do now!"

"Now?"

"Yes, at once!"

"But how shall we get upon his track?"

"That I cannot tell you! Who can say what may turn up? It was a sufficient stimulus to our exertions to follow him merely in order to avenge our wrongs; now we do it that we may once more obtain possession of Edgworth Bess, who I am certain is in his power. I feel more and more convinced of it every moment!"

"I begin to think so too," said Blueskin. "I cannot bring myself to believe that she left the place of her own accord!"

"No—no," said Jack. "I am sure nothing would have tempted her to do so!"

"I believe you are right. Some one, though in some strange and secret way, must have removed her, and who else could it be?—who else could have any aim or object in taking her away, than our old enemy, Jonathan Wild?"

"No one," replied Jack, wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement. "It is as clear as noonday! Jonathan Wild has been here and carried her off!"

"Yet stay," said Blueskin. "Events do seem to point to that conclusion; but how can we account for his having done this without the people in the house being aware of it? Surely, it cannot have been done without their knowledge?"

"No doubt the landlady of this place has gone over to his interests. We will call her, and threaten her if she does not at once declare what has become of her!"

The landlady was called, but no information could be elicited from her.

She solemnly declared, and over and over again repeated that she knew nothing of the mysterious disappearance of Edgworth Bess.

She was evidently as much astounded and bewildered at what had taken place as our friends were.

Jack was obliged to give up in despair.

"Be of good heart," said Blueskin. "Something must show up ere long that will put us on the right scent."

"It is all so mysterious!"

"It is."

"Jonathan Wild is a wonderful man!"

"True."

"Yet how he could have contrived to carry Edgworth Bess out of the house without anyone seeing him, passes my comprehension."

"And mine; though, if you reflect, you will find he has done even more wonderful things than this appears to be."

"You still cling to the idea that Jonathan Wild, and no one else, is concerned in her abduction?"

"I do feel sure of it! Every circumstance seems to point conclusively to it."

"I share your opinion; for, as we said before, it does not seem credible that Edgworth Bess should have left the house after receiving such strict injunctions from us, and no one else would feel interested in carrying her off except our old foe."

"I did hope we had heard the last of him."

"The gallows groans for him, my friend! Tyburn Tree must be graced with his carcass, some day or other!"

"But this talk is idle. We must do!"

"Come, then; I am ready! Luckily, we have money wherewith to accomplish our purpose."

"But where are we to look?"

"Let us go down and inquire."

The two friends descended.

The landlady kept out of their way.

Upon reaching the street, they looked up and down, but could see no one.

They found a watchman's box round the next corner, however.

Of course he was fast asleep.

When aroused, he was very angry.

[JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN MAKE A HORRIBLE DISCOVERY.]

He listened sulkily to the questions which our friends put to him, and when they had done speaking, he said: "You might think I was asleep when you came; but I wasn't! I know what goes on, and now I'll tell ye."

CHAPTER DLVII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD MEET WITH SOME STRANGE ADVENTURES IN THEIR PURSUIT OF JONATHAN WILD.

WHEREUPON the watchman told them—though not in a very lucid, straightforward, or satisfactory manner—that he had seen a man take away a young girl in a light, open trap.

He could give no particulars as to this man's appearance, because, as he said, the night was so very dark that he could not see.

Our two friends of course concluded that it must be no other than Jonathan Wild.

No. 119.—BLUESKIN.

The direction that had been taken was pointed out, and then they withdrew to consider.

"I told you I was right! The villain has stealthily carried her away! We must now mount, and ride off in pursuit!"

"Where shall we get horses?"

"Buy them—we have money enough."

"Agreed!"

"It would be unwise in the extreme to run the risk of getting ourselves into trouble over anything of that sort."

"Certainly it would; there is every necessity for the greatest caution."

"But where shall you be able to obtain them?"

"I must think for a moment. There are doubtless places not far off where we could get two good ones. The worst of it is, the hour is so late."

Blueskin and Jack walked on rapidly, until presently they came to some livery stables.

Here they paused, and after some little hesitation, Blueskin said:

"You have money enough no doubt, to buy what is required. Wrap your cloak closely around you, and make the inquiry. It will be better for you to go—there is little fear that you will be recognised."

To this, Jack assented.

Upon gaining the stable yard he found it silent and deserted.

There was a lamp burning over one of the doors, however, and close by the door itself was the ostler's bell.

He rung it several times, and finally a man appeared in the room above.

Upon learning Jack's business, he descended.

"I want two horses immediately," said Jack. "But as you don't know who I am, and as I can't tell how long I shall be absent, and when I shall be able to return, I want to know in what way you can accommodate me?"

The stable-keeper scratched his head.

"There is only one way that I can see."

"What is that?"

"You had better buy two horses."

"Have you two to sell?"

"Yes, or half a dozen."

"I only want two, so we will say agreed."

"Come this way then, sir; this is the stable. You can have a look at all the horses, and choose the two you like the best."

"I shall want saddles, and bridles, and trappings all complete," he said.

"Oh yes, of course."

"Now, what do you ask for the lot?" said Jack. "You must be quick and reasonable."

"I can't take anything less than thirty pounds a-piece for them."

"Then I shall have to go elsewhere," said Jack; "I have only fifty pounds. If you like to sell me the two horses for that amount, you shall have it."

After some haggling, this was consented to.

Jack paid the money, and the two horses were led out into the yard.

Blueskin now approached.

There was no need for him to say anything, and the darkness of the place was so great, that there was not much fear of his being recognised.

As time was an object of importance, they mounted at once, and galloped off down the road in the direction the watchman had pointed out; but before they had gone far they came to a place where the roads divided, and here they were completely at fault.

It is true they found a watchman near this spot, but he could give them no intelligence whatever.

He had not seen any vehicle answering to their description for several hours.

Jack and Blueskin were now compelled to trust entirely to their luck.

They had nothing whatever to guide them.

One road was just as likely to have been taken as the other, and so, quite at random, they turned their horses' heads in the direction of Croydon.

The night was dark yet clear.

The stars were shining brightly in the sky, and they could see around them with tolerable distinctness.

But little was said by the two friends.

Their hearts were heavy, and their thoughts busy, still they had nothing to converse about.

Each felt an inward conviction that they were going upon what might really be called, a "wild-goose chase."

And there was one thing of which they were ignorant, and which they did not even suspect: the watchman they had appealed to in the first instance had wilfully deceived them.

He had been fast asleep for a length of time, and knowing that if this could be proved he would be in danger of losing his situation, he gave the two friends false information. He had never seen anything of a light cart with a man and a woman in it—it was entirely a fiction coined in his own brain; and when, to his satisfaction, Blueskin and Jack went off so briskly, he rubbed his hands in a satisfied manner, and sitting down in his box, composed himself to sleep once more.

At the first toll-gate they came to, Jack, with his face still concealed by the large cloak he wore, asked the toll-keeper whether anyone answering to Wild's description had passed through the gate during the night.

"I am quite certain," said the tollman, who, for a wonder, was a civil fellow, "that no one of the appearance you describe has been past here to-night. I have been keeping watch all the time, and have opened the gate to everyone that has gone by."

Upon receipt of this intelligence, our two friends withdrew a little distance for consultation.

"We must turn back," said Jack; "there is no help for it. I will take this man's word, and if he has not seen Jonathan Wild, of what good will it be for us to gallop along in this direction?"

"None whatever."

"Then we must turn our horses' heads, and retrace our steps."

This was done reluctantly, for it was vexatious in the highest degree to think that they had galloped so far unnecessarily.

They at last reached the spot where the road divided.

They had two more to choose from.

One took a north-westerly direction, and the other led to London.

This last, it was considered, would certainly not be the road taken by Jonathan Wild.

Once having his prisoner secure in his clutches, his first step, they judged, would be to get into some obscure part of the country.

A consideration of this circumstance induced them to take the road we have mentioned as running to the north-west.

In a little while London was completely left behind, but still they failed to see or hear any sign of Jonathan Wild.

Presently, however, they saw in the distance something in the middle of the high-road which looked dim and shadowy.

What it was, they could not at first take upon themselves to say.

It was an unusual object certainly, and therefore they slackened speed.

"It looks like a vehicle of some sort," said Blueskin, shading his eyes with his hand. "But if it is, it is at a standstill in the middle of the road."

"That is strange."

"Very! Come forward gently. Perhaps even now we are upon the brink of discovering something."

Jack's heart beat hard and fast.

The disappointment he had met with up to the present moment made him exceedingly uneasy and alarmed.

Now, however, something seemed to tell him that this vehicle in front was in some way connected with the poor girl's fate.

Closer and closer they drew, and then Blueskin's supposition was proved to be correct.

It was a vehicle in the middle of the road, and it was also perfectly still.

"It is a post-chaise," said Blueskin. "Come forward quietly. How silent all seems! What can it mean?"

Closer and closer still they came, until, at length, they reined-in their horses close to the hind-wheels of the vehicle.

No notice whatever had been taken of their approach.

There was no movement—no sound; but when they pulled up, a cry of horror and surprise burst involuntarily from their lips.

Then they were silent, and with straining eyes they gazed upon the extraordinary spectacle before them.

Lying on the ground at full length, on his back, was a man attired in the costume of a postilion.

By his side was quite a large pool of dark-coloured blood; but this was all.

The door of the post-chaise was swinging wide open.

Lying half in and half out of the vehicle was a man attired as in those days only people of rank and fashion were.

His dress was of the richest description, and trimmed in many places with gold lace, while a star, attached by a ribbon to the breast of his coat, seemed to show that he belonged to some order.

His feet and legs lay on the bottom of the post-chaise, while his head and his shoulders rested strangely on the ground.

Around this person, too, a quantity of blood had collected.

It could be seen at a glance that he was either dead, or else in a state of total insensibility closely resembling it.

This, then, was the extraordinary and unexpected sight which Blueskin and Jack beheld; and it is not to be wondered at that they should be, for a minute or two, motionless with horror.

A dreadful deed had been committed.

Jack drew a long breath.

"This is an unexpected sight!" he said.

"Yes," replied Blueskin; "and an awful one! There has been a tragedy enacted here; but I fear we shall never know much more concerning it than we do now."

"Then let us push forward," said Jack Sheppard. "I was in hopes that this concerned us in some way, but I find now that it does not."

"Don't be too sure of that, Jack," said Blueskin. "A few minutes' delay can be of no particular importance, especially as we have not anything like a clue to the whereabouts of our foe."

"Still, the less delay the better."

"I agree with you in that—let us avoid all unnecessary delays; but, unless I am mistaken, I think we shall find, upon a closer search, something that will tell us whether we are on the right scent, or not."

"I trust it may be so."

"Dismount, then," said Blueskin. "Secure your horse to the back of the post-chaise. We will then take a look round. No doubt there's more to be seen than meets the eye at the first glance."

Jack complied, though rather reluctantly.

It was his opinion that they would be able to satisfy their curiosity to some extent, but nothing more.

However, he followed Blueskin's example, and secured his horse by the bridle to the back of the post-chaise.

"Follow me!" said Blueskin. "We will go round to the other side of the vehicle."

This was in order to avoid passing too close to the two dead bodies.

The post-chaise had not stopped quite in the centre of the road, but rather to one side of it, and it was on this side that the two bodies lay.

Upon getting round to the front of the vehicle, they noted with surprise that the traces had been cut, and the horses had vanished.

"A daring deed this!" said Blueskin. "Surely it is not long since it took place, or it would have been discovered."

They then came round to the other side, where the door was swinging open.

They approached, and, after a momentary reluctance, determined to ascertain whether either of these unfortunate beings was alive.

They went first to the gentleman whose body was in such a strange position.

They laid him out upon his back in the road.

He was quite warm; and this made them think that he was still alive.

Bending down over him, however, they saw a small round hole in his forehead, from which the blood was still oozing.

"It's a case!" said Blueskin. "He's dead, sure enough. That bullet must have gone quite through his brain."

"So I see. But how warm the body is."

"Yes; that shows the deed has only just been committed."

"And his pockets, do you observe they are turned inside out?"

"Yes. Is the postilion alive, I wonder?"

"That we can soon ascertain. I fancy not. First of all, let us look inside the post-chaise: it may be that we shall see something else there."

"Let us go round to the other door, then," said Blueskin; "we can open that and look in without the necessity of standing over this gentleman's corpse."

"With all my heart," said Jack. "I can't help being strongly and strangely interested in this affair; but yet I am anxious that we should make haste; it is quite time we were off."

CHAPTER DLVIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD FIND DANGER THICKENING AROUND THEM.

It took but a moment to gain the other side of the post-chaise, and then Blueskin took hold of the handle.

He turned it round, and then, very much to his surprise, the door opened, forcing him backwards as though some heavy weight was pushing against it.

A loud cry came from Jack Sheppard's lips.

They had indeed found something else inside the post-chaise, and the discovery was an appalling one.

It showed that they had not yet fully comprehended the dire tragedy.

As soon as ever the door was opened, something fell with a dull and heavy crash into the roadway.

It lay there perfectly still in a huddled-up mass.

One glance, however, was sufficient to show that it was the body of a female.

She had on a light dress, with some light-coloured wrapper or shawl thrown over it, but these garments were all stained with blood.

"Another murder!" gasped Blueskin. "This is truly horrible!"

"There is no life here, I think," said Jack. "Come forward."

Blueskin had stepped back several paces, but now, with a strange fluttering about his heart, he advanced.

He bent down, and, overcoming his repugnance as well as he was able, looked more closely at the huddled-up mass.

The light-coloured shawl, or whatever the garment was, had fallen over the face, and, stooping down, Blueskin, with a trembling hand, removed it.

A fair and beautiful countenance was then disclosed.

But it was distorted, as though by an access of bodily anguish.

Nevertheless, traces of great beauty remained.

"She's dead!" said Blueskin—"dead, beyond a doubt! What do you think of all this, Jack?"

"It is truly an appalling discovery!"

"It is; but, more than that, it seems to prove to me that we are on the right track."

"How so?"

"Does not this horrible spectacle look like Jonathan Wild's work?"

"It does—it does!"

"Who else but such a villain could have committed so atrocious and cold-blooded a deed as this?"

"No one, Jack! Depend upon it, Jonathan Wild has been here, and this is the mark he has left behind him!"

"There has been robbery as well as murder!"

"Yes; and in committing one crime he would not scruple to commit the other! It is unsatisfactory as well as dreadful to find all three in such a state as this! How much better it would have been for us if one of them had retained sufficient life to be able to give us some explanation of this tragedy, and to have described the person by whom it was perpetrated."

"It would," said Blueskin. "And I am not without the hope that we shall obtain that information!"

"How so?"

"You forget the postilion!"

"No, I do not; but I have little hope that you will be able to obtain any information from him! If his face isn't that of a dead man, I never saw one!"

"Look inside the post-chaise, Jack, and then we will go to him and see! Surely no other horrible discovery awaits us!"

As the post-chaise inclined to one side, one door swung open while the other was shut.

Jack pulled it open and looked in, but there was nothing else to be seen.

The interior was stained with blood; but they could not see any object within it.

Accordingly, in pursuance of their intention, they made their way round once more to the other side.

The postilion lay exactly in the same position.

"He is warm," said Blueskin, as he touched him. "He has been shot in the breast. I fear the wound is mortal, yet he may be recovered. Can you see any water?"

"There's a ditch by the roadside."

"Well, get a little clean water from that if you can. We will dash it on his face."

Jack picked up the postilion's hat, which was the only thing he could see that he could carry water in.

The ditch by the roadside in many respects resembled a stream, for it was three-parts full of water, and it was tolerably clean.

Jack filled the hat, and poured the contents over the postilion's face.

There was a slight shiver all over his frame, and then a groan issued from his lips.

In the hope that they should be able to obtain some information from him, Blueskin gently raised him to a half-sitting posture.

The man groaned again as though the movement had produced exquisite pain.

Then he opened his eyes.

"Speak," said Blueskin—"speak if you possibly can, and tell us how it has happened that you have got into this plight."

It was evident from the postilion's manner that he comprehended the words which had just been addressed to him.

He made several attempts to speak, but could not.

He seemed choking.

"Fetch some more water, Jack," said Blueskin, who thought he might be able to pour a little down his throat.

Jack hurried off, and soon returned.

The postilion thanked them for the water with an impressive glance.

He wanted it, but could not ask.

Again and again he tried to speak, but only half-articulate groans came from his lips.

He still seemed choking, and then suddenly, just when Blueskin imagined he was about to speak, a quantity of blood gushed forth from his lips.

Then he shivered again, and the muscles in his neck relaxing, his head fell forward upon his breast.

"It is no good, Blueskin," said Jack. "He's dead!"

"Alas, yes! I regret now that we did not attend to him at first. If we had done so, we might perchance have obtained the information so important to us."

"You are sure he is dead?"

"Oh yes, quite! He will never speak again!"

Blueskin placed the body in its original position, and then, standing upright, he said:

"Well, Jack, it seems pretty clear that we can do ourselves no good by remaining here."

"None whatever. Let us hasten forward."

"By all means," said Blueskin. "We should find it very awkward if we were discovered near this place."

"We should. A horrible discovery awaits some one! Hark! What is that?"

They listened.

"Horses' feet!" said Jack. "Police officers, I should say by the sound, or perhaps they may be only travellers. In either case, the sooner we get off the better!"

"Yes, mount at once!"

The horses were unfastened, and the two friends sprang into the saddles.

The post-chaise was quickly left behind.

They sped on down the road in a straight line.

Although disappointed at not being able to learn anything definite, yet they were in better spirits and more confident than they had been previously.

This was because they fully believed that they had got upon the thief-taker's track.

Such a horrible crime as had evidently been committed could be the work of no one else, therefore they felt the greatest encouragement to proceed.

Of the horsemen they heard approaching they saw nothing.

Of course they would stop as soon as ever they came to the post-chaise.

Still, as they galloped on, and as the night passed away, the two friends became saddened, for they met with no further traces of the thief-taker.

In the east, signs of the coming day could already be seen.

At length, on making their way up a very long and very steep hill, they paused upon its summit, in order to allow their horses to recover their wind.

Their horses showed palpable signs of great distress.

By degrees the grey, chill light of morning began to creep over the whole landscape, bringing into view the various objects of which it was composed.

The summit of the hill upon which they had halted commanded a most extensive prospect.

For many a mile the country could be seen around them.

Both shaded their eyes with their hands, in order to see more clearly, and then took a long and careful look around them.

But although their gaze rested successively upon every road, and lane, and meadow around, yet they failed nevertheless to catch a glimpse of their old enemy.

It was in a sad, almost heart-broken tone that Jack Sheppard let his hands fall to his side, and said to his companion:

"Alas! I can see nothing of him!"

"Nor I," said Blueskin, "but we must not despair, for all that! The task we have set ourselves is one of no common difficulty, and it would be ridiculous to suppose that we shall be able to succeed all at once."

"I know that," said Jack.

"Still, from your impatient manner, I think it is well that you should be reminded of it. You should not forget, too, that, for a length of time, Jonathan Wild has set all the police officers in the kingdom at defiance, and it is too much to suppose that we should succeed immediately where they have failed."

"I grant all that," said Jack, "but find myself unable to derive any consolation from it. He is a monster in human form!"

"Of that, Jack, there can be no doubt."

"There could not be after the events of to-night. Who but such a villain could have perpetrated such a horrible and atrocious deed?"

"No one."

"Imagine, then, what it must be to feel one's self wholly in the power and wholly at the mercy of such a man, as Edgworth Bess must be!"

"I do not think too much upon it, Jack, or it would drive me mad! There is no barbarity—no crime—no villainy that he would scruple to be guilty of."

"I am distressed," said Jack, "when I think of it. Here we are upon this road in all probability miles and miles away from where he now is, and at this very moment, while we are standing idly here, poor Edgworth Bess is no doubt in urgent need of our protection and assistance!"

"We must not dwell upon that, Jack, but make up our minds that, let the difficulty be ever so great, we will discover it!"

"And then," said Jack, looking behind him, "I can't help thinking in what a dangerous position we are ourselves. My existence, it is true, is not suspected, but no doubt the police officers are looking anxiously in every direction for yourself."

"No doubt of that," said Blueskin. "I have been out of sight for a long while, but yet not long enough for the police officers to forget me."

"Very true. Now look back upon the road. What is that coming along so swiftly?"

It was rather difficult to look back, because the sun, which was just rising above the horizon, was shining full in their faces.

Nevertheless, Blueskin gazed for a moment, and then said suddenly:

"They are police officers, Jack, coming along the road at full speed! You may depend they are part of the party we heard just before we left the post-chaise. They have discovered it and come on in pursuit. If we are seen, we shall get the credit of this deed, and we shall never be able to prove that we have not committed it! Forward! Our thought now must be flight!"

"Yes," said Jack, "forward at once, for from our elevated position, and from the fact of the sun shining full upon us, we must be distinctly visible to the officers."

"Well, we will not be much longer. Now, Jack, spur your horse hard—everything depends upon speed!"

Jack obeyed, and in another second the two friends were tearing down the hill at a speed that was absolutely terrific.

"The worst of it is," shouted Blueskin, as they reached the level ground, "that the officers will be able to see miles off as soon as they get to the top of the hill!"

"They are not there yet," cried Jack. "Look around you. Is there no means by which we can baffle or elude them?"

"None that I see," said Blueskin. "Forward—forward! We are too close to the foot of the hill to do anything."

At the same desperate rate they tore along the high-road, and at every few minutes both would turn their heads and look behind them, expecting every time that they would perceive the officers upon the summit of the hill.

CHAPTER DLIX.

WILD JUNIOR MAKES AN IMPORTANT AND UNLOOKED-FOR DISCOVERY.

GEORGE WILD found himself quite comfortable in his new lodgings, and no doubt he would have remained here in comfort and security for a considerable length of time, but he knew that in a very short time the end of his resources would be reached; therefore it was necessary for him to ponder over the future.

He was moved to do this also by a certain restlessness of disposition, which would never allow him to remain long idle or quiet.

"I must find out what's become of the gov'nor," he said, on the day following his arrival at his lodgings. "D—n him, he always was a trouble to me, and I suppose he always will be!"

After making this extraordinary remark, Wild junior remained for some time silent. No doubt he was in deep reflection.

Then, having made up his mind to a certain course, he said:

"I'll find out what I can about him. I'll send for a newspaper—not that that will be much good, for those chaps that write to the papers are such d—d liars!"

George rung the bell, and desired the landlady to obtain him a newspaper.

This was an unusual request, and made the woman stare with astonishment, for in those days it was quite a curiosity to catch sight of a newspaper.

"Go and get one," said Wild—"I want one very particularly."

The landlady withdrew, and towards evening appeared with a small, dirty-brown sheet of paper.

Wild seized it with avidity, and looked over its contents.

It was called the Flying Post, and appeared regularly every week, which was considered a wonderful thing in those days.

He came at length to an article which described at full length a desperate attempt to capture Jonathan Wild and his companion Mr. Noakes, and which had failed in consequence of the determined resistance they had made.

As a matter of course, the account ended with an assurance that they had good reason for believing that the two offenders would in a short time be in safe custody.

"I wonder what the gov'nor's up to?" said Wild junior, as he laid down the paper reflectively. "His stupid old head is at work at something, I know. What's he stopping in England for? Why don't he cut and run for it?"

George found himself unable to answer these questions, so at length he gave up in despair.

"I must do something for myself, at any rate," he said, at length. "It won't do for me to go on in this sort of way. If the gov'nor was only comfortably out of sight, and I felt sure I had the field clear to myself, I should know better how to set to work."

He was silent for a long while.

Then again he muttered his thoughts aloud.

"There's that girl—that heiress to the estates. That was as good a scheme as ever was planned by anybody. I'll give the gov'nor credit so far, and it was a thousand pities that anything should interfere with the carrying out of it; but I suppose it's all over with that. I wonder where the girl is."

This was another question that defied solution.

"If I could find her," he said, slowly—"get possession of her—marry her, in spite of all resistance, I should be pretty right. I shouldn't come in for the title, but I don't care a d—n for that! I should come in for the chink, which is better!"

George was greatly pleased at this prospect; and the more he thought over it, the more desirous he felt of succeeding in obtaining possession of the heiress.

"It may be done yet," he said. "Who can tell? I have been away from London a long while, which is awkward, for I don't know as I should do what has taken place. After all, I'm inclined to think well of it. If I could only marry her, I should then be able to set the gov'nor and all the rest of the world at defiance. She's the genuine heiress—there's no mistake about that,—I have fully satisfied myself upon that point. All that I have to do is to obtain possession of her; but, for the life of me, I can't tell how it is to be managed!"

Wild lighted his pipe, for he fancied that if he smoked for awhile it would quicken his inventive faculties.

But on this occasion the stimulant failed to produce its accustomed effects.

He was altogether abroad in the matter.

He knew not which way to turn nor in what direction to look for this heiress; and, for all he knew, she might already have been made the inheritor of her father's possessions; and if so, why, his plan would fall to the ground.

"It's no good for me to puzzle my brain about this matter to-night," he said. "I'll go to bed now, and when morning comes I will slightly disguise myself, and go out in search of information. I shall be sure to find something out. Yes, that must be it!"

Fully intending to retire to rest, George Wild rose, and put his pipe on the chimneypiece.

He had taken two rooms upon the second floor of the lodging-house, one of which was in the front, and used for a sitting-room, and the other at the back, and used for a bed-room.

Therefore, it follows that, in order to gain his sleeping apartment, he had to quit his sitting-room and cross the landing.

As he was doing this, he heard some one singing in a low and plaintive tone of voice.

What the words were he could not distinguish, but yet the sad, low voice seemed strangely familiar to him. He stood upon the landing as though suddenly transformed to stone.

He listened with eager intentness until the voice ceased to sing.

Wild's countenance lighted up with fresh hope, and he clenched his hands tightly.

"I am mad, or dreaming, or asleep, or drunk, or something!" he said, through his clenched teeth. "And yet, no—I am not! I am calm, and in my sober senses! I heard her singing—I'm sure of it! That was her voice!"

He trembled with excitement, and yet, although he felt so sure that he was not mistaken, strange doubts came over his mind.

"This is too good to be real," he said. "I can't believe that I have been favoured by my good luck so far as to come into the very house where she is! And yet, why not? Strange coincidences frequently occur, and this may be one of them."

The voice then began to sing again, and, as he listened to the faint, sad notes, George Wild became more and more convinced that his fancy was not deluding him.

He stood there for a moment wondering how to act and what to do to turn these circumstances to the greatest advantage.

"She's there," he said, "in this house, and in an apartment not far from this. I must secure her—but how?"

That was indeed difficult to decide, for of course it was impossible for Wild junior to tell whether Edgworth Bess was alone or not.

If he could only have made sure that none of her friends were at hand, and ready to render her assistance, he would have entered the apartment without hesitation.

The sorrowful voice of the singer seemed to have the effect of arresting all Wild's movements, for during the whole of the time he stood on the landing listening.

At length she was once more silent.

"Let the risk be what it will, I will go down!" he muttered. "I will enter the room, and either by force or fraud make her a prisoner! Yes—that's my course; and when I have accomplished that much, the remainder will be easy!"

Slowly and stealthily, Wild junior commenced the descent of the stairs.

He had got about half-way down the flight leading from the second to the first floor, when he stopped suddenly.

He heard some one ascending.

It would never do for him to be seen loitering there, nor would it do for him to attempt to carry out his purpose just at that moment; and so, with a muttered exclamation on his lips, he turned round, and hastily crept up to his own room again.

He reached it unperceived, and standing just within it, with the door partly open and his head half out, he looked down the staircase, in order to ascertain who it was he had heard coming up.

It was the landlady.

She paused on the first-floor landing, and having knocked at the door of one of the rooms, entered.

Wild stretched his sense of hearing to the utmost, but as the door was closed, no sound reached him.

Then, all at once, a fresh thought occurred to him.

His own sitting-room was immediately over the one the landlady had just entered.

It was not carpeted all over, but strips were laid down here and there.

As quick as thought, he closed the door and laid himself down at full length.

He placed his ear close to the boards, and then listened.

He grinned with satisfaction.

This plan succeeded admirably.

The sound of voices in the room below ascended, and his ear being placed where it was, enabled him to hear all.

He could not distinguish each word, however, but only a continuous sound.

In this way he recognised one voice to be that of the landlady, and the other that of Edgeworth Bess.

He listened for several moments, anxious to know whether any third person would take a share in the conversation.

At last, he heard the landlady leave the room and close the door, and then he came to the conclusion that Edgeworth Bess was the sole occupant of the apartment.

His brain was in a whirl.

He was like one suddenly receiving unexpected and joyful intelligence, which he hoped and believed was true, and yet feared that it was not.

He could scarcely believe that such good luck had befallen him.

"I will hesitate no longer," he said. "The matter shall be settled either one way or the other. I will go down at once. If I have been making a mistake—if my ears have deceived me—it will be no serious matter. I have got myself out of a worse difficulty than that can possibly be."

Once more, then, Wild made his way on to the landing.

He listened, but this time he heard no sounds of any one ascending to interrupt him.

Cautiously he crept down step by step, and in another minute more stood upon the landing on the first floor.

And now the voice began to sing again.

Of course, George heard with much greater plainness than he had yet done, and he felt quite certain in his own mind that he was not mistaken.

He placed his hand upon the knob.

It trembled slightly as he did so, for his excitement was so great that he could not control it.

"I must be careful to a degree in all my movements," he thought, "and speedy too. If she gives the least alarm or makes the least noise, the chance is lost."

George took a pistol from his pocket, and cocked it.

This he held in his right hand.

His left still rested upon the knob.

Suddenly he turned it.

The latch was raised.

Then, quick as thought, he opened the room door, closed it after him, placed his back against it, and exclaimed, in a hoarse, hissing whisper:

"One word—one cry—a single sound—and your fate is sealed!"

All this was done with a rapidity that cannot be described. It seemed instantaneous.

But his menacing words and attitude appeared to produce their due effect, for no alarm was given—all was as silent as the grave.

CHAPTER DLX.

IN WHICH THE MYSTERY OF THE DISAPPEARANCE OF EDGWORTH BESS IS FULLY ELUCIDATED.

FATE—chance—accident,—call it what you will,—had indeed and in truth brought George Wild to the very house in Westminster where Blueskin, Jack Sheppard, and Edgeworth Bess had taken up their quarters.

It was a strange coincidence, but many as strange, or even stranger, happen every day.

It is so long ago since we mentioned the arrival of Edgeworth Bess in this place that it may be as well to remind the reader of the few particulars connected with it.

Jack and Blueskin were both of opinion that in this obscure street they had found a secure asylum from their foes.

After staying for a few days without meeting with any molestation, Jack had announced his determination of setting out in pursuit of Jonathan Wild.

In spite of the tears and entreaties of Edgeworth Bess, he had remained firm to his purpose, and, as soon as dusk had come, quitted the house.

They strictly enjoined her before parting to remain in her room, and upon no account to go abroad, promising that, in three or four days at the utmost, they would certainly return.

It will doubtless be recollected that Blueskin and Jack went direct to Wild's house in Newgate Street, in the hope of obtaining some kind of clue to his whereabouts.

It was then that they had seen the bill offering the reward respecting Edgeworth Bess, and this caused them to make a change in their plans.

Instead of commencing their pursuit of Jonathan Wild there and then, they resolved to delay it, and went to the Lord Chancellor's.

What happened after that is already known.

After the departure of her friends, Edgeworth Bess remained, sad and sorrowful, seated by the fire.

She had no inclination to go abroad, and there was little fear that she would disobey the injunctions she had received in this respect.

She was in a state of the greatest agitation and alarm.

Strive as she would, she could not compose herself—in fact, she fancied, as the minutes passed slowly by, that the feeling of uneasiness increased.

There was nothing for her to do by which she could cheat time of its tediousness.

Then, after a long time, she fancied she would try to sing.

This, she thought, might have a cheering effect upon her spirits.

She began, then, an old plaintive ditty, which she had remembered from infancy.

During the time of her long captivity in the thief-taker's house, in Newgate Street, she had beguiled the tedium of many an hour by singing this ballad.

This at once explains how it was that George Wild so quickly and readily recognised her voice.

During the time of her imprisonment he was in the adjoining room keeping guard, and he had heard her sing this same song very often.

But growing tired in a little while of this amusement, she had summoned the landlady.

This simple act produced more important results than she could possibly have expected, for it prevented George Wild from entering the room.

Edgeworth Bess called the landlady to know whether she could be furnished with a book, in order that she might attempt to amuse herself by reading.

In those days, however, books were much scarcer things than now, and the landlady informed her lodger that she had not such a thing in the house.

After an unimportant conversation, she retired, and Edgeworth Bess, resuming her seat by the fireside, sat for some time in silence, and then half-unconsciously broke out into the same song.

Then, as we are already aware, George Wild opened the door and entered.

So sudden was his appearance that he might have been taken for an apparition, or something supernatural.

Upon hearing the door open, Edgeworth Bess instinctively turned round to look.

Her first impulse was to utter a loud shriek of alarm.

The dim light that was in the apartment fell upon the brutal-looking countenance of George Wild.

She recognised him instantly.

But the scream she wished to utter seemed frozen on her lips.

In vain she tried to cast off the kind of spell which had fallen upon her.

She could not.

She sat there without moving—almost without breathing.

Her terror was so great, she seemed changed to stone.

There was no occasion for Wild to have uttered those threatening words—his appearance was quite sufficient to freeze up all the poor girl's faculties.

Finding that he had succeeded so far, Wild junior, with a grin of triumph on his face, strode swiftly forward.

As he did so, he took from his neck the thick neckcloth he habitually wore.

It was already folded up in the shape of a broad bandage, and, in a second, he threw it over the poor girl's head, and tied it tightly at the back.

Her mouth was now firmly closed, and even if she had recovered her voice she could not have made herself heard.

It pressed also upon her nostrils, and she was in imminent danger of suffocation.

Believing that, as he had succeeded so far, the remainder would be simple, George said :

"Rise!—follow me noiselessly, and at once! Do not hesitate!—do not attempt to refuse or resist! If you do, you will repent it!"

But Edgworth Bess had lost not only all power over her voice, but over her limbs also.

Had her life depended upon it, she could not have risen in obedience to Wild junior's commands.

She trembled excessively.

Then George placed his hand rudely on her shoulder, and attempted to raise her to her feet.

That was enough.

She could bear no more, and she sank back in the chair in a deep swoon.

For a moment, Wild junior did not comprehend her condition, but as soon as he did so, he said :

"Perhaps it is as well, or even better, thus. I can manage with all the more secrecy and certainty."

By a great effort of strength, he lifted Edgworth Bess in his arms, and walked with her out of the room on to the landing.

She exhibited not one symptom of life.

He paused on the landing a moment, and closed the door.

The most difficult part of the proceeding was now before him.

He had to carry her downstairs, for he was resolved, now that he had got her in his power, that he would leave the house without a moment's delay, for fear Blueskin and Jack should return.

But he was forced to abandon this intention, for he heard a loud knocking at the front door, and then voices in the passage.

"Curse it!" he cried. "I am balked! I must wait for another opportunity!"

The footsteps and voices in the passage below came towards the stairs.

He felt pretty sure that these persons were about to ascend.

What, then, should he do under this posture of affair?

His first thought was that he would enter the room again, and then he remembered he would run a very great risk of detection.

He had only one resource, and no time for deliberation.

He feared that his strength would never be sufficient to enable him to carry his prisoner up the flight of stairs into his own room, and yet he must either do that or be detected.

Of course, when she was once in his room, all would be well; he would be in but little danger of discovery.

Summoning all his strength for this one tremendous effort, Wild junior placed Edgworth Bess partially over his shoulder, and hastened up the stairs.

Fortunately they were only twelve in number; but he felt, as he ascended one after another, as though he must certainly fall backwards.

But he gained the top.

His room door was open.

He entered and closed it after him with the rapidity of thought.

All was safe now, but he was not one moment too soon; in fact, had he been any later than he was, he must have been seen by those ascending.

These, as the reader may suspect, were no others than Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, who had brought the Lord Chancellor with them.

Had they but arrived one moment sooner than they did, what a world of misery and suffering would have been saved!

With what followed the arrival of Blueskin and Jack, the reader has already been made acquainted, and the disappearance of Edgworth Bess will no longer be a mystery.

Upon gaining his room, George Wild immediately placed his insensible prisoner upon a chair, and then, full of anxiety and impatience, hastened to the door, and ventured to open it a little way.

He had some half-formed suspicion in his mind that the new comers must be the friends of Edgworth Bess, but the time it took him to place Edgworth Bess upon the chair and to glide to the door had sufficed for the little party to enter the room on the floor below, and therefore he was not able to overhear anything.

"They will discover her disappearance much sooner than I expected. How cursedly unfortunate! Never mind! Perhaps, after all, things will turn out for the best!"

George remained at the door of his room, listening, for some time, nor did he draw in his head and close it until he heard them ascending the stairs.

He then closed and locked it, and, with a beating heart, awaited the result.

It will be remembered how they paused upon the landing on the second floor, and how the questions they asked were replied to by some one in a gruff tone of voice, who took care not to show himself.

This person with the gruff voice was, of course, no other than George Wild.

Had our friends insisted upon entering that room, they would have discovered all at a glance, but, as we know, they had not the least suspicion in this quarter, and, after the exchange of a few words, they descended the stairs, and afterwards left the house.

It was not until he had satisfied himself that they had all really and truly gone that Wild junior ventured to draw along breath.

"That's a relief!" he said. "And now that I have succeeded so far, I think I can manage the rest of the business comfortably."

He went back to the chair upon which Edgworth Bess was sitting.

Her death-like swoon still continued, and he grew so alarmed at her corpse-like appearance that he thought he had better remove the bandage from her face.

It was well that he did this, for the poor girl was in great danger of suffocation.

When the cloth was removed, she showed signs of returning vitality.

George Wild watched her eagerly, and while he did so, his thoughts were very busy.

"I'll get out of this house at once," he said. "I can't leave it too soon, and the greater distance I place between it and myself, the better it will be. They may grow suspicious. How do I know but that in a few minutes they may return, having taken it into their heads to search this chamber? Yes, I'll go at once, or rather as soon as she recovers sufficiently to accompany me!"

George did not know exactly what to do to assist the return of Edgworth Bess to consciousness, and even if he had, the remedies were not at hand.

He had no resource, therefore, but to wait and let nature take her proper course.

Very gradually, and very slowly, then, Edgworth Bess regained possession of her senses, and opening her eyes, she gave a terrified glance around her.

"Silence!" said George, in a threatening voice—"silence, or your life will pay the forfeit!"

CHAPTER DLXI.

EDGORTH BESS FINDS HERSELF WHOLLY IN THE POWER OF WILD JUNIOR.

At first Edgworth Bess was under the impression that the horrible events which had just occurred had existence only in her imagination.

She expected to find that the whole was a dream.

But the hideous countenance of Wild junior—the sight of the pistol which he held so threateningly towards her—and, above all, the tones of his harsh, menacing voice, struck terror to her soul, and made her aware, to her sorrow, that all was real.

That malignant fate which had always seemed to attend upon her had not yet ceased its persecutions.

After believing, as she did, that at last she was in a state of greater safety than she had been for a long time, the shock of finding herself wholly in the power of George Wild was almost more than she could withstand.

Much as she dreaded and feared the great thief-taker, she really believed in her own heart that she dreaded and feared his son more.

There was an amount of subtlety and treachery in George Wild's disposition which terrified her more than open violence could do.

"Listen," she heard Wild junior say—"pay attention to all my words—if you disregard them, it will be at your peril! Do you understand?"

Bess was silent.

"I believe you can hear and comprehend what I say; if so, and you cannot command your voice to speak, make me some sign to show that you understand."

Edgworth Bess, fearful of refusing, lest she should awake his violence, bent her head.

"Oh, you do understand me, then? Very well,—just pay attention to these instructions:—First of all, you are in my power—wholly—helplessly. Your friends have been—have looked for you—failed to find you, and have left the house under the impression that you have quitted it!"

The poor girl clasped her hands together in silent agony.

"They are now doubtless far enough off, so don't look forward to any assistance from them. And now I'll tell you what I intend to do. I am going to leave this house, and that at once. You must accompany me!"

By an impulse she could not resist, Edgworth Bess took hold of the arms of the chair, and clenched them tightly, as though to show she was determined to resist.

"Take my advice," said George Wild, "and submit quietly. I am not desirous of doing you an injury, if I can help it; but if you refuse to accompany me quietly, I shall use force,—I shall not be afraid to do so. The people in this house are wholly devoted to my interests, and, so far from offering any interruption, will lend me their assistance!"

This, of course, was not true; but, then, George judged it would have great effect in inducing his prisoner to become passive in his hands.

And he was not mistaken.

When she heard this dreadful and unexpected piece of intelligence, Edgworth Bess abandoned all hope.

She imagined she could tell, by the calm, confident manner in which he spoke, that Wild junior was telling her the truth.

Resistance, she was well aware, would be perfectly useless; such as she could offer would avail nothing against the strength of George Wild, and she knew the man already well enough to feel certain that he would not scruple in the least to use force, if he found he could not succeed without it.

"Now," he said, sharply and decisively, "I am going at once! Rally your energies! Rise, and accompany me! If you do so, no harm will befall you—I will not injure you in any way; but if you refuse, the consequences of the refusal will be on your own head!"

As he spoke, Wild stowed into his pockets a few articles that were in the room, and then, having made the whole of his preparations, he took hold of Edgworth Bess by the arm.

"Rise," he said, "without you intend me to force you to do so!"

With a sob and sigh, Edgworth Bess obeyed.

"Come!" said George. "I am going to descend the stairs; but before we leave the room, let me give you one more caution: do not attempt to utter a cry for aid, or to shriek out for assistance. If you do, you will find the consequences terrible in the extreme; and at this silent hour of the night, when nearly the whole world is asleep, your cries would be ineffectual, but they would raise my resentment to the highest pitch, and after that I would show you no mercy! So, now, I give you warning in good time! Beware!"

Terrified almost to death, and trembling violently in every limb, Edgworth Bess permitted her captor to lead her out on to the landing and down the stairs.

She seemed all the time as though her legs must give way beneath her, and tears of bitter anguish rolled down her cheeks.

George Wild had obtained complete mastery over her.

She was like a bird fascinated by some huge serpent. She offered not the slightest resistance, nor did she once open her lips to utter a cry for aid.

Had she done so, it is questionable whether she would have experienced any benefit from it; but still, the sound might have reached friendly ears.

But Wild junior had threatened to show her no mercy, and she knew very well that in this he would be as good as his word.

The inmates of the lodging-house had nearly all retired to rest.

In the kitchen, down below, voices could be heard.

In all probability, the landlady was occupied in giving her version of the strange proceedings that had taken place upstairs.

If so, it was pretty certain that she would be so occupied—and her listeners also—that they would fail to hear anything that was going on above.

When they reached the bottom of the stairs, and stood near the front door of the house, Edgworth Bess heard these voices below, and felt a strong and powerful inclination to utter a scream for aid.

But she did not.

She remained as silent as she had done hitherto.

With very great skill, Wild junior removed all the fastenings of the front door without making a sound loud enough to attract attention.

He held Edgworth Bess tightly by the wrist.

"Come," he whispered, as he flung the door open—"come, and, for your life, be silent!"

The cold night air blew gratefully upon the poor girl's face.

Unconsciously she drank in large draughts of the cold air, and as she did so she became remarkably strengthened and revived.

She began to think it would be better to set her captor at defiance, and to make an attempt to save herself, and so she opened her lips to utter a cry.

Before any sound could come forth, however, she felt the hard and heavy hand of George Wild pressed tightly over her mouth.

"Silence!" he cried, fiercely, in her ear. "Silence! Remember what I have said to you!"

He hurried her swiftly forward as he spoke, and just then they reached the corner of another street.

Along this a hackney-coach was creeping at a snail's pace.

George hailed the vehicle, but the man never offered to pull up.

"Stop," said Wild junior, "a fare—a good fare! Stop!" "Can't," said the man, "my horses are knocked up, and so am I. I'm going home."

"Two guineas," said George—"two guineas!"

"Ha! What?"

"Two guineas if you will take us a little way."

"Agreed!" said the man, stopping his horses at once.

It was not every night that he had an opportunity of earning such a sum, and the temptation was too great to be resisted.

Once more Edgworth Bess had almost swooned—partly from fear, and partly from the disgust she felt at Wild's hand being upon her face and pressed tightly over her mouth.

"Jump down and open the door!" said George, addressing the driver. "Make haste! Can't you see the lady has fainted?"

"All right, sir!" said the coachman, obeying with great alacrity.

[WILD JUNIOR ARRIVES WITH HIS CAPTIVE AT THE LONESOME INN.]

In another moment, George Wild was seated with his captive in the vehicle.

"Where to, sir?" asked the driver.

"Drive towards the Edgware Road," said Wild junior. "You can't take me so far as I want to go. Stop when you find another hackney-coach."

"Oh, I'll go, sir," said the driver, "now I've made a start, and I can give the horses some refreshment on the way!"

"Very well, then—drive to the corner of Edgware Road. When you get there, I'll tell you which way you are to take."

George gave this direction because at the moment he had not made up his mind where to go.

That it would be best to get a little way from London seemed tolerably clear, and therefore, he gave instructions to be driven to the corner of the Edgware Road.

No. 120.—BLUESKIN.

While he was going so far he should be able to mature his plans.

Now that he had his captive fairly in the vehicle, he removed his hand from her face, and allowed her to sit on the seat opposite to him.

He kept an eye upon all her movements, but he saw that, although she was not utterly unconscious, she was, nevertheless, in a dreamy state, and unable to make any resistance.

Anxiously he began to deliberate.

"I will get into some out-of-the-way place, some miles from London, and there I will take steps for an immediate marriage! When the ceremony is once performed I shall not care—she can go to the devil if she likes—my share of the wealth will be secure!"

Presently the coach stopped, and looking out of the window, George saw that he was at the corner of the Edgware Road.

"Drive straight on towards Edgware," said George.

"Very good, sir," said the driver; "and if you don't mind the expense, there is an inn at Kilburn where I can obtain a change of horses."

"D—n the expense!" said George Wild. "Drive there as fast as you can, and change the two brutes you've got for the two best horses in the stable!"

"All right, sir!" said the driver. "But you'll understand that this will be extra!"

"Oh, quite extra!" said George, growling. "You will have no cause to complain of my liberality when we get to the end of our journey."

The coachman drove on, and, without the occurrence of any further accident, finally stopped in front of an inn at Kilburn.

Edgworth Bess had not yet recovered her consciousness.

She knew that the coach had stopped—she knew that people were moving about, but yet she lacked both the physical and mental power to utter a cry that would bring them to her relief.

The horses were quickly changed, and when the driver had solaced himself with a glass of something short to keep the cold out, the journey was resumed at a much more rapid rate than before.

Just as day was beginning to dawn they passed through the little village of Edgware.

George knew the place well—in fact, he was familiar with all the roads in and around London.

While thinking seriously as to the spot he should choose for his destination, he suddenly remembered a very out-of-the-way nook, where there was every probability of his being able to remain for any length of time in secrecy and security.

This place was, however, some five miles further along the road, and so he leaned back in his seat, waiting patiently until that distance had been travelled.

CHAPTER DLXII.

WILD JUNIOR ARRIVES WITH HIS CAPTIVE AT THE LONESOME INN.

THE hackney-coach rolled along at a very tolerable rate and in a short time its destination would be reached.

The place of which George Wild had thought was an inn, which did not stand at the side of the road, but up a narrow lane which seemed to lead to nowhere save to the front door of the building.

It was a place that had a very evil reputation indeed, and certainly no traveller would be safe if he ventured to take up his lodgings there for one night.

How it was he had not thought of it earlier George could scarcely tell, but the fact was, the recollection of the existence of the inn had altogether slipped out of his memory.

He congratulated himself, however, upon having thought of it just in time.

The landlord he had known well in times back, and he was aware that he was one who would not hesitate to commit any atrocity so long as he was well rewarded for what he did.

This was precisely the man George wanted, and moreover, he was certain that this man would not betray him nor allow Edgworth Bess a single opportunity of escape.

Then the inn itself was so retired, that it was but rarely people stopped at it, and from the fact that there was scarcely any business done, it might be gathered that the landlord had some other source of revenue.

George kept a good look-out all the way, to be in readiness to stop the driver when the coach reached the corner of the lane we have mentioned.

Edgworth Bess now began to recover to some extent from her alarm.

Still, she was greatly terrified, and trembled from head to foot.

The rapid motion of the vehicle, the silence and darkness around her, and above all, the harsh, forbidding countenance of the man who sat opposite to her filled her with a thousand dreadful apprehensions.

By degrees, however, she began to recover her calmness, and at the same time her courage also.

"George Wild," she said.

"You know me then it seems!" he interrupted with a chuckle. "Well, so much the better, we shall be well acquainted with each other before long."

"No, we shall not!" she answered, with a shudder. "I demand to be released! Stop this vehicle and allow me to alight!"

"Wouldn't you like it?" said George, putting his tongue in his cheek. "But really the thing is quite absurd! I could not be so unkind as to leave you on a lonely country road at this hour of the night!"

"Don't mock me! I tell you I demand to be released!"

"Oh, do you?"

"I do!"

"Then, I regret to say that your request is one which I cannot comply with. I am very sorry, but——"

Edgworth Bess would not wait to hear any more.

Turning round, she tapped with her fingers upon the glass in front of the hackney-coach.

"Stop—stop!" she cried. "Stop at once!"

"Hulloa!" said the driver—"what's the matter I wonder?"

He pulled up, and the hackney-coach came to a standstill.

Wild junior uttered a fearful oath.

He seized Edgworth Bess by the wrist with such tightness that she shrieked out with pain.

"Drive on!" shouted George to the coachman. "If you dare to stop again without I order you to do so, I'll put a bullet through your d—d carcass! Drive on, will you?"

The coachman muttered some curses between his teeth, and whipped up his horses.

Once more the vehicle was in motion.

Finding herself foiled in this attempt to escape, and believing that the driver would disregard her commands, Edgworth Bess uttered shriek after shriek, in the hope that the sounds of distress would reach the ears of some chance passers by.

"Stop that noise!" growled Wild junior, threateningly—"stop it, I say, or it will be the worse for you!"

Edgworth Bess paid no attention.

"You had better not try me too far!" he said. "Don't force me to use violence towards you, or you will regret it! Silence, I say! You are in my power, and cannot escape!"

Exhausted and fatigued, the poor girl again sank back upon the seat.

"Now," said Wild junior, "as we have begun to have a little conversation, I think I can't do better than acquaint you with my future intentions! Do you hear me?"

Edgworth Bess was silent.

"You won't speak; but I know you can hear, and so I shall take silence for consent! Now listen: I am not afraid that you will escape from me this time; we are in a lonely part of the country, and there is no one near to aid you!"

At these words the poor girl could not control her tears.

"It will be your own fault entirely if I use any harshness towards you," said Wild junior. "I have every wish to behave kindly; all will depend upon yourself, however. Of this, at least, you can make yourself certain—before you are many hours older you will be my wife!"

"Never—never!" said Edgworth Bess, with the utmost loathing. "You shall not force me into such a union!"

"Well, we shall see," said George, significantly. "I am determined; and as for you, it matters little what you say or do!"

"It is monstrous—horrible!" said Edgworth Bess. "And hopeless as my position now seems, I am not without hope that help will come ere long!"

"You think your friends will find you out, do you? You are mistaken though: I am not the least apprehensive upon that point! No, no—I have you secure—secure!"

Edgworth Bess looked from side to side, and was strongly tempted to make a desperate effort to cast herself through the coach window even while the vehicle was in motion.

But had she made any such attempt it would have proved abortive.

With an eye like a hawk's, Wild junior watched not only every movement of her body but every change of her countenance.

"You were born to be my wife," he said; "you may not think it, but you will find out presently that what I say is true! Hi—hi, driver—stop! Pull up, I say!"

Grumbling and swearing, the coachman stopped his horses.

"What now?" he said.

"Be civil," said George; "recollect I have got to settle with you yet!"

These words produced an effect upon the coachman, for in quite a humble tone of voice he said:

"Which way do you want to go now, sir?"

"Why, you have just come past a narrow lane—turn back, and drive up it!"

"Very good, sir."

"You will find it will lead you to a public-house—stop before the front door."

The coachman said no more, but turned his horses' heads round and obeyed Wild junior's command.

When Edgworth Bess found they were going to stop, and at a roadside inn, too—for such she imagined it would be—her heart once more beat with hope.

Surely in this place she would meet with people.

They would be human.

They would listen to the story of her sufferings.

They would protect her from George Wild.

As might be guessed, this hope was destined to be a fallacious one.

Slowly and heavily the hackney-coach made its way along the narrow lane.

It was ill-kept, and deep ruts had been worn in it, and the horses struggled at every step to get the vehicle along.

The public-house was situated about a quarter of a mile up this lane, and at last, to the satisfaction and relief of all parties, the hackney-coach stopped before the front door.

Edgworth Bess opened her lips as though about to scream.

George Wild divined her intention, and, in a stern voice, he said:

"Now, I'll give you one word of caution, and mind you attend to it! If you don't, it will be the worse for you, and you will have no one to blame but yourself for the consequences! Be silent, and avoid making any fuss! The people at this place are all in my power! You will get no help from them; on the contrary, they will strive to assist me!"

Wild junior spoke these words in such suppressed and earnest tones, that they carried conviction to the heart of Edgworth Bess.

She did not for one single moment doubt that he was doing otherwise than speaking the truth.

A deep groan of utter anguish and hopelessness escaped her lips, and again she sank back half-fainting on the seat.

The coach came to a standstill.

The driver got down off his seat, and, coming to the door, turned the handle, and opened it.

"Here we are, sir!" he said. "This is the inn, I suppose? Do you want to alight?"

"Yes," said George. "I sha'n't travel any further for some hours! Come," he added, addressing his prisoner, "no resistance—no screams, or depend upon it you will repent it!"

Grasping her wrist tightly as he spoke, he half dragged her out of the coach.

The ostler was standing by, and he gazed with some surprise upon Wild junior's proceedings.

Taking no notice, however, George dragged his prisoner after him to the front door of the public-house, which was standing wide open.

He had only a few steps to go; and almost before she was aware of it, Edgworth Bess found herself standing in a narrow, ill-lighted passage.

"Nicholson," cried Wild, as soon as he crossed the threshold—"Nicholson, I say, where are you?"

"Ere—ere!" said a gruff voice.

Directly afterwards there was a flash of light at the other end of the passage.

George took hold of the front door and slammed it shut, and then dragged his captive still further along the passage.

"Hallo!" cried the voice—"what the devil are you about? What did you want to shut that door for?"

"Nicholson," said George again, "come this way!"

A man, carrying a light, now advanced.

He stopped a few paces from his guests.

He held the light up in the air above his head, in order to catch a glimpse of their countenances.

In doing this he also revealed his own.

It was sinister-looking and repulsive to a degree.

As soon as ever he caught sight of Wild junior's face, Nicholson started violently.

When he recovered himself, a remarkable change in his manner was observable.

He bent himself almost to the ground, and in the most humble tones which could possibly be employed by anyone, he said:

"I am your very humble and most devoted servant! What is it you want? I'll do anything for you if you'll but spare my life!"

"I'll see about that," said George, gravely; "I will promise nothing. Still, there is a chance now, if you like to embrace it, of making friends with me."

"Speak—speak!" said Nicholson, anxiously. "Let me know what it is!"

"Well, then, first of all, have you a strong room upstairs?"

"You know I have," replied Nicholson. "You know that as well as I do." Of course, the room is there just as it was when occupied by—"

"Silence!" shouted Wild junior, in a tone so loud that it made the whole house ring again—"silence! Mention no names! That will do. Show me the way to that room!"

"Certainly—certainly," said Nicholson, as humbly as before. "You know the way. Follow me; I'll go first with the light."

George growled out a reply, and followed in the footsteps of the man Nicholson.

He went some little distance further along the passage until he came to the bottom of a flight of stairs.

These he ascended.

They were old and worm-eaten, and creaked painfully beneath their tread, threatening every moment to give way and precipitate them to the earth.

The top was reached in safety, and then Nicholson crossed a landing and paused before a low, strong-looking door.

CHAPTER DLXIII.

WILD JUNIOR TAKES NICHOLSON INTO HIS CONFIDENCE, AND OBTAINS A SPECIAL LICENCE.

A KEY was sticking in the lock.

It was a large, rusty key, and seemed to have been for a long while unused, for Nicholson had to put forth considerable strength before he could turn it.

With a grating, screeching sound, the bolt of the lock was drawn back.

Then a vigorous push caused the door to open, for from damp or some other cause it stuck tightly in its frame.

Nicholson entered the room first, and Wild junior followed.

Upon the countenance of the latter there was a strange peculiar expression.

Something had agitated him in no trifling degree.

What that something was we may yet learn.

"She will be safe here—quite safe!" said Nicholson.

"Of course, you remember—"

"Silence, fool!" interrupted George, fiercely. "Why revert to the past? I wish to hear nothing of it! Close the door, and hold the light so that I can look round!"

Humbly, Nicholson obeyed.

When he held up the light, Wild junior glanced searchingly around him.

The room was empty, and had a desolate appearance.

It contained only two articles of furniture—a small table and a small bed, though the last scarcely deserved to have such a name applied to it.

"This will do," said George.

Then turning to Edgworth Bess, who was shivering with cold and fright, he added:

"You will stay here only for a short time. You will be safe."

"Quite safe," said Nicholson—"I'll guarantee that!"

"There's the window," said Wild—"how about that?"

"It's all right."

"In what way is it secured?"

"It's fastened, and there are bars outside. The ground is twelve feet below, and my dog Pincher is in the yard."

"That will do," said George—"that is quite satisfactory. Now, come, close the door!"

Hearing these words, Edgworth Bess made a frantic attempt to leave the chamber before the closing door made her a prisoner.

But George Wild thrust her rudely back, and turned the rusty key in the lock.

"Downstairs!" he said, imperiously, addressing Nicholson. "Lead the way to the best room!"

"Oh, yes—certainly! Oh, yes! In all things I am your most obedient servant!"

Now, there was something intensely disagreeable in the cringing servility of this man.

It is clear that it was not his nature to fawn upon anyone as he did upon Wild junior.

But there was good reason for his behaviour.

He led the way to a miserable apartment on the ground floor, which he assured his visitor was the best in the house.

"Something to drink!" said George. "Come here, and bring a glass for yourself—I want to speak to you!"

"Yes, yes—oh, yes! What is it you would like?"

"Have you any wine?"

"Not such as I should like to put before you."

"Any brandy?"

"Yes."

"Bring that, then."

Nicholson soon returned with a bottle of brandy, and George poured out two glasses.

"Shall you want that room upstairs very long?" asked Nicholson.

"No; for a short time only—a day or two, at most."

"Very good!"

"Why do you ask?"

"Oh, for no particular reason—I wished to know!"

"Nicholson," said Wild, sinking his voice, "listen attentively to what I am going to say!"

"I always do—always."

"Be doubly attentive now. You know the power that I have over you? You quite comprehend that, without my going further into particulars?"

"Quite—quite! Don't say any more—the subject is hateful!"

"Very good; and knowing that you are so much in my power, I don't hesitate to take you into my confidence."

Nicholson muttered some half intelligible reply.

"I am going to get married," said Wild junior.

"You?"

"Yes."

"In earnest?"

"Certainly."

"To that girl upstairs?"

"Yes."

"I didn't know that you were a marrying man," said Nicholson.

"Nor am I—that is, I wouldn't marry a woman."

"Not a woman?"

"No."

"Then what do you call that person upstairs?"

"A fortune, Nicholson—a fortune! That's what I'm going to marry!"

"I see!" said the landlord. "I was dull not to understand earlier."

"I am resolved to wed her," said George; "but she will never give her consent!"

"How shall you manage it, then?"

"That's just what I wanted to consult with you about."

"You honour me," said Nicholson, bending his head—"you honour me by taking me so deeply into your confidence."

"Bah! I should not do it did I not know well enough that you dare not disclose a word I say, or refuse to obey my mandates!"

"I will be silent and obedient!"

"Good! Well, now, let us consider how I am to succeed in my design. In the first place, a special licence will be required."

Nicholson nodded.

"That's but a trifling difficulty—I can easily surmount that!"

"Not so easy, I should think," said Nicholson.

"Yes; leave me to obtain the licence! I wish the remainder was no more difficult!"

"But the girl's consent?"

"Yes, that's the obstacle!"

"I can't see how you are to overcome it."

"Nor I, except in one way."

"Is there one way?"

"Yes."

"What is it?"

"To drug her—make her half insensible and half conscious of what she is about! In that case it will be necessary to secure the services of a person who would overlook such a trifling irregularity as the bride not knowing what she was about."

Nicholson laughed.

"You have a rare wit!" he exclaimed; "the idea of calling such a thing a trifle!"

"Well, no matter. Supposing that we settle to overcome her resistance by stupefying her, it then becomes necessary to find a person. Can you procure one?"

Nicholson shook his head.

"My acquaintances don't lie among such people. I don't trouble parsons much."

"Nor I," said Wild junior, grinding his teeth; "but I wish I had one as much in my power as you are, the whole thing would be easy then!"

"But you have not."

"No, curse it, I wish I had!"

"I don't know how it is to be managed," said Nicholson.

"But it must be done," cried Wild, "whether it can or not! You must find me a person who will perform this ceremony remember. I'll pay him well for the service—indeed, he shall have such a reward as will entirely overcome all conscientious scruples!"

"I'll try, Mr. Wild—I'll try!"

"And you must succeed! Offer any amount, no matter what, so long as the object is achieved!"

"To what amount would you go?"

"To any amount."

"A thousand pounds?"

"Yes, or two, or three! No matter how much, if it cannot be done for less!"

"That will be a great temptation," said Nicholson. "I have better hopes now."

"Well, now, then, listen. I have a few instructions to give you, and, if you are wise, you will ponder well upon them."

"Speak—I am all attention."

"Well, then, in the first place, I am going to leave this house for a time."

"Why?"

"In order to obtain a special licence. I must ride to London for it."

"I see now. I forgot that."

"It will take me several hours," continued George, "and while I am gone, bear in mind I leave that girl upstairs in your charge."

"She will be quite safe."

"She had better be, for your own sake! I shall hold you responsible for her. If she escapes, or if she is rescued, the blame will rest upon your shoulders."

"Don't be alarmed upon that point," said Nicholson.

"I'm not afraid of either happening. She's perfectly safe—as safe as—"

"You need not mention names. Curse it! why do you keep harping all the time upon the past?"

"Pray forgive me, Mr. Wild! I meant nothing. It was done thoughtlessly—quite thoughtlessly."

"Well, recollect for the future. Have you a horse in the stable that you can place at my disposal?"

"No, that I have not."

"You must get one."

"That will take some time. I shall have to go far in order to obtain what you require. But there's the hackney-coachman—why not return with him?"

"Has he not gone?"

"Well, hardly, considering you have not settled with him for the journey here."

"Very true. I remember now that, in the excitement I felt, I forgot it. I'll go back with him. That will suit admirably."

"Shall I tell him so now?"

"Yes, at once. Where is he?"

"In the kitchen, having something to drink."

"Well, tell him to get ready. I shall ride back to London with him."

The driver was communicated with, and, in a short time after, George Wild was again seated in the vehicle, and on his way back to London.

As the distance from the lonely inn increased, strange misgivings came over him as to the security of his captive.

But he would banish these doubts by the thought that the landlord was so completely in his power that, for his life's sake, he would guard her securely.

A man less audacious than Wild junior might have hesitated before he attempted to obtain a special marriage licence.

But, for one thing, he understood exactly how to make his application.

He studied the matter carefully over in his mind during his ride.

By the time he reached London, day had begun, and the streets presented their usual bustling appearance.

George dismissed the hackney-coach close to St. Paul's.

He gave the driver such a liberal sum that the man was actually quite satisfied with his night's work, which is something wonderful, considering that the hackney-coachmen of the last century greatly resembled the cabmen of the present day.

George watched the vehicle lumber off, and then he made his way to Doctors' Commons.

The obtaining of the licence involved his taking an oath to something which he knew quite well was false.

But it was scarcely likely that such a one as George Wild would shrink from a trifle like that.

He was quite delighted with the ease with which he obtained the much-coveted document, and went out into the street again, feeling quite overjoyed.

"Now to return to Nicholson!" he exclaimed. "I can't help feeling uneasy; but that's because there's so much at stake. I'll make haste back, and I'll have a horse—that will be the quickest and best way!"

George hired a horse, and was soon making his way towards his destination at full gallop.

The journey was performed in much less time than had been taken by the hackney-coach.

At length he pulled up opposite the strange, lonely, out-of-the-way inn.

His horse was covered with foam, and panting painfully for breath.

Quite heedless of this, however, George sprang from the saddle and entered the inn.

CHAPTER DLXIV.

JONATHAN WILD RESOLVES TO SHOW THE CONTEMPT HE FEELS FOR THE OLD HAG'S PREDICTIONS.

THE encounter with the witch-like and seemingly supernatural being at the toll-gate produced, as we have seen, a remarkable effect upon Jonathan Wild.

He was more terrified and alarmed than he would have admitted even to himself.

It was an exquisite relief when he found he was leaving the hateful spot behind him so rapidly.

As the distance increased, his alarm slightly subsided, and he began to feel angry with himself for having allowed his fears to get so completely the mastery over him.

Although Mr. Noakes had not been included in the witch's denunciations, yet he was to the full as terrified as his companion.

Wild noticed his terror, and felt disgusted with it.

As well as he could, he banished all his own fears, and turning round to his companion, said fiercely:

"What are you looking so damnably frightened about?"

Mr. Noakes did not reply.

"Answer me!" cried Wild. "Do you mean to say that you attach the least importance to the ravings of that mad creature?"

"It is not for me to say," said Noakes. "You set me the example of galloping away, and I did but follow."

"Well," said Jonathan, "I hate mad people—I can't bear to be near them."

"Was she mad?"

"Of course she was, idiot! If she was in her senses, do you think she would have behaved in that extraordinary manner?"

"I suppose not."

"Of course not! You might think I cared for her ravings, and fancy I was terrified? Nothing of the kind! You never made a greater mistake in your life!"

Mr. Noakes did not like to contradict his companion, for fear of arousing his resentment.

Nevertheless, he considered it was necessary to say something.

"What old woman is it?" he asked—"who is she?"

"How should I know?"

"I thought you did."

"Then you thought wrong."

"But she said that she had met you before, and that she had prophesied your ultimate fate."

"Peace!" shrieked Wild, fiercely. "Say no more about it!"

The thought that some day or other he might expiate his many crimes upon the scaffold was one that filled him with the liveliest horror.

He could not bear to look forward to suffering, in his own person, that death to which he had condemned so many innocent persons.

But, then, directly after he had spoken he fancied he was strengthening the belief in the mind of his companion that he was really and truly alarmed at what the old woman had said.

"She is some mad creature," he continued, "who ought not to be allowed to be at large! I only hope that bullet was effectual!"

"What! would you murder the poor old creature?"

"Yes!" said Wild, savagely—"I should like to see her die a death of cruel torment!"

"But suppose, Mr. Wild, that in what she said there should be some truth?"

"How do you mean, villain!"

"I mean, supposing that what she has said is a warning as to what the future will be?"

"Do you think I would pay attention to the ravings of a maniac?"

"There may be truth in them," said Mr. Noakes. "Why not take warning by them?—why not take steps to leave England at once, and place yourself in a position of security?"

"Bah!" was the reply. "I would not display so much rank cowardice! I tell you, I care not for her words!"

"But you do care, Jonathan Wild!" said Mr. Noakes, with a boldness that surprised even himself.

"Liar! I tell you I do not!" said Wild, in tones of bravado. "And to prove it, I'll stop the next traveller I meet with on the highway!"

"No, no! That would be madness—utter madness!"

"Would it?" said Jonathan. "I rather think it would be something quite different! However, you will see. And you will see, as well, how much effect the croakings of that old hag have had upon me!"

"Of course you can act as you like," said Mr. Noakes, with a sigh, "and I am obliged to submit. I wish you would consent to a separation, and allow me to go my way, and you to go yours."

"You would like it, would you not?" exclaimed Jonathan, with a sneer. "No, no—we never part again, until we are separated by the officers!"

"And that will not be long first," said Mr. Noakes, "if you continue in your present mad career."

"Whether it is long or not, I shall keep you with me. For one thing, I hate to be alone—I can't bear it; but, independently of that, I should not think of trusting you out of my sight."

"Why not?"

"For fear you should take advantage of the opportunity to betray me to my foes."

"That is a groundless fear."

"Well, perhaps it is," said Jonathan. "As I don't intend to run the risk of allowing you to leave me, you see you will not have the opportunity."

Noakes groaned.

"I tell you candidly," said Wild, "and I hope that the intelligence will be pleasing, that I intend, ere long, to quit England for ever."

"Do you indeed?"

"I do. I am as sick of being hunted like a wild beast as you are!"

"Then why not go at once?"

"Because I have an object to achieve—I have a purpose to accomplish; and, until it is done, I must stay here."

Mr. Noakes groaned.

"What are you making that noise for, you fool? You hear what I say—whether you like it or not, you will have to stay with me; and you shall have such a sum of money as will enable you to live decently in some foreign land during the remainder of your life."

"Are you in earnest?" said the Governor, endeavouring to catch a glimpse of his companion's countenance.

"You shall see," said Wild.

The thief-taker carefully turned his head away.

He did not wish his companion to note the hideous, mocking expression upon it.

One glance at his features would have been enough to let the Governor know that Wild was not sincere in what he said.

"You shall see," continued Jonathan, "how much effect that old woman's words have had upon me. Do you think I would be frightened by such a shadow? No! Pull up a moment, and listen! I wish to know whether there's anyone on the road."

"Mr. Wild," said Noakes, imploringly, "do for once take my advice! If there is a traveller, let him pass by unmolested. Let us get further away from our foes. You forget, surely, that the officers are somewhere behind, and after discovering the body in the lane they would pursue us with fresh vigour and determination."

"We are already out of hearing of them, and I don't feel alarmed on that score. But silence! I intend to prove to you that I care not one jot for that old hag's remarks!"

While speaking in this manner, Jonathan Wild was, as the reader may suppose, endeavouring to cheat himself into the belief that he did not indeed attach any importance to the old witch's prophecies.

But his very manner was quite enough to show that he was indeed much affected by them.

Still he was in hopes of being able to remove the impression by an assumption of bravado and recklessness which he was far from feeling.

Therefore, it was not to convince his timid companion that he despised the denunciations that had been levelled at him that he resolved to stop the next traveller he saw, but to inspire his own craven heart with fresh courage.

Noakes pulled up, for he did not dare to refuse obedience to Wild's commands.

Both remained quite still and quite quiet, listening with the greatest intendment, but both with different hopes.

Jonathan Wild was wishing ardently for the sound of hoof-beats on the hard road.

Mr. Noakes, on the contrary, was hoping that the silence would remain unbroken, and that Wild would consent to place a still greater distance between them and their foes than there was, without committing an act which would serve to place the officers unerringly upon their track.

"I hear no one as yet," said Wild, after several moments' silence. "All is still. We will push on a little further."

Mr. Noakes was overjoyed.

"But I have not abandoned my intention. I tell you, the next traveller I meet I'll stop! Morning is coming, but if it is broad daylight I'll do it!"

At a swift yet easy trot, the two villains made their way along the road in the direction of the country.

Ere they had gone much further, however, the sound which Jonathan so much wished for reached his ears.

"A traveller," he said, "and only one. Now, then, I will prove how I despise her words! Jonathan Wild will never die upon the gallows!"

"I don't know that," said Noakes.

"What do you say, villain?"

"I meant that it was hard indeed for anyone to say what particular death should overtake them. Fortune might take an evil turn. You might be brought to Tyburn."

"Silence, wretch! I will not have such a thing mentioned! But now I tell you, even if my enemies triumph, they shall not receive that satisfaction in the end!"

"How could you prevent it if you were captured, and strict watch was kept over you?"

"Why, rather than they should put a rope round my neck, I would batter my brains out against the wall of my cell! But hush!—not another word! The traveller is coming now!"

"Take my advice, and let him pass!"

"Never! You are a coward and a fool! Back your horse into the shadow of the hedgerow, and remain there until the deed is over! Besides, I want more money than I have now!"

Mr. Noakes backed his horse quite into the ditch by the roadside, while Jonathan Wild took up his position boldly and defiantly in the centre of the highway.

In his hand he held a pistol, which he had satisfied himself, by a rapid examination, was in perfect readiness for use.

The horseman, whose approach could now be distinctly heard, was coming from the direction of London.

The night was dark, and so he did not see the motionless figures of Wild and his steed, planted in the centre of the road, until close to them.

Indeed, almost the first intimation that the traveller received was the sound of Jonathan Wild's voice.

"Hold!" he cried. "Pull up, for your life! Hand over your money! Don't dally, or play any tricks, or you will find it the worse for you!"

The traveller stopped his horse, and with great suddenness drew a pistol from the holster, and levelling it at Wild, pulled the trigger.

There was a flash and a deafening report.

Jonathan uttered a scream of pain.

"Ha, ha!" said the traveller, "you have got your deserts at last, my fine fellow! I hope you like it!"

A horrible curse came from Wild's lips; and then, hastily raising the pistol, he fired.

The shot was effectual.

The traveller had set his horse in motion, and the bullet from Wild's pistol must have struck him in the back.

He uttered a gasping shriek, as though enduring great agony, and fell forward in a strange attitude upon his horse's neck.

His steed, terrified by the report of the firearms and the strange attitude of his rider, galloped off at full speed, and in a few seconds was out of sight.

Jonathan Wild swayed backwards and forwards in the saddle, and seemed in imminent danger of falling to the ground.

Then Mr. Noakes ventured to come out from his place of concealment.

"Are you much hurt?" he asked.

"Curse him, I know not!—he has hit me!"

"I feared as much."

"The bullet has struck me in the neck! Where is the rascal? Did he fall from his horse?"

"No, he galloped off."

"After him, then! I'll pursue him! I'll have his money yet! I'm sure I hit him!"

"But you are scarcely fit to ride!"

"Yes, I am! Wait a moment. There, that will do—the bleeding will stop now."

While speaking these words, Jonathan hastily tore off his neckcloth and bound it very tightly over the wound—so tight, indeed, and with so much skill, as to check the flow of blood at once.

Whether it would only last for a time, or whether the stoppage would be permanent, he could not tell.

"Now then," he said, "I'm ready and equal to the task. Forward—forward! I say, we will have him yet!"

"Take my advice!" said Mr. Noakes. "Listen to me!"

"Coward and fool!" cried Wild. "I didn't ask you to run the risk! Come on—follow me. Refuse at your peril!"

Mr. Noakes knew he dared not refuse, and so, clapping spurs to his horse's sides, he followed Jonathan Wild at a headlong gallop along the highway.

CHAPTER DLXV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES FIND THEMSELVES UPON THE THRESHOLD OF A STRANGE ADVENTURE.

Ere they had gone very far, a dreadful feeling of giddiness seized upon Jonathan Wild, and he absolutely reeled in the saddle.

It was in vain that he tried to overcome this sensation. The effects of the wound he had received would make themselves apparent, and at last he had the prudence and good sense to rein-in his steed.

Mr. Noakes was nothing loth to follow his example.

"What now?" he said.

"Noakes—Noakes!" gasped Wild, faintly.

"What?"

"I'm afraid I've been hurt more than I thought, or I must stop—I can't ride any further."

"What shall you do?"

"I can scarcely tell; but now that the motion has ceased, I already begin to feel better."

This was only natural.

The violent exertion so quickly after having received the wound was enough to bleed him to death, and would have done so had he not stopped in time.

Now that his heart no longer beat so rapidly, and the blood circulated more slowly through his veins, the bleeding became less violent, and the thief-taker was soon sensible of it.

"What shall you do?" asked Noakes again. "Tell me how I am to act, and I will obey you."

"I can scarcely tell. I fear I must rest somewhere, and have the wound attended to. Curses on him—curses on him!"

"It was your own fault."

"Silence! What is it to you? Look around you—can you see any habitation?"

"No, not from here."

"There is a mist—a mist of blood before my eyes," said Jonathan, "and yet, for all that, I fancy I can see the grey light of dawn creeping over the meadows."

"Yes, you're right," said Noakes—"the night is over, and day has begun."

"Curses on him, then, for having crippled me like this! What are we to do during the daylight?"

"I don't know how to answer that question. I have always left the direction of affairs to you."

"Well, I'm better—fast getting better. Do you see any water?"

Mr. Noakes raised himself up in the stirrups, and then said:

"I fancy I can see a large pond over the meadows yonder, but I don't know how we are to reach it."

"We must," said Jonathan. "I burn with thirst, and cold water will do more to stanch the flow of blood than anything else. I can manage to go forward if my horse goes at a walking pace; so lead the way towards the pool you speak of."

Mr. Noakes knew he had no resource but to submit.

Fortunately, the meadow nearest the high-road was bounded by posts and rails.

But these were old, and in very bad condition altogether.

By dismounting, Mr. Noakes was able to pull up one of the posts out of the ground and to remove the rails, leaving a space wide enough for the horses to pass through.

As soon as they were in the meadow, Jonathan said:

"Don't mount until you have restored the fence to its original condition,—we don't want to leave such a track as that behind us!"

Mr. Noakes managed this pretty well, and then, remounting his horse, led the way towards the pond.

It was about half a mile away from the high-road.

It was a large, smooth sheet of water; and from the manner in which the ground round about sloped down to it, it seemed to have been made for the purpose of draining the surrounding property.

Over this pool there hung a thin, gauzy mist, which was, nevertheless, sufficient to render objects confused and indistinct.

"There's little fear of our being seen from the high-road," said Noakes, as they halted at the side of the pond.

"So much the better," growled Wild. "Help me to dismount."

With some difficulty, he managed to lower himself from the saddle.

He was frightfully weak, and, but for his indomitable spirit, he must surely have succumbed beneath it.

Upon gaining the water, he completely plunged his head into it, and allowed the cold liquid to encircle his neck.

The cold water was very pleasant and refreshing.

His wound had begun to smart horribly, but the cold water stopped it as if by magic, and all that remained was a slight, dull, aching pain.

The thief-taker drank some deep draughts of the water, and then felt considerably better.

His next act was to bandage his throat up in a more careful and skilful manner than he had done previously.

He employed wet bandages, which were much better than dry ones.

Still he was fearfully weak, and his head throbbed as though a heavy iron weight was beating to and fro inside his brain.

He sat down on the damp grass at the edge of the pool, looking very crestfallen and wretched indeed.

"Are you better now?" asked Noakes.

"Yes—much better."

"I am glad of that. Don't you think it will be wise to move away from this pool?"

"Why so?"

"Can you not see that the mist which was hanging over it has dispersed, and we must now be plainly visible to anyone who may be on the high-road?"

"You are right, Noakes. I don't feel equal to the exertion, but I must mount again. We must push on still further, and stop at the first place that offers us the least chance of shelter."

"I shall be glad of a rest," said Noakes, "if it's ever so brief a one. It seems to me as though I'd never known what rest was."

"Oh, gammon!" said Wild. "You have not suffered half so much as I have: but that's neither here nor there! Help me to mount!"

Mr. Noakes obeyed, and with a great deal of trouble, Jonathan Wild seated himself in the saddle.

His companion followed.

"Will you return to the high-road or push on across the meadows?" asked the latter.

"Across the meadows, of course."

Mr. Noakes said no more.

Presently they reached a slightly-elevated piece of ground, from which an extensive prospect was obtainable.

"I am very weak and giddy," said Wild, "and my eyes fail me! Look again—tell me whether you can see a habitation of any kind!"

"I can only see one."

"Can you see one?"

"Yes."

"How far off?"

"About a mile."

"What sort of a looking place is it? I can't see it."

Wild strained his eyes in vain.

There was a mist before them, and he could see nothing beyond his horse's head.

"It's a large, red-brick building," said Mr. Noakes—"a gentleman's house, I should fancy, by the look of it."

"Then that's no place for us, I'm afraid."

"I fear not, too."

"And yet," said Wild, "people dwelling alone in the country in such houses as this are generally hospitable. Very often the place is left in charge of servants alone, and they are always glad to see a fresh face. But are you sure you can see no other habitation?"

"Quite sure, Mr. Wild, and I can see for miles in every direction."

"Then we must go there, at all risks."

This was an idea that rather terrified Mr. Noakes.

Still he moved onwards.

"What shall we say when we get there?" he said.

"Even if we do see the servants, I question whether they would be well enough pleased with our appearance to admit us."

"I don't know that," said Jonathan. "It would be easy to get up some tale. We will say that we have been robbed and ill-treated by highwaymen, and left for dead upon the road. Leave it to me—I'll make up a story that shall sound plausible and satisfactory, depend upon it!"

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild! I have often made the remark, and it's quite true."

"There's nothing very wonderful in that," said Jonathan, grinning. "Are we going straight for the house?"

"Yes—as straight as I can take you. Do you feel any better?"

"I fancy I do, a little. Still, my eyes are very bad. All objects seem floating about."

After this Jonathan became silent, and from the look of his face, it might be surmised that he was engaged in arranging the details of some story which he would be able to pour into the ears of the residents of the red-brick house.

He was pleased to find, after a time, that his vision improved, for he was able to distinguish the outlines of the building.

It was a large, imposing-looking building, and quite a different place to what he had pictured in his own mind from his companion's description.

He was astonished at the vastness of it; but there was a general air of untidiness about the whole structure.

At some windows the blinds were drawn closely down, and the others had the shutters shut.

"We are in luck's way, Noakes," said Wild at last. "I feel well-nigh certain that the owners of that mansion are not occupying it. The place has all the appearance of being left in charge of servants."

"It looks dirty and wretched enough, certainly."

"It does."

In a few more minutes they came to a red-brick wall, which seemed completely to surround the piece of ground upon which the house was built.

This wall was eight feet high at the very least, and of great thickness, so that it was quite out of the question to think of climbing over it.

"We must go round to one of the regular entrances," said Wild,—"it will look much better, and be more in accordance with the tale I have to tell. Come along. If we skirt the wall in this direction, I think we shall surely find a gate."

Wild was right in this conjecture.

Before they had gone another hundred yards they turned a corner, and then another hundred yards brought them to some large and handsome wooden gates.

"I see how it is, now," exclaimed Wild at this moment. "The dirty appearance of the house is quite accounted for. Why, it's to let!"

He pointed as he spoke to a board that was nailed on the gate, which made the announcement that the house was to let, and the particulars were to be obtained within.

"Then the house is not empty, at all events," said Wild, after reading the announcement from beginning to end. "Perhaps a couple have been left in charge of it. Well, that don't matter. I know what sort of people they are generally who mind houses in that sort of way—the sight of a guinea will persuade them to do almost anything."

So saying, Jonathan Wild seized hold of a handle which hung down at one side of the gate.

The loud clanging of a bell then made itself heard.

They waited for several minutes, but there was no response.

"Perhaps there is no one here after all," said Mr. Noakes.

"I'll warrant there is," said Jonathan, "or else that board would not be there. Ring the bell again—you can pull the handle better than I can."

Noakes tugged away with right good will, for he believed that at last there was a prospect of his obtaining rest and secure shelter.

But no more notice was taken of this pull than of the former one; but Wild, still clinging to his original notion, ordered Noakes to ring again.

The third time, a little wicket in the large gates was opened, and an old and wrinkled face appeared at the aperture.

Simultaneously with its appearance, a voice said, in shrill, piping tones:

"Want to see the house, I suppose? Seen the board to say it's to let. You can come in and look at it, if you like; but dear me, you may as well take my word, and save yourself the trouble. The house won't suit you—I'm sure of it. If it hadn't been so damp and so old, and if it hadn't been haunted, it would have been let long ago. However, you can come in and have a look, if you like."

CHAPTER DLXVI.

SOME VERY EXTRAORDINARY EVENTS TAKE PLACE IN THE HOUSE TO LET.

THIS was a most extraordinary speech for the old woman to make.

Jonathan Wild looked at her in amazement.

"Well, you can come in and look at the place, or will you save yourself the trouble?" continued the old woman, speaking with the same volubility as before. "It's quite indifferent to me which, seein' as 'ow I'm placed 'ere in charge; but I happen to 'ave a conscience, sir—a real conscience, and that's why I can't 'elp speakin' the truth."

Some curses rose up to Jonathan Wild's lips, but he thought his wisest plan would be not to utter them, and so, instead, he remarked:

"My good woman, I don't want to look at this house with the view of becoming its tenant, but the fact is we have both been set upon by a whole troop of highwaymen, and I have been wounded in the way you see."

"What's that to do with me?" almost shrieked the old woman. "You thought to be ashamed to fetch me hout of the 'ouse down to the gate, if you don't want to look hat the 'onse—that's what you hought!"

She slammed the little wicket shut as she spoke.

"Pull the bell, Noakes!" roared Wild. "D—n you, pull it harder! How I wish I could have the pleasure of twisting that old hag's head off!"

Mr. Noakes pulled away at the bell-handle with might and main, and the clangour it made was something terrific.

The little wicket was dashed violently open, and the woman's face again appeared at it.

It was crimsoned and distorted by rage, but Jonathan Wild was better prepared than on the preceding occasion.

He had taken a guinea from his pocket, and held it up between his finger and thumb in such a manner that it could not escape the observation of the old woman.

Indeed, her eyes seemed to be attracted to the glittering piece of metal—as steel is attracted to the magnet—and there they remained, fixed and immovable.

"Do you want to earn a guinea?" cried Wild—"a guinea, look!—a real, golden guinea! Do you want to earn it?—if so, say the word!"

"A prince—a prince!" cried the old woman; "you must be a prince!"

"It don't matter who I am; but I have been badly hurt, and I want your assistance. Let me have a few hours' rest, and you shall have something more than this—I will give you a guinea for admitting us!"

"And you're sure you don't want the 'ouse?" asked the old woman.

"Quite sure."

"Then I'll let you in, with all the pleasure in life."

The face was withdrawn, and the sound of the drawing back of bolts and the removal of chains came immediately upon the ears of Wild and Noakes.

Then one half of the ponderous gates was thrown open. "This way, gentlemen—this way, hif you please."

When you're inside, I'll shut the gate again."

Mr. Noakes was still standing on the ground, holding his horse's bridle in his left hand.

With his right he now led Jonathan Wild's horse as well through the gate, which was immediately closed.

Both marvelled at the extraordinary behaviour of the old woman, and at her secrecy and caution.

She evidently did not desire that any persons should intrude upon the domain.

Feeling curious in this respect made Jonathan Wild pass his hand over his eyes to clear his vision a little, in order that he might see what the old woman looked like.

A closer view showed that she was not anything like so old as they had at first imagined; but her countenance was covered with innumerable lines and wrinkles, and her mouth and eyes were strangely puckered up.

She was nothing but a mere framework of bones, for there did not appear to be an ounce of flesh upon her whole body.

Her arms and hands especially were skeleton-like in a remarkable degree.

There was clearly nothing but bone and very little muscle.

The skin was drawn tightly over them—so tightly that it had a shiny look like bone itself.

"This way," she cried, hobbling before them, and looking like some evil spirit—"this way! Ah, this house has been to let for a long, long while, and I don't wonder at it, for who would live in it? No one with sense, I'm sure!"

"I don't wonder at it having remained so long empty," said Wild, to himself, "for who would take it after such a recommendation?"

[EDGORTH BESS MAKING HER ESCAPE FROM THE LONESOME INN.]

It seemed very strange that the old woman should endeavour to prejudice the minds of those persons who might happen to come to the gate to make inquiries about the house to let.

What her motive could be for such conduct was a matter of conjecture.

It might be that she found living there comfortable and pleasant, and did not wish to be turned out, as she would be should anyone decide to occupy the mansion.

This was the first view that Jonathan Wild took of the case, but before he had thought over it a moment, he came to the conclusion that it was not the right solution for the mystery.

If such an answer was often given to applicants, and if pains were taken by this old woman to set their minds against taking it, such conduct would inevitably sooner or later reach the ears of her employers.

Then she would, of course, be turned out immediately.

No 121.—BLUESKIN

Jonathan was not of the opinion that she had managed to impose upon people for such a short time as not to be found out, for as he glanced around him, not only at the house itself, but the grounds surrounding it, he could perceive every token that the place had been deserted for a great many years.

These were the thoughts and speculations passing through Jonathan's mind as he followed the old hag up the winding avenue, and round to the back part of the mansion.

It was strange, considering the state he was in both mentally and physically, that he should trouble himself about that which clearly did not concern him—it was no business of his whatever.

He had no intentions of occupying the house, and what could it signify to him, whether the old woman spoke against it or not.

One would have thought, with so many cares weighing upon his mind, and with so many perplexing things to think about, that he would have passed over such a circumstance without taking any notice of it.

But Wild felt there was a mystery, and when he was conscious of this, the irresistible desire immediately sprang up in his mind to find out what that mystery was.

There did not seem the slightest probability that even if he did succeed in finding out the mystery, that it would benefit him in the remotest degree.

But he did not think of that.

"I will find it out," he muttered. "If it will do nothing else, it will serve to prevent me from brooding over unpleasant subjects—it will amuse me while I am here,—perhaps it will enable me to get that old hag into my power, and if so—Well, we'll see—we'll see!"

Jonathan muttered these last words just as they paused at the back of the premises.

"This way, gentlemen," said the hag. "You see, me and my old man, we live in the kitchens. It's a long time since we had visitors, I can assure you."

She chuckled oddly as she spoke.

Not without some trouble Jonathan dismounted from his steed.

But every moment he was palpably getting better; and there could be no question that, after he had partaken of a good meal, and had a few hours' rest, he would be once more equal to the difficulties of his position.

The dimness had almost left his eyes now; yet, for the last time, he passed his hands over them, pressing his fingers tightly upon his eyeballs.

Then, addressing the old woman, he said:

"So this house has been to let for a long time, I suppose?"

"Well, sir, it has—it has; and that's the truth—a very long while; but who can wonder at it?"

"It seems strange, too," remarked Wild, "that so fine a building and such beautiful grounds should be allowed to run to decay."

"But it is no wonder—it is no wonder," said the old hag, peering into his face, and speaking as though she wished to remove all suspicion from his mind. "You don't know the place, sir; but I'll show you over it, if you don't mind the trouble, when you're better. You see, it's very old and full of nooks and corners, and cupboards; and many years ago—so I've heard—there was a horrible murder committed in one of the rooms upstairs, and the whole place has been haunted ever since."

"What shall I do with the horses?" asked Noakes at this moment, for he was anxious to get inside, and wondered why Wild stopped talking about matters that could not possibly concern him.

"Horses?" said the hag. "I don't know what you can do with them. There's some stables belonging to the house!"

"Where are they?" asked Noakes, looking round.

"Oh! it's no good you thinkin' of putting the horses in them," said the hag, quickly—"for the roof is partly off, and they're filled up with litter, and wet, and the doors have not been opened for I couldn't tell how many years."

"Dear me—how odd!" said Jonathan.

The woman turned quickly round upon him as he spoke.

The expression of her face was such that Wild came to the conclusion that she regretted exceedingly having allowed the two strangers to enter the place.

"But what am I to do with the horses?" asked Noakes. "They must be put somewhere."

"And then there's no food for them," said the hag. "It's not likely that you'd find corn and hay and all that sort of thing in a house to let. You'd better tie them to the palisades."

"Judging from appearances," exclaimed Wild, glancing around him, "I imagine that they could not do much harm if they were left loose to roam over the ground, and then they would doubtless find something to eat."

"They can't do harm," said the old woman; "you can leave them loose if you like."

"Thank you. You will find you will lose nothing by being civil. Noakes," he added, turning to his companion, "take the bits out of their mouths, and let them wander about."

Noakes obeyed immediately.

The horses seemed glad enough to recover their freedom, and although the ground was overgrown with very rank vegetation, yet they quickly found something that suited their palates.

This little conversation had taken place in front of a weatherbeaten door which the old hag now proceeded to open.

It grated harshly upon its hinges, and a strange sensation came over the hearts both of Jonathan and Mr. Noakes as they followed their strange conductor into the darkness beyond.

"Stand still a moment," she cried, as soon as they crossed the threshold. "I want to close the door."

She passed by them as she spoke, and from the ease with which she closed the door, although the place was in utter darkness, Wild felt certain that she must be very familiar with it indeed.

She passed them again, saying:

"Follow me along the passage until I speak—it's level, but we shall come to steps presently, and then I will speak."

Mr. Noakes seemed slightly alarmed, and he clutched his companion by the arm nervously.

"I don't like this place," he said, in a suppressed voice. "I think we had better seek shelter elsewhere."

"Don't be a fool!" said Wild. "You are as cowardly as a chicken! Bah!—get out—I have no patience with you!"

"Steps!" cried the hag, at this instant.

"Up or down?"

"Up."

Just then Wild's foot struck against some obstruction, which he immediately concluded was a step.

He found he was right, and ascended six of them.

The old woman, upon reaching the top, pushed open a door.

There was a room beyond, in which a light of some kind was burning, so that the dim kind of radiance lighted up the top of the stairs.

Jonathan looked around him curiously, as well as the dim light would permit.

The place was just what he had expected to find.

There was plenty of woodwork, and the stairs he had ascended were protected by a strong and curiously-carved balustrade.

The door was massive and heavy; but, having just given one glance at the objects around, his attention was riveted upon the room which he was about to enter.

CHAPTER DLXVII.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS THE MYSTERIES CONNECTED WITH THE HOUSE TO LET BECOME MORE AND MORE PROFOUND.

The light, though somewhat bright, was flickering and uncertain, as though it proceeded from neither lamp nor candle, but from a fire.

Crossing over the threshold, Jonathan saw in a moment that he was right.

He found himself in a spacious but low apartment, if we may with propriety apply the word to such a place.

It resembled some huge vault more than anything else; for the ceiling was arched, and appeared to be composed of stone, or some similar material.

The fire was situated at the further extremity of the apartment, and was burning on the hearth.

Half crouching over this fire was a somewhat singular-looking object.

It was a man, though at the first glance there appeared to be but little human in his appearance.

He was thin and shrivelled, with long arms and legs, which, taken in conjunction with his face, suggested in a moment the idea of a vulture, or some other bird of prey.

He rose up frantically as the party entered, and glared at them with fierce, inquisitive eyes.

But even as he stood, he was in a strange, bent, doubled-up attitude, with his chin almost resting upon his breast.

His head was bald, with the exception of a slight fringe of hair running round the back part of his head, and extending from ear to ear.

But there was something indescribably filthy and loathsome in the appearance of this old man.

His garments had evidently never been made for him, and were dirty to a degree.

He wore a huge coat, which he was able to wrap round and round him like a cloak, for the garment had evidently been made for a man of rather unusual dimensions.

His hands and face were completely covered over with innumerable lines and wrinkles, in every one of which had lodged a certain amount of black grime and dirt.

Then his forehead and the upper part of his head, where the hair had ceased to grow, were crusted over with the same black, disgusting-looking dirt as covered the whole of his person.

Having risen and bent his piercing, scrutinising eyes upon the new-comers, he said, in a shrill, disagreeable voice :

"What does this mean, Martha—what does this mean? Who are these people? Have they come to view this house? Did you tell them how badly it was haunted ever since that horrible murder was committed in the room upstairs by that cavalier who lived in the reign of Queen Anne?"

"Sweet William!" said the hag, addressing the unsavoury old man by this misplaced appellation, "these gentlemen don't want the house. They have been set upon by highwaymen, and robbed and ill-treated."

"Well, well, what of that—what of that?" he asked, angrily, and fidgeting about with his long, claw-like hands while he spoke. "Don't you know that it's against the orders we received to admit anyone to this place without they come to look at it with a view of buying the lease?"

"Yes—yes, that's all right enough, old fellow!" said Wild, with an assumption of joviality which became him very badly—"we know all about it; but I gave a guinea to be admitted, and you shall have more if you will let me rest here for awhile, and furnish me with something to eat and drink."

"A guinea?" screamed the old man,—"did you say a guinea?"

"Yes."

"A golden guinea?"

"Certainly."

"Where is it?"

"She has it."

Jonathan pointed to the old hag as he spoke.

The old man gave an extraordinary spring forward as he spoke, just as one might have expected a wild animal would do, and alighted close to the old woman.

"Where is it, Martha?" he screamed—"where is it—the guinea?—give it to me, I say!"

"Sha'n't!"

"You had better," said the old man, clenching his teeth, "give it to me!"

"I sha'n't, I tell you!"

"What's yours is mine!"

"This is not."

"My good friends," said Jonathan, "don't quarrel on my account, I beg."

"But she shall give me the guinea!"

"No," said Wild. "She has a right to keep it; but if it will prevent any unpleasantness, you shall have one too, in return for which you must find us something to eat and drink."

The old man snatched the guinea in a frenzied manner as though its value had been a thousand times greater than it was.

"Now," said Wild, "be quick—get us something to eat."

"I will. Never you mind Martha—you shouldn't attend to her—I'm the master of this house. Curse her, she's always interfering and always robbing me; but I'll be even with her some day—some day!"

The old man left the room as he spoke.

The hag shook her fist menacingly after him.

Angry words were evidently trembling upon her lips, and Wild was just hoping that in her rage she would utter something that would tend to clear up the mystery that baffled him, when the loud clanging of a bell came distinctly upon his ears.

The old woman heard it, and so did Noakes.

The latter started violently; but Wild put out his hand and held him.

"What's that?" cried the hag—"what is it?"

"The bell, I should say," cried Wild, "though what bell I don't know!"

"There's some one at the front gates. Who in the world can it be? Surely not an application? I must see—I must see! I know Sweet William won't trouble himself to go."

The old hag hobbled quickly out of the apartment, and was lost to sight in the darkness before Wild was able to make up his mind whether to allow her to go or to detain her.

The two companions in crime now found themselves alone; but the old man might be expected to return every moment.

Mr. Noakes shook in every limb.

"Did you hear that bell?" he asked.

"Of course I did."

"And did you feel no fear? Does it not stop the current of blood in your veins?"

"No—nothing of the kind!"

"But it terrifies me!" said Noakes. "Let us hide somewhere!"

"Why?"

"They must be police officers at the gate, wh, in some way or other have tracked us hither. We shall be caught like rats in a trap!"

"I doubt it," said Wild.

"You doubt whether they are police officers?"

"No—I think that very likely."

"Then what is it you do doubt?"

"Why, that we shall be taken like rats in a trap. While we have been here, have you not been noticing what strange people they are who inhabit this place?"

"I have. But what has that to do with our present peril?"

"Everything! There's some mystery in all this. There's more in it than meets the eye—I feel quite convinced of that!"

"How? What do you mean?"

"I can't explain myself; for I have only a dim and shadowy suspicion as yet. Still, unless I am greatly mistaken, that old woman, when she gets to the gate, if she finds they are police officers outside would no more think of admitting them than we should."

"But why not?" asked Noakes, incredulously.

"That's her business," said Wild; "perhaps we shall find out before long. Hush!"

"What do you hear?"

"Nothing. I wonder where the old man is? I should like to know whether he's coming back! Wait a moment!"

Jonathan crossed the huge vaulted chamber on tiptoe; and upon reaching the door, stood still and listened.

He remained motionless for a second or two, and then turned round.

His face could be plainly seen, for the light of the fire fell full upon it; and by the expression it wore, it would seem that he was satisfied that no one was at hand.

"Noakes!" he said in a whisper, "we may not be left alone in this place together again! Be silent—let us take a look around; we may find something!"

Wondering not only at his companion's words, but at his manner also, Noakes stood still, making not the slightest effort to obey the command Wild had just given.

Jonathan advanced to the fireplace.

Just then he fancied some slight sound, like the rustling of garments, came upon his ear.

But the sound was of such brief continuance, that he could not say positively whether his fancy had deceived him or not.

He raised his eyes, and glanced rapidly all around him.

His glance took in all that that strange chamber contained; but finally his eyes rested upon one of the walls.

The light of the fire was shining full upon it.

On this wall something was in motion.

Wild strained his eyes.

It was shadowy, dim, vague looking; and, although it clearly moved, he could not take upon himself to say what the object was, or what it resembled.

There was a strange fluttering about his heart.

A superstitious man was Jonathan Wild, and although he had carried off his encounter with the hag very well, yet her denunciations had made a deep impression upon his soul.

He was just in that particular mental and physical condition as to be susceptible to all supernatural influences.

He did not move a muscle, but remained breathlessly gazing upon the uncertain movements of the shadow, and endeavouring to make out what was its precise shape.

He could imagine nothing that would throw the moving shadow on the wall, for he was standing perfectly still himself, and so was Noakes, and they were the only occupants of the chamber.

His heated and excited fancy could no doubt have easily enabled him to form this into something wild and strange, but he was not allowed the opportunity.

The sound of a footstep broke the silence of the place. It also dispelled the charm which seemed to have held Jonathan during the last few moments spellbound.

His eyes instinctively sought the door.

Then the old man appeared, carrying with him some articles of an eatable character, and a bottle of something which looked strangely like wine or brandy.

Wild was much rejoiced when he saw the bottle.

He was languid—very languid from the effects of his wound.

The bleeding had ceased, and he believed one draught of wine would restore him to his usual strength.

He strode forward, and forgetting all his strange and supernatural fears in an instant, said:

"Is that wine in the bottle?"

The old man replied in the affirmative.

Jonathan snatched the bottle from his hands, and with one blow with the butt-end of one of his pistols he knocked off the neck.

Then, placing it to his lips, he drank deeply of the contents.

In the meanwhile, Noakes's fears increased rather than abated.

The very natural idea that police officers were seeking admission to that mysterious house had taken firm possession of his mind, and he listened in the greatest dread and awe, expecting each second to hear a sound that would confirm his worst forebodings.

The old man glanced round him, and then cried out suddenly in a screaming voice:

"Martha—Martha! Where's Martha—where has she gone? That old woman will be the death of me yet!"

"D—n you!" said Wild. "What did you want to screech out in that way for, all of a sudden? You've made me spill as much wine as I've drank!"

"Where is she?" asked the old man, almost in the manner of a maniac.

"Some one rang the bell," said Wild, with great coolness. "So I suppose she went to see who it was!"

"The bell—more visitors! What can this mean?" muttered the old man. "And why was she so foolish as to leave them here alone—curse her?"

Of this sentence, only the last words reached the ears of Jonathan Wild.

Again he had placed the bottle to his lips, and the gurgling sound that the liquid made as it trickled down his throat effectually prevented him from hearing the old man's muttered words.

It was just as he had drained the last drop of wine, and was removing the bottle from his lips, that in a rather louder tone than he had employed before, the old man said:

"Curse her!"

"You seem a nice old article," said Wild, "to curse your wife in that fashion, for going to see who's at the gate, if the bell rings!"

The old man's eyes sparkled ominously; and Wild thought to himself that he should not like to be helpless in his power.

But just then a sound, as of a door opening or closing, reached their ears.

As if actuated by one impulse, all three stopped and listened.

Then they heard voices, indistinctly, it is true, but yet voices.

The shrill tones in which the old hag spoke could be distinguished above all the rest.

Then the sound of footsteps ascending the little flight of stairs became audible.

With straining eyes, bloodless face, and trembling limbs, Mr. Noakes gazed in the direction of the door.

Jonathan Wild, too, looked at it; but the fumes of the immense quantity of wine he had drank, almost at a draught, mounted to his brain, and produced an intense and remarkable elation of spirits.

He felt within his own mind a perfect indifference to danger of every description; and so it was with an easy, self-assured air, that he waited for these new-comers to make their appearance.

CHAPTER DLXVIII.

A BADLY-WOUNDED STRANGER SEEKS SHELTER IN THE HOUSE TO LET.

THE old hag Martha was in her movements as full of mystery as the house itself.

After the loud summons given forth by the bell, she made her way down the steps along the passage and round the mansion to the gate through which Wild and Noakes had gained admittance.

The bell was rung several times; for her joints were stiffened by age, and she could not make anything like good speed.

Just as she was about to dash the little wicket back, in order to see who was outside, a dismal groan came upon her ears, and a voice said:

"Help—help—help me, or I die!"

Then came another hideous groan.

The old woman trembled as she heard the sound; but, recovering herself rapidly, she drew back the wicket and looked out.

It was now fairly daylight, and the mist which had hitherto hung over the landscape had disappeared.

The first object upon which the hag's eyes rested was a horse.

The saddle was empty.

But she could see that the leather of which it was composed and the stirrups were deeply stained with blood.

The crimson fluid had also found its way on to the horse's flanks, and every now and then a drop would fall with a faint dash to the earth.

This was a sight which blanched the old woman's cheeks.

She looked a good ten years older in the course of a single moment.

Evidently the sight of blood strongly affected her.

Then again she heard the groan, but she could see no one.

She drew back a pace, and then her eyes, accidentally falling upon the ground, showed her that blood was slowly trickling underneath the gate.

"Help me—oh, help me!" said the voice again. "I am wounded, and I fear unto the death! Help me—save me, or I shall perish at your gates!"

The old woman stood perfectly still.

Whether it was that terror froze up her faculties, or whether it was that she had made up her mind to afford no succour to the individual without, is hard to say.

Another groan came, and the sound thrilled through her very heart.

She trembled excessively.

"Alas!" said the voice, "I have no longer the strength to raise myself up sufficiently to reach the handle of the bell! Surely there are people here; and they have heard me, and having heard me, they would not let me perish on their very threshold! I must try once more—once more!"

The old hag never moved.

Then a curious, muffled, rustling sound made itself heard, and the old woman knew as well as if she had been able to see through the woodwork that the wounded man was endeavouring to raise himself up against the gate in order to give one more summons upon the bell.

Almost every movement was accompanied by a gasping groan.

And then, suddenly, came one louder than the rest.

It was followed by a dull, heavy, and sickening crash.

The wounded man had raised himself almost to an upright posture, when a frightful sensation of weakness had come over him, and he had dropped to the ground again.

"Surely," groaned the voice, "they have heard the bell! I have rung it many times; they would not—could not be so inhuman as to allow me to perish for the want of a little aid! If, however, anyone is within hearing, and hesitating whether to admit me, I will promise them gold—much gold—ample reward, if they will but bind up my wounds and allow me to lie down and recover my strength!"

The voice ceased.

It was evident these words produced an effect upon the old woman.

Her eyes sparkled, and her hands moved convulsively.

She took one step towards the gate, which brought her close to it.

She tapped upon the woodwork with her knuckles, and then cried:

"Who is there? I know you not, and am fearful to admit you! I am a poor, lone woman, and there are thieves and robbers in the land, so that I am frightened to open the gates."

"Don't fear!" said the voice again, becoming stronger as hope once more obtained the ascendancy, "I shall not harm you! I am a gentleman—a traveller; but I am wounded! I have been shot by a highwayman!"

"Another!" said the old woman.

"What did you say? Don't keep me parleying here, but admit me: for every moment is of the utmost consequence, for my life-blood is ebbing fast!"

After a momentary hesitation, the old hag undid the fastenings, and then opened one half of the large gates.

As she did so, the body of the traveller, which had been resting against the woodwork, fell into the avenue.

He was surrounded by quite a pool of blood, and his clothing was literally saturated with it.

As the hag came towards him he slowly raised himself upon one arm.

"I am getting better now—much better and stronger; that is because I can see some prospect of relief! Before, despair had possession of my heart, because I thought I should perish for want of succour."

"Can you rise to your feet?"

"With your assistance, I have no doubt I can."

"And your horse?"

"Let him come inside. Lead him; he's quiet—he will not harm you!"

As though she had been accustomed to horses, the hag took hold of the bridle and led the traveller's steed through the gates.

"That's done," she said. "Now will you rise?"

"I will. Help me."

The old hag was feeble and tottering, and the aid she was able to give was scarcely worth mentioning.

Still it enabled the traveller to regain his feet.

He reeled when he found himself upright, but he managed to keep his feet, and then the dizziness passed away.

"Bind up my wound," he said—"bind it up, or I shall bleed to death!"

"You must come to the house first," said the hag; "it's old and empty, and I can find you but little accommodation, still, such as there is you are welcome to."

"You shall be well rewarded for your trouble," said the stranger—"well rewarded! I hold my life as a thing of value, and should give much in order to retain possession of it."

It was really wonderful, considering the state he had lately been in, to see what a difference there was in the traveller already.

He could speak with some degree of firmness and ease, and, by leaning slightly upon the hag's arm, he was able to walk.

"It's some distance to the house," she said. "Do you think your strength will be sufficient?"

"I think so."

"Come, then. It's very strange, but only half an hour ago two other strangers, like yourself, sought admission here, having been set upon and wounded by highwaymen."

"I don't wonder at it—I don't wonder at it! He was a desperate villain that I encountered; but I fancy, although he wounded me, that I inflicted a hurt upon him from which he will not recover easily."

With slow steps, this strange pair tottered along the avenue skirting the house, and finally entered it by just the same route as had been taken by Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes.

It was the old woman in conversation with this wounded traveller that they had heard.

All those fears which Noakes had respecting the police-officers were groundless.

He had alarmed himself and endured all that terror for nothing.

It was an exquisite relief to him when he saw the hag enter the vaulted chamber with the wounded traveller leaning on her arm.

It was a relief to Jonathan Wild too.

But at the first glance he shrunk back so that his form was half concealed by the dark shadows which the fire cast.

"Let me sit down," moaned the traveller—"let me sit down. Bind up my wounds now—bind them up, or I die!"

He sank into a chair while uttering these words, and seemed to fall into a state of insensibility.

Another sharp dispute took place between the hag and the old man, which ended in both setting about the task of binding up the stranger's wounds and restoring him to consciousness.

In the meanwhile, Noakes shrunk round to the spot where his companion was seated.

From the position he occupied, Jonathan Wild was able to see with great distinctness every movement that was made by the old man and the hag.

"Mr. Wild," said Noakes, in a faint whisper—"Mr. Wild!"

"Hush," said Jonathan, turning quickly round.

"Silence, fool—do you know no better than to call me by that name while we are in this place?"

"I ask your pardon—I forgot."

"Forgot be d—d!"

"But it doesn't matter," said Noakes—"no one heard me save yourself; I spoke in such a faint whisper!"

"How can you tell?" growled Wild. "People's ears are always quick to catch a secret. Mind how you speak to me in future! Call me by any name but that."

"I will be very careful."

"What were you going to say?"

"Nothing—nothing, except it seems that we were frightening ourselves about nothing."

"We?"

"Yes."

"No—it was you alone; I was not frightened, but your coward's heart is ever suggesting to you a thousand fears that are as groundless as the air!"

"Still it is a satisfaction to find that we are safe; but the peril was not so great as we thought it."

"Is that your opinion?"

"Y—yes."

"Then you're a bigger fool than I ever took you to be!"

"Is there danger, then? Are you sure there's some other danger? Speak—what is it—tell me?"

Mr. Noakes was full of fear instantly.

"You are an idiot—a complete fool! There's danger, but such as I can cope with! Do you recognise that stranger?"

"Who?—the wounded man over there?"

"Yes, fool! Don't let them see that we are talking about him. Of course I mean him."

"No—I don't recognise him," said Noakes. "I have no remembrance of ever having seen him in my life before. Is he a police officer in disguise? Is it some trick to ascertain whether we are here or not?"

"Pooh! Your heart and brain are ever ready to suggest a thousand imaginary evils!"

"What is the danger, then? Speak—pray explain it!"

"Why that stranger over there——"

"Yes—yes!"

"Is the man I stopped on the highway a little while ago, and who gave me the wound in my neck—curse him!"

Jonathan ground his teeth together as he spoke.

Noakes trembled violently.

"No—no! You are jesting. Surely, that cannot be?"

"I tell you it is!"

"Then let us go—let us leave the place instantly! Who can tell how soon he may recover, and then he will recognise us!"

"Bah! I don't intend to move! I look upon his arrival here as being quite providential!"

"Providential?"

"Yes! I have but little money left, and I don't intend to be wounded for nothing!"

"What do you mean?"

"What I said—that it is quite providential he has arrived here!"

Mr. Noakes shuddered.

"What do you intend to do?" he asked.

"Never mind—you will see!"

"Mr. Wild!"

"What! after my caution, will you call me by that name again?"

"I humbly ask your pardon, but——"

"But what, idiot?"

"If for once—only for once—if——"

"What! Why don't you go on? Why do you pause in that manner in the middle of your speech?"

"Because I am frightened to proceed; but if, on this one occasion only, you would condescend to take my advice—if you would only listen to my suggestions——"

"Well—what are they?"

"I fear there is but little use in uttering them, still I will speak!"

"Do so then! Confound it, why do you beat about the bush, and hang fire in that manner?"

"Because you are so violent!"

"Bah! What's your advice—come to the point?"

"Why—you are rested. You have recovered somewhat from your wound; the wine you have drunk has restored you greatly. There is danger in the atmosphere of this place—a thousand perils may be closing around us. Take my advice, then, and leave it at once. Let us seek for shelter elsewhere!"

"Noakes!"

"Yes, Mr.——"

"Silence! Are you determined to provoke discovery?"

"I am very sorry!"

"Bah! Now listen to me, and I will give you some advice—advice of which you stand much in need."

"What is it?"

"Mind your own business, and leave the management of affairs to me. Don't open your mouth on another occasion, and make a d—d fool of yourself! Silence, I say!"

CHAPTER DLXIX.

JONATHAN WILD RESOLVES TO ELUCIDATE THE MYSTERY THAT HANGS OVER THE HOUSE TO LET, AND ITS STRANGE OCCUPANTS.

JONATHAN WILD clutched Mr. Noakes tightly by the arm to enforce his words.

Mechanically, Noakes looked across the chamber to the little group at the other end of it, and then he saw at once why his companion had so peremptorily bidden him be silent.

The stranger's wound had been dressed and tightly bandaged.

The bleeding had ceased.

He now gave signs of returning consciousness, and as Noakes gazed, he saw him open his eyes and look wonderingly around him.

By the expression of his face it could be seen at once that his faculties were clouded.

He did not know precisely where he was, and was striving to recall his scattered recollection.

Then he remembered his wound, and in a strange, stifled voice, he said:

"Yes, I recollect—I have been saved—my wound has been dressed!"

He uttered these last words in an interrogatory tone, and the old woman replied:

"They have. When you have had something to eat and drink, and slept, you will no doubt be better."

"Thanks—thanks!—a thousand thanks for that assurance! I tell you that not only do I prize my own life very highly, but there are many others who place a still higher value upon it, and to whom I am of more importance than I am to myself; therefore, I am anxious—most anxious to recover."

"You mustn't excite yourself," said the hag. "We will do all we can to help you."

"I have money," said the stranger. "I am in no want of wealth, and you will find that I shall reward you richly for the service you render. Don't doubt my gratitude—don't be afraid I am not liberal. I shall give you more than you could possibly expect."

This announcement was well relished by the old hag and her husband, for such the other most probably was.

Both broke out into a perfect torrent of protestations concerning their intentions and willingness to serve the stranger in every possible way.

"That is enough," he said. "Curses on the villain who gave me this wound! I thought I had rid the world of a rascal. I'm sure I shot him, but he turned round quickly and fired upon me. Perhaps he did it in his last dying agony; at any rate, his aim was accurate."

Could he have seen Jonathan's face in the shade, he would have perceived a grim, mocking smile distorting it.

"I will get you something to eat and drink in a moment," said the hag. "Do you feel yourself recovering?"

"I do—quite fast. I am astonished at the improvement that has taken place. I feared that almost the last drop of blood had been drained out of my veins."

The old man again set out to fetch provisions and wine, and as he left the room, the stranger said:

"What was it you were telling me about two other travellers having besought your hospitality?"

"They are here," said the hag.

"Where?"

"Seated by the fire."

"Gentlemen, I can't see you well. I don't know you. There seems to be a strange dimness before my eyes. But it seems that you are suffering from the same cause as myself—is it not so?"

"Answer him!" hissed Wild, in Noakes's ear—"answer him, and be on your guard—maintain your presence of mind. I dare not speak myself, for fear he should recognise my voice."

This was giving Mr. Noakes a difficult task to accomplish, but he felt he was obliged to comply with his companion's demands.

"Yes—yes!" he said, in a stammering, hesitating voice, "we are suffering from the same cause."

"Are you much hurt?" said the stranger.

"No; fortunately, I am not; but my companion is badly wounded by a pistol bullet."

"What was that?" said the stranger, suddenly.

Jonathan Wild had gnashed his teeth together upon hearing Mr. Noakes say that he had been wounded by a pistol.

Had he said a word, the circumstance would have been less suspicious.

Mr. Noakes made no reply.

"What was that strange noise?" said the stranger.

"Did you gnash your teeth like that?"

"No!" stammered Noakes; "it was my friend here."

"Pain—pain," groaned Wild, in so faint and husky a voice that there was no fear of betraying his identity. "My wound smarts horribly."

"No doubt," said the stranger, who little suspected who the two persons were sitting opposite to him—"no doubt you have been injured by the same hand as I have, and therefore there ought to be more than a common feeling between us. Can you give me the particulars?"

"They are few," said Noakes, with a boldness and a readiness that astonished himself. "We were riding along, when suddenly we found ourselves face to face with a man on horseback, who had planted himself in the very middle of the roadway. He called to us to stop. My friend fired, and believed that he had hit the robber; but directly afterwards there was another report, and my friend was badly wounded."

"That's just what happened to me," said the stranger. "The coincidence is exact. But who can this mysterious robber be upon whom a pistol bullet produces not the least impression?"

"That I know not," said Noakes; "for we are travelling from London; and as we live in the country, in a lonely spot, we know but little of what is going on in the great world."

"The attack upon me," said the stranger, "took place very close indeed to this spot; but my horse galloped on, and I found myself fast losing my consciousness. Fortunately, before my senses left me, I was able to pull him up; and to that circumstance, no doubt, I owe my life."

"It was, indeed, most fortunate!" said Mr. Noakes.

"It was. I recovered after a time, and with some difficulty dragged myself to the gates of this house. I looked around, and from where I stood I had an extensive prospect of the country; but this was the only habitation in sight, and so I made my way at once towards it, never doubting that I should meet with the succour and assistance that I have found."

"The same with us," said Mr. Noakes. "We were attacked within a mile of this house; and the wound that my companion received bled so profusely that I was terrified for the result. Like you, I looked around—for my friend could not—and this was the only house in sight; and so I came towards it."

"I am better," said the stranger,—"I feel sure that I am better. When I recover, one of my first acts shall be to discover this robber and assassin, and bring him to justice!"

"You would be doing the country at large a great service," said Mr. Noakes. "But he's a dangerous man to meddle with."

"How do you know that?"

"I don't know it," said Noakes, in some confusion, for this last question took him by surprise. "I only judged by his acts, as you might have done. It seems he has nearly been the death of you, and the death of my friend as well."

"Still, we must not shrink from our duty any the more on that account."

"Here comes food and wine," said the hag. "When you have partaken of that you will find yourself much stronger and much better."

"Believe me, I will reward you—amply reward you for this."

The viands were placed before the wounded traveller.

He had the prudence to eat and drink sparingly, and the meal clearly did him an immense amount of good.

"Now I am sleepy," he said,—"very sleepy, and a long, heavy slumber is just what I require to put me right. Can you not let me sleep?"

"Oh, yes," said the hag. "This house is large and spacious. There are more rooms in it than I should like to be compelled to enter in one day. It's a huge place."

"And to let?" asked the stranger.

"Yes, to let, though no one will take it."

"How is that?"

"The place is old-fashioned, and damp, and deserted. It's haunted, too."

"Bah!"

The word was uttered contemptuously.

"You don't believe in such things, then?" said the hag. "Well, perhaps you may see something—perhaps you may not; but, in the reign of Queen Anne—"

"There was a murder committed, and all that sort of thing," said the stranger, with a yawn,—"blood stains on the floor which cannot be washed out. The old story! Bah! I have no patience to listen to such folly!"

"You may call it folly, or what you like, sir," said the hag, in a half-angry, half-offended tone. "But, however, that doesn't matter. The house is empty, and has been for many a year, and no doubt will be for many a year to come, for who could live in such a place?"

"You live in it, don't you?"

"Yes, we do."

"And do the ghosts trouble you?"

"We're used to them."

"And so would anyone else be, I should think," said the stranger.

"But then you must remember we are poor old folks, and unable to get a living in any other way, and so we put up with that which others would not."

"Well, well; it is indifferent to me—quite indifferent—only show me to something like a bed where I can lie down and sleep off the effects of my wound, and that's all that I require."

"This way, then," said the hag—"follow me! We need not go up into the mansion among the dreary corridors and deserted rooms. There's a place on the ground floor that will suit you."

"Anywhere—anywhere," said the stranger, sleepily—"anywhere will do for me!"

"Come, then."

"Good night, gentlemen," he said, as he followed the old hag from the room—"good night! I trust I shall see you when I wake. You can describe the robber, no doubt, and so can I, and between us we shall be able to get up a tolerably complete description."

"We shall," said Mr. Noakes—"we shall! Good night!"

Jonathan Wild pretended to be very bad indeed, and so, instead of saying good night, he only gave a half-smothered sort of groan.

The old man drew nearer to the fire, and rubbed his skinny hands together, for he was cold.

"It's strange—strange," he said, "to have visitors, and all in one day; I never remember such a thing before."

"But it's far from being disagreeable to you, I should think!" said Wild.

"Ah, then, sir, you're better; you've found your voice."

"Yes, I have—I am better; now and then the pain keeps returning."

"You drank too much wine," said the old man—"sadly too much wine,—you will suffer for it."

"Bah! it's wine I want; bring me more—another draught will set me right."

"As you will," said the old man, "it's no business of of mine. I should advise you not."

Jonathan made an impatient gesture.

"Here is wine in this bottle," continued the old man.

"You see, the other traveller has only drunk a small portion."

"He's a milksop!" said Wild.

He placed the bottle to his lips as he spoke, nor did he remove it until nearly the whole of its contents had trickled down his throat, and then he handed it to Noakes.

The old man took the bottle and retired to the other end of the room.

"Now," said Noakes, upon whom the wine had produced a beneficial effect, for he was bolder and stronger—"now then, what's the next step? Will you not leave now?"

"No—a thousand times no! I do intend to leave, but not till I have accomplished my purpose!"

"What purpose?"

"I should have said purposes, for I have two things to do."

"What are they?"

Wild sunk his voice to a deep, hoarse whisper.

"The first," he said, "is to take possession of that money which the traveller should have given me at first. I will have it, I am determined!"

"And the other?" asked Noakes, with a sigh.

"It is to find out the mystery that hangs over the whole of this place. I will probe it to the bottom, I will discover it, I will find out who these strange old people are, and have a better reason than has yet been given me for the desertion of this house. There's more in it than meets the eye."

"Shall you not stop?"

"No, it would be too dangerous. But look there, what do you think of that?"

Jonathan, as he spoke, pointed towards the door.

CHAPTER DLXX.

EDGORTH BESS MAKES AN ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM THE LONESOME INN.

LEAVING Jonathan Wild and his companion in iniquity in this strange place, with mystery and peril thickening around them, we will make our way to that lonesome, dreary inn to which Wild junior had taken his captive, Edgworth Bess.

Her position is such as to demand the whole of our attention.

After having been rudely thrust back by George Wild when she made that frantic and ineffectual attempt to leave the room, she sank down dejected, exhausted, and despairing upon the floor.

Then the dismal noise made by securing the door grated upon her very soul, and, filled with all kinds of terrors and forebodings for the future, her head sank upon her breast, and she became unconscious.

How long she remained in this insensible condition of course she could not tell.

By degrees she became herself, and then looked round her in trembling and fear.

What had lately happened seemed more like a dis-ordered dream than anything real, and her first impression was that she had just woken from a vision.

But the strangeness of the place soon manifested itself to her, and the darkness terrified her exceedingly.

Trembling in every limb, shivering with cold and fright, she rose to her feet.

The darkness in that chamber was most profound, and instinctively she stretched out her arms to their fullest extent, so as to guard against coming into contact with any unseen obstacle.

Her breath came short and thick.

Her pulses throbbed, and there was a dreadful burning sensation in her brain which engendered the belief that she was going mad.

But she was soon growing calmer, as was proved by the first reflection she made.

This was, that her state of insensibility had not continued for any great length of time.

It was dark when she had arrived at the inn, and when she had been thrust into that room.

It was dark now.

From the time that had been occupied by the journey, she felt sure that the night must have been almost spent by the time she arrived, and yet it was still dark.

Happening to turn her head, she saw one part of the room where the darkness was not so profound.

A slight glimmer of light could be seen, as though there was a window or some such aperture.

No sooner did she behold it, than an invincible desire sprang up in her breast to bend her steps in that direction, but she was fearful of encountering something in the darkness, and of doing herself an injury.

Then she bethought herself of the expedient of sinking down to a level with the floor, and in this position she crawled towards the spot which she desired to reach.

Her hand suddenly touched something soft, like wool.

At first she drew back at the contact, and then a second thought told her what the object was.

It was a curtain.

Holding it in her hand, she slowly drew herself up to her full height, and then grasping the curtain higher up, dashed it aside.

A window was then disclosed.

She could now see out into the night, and into the darkness.

The sky was covered with dense, heavy, murky clouds, portending rain.

On the far-off horizon the clouds were a faint, greyish tint.

This shewed that morning was coming.

But Edgworth Bess knew it not.

Her eyes wandered to other objects which interested her more deeply.

She noted with a pang of distress and alarm, that the window was strongly barred on the outside.

From the manner in which her heart sank at this discovery, she became conscious to what extent she had been buoyed up by the hope of making her escape.

Now it seemed hopeless.

Then she remembered what the landlord had said.

Not only was the window barred, but down in the yard beneath there was a dog, doubtless of a ferocious species.

She placed her face close to the glass, and strained her eyes in the endeavour to look down beneath.

But she was able to distinguish nothing but a dusky mass of objects.

Her heart beat painfully, and tears started to her eyes.

"Oh, that they had stopped!" she murmured—"oh that they had listened to my pleadings, I should not then have been in this terrible situation!"

Great as was the dread which the poor girl had of Jonathan Wild, it was not so great as that which she had for the thief-taker's son, and now she was in his power—wholly—entirely in his power, to do with her as he thought fit.

The thought was madness in the extreme, and the more she pondered upon it and upon the dreadful nature of her situation, the stronger and stronger became the impulse to dare everything—to run all risks in endeavouring to escape.

"I must help myself," she said, "and I trust Providence will second me in my efforts. At any rate, I will not sink into his power without a struggle. I will try to escape. If I fail, then I shall not have so much to reproach myself with; but I will not fail!"

It seemed absurd for that weak girl to say she would not fail, in the face of such obstacles as she had to contend with.

"The window is my only chance," she murmured. "If I could get out, I would run the risk of the danger I should meet with from the dog. I would not care for that—no animal, however ferocious, could be so bad as George Wild."

Her whole body quivered with agitation as she spoke these words, but, as soon as she had finished, she made a desperate attempt to open the window.

But she failed.

At one time there had been a swing lattice, and the casement had opened outwards, but now it was nailed up.

Still, this discovery did not cause her to despair.

The window was just such a one as might be expected to be seen in such a place.

It was composed of numerous tiny panes of glass set in lead.

This she felt sure she could remove easily, and so set about the task.

As with all great undertakings, the commencement is the greatest difficulty.

She bent the lead back, and managed to extract one of the little diamond-shaped panes of glass, and when she had got the first out, the displacement of the remainder was easily and rapidly accomplished.

It served her as a ready and convenient tool wherewith to bend back the lead.

At last she ceased her labour, for she imagined she had removed a sufficient number of panes to answer her purpose.

Her hands were cut and bleeding; but such a trifling ill as that she heeded not.

With the same piece of glass in her hand which had rendered her such good service, she tore and broke away the leaden framework in which the panes had been set.

So far, then, her purpose was accomplished.

There was a hole large enough for her body to pass through easily, but she seemed as far off making her escape as ever, for beyond were the strong perpendicular iron bars.

With trembling eagerness, she seized one of them and shook it.

It was as firm as a rock.

She took hold of another, fully anticipating the same result, and shook that too.

But she could hardly repress a cry of joy when, to her surprise and gratification, she found the bar was loose.

She shook it again, and it moved more and more.

Throwing down the piece of glass, she took hold of the bar with both hands, and renewed her efforts.

She had every encouragement to proceed, for every time she shook the bar it became looser and looser in its socket.

Either originally it had been inefficiently fastened, or else, from the length of time, the weather had produced an effect upon it.

Most likely the reason was that both causes had been combined.

Oh, how desperately she tugged and shook at that iron bar!

And then at length, to her joy and delight, it came away in her hands.

But the space then between the bars was frightfully narrow—so narrow that she feared it would be impossible to squeeze her body through so small a space.

She tried the bars on either side, but they were as firm as any rock could be.

And she was to try to squeeze herself through this narrow opening.

But, having done so, how was she to reach the ground? She looked out, and saw that the distance was not great.

But in the darkness the eye is easily deceived with regard to depth.

Edgworth Bess thought that if she got out on to the window-sill, and lowered herself until she hung by the full length of her arms, she would be able to reach within an inch or two of the ground.

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES IN THE HOUSE TO LET.]

Trembling with excitement and hope, she began to squeeze herself between the bars.

It was difficult—almost impossible—and she bruised herself sadly in her efforts; but she knew she was escaping from George Wild, and that knowledge made her careless of all other injuries.

At last she stood upon the sill of the window.

She felt giddy, and almost fell; but, recovering herself by a great effort, she held tightly to the bars.

Then cautiously she knelt down upon the sill, and gradually lowered herself until she hung suspended only by the grasp which her fingers had upon the stone of the window-ledge.

But the ground seemed far beneath her.

It was impossible to retreat.

She must let go and chance the consequences and the injuries she might receive in her fall.

No. 122.—BLUESKIN.

Nor could she remain where she was.

Her arms ached, and the muscles of her fingers relaxed—they were not strong enough to sustain the whole weight of her body.

She felt her grasp slipping from the window-sill, and closed her eyes.

There was an awful moment, and then, with a slight shock, she reached the ground.

The distance she had had to drop was trifling.

Still she lost her footing, and lay in a strange, huddled-up mass upon the ground.

Then, before she could recover herself, she felt a touch upon her shoulder and hot breath upon her neck.

She had much difficulty in suppressing the scream which sprang readily to her lips, but she did so.

Then she looked up, and her terror increased when she beheld two glaring eyes close to her that seemed to burn as though they possessed some light of their own.

Then a low, growling sound made itself heard.

It was the dog of which Nicholson had spoken. He had sprang upon, and now he stood there like a sentinel.

He seemed passive and quiet, but no doubt the least movement upon Edgworth Bess's part would altogether change his nature.

He would become then as ferocious as he was now quiet.

The growling grew louder and louder.

He seemed about to bark loudly; and if he was, Edgworth Bess was well aware that Nicholson would fly at full speed to the spot.

She would then be discovered.

She would then have had all her labour for nothing.

CHAPTER DLXXI.

EDGWORTH BESS ESCAPES FROM THE LONESOME INN, AND HAS A NARROW ESCAPE FROM WILD JUNIOR.

It was a terrible moment!

In what way to act, or what to do for the best to free her from her terrible position, the poor girl could not think.

She was, too, almost paralysed by fear.

It seemed to her an age while the dog kept his paw upon her, but in reality it was only a few seconds.

But as the dog did not bark immediately, hope began to find a place in her heart.

The idea darted into her mind that by a kindly-uttered word or a caress she could soothe the dog and prevent him from giving an alarm.

It was a dangerous attempt to make, but yet her position could not be made worse than it was, and she felt that she would rather die by the teeth of this fierce animal than she would fall again into the power of George Wild.

Tremblingly, then, she put forth her hand until it rested upon the dog's shaggy, wiry coat.

"Poor dog!" she cried, in a gentle voice—"poor dog!"

She patted and stroked him while she spoke.

To her intense delight the growling ceased!

Nicholson was not a man overflowing with affection and sympathy, and no doubt it was many a day since his dog had heard a word of kindness or received any other caress than a brutal kick.

Such being the case, then, it is not surprising that the animal should in this respect somewhat resemble a human being.

The dog was a stranger to kind and gentle words and to caresses, and when Edgworth Bess patted him and spoke as she did, the action seemed to go to the creature's heart.

It removed its one paw, and began licking the poor girl's hand.

She began to think then that all danger was over, and that this formidable creature she so much feared would prove a friend to her and a protector, instead of an enemy.

She continued her caresses and kind words for several moments until, indeed, the dog seemed almost delirious with delight.

He uttered a faint whining cry, which gave Edgworth Bess fresh cause for alarm, for she feared that it would presently break out into a bark of gratification.

She determined to make an effort to rise to her feet.

She was almost frightened to move, for she did not know how far to trust the dog.

He might submit to her caresses, and be kind and gentle while she remained immovable, but it was questionable whether he would continue this behaviour if he saw her making an attempt to escape.

But the experiment, hazardous as it was, must be tried.

Slowly she rose to her feet.

The dog growled.

Fear again came over her heart, for it appeared that her forebodings were about to be realised.

"Good dog!" she said, again—"good dog! Lie down—be quiet!"

The animal seemed to comprehend her words, for he crouched submissively at her feet.

By this time the poor girl had been long enough in the darkness for her eyes to become accustomed to it; so when she looked round, she was able to distinguish with tolerable distinctness the various objects by which she was surrounded.

A few paces off was a high wall surmounted with spikes.

Her heart sank at the sight, for she was sure it was an obstacle she could not surmount.

In the hope of finding some doorway through which she could pass, she slowly crept forward.

The dog followed at her heels.

Gaining the wall, she passed her hand over it until after walking a little way she came to a door.

It was secured and refused to open, but the fastenings were all upon the inner side, so she was not without the hope that after all she should be able to escape.

Carefully and cautiously she bent all her energies to the accomplishment of the task of unfastening the door.

At length she succeeded.

The strong, heavy bar was taken down, the bolts were withdrawn, the key turned in the rusty lock.

Then the door opened, and before her she saw by the aid of the dim, grey, early dawn a wide expanse of country.

Like a spirit she darted through the door, and, heedless of the many obstructions in her path, rushed onward at full speed.

She did not notice it at first, but the dog followed her.

Turning round, at length, when exhaustion compelled her to slacken her pace, she beheld him.

Again she caressed him and spoke kindly, and the dog jumped about and looked up to her, seeming frantic with joy.

It looked as though it rejoiced in its own liberation as much as Edgworth Bess did.

Her breath failed, her limbs trembled, and she felt unequal to the task of running far, and yet the poor girl knew that in spite of everything she must put forth her utmost speed, or her escape would be discovered and she would be overtaken.

She had no idea which way she was going, or which would be the best course for her to take.

Straight before her was the east, and almost unthinkingly she ran in this direction.

At last sheer fatigue compelled her to stop.

She sank down upon a fallen log and panted painfully for breath.

But the intense fear she felt, and her apprehensions of immediate pursuit would not suffer her to sit long; so, rising to her feet again, she once more dashed onwards.

She still continued flying over the meadows, taking her course almost in a straight line; but she had satisfied herself that she was out of sight of anyone who might be at the lonesome inn, for when she turned round to look behind her, a group of tall trees hid the building from her view.

Away she ran until suddenly she heard a voice.

"Stop—stop!" said some one. "Do you know where you're going! Stop—stop, I say!"

To the excited fears of the poor girl it seemed the cries to stop could only come from behind her, and so she rushed blindly forward.

In another moment there was a collision, and looking up she found herself face to face with a man who was carrying a gun in a negligent manner in his arms.

"Stop!" he said again. "Where are you going to? Don't you know you're trespassing? You have no business on these grounds! Be off with you, I say!"

Edgworth Bess was so terrified and so spent with running fast, that she could not find breath to gasp out a single sound.

The man who had stopped her appeared by his dress to be a head gamekeeper, or something of that kind.

"You've a pretty face, young woman!" he said, still holding her roughly by the arm—"a very pretty face! You've no business to be running over the fields at this time in the morning. Come with me—I must find out who you are!"

This alarmed the poor girl excessively.

She struggled and tried to free herself from his hold, but failing in this—for the man was much stronger than she was—she uttered a despairing cry for help.

She little thought that it would be responded to, but there was a friend near whose existence she had forgotten.

This was the dog.

With an angry growl, he gave a bound forward and seized the man by the throat.

"Murder!" he cried. "Help—help!" Oh, murder! Curse the dog—call him off, or he will be the death of me!"

In a second, Edgworth Bess found herself free from her assailant, for in his alarm at the sudden attack made upon him by the dog, he had not only released her arm but had dropped his gun as well.

She was so terrified as scarcely to know what to do.

The man still continued his vociferations, and then, with some difficulty, she called the dog off, and induced him to relinquish his hold.

The gamekeeper had not escaped uninjured, and after the dog had gone he made an effort to rise, and lay on the ground uttering piteous groans.

Humanity prompted Edgworth Bess to stop out she had seen so much treachery during her short life, and was, too, so fully impressed with the importance of getting as far away from the inn as she possibly could, that instead of attempting to render any assistance, she continued her headlong flight.

The dog still followed her.

In a few moments the scene of her encounter with the gamekeeper was left behind.

She ran on, however, and never thought of stopping until she found before her an obstacle which compelled her to pause.

This was no other than a hedge of great height and thickness.

To break through it or climb over it was equally impossible.

It was thickly planted, and all the boughs were furnished with long, sharp thorns.

Near the top of the little embankment, upon which it was planted, however, it was possible to obtain a glimpse of what was beyond.

Curiosity made Edgworth Bess stoop down and peep through the hedge.

To her surprise she saw a narrow, ill-kept road.

Grass was growing upon it in many places, and in the centre were two deep ruts, caused by cartwheels.

She was looking through, wondering to what place this road led and how she should gain it, when the sound of a horse's footsteps reached her ears.

Some one was coming on at a headlong, furious gallop.

The horse was approaching evidently, for the sounds grew louder and louder each instant.

Oppressed with a vague and indefinable fear, Edgworth Bess crouched down still lower and closer to the roots of the hedge, and waited patiently for the horseman to make his appearance.

She could scarcely venture to hope it was any friend of hers, or anyone who would render her assistance.

If it should prove to be an enemy, however, the prickly hedge would conceal her from his view.

Her patience was not put to a very severe trial.

In something less than two minutes the horseman came in sight.

He was mounted upon a steed of excellent quality, but the noble creature was thickly covered with foam.

It shot by almost with the rapidity of an arrow.

Still Edgworth Bess was enabled to catch a glimpse of the rider's countenance.

She almost swooned when she beheld it, and a shriek rose up to her lips.

It was George Wild.

He was returning to the lonesome inn after his successful journey to London with all speed, for his heart was oppressed with many misgivings concerning the safety of his captive.

Little did he think as he rode along at such a pace that she was crouching down behind the hedge quite helpless and powerless to resist him.

As the sound of the horse's feet became less and less distinct, Edgworth Bess again felt her spirits revive.

She drew a long breath of exquisite relief and thankfulness at having once more escaped her much-dreaded persecutor.

It made her shudder when she thought of the narrow escape she had had.

But for the fact of the hedge being so strong and so high, she would have made her way into the lane, and then she would certainly have been seen and made a prisoner once more.

Now she began to be conscious that she was tolerably safe.

She was aware of the direction Wild junior had taken, and what she had to do was to go in the one exactly opposite.

She knew full well, however, that going at the pace he did, it would not take him long to reach the inn, and as soon as ever he got there her flight must be discovered, even if it had not been found out already.

It was necessary, then, that she should push onwards with redoubled speed.

She paused in doubt, for after what had occurred she scarcely knew whether it would be safe for her to venture to pass along any of the high-roads.

Unable to decide, she continued her course, keeping close under the hedge, so that it should form some kind of protection to her, until at length she came to a wooden gate.

To emerge into the road was now easy enough, and after a little more deliberation she decided upon doing so.

She ran onwards at full speed, and then presently she reached the termination of the lane.

It ran in a broad high-road which reached right and left as far as ever she could see.

Which way to turn she could not tell, but by chance she saw on the opposite side of the road a mile-stone.

Upon this she saw on one side, "To Edgware—five miles," and on the other, "To London—five miles."

"London?" she repeated; "that is where I want to go, and that is the way!"

She at once turned her face towards the metropolis.

She was so tired now as to be unable to run, and was compelled to proceed at a walk.

Then, as if to form another hindrance to her progress, she saw before her a very steep hill.

It would take a long while to climb up this; and it would fatigue her greatly, but the task had to be accomplished, and so she bent all her energies towards it.

CHAPTER DLXXII.

EDGWORTH BESS FINDS ANOTHER FRIEND ON THE HIGHWAY.

SHE had to rest several times, but when she reached the summit she considered herself somewhat repaid for her toil.

From the elevated position she then occupied, an extensive view could be obtained.

In the distance she could see the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, and it was a great satisfaction to have her destination in sight, and be quite sure that she was going in the right direction.

After a brief rest, she commenced descending the hill, and this was a much more easy process.

She made good speed, and when the bottom was reached, walked along the highway for about half a mile.

Then she saw another mile-stone, and upon this she seated herself to rest.

The dog seated himself by her side, and looked wistfully up into her face.

Again she caressed him, and felt thankful at having found in the hour of need one who would doubtless continue to be a firm and incorruptible friend to her.

How long she sat thus, she could hardly tell—it was for some considerable length of time.

But she was very weary, and she could not summon up her courage sufficiently to make the effort to rise.

At last, just as she was about doing so, she looked back in the direction she had come.

Then she saw, creeping slowly down the hill, a large, covered waggon, drawn by three powerful horses.

Edgworth Bess looked at the vehicle longingly.

It was going towards London, and she thought, with a sigh, what a relief it would be to her if she could avail herself of this means of conveyance.

It was tardy, but then she would reach her journey's end without fatigue.

The waggon came rolling on, and as it drew nearer and nearer, she made up her mind that she would speak to the driver, and ask him to allow her to ride.

Presently, the waggon arrived opposite to her.

The driver was perched up in his high seat, and Edgworth Bess perceived that he was looking down upon her with an expression of pity and compassion upon his face.

"Woa—woa!" he cried, tightening the reins as he spoke. "What's the matter, my lass? Dang it, you do look tired!"

"I am—I am!" Edgworth Bess managed to gasp out, but yet she could not make the request.

"Be you agoin' to Lunnun?" asked the waggoner.

"Yes."

"Well, then, get up in the waggon behind. Dang it all, I'll give yer a lift! It's a downright shame for you to be walking on when you're so tired. Woa, I say!"

Edgworth Bess endeavoured to express her thanks for this unlooked-for succour.

Tears sprang into her eyes, and she found herself unable to say a single word.

"Come, my wench, up with yer! I mustn't stop long, you know. There be a few things in the cart—such as empty sacks, an' such-loike, and yer won't be much extra carriage."

"Thanks—thanks!" the poor girl managed to exclaim at last. "And my dog—will you let him ride with me too?"

"I don't mind," said the waggoner; "but, axin' yer pardon, and meanin' no offence, he's an ugly-lookin' cur, and that's the best compliment that I can pay him."

This was true enough.

The dog, which had already been such a friend to Edgworth Bess, had nothing prepossessing in his appearance.

He had a vicious-looking head, and at some time or other had been deprived of one of his eyes, which added considerably to the repulsiveness of his look.

Then his tail had been lopped off close to his body, and, from an injury he had received to one of his legs, he limped along in a very odd fashion.

He was dirty, and altogether a very disreputable-looking dog, and certainly not the kind of animal that any one like Edgworth Bess would be expected to be found with.

"He's a friend," said Edgworth Bess. "He's not handsome, but I don't like him any the less for that."

"That's right, miss—that's my sentiment. I always do say a friend's a friend all the world over."

"And you will let him ride with me?"

"Yes—certainly!"

Edgworth Bess climbed into the back of the waggon, and the dog jumped in after her.

"Are you all right?" said the waggoner.

"Yes," was the reply. "I shall never forget your kindness."

"All right, don't say anything about that! Gee, captain!"

The waggoner cracked his whip, and the horses once more crawled forward at their former rate.

There was a canvas covering that hung down at the back part of the waggon, and which caused the interior to be dark.

By drawing the canvas in front on one side, the driver was able to look in; and as soon as his horses were fairly in motion, he turned round and said:

"It's very dark in there, is it not? Would you like to have the canvas at the back turned up?"

"No, thank you," said Edgworth Bess. "No, thank you. You're very kind! I shall do very well as I am!"

"Very good, miss—just as you like. Here's axin' yer pardon, but maybe you wouldn't moind talkin' to a poor fellow for awhile!"

"Certainly not! I would do anything in my power to repay you for the service you have rendered me!"

"No—no, I don't mean that; but if so be as you don't moind talkin' a bit, why I shall be very glad!"

"What shall I talk about?"

"Oh! anything. I ain't at all particular what. But talkin' is a fine thing."

"It is," said Edgworth Bess, rather surprised at the man's discourse.

"When I be drivin' along the road," continued the waggoner, "I often think what poor creatures we should be if we could not talk! Why, this world wouldn't be worth livin' in then!"

"It's often pleasant to talk," said Edgworth Bess, who scarcely knew how to reply.

"Sometimes pleasant, eh? Well, I always find it so. Now, mine's a very hard life, do you see; you might not think it, but it is nevertheless!"

"How so?"

"Well, you may think it easy enough to sit here holdin' the reins in your hands and drivin' yer horses along the road—it seems very easy, but it isn't! Here am I, all by myself, goin' along the road. Perhaps I go ten mile and only have my horses to speak to, and then, when I meet anybody, ten to one if they will take the trouble to reply to I!"

"You're fond of talking, then?"

"I be—I just be! I do like to talk. I don't care what it's about, so long as it's talkin'!"

"I'll talk, then! Tell me what subject I can choose!"

"Oh! any—any. I don't mind!"

"Nay, mention something!"

"Well, I be talkative and fond of talkin', and I be curious, too, when I see anything out o' the common. Now, there's you, for instance. Of course I axes yer pardon, but if you wouldn't mind it, I should mighty like to know what brings you walkin' along the road in this fashion, with such an ill-looking dog for a companion?"

"It's a long story," said Edgworth Bess, with a sigh—"a very long story!"

"Is it?" said the waggoner, immediately interested—"is it?"

"It is indeed!"

"Well, then, I do hope you'll tell me all of it, so that we can keep on talkin' all the way to London."

"I don't know whether I could tell you all," said Edgworth Bess; "but I can tell you some. I have been carried away from my home by a scoundrel, and locked up in a room in a very lonely house."

"Have you, though?"

"I have escaped. I was afraid at first this dog would tear me to pieces, or bark, and so discover my escape; but he did not—he turned my friend, and we have kept together ever since."

"I don't wonder at him takin' a likin' to you," said the waggoner—"a not a bit of it!"

"Well, he has done so, and I feel very grateful to him. I am on the way to London, but I am frightened to death!"

"What about?"

"About the man who carried me off, and the other who kept me a prisoner. By this time they must have found out that I have escaped. I am sure they will set off in pursuit of me, and I am in continual terror of being overtaken!"

"What, by those two men?"

"Yes. And now will you do me a favour?"

"Certainly, miss. What is it?"

"Will you look back along the road and tell me whether you can see two men on horseback? If you can, you may depend they are the two men I have been speaking of."

Edgworth Bess was induced to make this request, for the wind happening to blow aside the canvas at the back of the waggon, enabled her to get one glimpse of the road, and she fancied she had seen two figures on horseback.

The driver stood up, and, shading his eyes with his hand, looked over the top of the waggon.

"Ay, miss, there be two men, sure enough, and they're comin' along as though they would break their blessed necks!"

Edgworth Bess uttered a scream of terror.

"Don't you be frightened now, miss—don't you be frightened—you're all right. I am a friend, and I will stick by you to the last! Those two men sha'n't hurt you, you may depend!"

"But you would find them more than a match for you, my friend," said Edgworth Bess. "They are a couple of desperate villains, and would not shrink from any deed! What can I do?—how can I escape?"

"Why, miss, you just sit where you are, and leave it to me. I'd just like to catch them interferin' with you!"

"No, no—I could not sit here! You don't know them! Alas! I have had all my trouble for nothing! I shall be dragged back again!"

"I say, miss!"

"What?"

"Why, how do you know that those two chaps are in pursuit of you? They may be two very different people."

"Alas! I am afraid to think that!"

"Well, take a little peep out of the back of the waggon—perhaps you will be able to tell them."

Edgworth Bess obeyed.

One glance was sufficient to satisfy her.

At no great distance she could see Wild junior galloping along on horseback at a furious rate.

She fancied, too, that his face wore a very angry look, and that his eyes were fixed upon the waggon as though he knew she was seated within it."

By his side was Nicholson, the landlord of the inn.

"Yes, they are my foes!" said Edgworth Bess. "Heaven help me now! What shall I do?"

"Why, miss, I'll settle the rascals, never you fear! You don't know me, nor what I can do!"

Edgworth Bess was so alarmed that she was scarcely capable of anything like clear thought.

She noticed, however, that the waggon contained a number of sacks, and also a quantity of straw.

Upon seeing them, the idea entered her head that it might be possible for her to conceal herself beneath these articles.

"Listen," she said, addressing the driver. "I think you will be able to render me a very great service."

"How so, miss?—how so?"

"Why, I'll conceal myself underneath these sacks. I will cover myself up completely with them; and should these two men stop to make any inquiry of you, tell them that you have not seen me; and if they look into the waggon they will think that it contains nothing but the straw and empty sacks."

"I'll tell them that, miss," said the waggoner. "If they ax me whether I have seen anyone like you, I shall say no!"

The loud clatter of horses' feet upon the road could now be distinctly heard; and, trembling in ever limb at the danger she was about to encounter, Edgworth Bess covered herself over with the sacks, and was careful to conceal the dog as well.

The driver turned round in his seat and pretended to be half asleep.

Scarcely had Edgworth Bess finished her proceedings than two horsemen galloped past the waggon at full speed.

Her heart gave a sudden bound at this unexpected, unhopd-for escape.

She was just congratulating herself that the danger was over, and indeed, was in the act of removing some of the articles with which she had covered herself, when she heard the trampling of horses' feet again.

This time they stopped close to the waggon; and then a voice which she knew only too well, and which thrilled through every fibre in her frame, exclaimed:

"Hoy, waggoner—stop a minute! Pull up!"

"What do you want?" said the driver, slackening the speed at which his horses had been going.

"Why, I want to know whether you have come far along this road?"

"Well, a matter of six or seven miles or thereabouts," was the reply. "I have come from Edgware."

"Well, then, have you seen anything of a girl on the highway? Have you passed one?"

"What sort of a one?"

"Why, young and thin, with a pale face, wearing a small hat!"

The waggoner shook his head to and fro.

"No," he said—"I haven't seen her!"

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure, for I haven't seen a girl at all since I started."

"Then, if that's the case, what did you want to ask that question for?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing! I axes yer pardon, I didn't mean no offence, only I thought it would be pleasant to have a bit of a talk. You see, talkin' is such a fine thing. I often think to myself, if it was not for talkin'—"

"Oh, d—n your thoughts!" said Wild junior. "I don't want to know them. What have you got in your waggon?"

"Well, sir, axin' yer pardon, I don't mind havin' a talk about that. I would sooner have a talk about what's in my waggon than I wouldn't talk at all. I often think to myself—"

"D—n your thoughts!" said Wild junior, again. "What have you got in your waggon? Though never mind—don't trouble yourself to tell me—I'll have a look!"

With these words, George Wild, very much to the consternation both of Edgworth Bess and the driver, trotted round to the back of the waggon and drew aside the canvas we have mentioned.

The interior was then plainly revealed.

He could see into every corner.

At the other end of the waggon there was a pile of empty sacks, but he could see nothing else.

The driver thrust his head through the opening of the canvas in front, and said:

"I have nothing in the waggon, you see, but these 'ere empty sacks and a trifle of straw. You didn't think I'd got a girl in here, did you? I only wish I had, there would be some chance of having a little bit of a talk, for I often think to myself—"

With an angry curse George Wild released his hold upon the canvas and allowed the covering to fall over the back of the waggon.

"She must be further on the road," he said to his companion. "Spur your horse forward—forward!"

"But perhaps she hasn't come this way at all," said Nicholson.

"Don't you perhaps anything, d—n you! If you had done your duty I shouldn't have had this chase all over the country! But she'll make her way to London, I feel sure of that, so that if we get there before her, it won't much matter."

This was all Edgworth Bess was able to hear.

The sound of their voices in conversation died away.

It was some time before the waggoner ventured to turn round and speak—in fact, until he had watched Wild junior and Nicholson out of sight.

Cheer up, my lass, it's all right! After all, the blackguards have gone galloping on to London. They've missed you. It's all right—don't be afraid. Eh! what did you say?"

Edgworth Bess had said nothing.

An ominous kind of silence reigned inside the vehicle, which was suddenly broken by the whining of the dog.

The driver had tried to cheat himself into believing that Edgworth Bess had made some reply to his questions.

But such was not the case.

The poor girl, entirely overcome with fright, had fallen into a death-like swoon.

CHAPTER DLXXXIII.

RELATES THE ADVENTURES WHICH BEFEL JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES IN THE HOUSE TO LET.

WHEN Jonathan Wild pointed in the direction of the door of that strange vaulted chamber, Mr. Noakes, who was ever ready to anticipate danger, trembled and shook as he followed with his eyes the direction of his companion's finger.

Then he drew a long breath.

In reality he saw little to excite apprehension.

The old hag had returned from showing the traveller to his chamber, and was now whispering something into the ear of the old man.

"They are plotting something," said Wild, "you may rely upon that. What it is I shall find out presently."

Just then the old woman came forward.

"I hope, gentlemen, that you are satisfied with the poor accommodation of this place!"

"Oh, yes, quite—quite."

"And you are better, sir?" she added, addressing Wild. "Yes, somewhat better. A few hours' rest, no doubt, will put me right."

"Would you like to retire now, sir? The chamber is all ready."

"No," said Wild, "I won't go just yet; my appetite has returned to me a little. I was going to eat something when that bell rang. I will try a meal now."

The old woman did not seem very well pleased with this announcement, but she offered no objection.

On the contrary, she seemed all alacrity, for she drew the table closer to the fire, placed two chairs near it, and spread the provisions with great speed.

Jonathan watched her movements, and wondered whether she acted thus in order to serve him speedily, or whether it was in order to get the meal over as soon as possible.

He thought the latter.

He sat down at the table along with Noakes, and they partook largely of the plain substantial fare spread out before them.

Both were hungry, and such was the precarious state they were in, that they felt they could not afford to miss this opportunity of obtaining a regular meal.

Jonathan was an unreasonably long time over his repast, and he noticed that the more he lingered the more fidgety and uneasy the old people became.

This still added to his suspicions.

At length he turned, and said to the old woman:

"What was that strange story you were telling the traveller about this old place being haunted?"

"Oh! it's a long story, sir, and it would take a long time to tell!"

"No matter," said Wild, "I'm in the humour to listen to it, and before I go to bed I should like to know what kind of companions I may expect to have."

"Oh, you may not see or hear anything," said the old woman, hastily, "but if you do, let me give you one word of advice."

"What is it?"

"Lie still and be quiet. On no account attempt to move—the spirits will not harm you."

"What spirits?"

"Those who in the night time roam about this mansion."

"What are they like?—have you seen them?"

"Oh yes, many a time, and so have plenty more—that's the reason the house has remained to let for such a many years; I think I told you so. In Queen Anne's time a dreadful double murder was committed upstairs."

"By whom?"

"By a nobleman who was at that time the owner of this house. He returned one night unexpectedly, and in secret one of the servants let him in, and the nobleman with cautious, silent steps ascended the grand staircase."

"What did he do?"

"That no one saw, but it was easy to guess. Suddenly a loud and awful scream rang through the whole of the mansion. It was followed by the clashing of swords, then another scream, and all was still."

"What did he do then?"

"All the servants were aroused, and as soon as they could recover their courage sufficiently to do so, they armed themselves and went in a body to the chamber from which the awful sounds had come. When they entered it a terrible spectacle presented itself. On the floor lay the bodies of two persons weltering in blood. One was the nobleman's wife, the other was a stranger. No one of the domestics had seen him before, and how he had gained admittance to the mansion unperceived was a mystery."

"And were both dead?" asked Wild.

"Yes, both. The nobleman fled, and died soon afterwards in a foreign land. I could show you the chamber where this dreadful deed was done, and on the floor the traces still remain."

"And are these the spirits that haunt the place?"

"Yes, one is the wife, the other the stranger. They wander through the deserted corridors, and in and out of the empty rooms all the night long, and that's why it is that this old house has remained untenanted for many a year. It will soon be nothing but a ruin, merely from the want of habitation. If people lived here the old place would look quite different."

"So it would," said Wild. "And these spirits, then, are quite harmless?"

"I don't know for that," was the reply, "but I have never met with any harm from them."

"Then we will say they are so," returned Wild. "It is a very good tale to tell by the fireside and frighten people with, but I don't think much of it myself."

"You don't!" screamed the hag. "What do you mean by that?"

"Neither more nor less than I say."

"And why not, pray—why not?"

"How violent you are to be sure, I don't think much of it, simply because I have heard similar stories very often; there's nothing new about it, and that's the reason it has failed to make an impression."

"Indeed!" said the hag. "Well, I can't help it being old; but it's true, every word of it, and I could show you the stains on the floor."

"I won't trouble you so far," said Wild; "but you shall show me to the chamber you spoke of. I am tired, and my wounds make me feel very drowsy. Lead the way!"

The hag sprang to her feet gladly.

"Follow me," she said—"follow me!"

Wild and Noakes both rose and obeyed.

"As they passed out of the apartment, the hag said:

"Hush, do not make a noise—you will disturb the other traveller!"

"He's close by, then?"

"He is; I have given up my bed for him."

"All right, it's nothing to me. Which is our chamber?"

"I will show you in a moment. Come, follow me!"

The hag ascended a broad flight of stone steps, at the top of which was a door.

It she pushed open and more steps were disclosed.

These she ascended, and by the time they reached the top, not only were Wild's legs tired, but his patience also.

"Why have you brought me up here?" he asked.

"Because there are no beds down below, except the one I use myself, and that the traveller occupies. Here is a comfortable chamber enough, though it has not been used for many a day."

She opened a door as she spoke, and Wild and Noakes found themselves in a spacious old-fashioned room furnished with antique oak furniture.

But upon everything there was a thick coating of dust, and they could readily credit the old woman's assertion that it had not been used for a very long time.

"You will be able to rest yourselves there—don't feel afraid of that; the couch doesn't look very inviting, but when you come into a place as you have done here, you must be content to take things as they are."

"I am," said Wild—"I am. This will do for us very well."

"I am glad of it," said the old woman, "and will leave you; but before I go, I should like to give you one word of advice."

"Very good—speak; let us hear what it is."

"Well, then, no matter what noises you may hear, and you're sure to hear some, take no notice, but keep profoundly still—you will then remain uninjured."

"And suppose we don't follow your advice?"

"Why, then, I wouldn't answer for the consequences."

With these words on her lips, the hag took her departure.

She closed the door carefully.

There was a moment's silence, and then Noakes said:

"Mr. Wild—"

Jonathan struck him a heavy blow upon the mouth.

"Fool!" he cried. "Take that! I have cautioned you until I am tired. Now, perhaps, you will remember for the future!"

"What do you mean?"

"You must be mad to perpetually call me by my name. It is absolute insanity! Be silent!"

"For what? We are alone now."

"How do you know that? That hag is probably listening outside!"

"I didn't think of that."

"That's no excuse! You ought to have done so! If you don't care for your own safety, remember I do for mine!"

"I will be careful—indeed I will be careful!"

"Very well, then! See, above all things, that you do not mention my name."

"I will be careful," said Noakes, again.

"Silence!" said Jonathan, in a whisper. "We shall hear whether the woman is listening at the door or not."

A long pause now ensued, during which both listened eagerly.

But although they stretched their ears to the utmost, they failed to catch the slightest sound.

"I believe it's all right," said Jonathan, at last breaking the silence—"I believe it's all right!"

"What did you think of that tale the old woman told you?" asked Noakes.

"Nothing."

"You did think something—I mean what's your opinion of it?"

"What's yours?"

"I don't presume to have one."

"You don't believe in these ghosts, I should think?"

"Do you?"

Jonathan shook a little, as he replied:

"Certainly not; the whole story itself was nothing but a fabrication."

"For what object was it told?"

"That I can partly guess. She had a motive, you may be sure."

"And yet," said Noakes, "I have heard of such a thing before. What she has said may be true."

"It may, but I very much doubt it. Her conduct, and the old man's, too, is altogether most suspicious. Did you not notice what strict injunctions she was careful to give about remaining quiet in case we should hear any noise?"

"Yes I did, though until this moment I did not attach any importance to it."

"That shows how careless you are, then. There's a meaning in that—a deep meaning; but hush, we have talked enough."

"What do you intend to do, then?"

"Not to lie down on the bed and sleep, you may depend."

"I am very weary," said Noakes.

"So am I," replied Wild, "but for all that I can't think of resting. No, I will solve this mystery; depend upon it, it's possible to obtain a solution. At any rate, I will try."

From his manner it was easy to perceive that Mr. Noakes did not approve of this resolution; but he dared not say as much.

With stealthy steps Jonathan crossed the chamber in the direction of the door.

Reaching it, he raised the latch and strove to push it open.

But the door remained firm—immovable.

Wild uttered a curse.

"This door has been bolted or locked on the outside," he said. "We are prisoners!"

This was an announcement that terrified Noakes greatly, and he immediately became desirous of leaving the chamber.

He hastened to his companion's side, and found that what he had heard was indeed correct.

"How this was done," cried Wild, "puzzles me to think. I listened carefully enough, and yet I neither heard a key turned nor a bolt shot into the socket."

"And yet it must have been done."

"Oh, yes, it must have been done! Wait a moment, though—we will soon be at liberty."

"Why have we been made prisoners?"

"For some object. Depend upon it, we shall find out what."

Jonathan tugged away at the door, for he was anxious to open it without making any more noise than he could possibly help.

But he soon desisted.

The door was as firmly fastened as if it had been nailed up.

"We must try another plan," he cried; "but I'll get out, I am determined!"

Jonathan took an ugly-looking knife out of his pocket and commenced an attack upon the door with it.

He inserted it in the crevice between the door and the doorpost, and used it as a lever.

By this means he was able to tell just whereabouts the fastenings were situated, and having made this discovery he set to work to force the chamber open; but so far from succeeding in the attempt, he only broke the strong blade of his knife.

"Curses!" he cried, as he threw it down upon the ground. "However, I'll not be balked by a door!"

Jonathan had lost his temper and his prudence too, for suddenly he threw himself with full force against the door.

The shock was more than could be withstood.

The door did not fly open, but it was evident a very little pressure would cause it to do so.

Before he applied that pressure, Wild paused and listened.

No sound came to his ear, however; and encouraged by the silence, he pushed the door open.

Then he slowly and carefully descended the staircase, Mr. Noakes following closely at his heels.

They reached the bottom, and again they paused to listen.

But all was silent still, and Jonathan, opening the door, continued his descent.

"I can't make out exactly whereabouts in the house we are," he cried. "This seems more like a secret staircase than anything else. I believe that is what it is. We must manage to get into another part of the mansion."

"For what purpose?"

"Fool! Have I not told you that I intend to clear up the mystery which hangs over this abode; and how can I carry out my intention if I don't search thoroughly all over the place?"

Thus rebuked, Mr. Noakes was silent.

Wild looked carefully on each side of him for a door, hoping that if he found one it would lead him in the direction he wished to take.

But the walls on both sides were perfectly smooth, and this circumstance, added to the narrowness of the staircase, served to confirm Wild in his supposition.

"Tread as quietly as you can," he exclaimed, "lest those old people should hear you. We must be very near that part of the house where they have taken up their quarters!"

This was undoubtedly true; and while they were careful not to make any more noise than they could help, they also listened for any sound which might reach them from below.

At last the bottom of this staircase was reached.

Somewhere not far off was the apartment into which the traveller had been shown, and a little further on still was the vaulted chamber where the fire was burning.

Looking around, Jonathan saw the steps leading down to the passage which communicated with the door through which they had gained admittance to the building.

On the opposite side to this was another door deeply set in its case.

Wild felt quite delighted when he saw it, for he made no doubt that it would lead him into that part of the mansion he wished to reach.

He placed his hand upon his companion's shoulder, and with the other hand pointed out the situation of the door to him.

Just then, however, a faint, gurgling, gasping cry reached their ears, and for a moment or two both stood as motionless as statues.

CHAPTER DLXXIV.

CONTINUES TO RELATE THE HORRIBLE ADVENTURES THAT OCCURRED IN THE HOUSE TO LET.

JONATHAN WILD was the first to recover his composure. His grasp upon his companion's shoulder tightened until it became painful.

Then, in a faint, hissing whisper he said:

"What was that?"

Mr. Noakes did not reply.

He could not, for his tongue clung to the roof of his mouth.

He trembled in every limb, and his face was ashy pale.

"What was that?" said Wild again, for the sound had come upon him so suddenly and so unexpectedly that it had deprived him of his usual coolness.

As he asked the question for the second time, however, all his fierce courage came to his aid.

"Hush!" he said—"hush!—I see it all now. I was startled—now I understand it!"

"What is it?"

"Confirmation of my suspicions," said Wild. "Hush—be still!"

Again they listened—but that strange, awful sound which unnerved even Jonathan Wild reached their ears no more.

But just as Jonathan Wild had resolved to step forward and ascertain if possible what it was that had given utterance to this cry, he heard another sound, but not of so alarming a nature.

This was neither more nor less than the opening of a door!

"Back—back!" he cried. "Quick, up the stairs again! Be silent and speedy, or we shall be discovered!"

He set the example himself of ascending the stairs on tiptoe, and when he had reached what he considered to be a sufficient height he stopped.

Again they listened.

From the position they now occupied, it was not possible for them to see the spot upon which they had so lately stood.

An angle in the staircase hid it from their view.

But they could hear.

Footsteps were audible, then a door was closed, and then, upon the dark, damp wall they saw the faint glimmering reflection of a light.

This was only for an instant.

All then was darkness once more, but not silence.

They heard whisperings and mutterings in the passage below, and they could also detect the sound of hasty, shuffling footsteps.

But in a short time that sound ceased.

Then a door was closed somewhat violently, after which the silence of the grave prevailed.

Nevertheless, Jonathan Wild waited several moments before he ventured to quit his position.

Then, when he imagined that all was safe, and that the coast was perfectly clear, he touched his companion slightly on the arm, for he did not like to trust himself to speak at present.

Noakes understood the meaning of the touch, and followed him down the steps again.

Upon reaching the bottom, the thief-taker again looked about him.

Then, having satisfied himself that no one was moving, he led the way towards the door of the vaulted apartment.

This was closed, and, from this circumstance, he jumped to the conclusion that this was the door he had heard banged shut a little while before.

"Now," he muttered, to himself—"now to find the traveller's room!"

This was no easy task, for the mansion was built in an intricate manner, and time was requisite for anyone to become acquainted with its arrangements.

He saw several doors, but hesitated to enter any of them.

But the attempt had to be made; so, placing his hand upon the latch of one, he raised it.

The door was fast.

He tried another and another with the like result.

Then he went to a fourth.

This one yielded.

Jonathan satisfied himself upon this point by only moving it an inch or two, and he hesitated some time before he ventured to push it open far enough to see into the interior.

Reassured by the stillness, he at length did so.

He beckoned to his companion to keep close to him, and then crossed the threshold.

He found himself in a small, meanly-furnished room.

At one extremity was a window, but it was furnished with shutters, which were closed.

In the upper part of them were two diamond-shaped holes, through which there came a faint ray of light, but not sufficient to illuminate the chamber.

It was a kind of dusky twilight that prevailed in it, which made it very difficult to distinguish objects.

Carefully holding his hands before him, Jonathan walked towards this window.

A few steps took him to it, and then, not without some difficulty and delay, he managed to undo the fastenings of the shutters, and to throw them partially open.

A broad beam of light now shot in.

A faint cry came from the lips of Mr. Noakes.

Jonathan turned like lightning, and was well-nigh betrayed into an exclamation too.

The room contained no other articles of furniture save the bed and a chair.

On the former lay the traveller.

He presented a frightful spectacle, and it was no wonder Mr. Noakes should utter an ejaculation.

The stranger had been cruelly and barbarously murdered, and the bed was smeared all over with blood.

A moment elapsed, and then Jonathan said:

"Just as I expected, my suspicions are confirmed—the mystery is clear enough."

"Is he dead?" asked Noakes.

"Yes, never fear—no one could survive such injuries as those. Look—look, his head is almost severed from his body."

Mr. Noakes did not look, but turned his head aside.

"They have been beforehand with me," said Wild—"I am too late. Those two wretches, beyond a doubt, have plundered him of all the money and valuables he had about him."

This seemed probable enough, but yet Jonathan determined to satisfy himself as to whether his supposition was correct.

The traveller had thrown himself upon the bed with all his clothes on.

No doubt he was entirely overcome with fatigue and weakness, and had dropped off to sleep immediately.

It was not by any means a pleasant task to advance to the bed, and ascertain whether the valuables had been removed from the pockets. Jonathan Wild was not a man to stick at trifles, and so he immediately began his search.

Mr. Noakes averted his eyes.

He could not bear to look upon the horrid scene.

"I was right," said Wild, with a curse—"I was right; they have taken all his money—everything, indeed, of the least value. Now then, I will have a reckoning with them! I will learn all I wish to know, and obtain the money too!"

Jonathan went up to his companion, and said:

"Come, Noakes, don't be chicken-hearted! Now is the time for courage! Put on a bold front, appear to be valorous and desperate—you will find it will answer the purpose just as well as the real thing."

"But tell me what you are going to do?" said Noakes; "let me have an idea of how you intend to act."

"No, that never answers; besides, at the present moment I can't tell. I shall be guided entirely by circumstances!"

"How shall I know what to do, then?"

"Obey every command I give with promptitude—imitate me in all things—follow me up closely to render what assistance you are able. Come!"

As he spoke, Jonathan led the way out of the chamber. Noakes was only too glad to follow.

Once more they crept along the passage to the door leading into the vaulted apartment, and there they paused again.

The sound of angry voices in dispute came plainly upon their ears, though they were not able to distinguish the voices that were made use of.

Every now and then the hag's voice would rise up to a shrill scream, and before long Jonathan came to the conclusion that the old man was refusing to do something the woman required, and that she was infuriated in consequence.

"Now, Noakes," whispered Wild, "ten to one if this door is fastened. I shall open it and dash in. As soon as I have done so, close the door, and, if possible, secure it."

Noakes promised obedience, and then, without another word, Wild raised the latch swiftly and flung the door open.

A cry of terror reached their ears.

But he sprang forward and heeded it not.

The old man and the hag had evidently been crouching down over the fire at the further extremity of the apartment, and now they were standing up near it, looking scared and terrified.

"Silence!" shouted Wild—"silence! Keep still—move at your peril! Do not attempt resistance, or it will be worse for you!"

"I told you so!" screamed the hag—"I told you so! You would not pay attention to my words, and now see the result!"

These words were addressed to the old man.

"Silence!" cried Wild again, holding his drawn sword before him in an attitude of defence,—"silence, I say—submit! Resist at your peril!"

"We are found out now!" screamed the hag. "William, make an effort to escape the gallows—we are fairly matched!"

So saying, the hag in a frantic manner seized a long knife that lay upon the table, and rushed upon Wild with it.

The sight of his drawn sword, however, made her hesitate and change her intention.

She saw that Noakes was not armed, and so she rushed towards him.

Jonathan did not intend that his comrade should be sacrificed, and so he cried:

"Hold, woman—hold! If you refuse, your death be on your own head!"

The hag paid not the least attention.

Before Noakes was prepared for an attack, she had seized him by the breast of his coat and held him secure.

The knife was already uplifted, and was in the act of descending.

Another quarter of a second, and Mr. Noakes would have received at least, if not a mortal, a dangerous wound, but Jonathan sprang forward just in time to save him.

No. 123.—BLUESKIN.

He thrust his sword between the body of Mr. Noakes and the hag's descending arm.

She could not stop herself, but instead of accomplishing her murderous purpose, her arm struck violently upon the sharp edge of Wild's sword.

With a cry of pain she dropped the knife, and released her hold upon Noakes.

That individual was suddenly endued with great ferocity.

All his nature changed, and he felt a sudden and insatiable craving for vengeance upon the woman who had so nearly caused his death.

Almost before he had time to reflect, or before anyone knew what he was about, he picked up the knife she had dropped, and with an angry cry, drove the long, keen blade into her breast.

An awful scream thrilled from the hag's lips, and she fell back on the stone floor with a crash.

As soon as ever the deed was committed, Mr. Noakes was astonished at what he had done.

But the old man, rendered desperate by the fate which had overtaken his companion, suddenly snatched a pistol which hung over the mantelpiece, and hastily aiming, fired at the two intruders.

The bullet struck harmlessly against the wall.

As soon as he saw his shot had failed, the old man screamed aloud, and, taking hold of his companion-weapon, was about to fire that also, when Jonathan prevented him just in time.

Before the echoes of the shot had died away, Wild had drawn one of his pistols, and he discharged it just as the old man's finger was pressing upon the trigger.

With a groan he sank down to the ground writhing like some wounded serpent.

"Are you hurt, Noakes?" asked Wild.

"No, I think not."

"Nor am I. It seems we have the place to ourselves now, at all events."

"Yes," said Noakes with a shudder. "What awful slaughter!"

"Bah! With the murder of the traveller we have nothing to do; we have only acted in self-defence, and, by slaying these two wretches, preserved our own lives."

There was some truth in this, and Noakes felt it.

"I rather think the house will be haunted now!" continued Jonathan. "Here are three more dead bodies, or, at all events, will soon be!"

"Let us go," implored Noakes—"let us go! Every moment of our stay here is fraught with danger!"

"Presently," said Wild—"presently! But not until my purpose is achieved. First of all, I must have the traveller's gold."

He strode across the room, towards the spot where the old man lay groaning and writhing, as he spoke.

Jonathan touched him roughly with his foot, as he said:

"Now you have your desserts! Where is the gold you took from the pockets of the murdered traveller? Quick—hand it to me!"

The old man made no reply, but turned his head away.

"Come," said Jonathan, "I shall stand no foolery! Quick—tell me where it is!"

Still no reply.

Jonathan then stooped down, and with great violence tore open the old man's pockets, and presently drew forth a large bag containing money.

When he found this treasure going from him, the old man seemed to forget the pain his wound caused him.

He sprang up to a half-sitting posture, and commenced a desperate struggle.

In the hands of Wild he was but a child.

Suddenly he found himself dashed to the earth with a force that shook nearly all the breath out of his body.

Jonathan placed the money in his pocket and drew his sword.

He presented the point of the weapon to the old man's breast, and just allowed it to penetrate the skin.

"Now," he cried, "answer my questions, and answer them truthfully; if you refuse, I will run you through this instant!"

"Mercy—mercy!" cried the old man, as he felt the point of the sword piercing his skin—"mercy—mercy! Remove your sword!"

"Not without you answer my questions. If you refuse or hesitate, I shall bear all my weight upon it, and the sword will then pass through your heart!"

"What is it you want to know, then?"

"Tell me the meaning of all the mysteries in this place—nothing less will satisfy me."

The old man shuddered.

"Don't hesitate. I will know it—I am determined to know it. Speak out freely and clearly!"

"I can't tell you!" said the old man.

"You lie! Why does this house remain unlet? Why did that old hag, who I suppose is your wife, speak as she did as soon as she saw us at the gate? It is evident you do not wish this house to be let. Tell me why!"

"Because—because—"

"Because what?"

"Because it is a refuge for me and for my wife. If anyone came here they would turn us out, and then we should either have to starve on the roadside, or enter the workhouse."

"That is a reason," said Wild, "and a good one, yet it will not satisfy me—that does not explain all."

The old man looked in terror into Jonathan's face.

"Why have you slain the traveller?" he asked—"answer me that! Is it only a chance, solitary crime, or is it one of many assassinations?"

"One—only one," said the old man—"only one. It was my wife's fault—she tempted me; she told me how much money he had got, and how easily we should obtain possession of it!"

"We will quit that part of the question for the present, and return to what I originally asked you. The owners of this house would soon learn that you drove people away who come to inquire after it, and you would lose your place. I am convinced there's a deep mystery in all this, and what that mystery is I am determined to find out. If you refuse to disclose it, you die!"

CHAPTER DLXXV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES COMMENCE THE EXPLORATION OF THE HOUSE TO LET.

THE old man closed his eyes and uttered a groan.

"Come," said Wild, "no nonsense—that will not do. Tell me at once all I want to know!"

"There's a secret!" gasped the old man.

"Yes—yes!"

"But I have taken an oath——"

"Bah!"

"I have taken an awful oath never to reveal what that secret is!"

Jonathan raised his sword.

"I see you are determined to perish! Well, you're a fool! Take your desserts!"

The old man opened his eyes and saw the sword descending.

He knew that, unless Wild stayed his arm, his death would be immediate, and so he cried aloud:

"Hold—hold!"

Again Jonathan pressed the point against his breast.

"Now tell me!" he cried. "You see I'm not a man to be trifled with!"

"Alas! I fear I am dying now; I can feel my strength going, and my eyes are becoming dim! Let me die in peace!"

"No," said Wild, "I am determined to learn all! Confess, or you die this moment!"

One would have thought that this threat would not have produced any great effect upon the old man, seeing that he was already wounded so seriously that his death was almost certain to result from it.

Still, there was a doubt on the point, and so, with that strong instinct that makes all desire to cling to life, he was terrified at the idea of being slain immediately.

Yet the oath that had been imposed upon him must have been one of no ordinary character, or he would not have hesitated so long about breaking it.

When he looked up into Jonathan's countenance he saw an angry glance in his eyes, which convinced him that he was terribly in earnest.

"I will tell you," he said—"I will tell you!"

"Do so. I shall watch your countenance closely, and I shall be able to detect a lie; or, if I cannot immediately, yet when I discover you have played me false, I will slay you at that moment!"

The old man was becoming more and more terrified by Jonathan's threats and manner, and so, clasping his hands together abjectedly, said:

"Listen—listen! I will tell all—I will break the oath that I have taken!"

"What's the oath?"

"An awful one!"

"What are the terms of it?"

"No—no!" cried the old man, with a shudder, "I can't tell you that—I can't repeat the fearful words!"

"Well, no matter—I care not for that; it is this mystery I want to solve!"

"Listen, then: This large house which you see in this strange, neglected state belongs, to a strange being who is my master."

"Go on."

"The board is fixed to the outer gates only as a means of leading people astray, or blinding the eyes of suspicion."

"I guessed that."

"Did you indeed?"

"I did."

"We were placed here—that is, my wife and myself—to take care of the house and to answer any people who might apply for particulars. It is rarely we are troubled with visitors, still we are here."

"And when they do come I suppose you answer them in much the same way as I was answered when I rang the bell?"

"Yes—yes! But the old woman is hasty—much too hasty, and her behaviour is calculated to excite suspicion. She ought to be careful!"

"Never mind that," said Wild; "it's no good for you to find fault with her now—she's past all that!"

"Is she dead?" groaned the old man, raising his head.

"Never mind," said Wild. "Attend to your own life before you look after her. Go on! You have only commenced your history."

"We have been strictly bidden never to allow anyone to remain in the house, and even to prevent inquirers from going through the various rooms if possible. To-day my wife was tempted to break the injunctions which have been laid upon us. She admitted you and your friend, and this is the result. You have caused all these misfortunes. We're justly but fearfully punished for our disobedience."

"Never mind grieving over that," said Jonathan, abruptly. "That doesn't concern or interest me in the least. Proceed! Why do you not come to the point? Beware, I will not be played with!"

"I will tell you all straightforwardly and clearly. This house has many occupants—that is, when all are here."

"Who?"

"My master and his men."

"Indeed! Go on. Who are your master and his men? Why are they here?"

The old man tried to reply, but there seemed to be something in his throat that was choking him.

"Speak!" said Wild, fiercely—"answer me!"

The old man made an evident effort.

He still seemed to be choking, and Jonathan, roughly seizing him by the arm, raised him to a sitting posture.

No sooner was this done than there came from his lips a gush of blood, and as soon as the crimson stream had ceased to flow, the old man's head fell back, his eyes closed, his jaw fell, and when Jonathan released his hand, he sank back upon the stone flooring with a dull and sickening crash.

"Curses!" cried Jonathan—"he's dead—dead! Just when he was about to reveal the secret! Curses on his obstinacy!"

Jonathan Wild, in his rage, raised his sword, and it seemed as if he was about to plunge it into the lifeless body of the old man.

But recollecting that it would do no good to wreak his vengeance on the dead, he sheathed his sword, and turned round to his companion.

The fierce courage—or rather fit of ferocity—which had come over Mr. Noakes had now entirely disappeared.

He was once again the trembling, timid, cowardly villain he always was.

His limbs were shaking, and he bent down his eyes beneath his companion's steadfast gaze.

"Are you going now, Mr. Wild?" he said.

"No, fool! I have not yet accomplished my purpose! I tell you I will penetrate this mystery!"

"You will live to repent this," said Noakes, with a sigh. "You are rushing on blindfolded and headlong into ruin."

"Silence! I don't want to listen to your croakings! Keep your fears to yourself—you will not make me a sharer of them! But for that fool, I am convinced all was well. Now I must guess at part, and explore the mansion for the remainder. Is the old woman dead?"

"I know not," said Noakes, averting his eyes from the body. "I think so."

In the hope that life might still linger in the body of the old hag, Jonathan Wild strode across the floor to the spot where she was lying.

He uttered a curse when his eyes first rested upon her, for it was pretty evident that she was already dead.

And yet she might be only in a deep swoon resembling death, from which she might be recovered, and then she might be induced to give the particulars Jonathan so much desired to learn.

Wild took a somewhat original but decidedly effective means of ascertaining whether this was the case or not.

He drew his sword again, and inflicted a slight wound upon her breast.

Had she been alive, that would certainly have restored her to consciousness.

But she made not the slightest movement.

Only a single drop of blood issued from the wound.

"She's dead too," cried Wild. "Noakes, you did your work well! How was it you plucked up such a spirit?"

"Say no more about that, Mr. Wild—say no more about it! I would gladly forget the deed."

"I must have a light!" said Wild. "Look about you and see if you can find a lamp or candle, or something that will serve our purpose."

"Do you indeed intend to explore the house?"

"I do, from the roof to the foundation! Doubtless we shall make discoveries that will repay us for our pains."

Mr. Noakes shook his head.

"What was it the old man told you?" he asked.

"Did you not hear?"

"Not distinctly."

"It amounted to very little. He confirmed my suspicions by saying that the board fixed to the gate was only a pretence, and that if anyone had wished to take the mansion some obstacle would have been thrown in the way of doing so. Such a course as that would not be adopted without some strong and urgent reason."

Mr. Noakes, in spite of his alarm and desire to leave, could not help feeling interested.

"The old man spoke of being employed by some one whom he called his master, and this master has many comrades. Sometimes they are here."

"Here, in this mansion?"

"Yes, so I have understood him."

"Then let us leave it—let us go while we are safe."

"Be silent!"

"I will not! Why should you run this risk? What does it concern us? This mansion is nothing to either of us. Let us quit it!"

"It is something to me," said Wild. "Let that be sufficient. I would have you know that my will is law! Have you found a candle? but here is a lamp that will do as well. Light it."

Mr. Noakes obeyed.

"Does it strike you what this master may be?" asked Wild, "and who his comrades are?"

Mr. Noakes looked in his companion's face with amazement as he said.

"No—have you any suspicions?"

"I could hazard a guess," said Jonathan, "but, however, I'll wait; some further evidence is necessary, and doubtless it will be forthcoming."

"And—and—"

"And what, villain?"

"Do you think, Mr. Wild, that the discoveries will in any way benefit us?"

"I do—I am firmly of opinion that they will benefit us in no ordinary degree; still, they may not—that's a thing we can only learn in time. Go on."

"Would it not be better for you to lead the way?" said Noakes; "I don't know in which direction you wish to go."

"You're afraid!" said Wild—"that's it. Here, give me the lamp and follow in my footsteps, coward that you are!"

Mr. Noakes took no notice of this speech, but handed the lamp to Wild as he had been bidden.

Jonathan took it in his left hand.

In his right he held the sword, projecting it before him in a defensive attitude.

In this way he flung open the door and quitted the kitchen.

"I have one way of searching a house," he said—"one way which I always adopted when I searched houses, and that's to begin at the top; so we must make our way to the top of this."

Mr. Noakes was silent, for it was really indifferent to him what particular mode was adopted.

Jonathan looked about him in search of some door or passage communicating with the upper and habitable portion of the mansion—that is to say, that part where its occupants would be supposing it was tenanted.

At length, at the end of a short passage, he espied four stone steps leading up to a door.

Upon coming nearer, he saw that it was a strong one, and well fastened.

Still he did not despair of opening it.

He handed the lamp to Mr. Noakes and commenced his operations.

Although he was ill-provided with tools, yet in a comparatively short space of time he managed by his dexterity to get the door open.

A rush of cold air streamed upon them immediately, and in the distance they could see a faint, dim, glimmering light, as though evening was closing in.

Once more taking the light, Jonathan strode forward, looking curiously about him.

The silence of the grave was all around.

It was an impressive silence, and had its effect upon the callous thief-taker.

As for Mr. Noakes, he was much more susceptible to its influence, and he drew his breath in short, painful gasps.

After going a few steps, Jonathan, as he fully expected, found himself in the entrance-hall of the mansion.

There were doors on his left hand and on his right.

But all were closed.

Before him was the front door, occupying the whole width of the hall.

Above this there was a fanlight.

It was small, and so obscured by the dust and rain of many years that the light had much difficulty in forcing its way through it.

Still, it filled the huge hall with a dim, mellow radiance, to which their eyes quickly became accustomed.

Jonathan saw all this at one comprehensive glance; and though there were many strange objects round well calculated to call forth close examination, he refused to take any notice of them.

"Come, Noakes," he cried; "never mind what you see here—we shall look at all these things another time. Our present purpose is to search the top of the house. Come!"

Half a dozen steps took them to the foot of the ample stone staircase.

He ascended it two steps at a time, and presently he discovered that far up above in the roof there was a skylight or circular dome, so that, although the glass of which it was composed was thickly encrusted with dirt, yet he was able to see about him on all sides without the aid of the light which the lamp afforded him.

CHAPTER DLXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES CONTINUE THEIR EXPLORATIONS IN THE HOUSE TO LET.

JONATHAN WILD steadily ascended the steps, still adhering to his determination of gaining the top before he commenced his investigations.

At length both arrived upon the topmost landing, and then they paused a moment to recover their breath, for the ascent had been long and toilsome.

Looking round him, Wild saw several doors, apparently leading into sleeping chambers.

The landing had nothing peculiar in its appearance, and from what he saw he concluded that a long time had elapsed since it had been visited.

In this respect, however, he might easily be deceived, and so he went to the nearest door on his left hand.

He raised the latch, and found the door yielded easily.

He entered boldly, for the room was light.

Glancing about him, he soon perceived that this chamber contained nothing to reward him for his search.

It was absolutely destitute of even the smallest article of furniture.

The walls had a damp, dirty look, and upon looking out of the window he saw that the sun was rapidly declining towards the west, and that before long it would be night.

A very extensive prospect could be obtained from this window, and therefore Jonathan stood at it for several moments, looking carefully in every direction.

He turned away at length with a satisfied expression upon his countenance, for he had failed to see the least signs of any of his foes.

Believing himself quite secure, he passed out of that room and entered the next, and the next, and the next, and, in fact, all upon the top floor.

Every room was just in the same state as the one he had first visited, and therefore it would be tedious to describe each one over and over again.

"There's nothing here, Noakes," he growled, "we may rest satisfied of that, and, what's more, I've had a good look all round for many a mile from every one of the windows, and I can't see the least signs of a police officer!"

"That's welcome news," said Noakes, whose courage began to revive at the intelligence. "I feared——"

"Yes, you're always fearing something—you die a thousand deaths every day! You should not be so easily terrified!"

"But, Mr. Wild——"

"What?"

"Think what a dreadful life this is to lead, flying from spot to spot, and hunted about just like wild beasts, never obtaining any rest!"

"Well, we're not hunted now, are we? We're taking our rest."

"But in what a fashion!"

"Don't you grumble—take things as they are, and be content. You can't alter the course of events, so don't make the attempt!"

"But—but——"

"What?"

"I know it's useless to urge the point, and yet how pleased I should be if I could only get you to see things in the same light as I do."

"What things?"

"Danger and disgrace."

"Bah!"

"You affect to despise them. You're like a man rushing blindfold and headlong to ruin."

"Hold your row!"

"Why not let me speak? It can do no harm!"

"Very true, and less good! Go on—speak away, if it pleases you!"

"Well, then, Mr. Wild, think of this—you have satisfied yourself, by looking from the windows, that none of our foes are within sight. Let us, then, take this favourable opportunity of stealing away and getting to the sea coast; then let us embark on some vessel and make our way to a foreign land."

"Yes, that sounds all very well; but when we get there what shall we do—eh, Noakes? Just answer me that!"

"I should not care what we did so long as the fear of pursuit no longer oppressed me. I would beg or starve—anything would be better than such a life as this!"

"And steal—eh, Noakes? Should you steal?"

"No—never! I would take care to keep clear of everything that would bring me within the clutches of the laws of another land."

"Bah! Noakes, you talk like a fool—that's why I have no patience to listen to you! I thought I would give you a chance during the rest, and listen to your arguments. They are absurd and ridiculous!"

"How so?"

"When I get to a foreign land, don't you think I should want to live?"

"Of course."

"Well, then, and how could I live? Do you happen to know of any buried treasure, or anything of that sort? Can you tell me where I am to find a fortune ready made? If you can, I'll quit England with you with the greatest pleasure!"

Mr. Noakes groaned.

"You can't do it, I suppose? Well, then, we must stay here. I would sooner play the highwayman or robber in England than in any other country under the sun! And do you think that I should be content to toil and toil from morn till night?"

"I would," said Noakes. "Slavery would be better than this!"

"I don't think so. Now, Noakes, I'll tell you what—I've listened to you, and therefore I shall expect you to listen to me."

"I always do, Mr. Wild."

"But on this occasion I not only want you to listen, but to pay the greatest attention to every word I say."

"I will—I will!"

"You promise that?"

"I do."

"Well, then, although that old man did not make such a full disclosure as I could have wished, yet I have managed to gather something from his half-confession; it may be right or not. However, we shall quickly see."

"What do you mean, Mr. Wild? I can't comprehend you."

"I don't suppose you can at present, but you shortly will. Listen!"

"I am listening."

"Well, then, in considering over what the old man said just before he died, I have come to the conclusion that somewhere or other in this mansion there is concealed considerable wealth."

"Wealth?"

"Yes—treasure, gold, silver, diamonds, jewellery—valuables of all kinds."

"What reason have you for thinking such an extraordinary thing as that?"

"Good reason, you may depend—the best of reasons."

"What are they?"

"Never mind; I will not tell them to you now—they will take too long; moreover, I might not be able fully to explain myself. Here we are, now, upon the next landing. I intend to search every room on this floor as rigidly as I did the one above, until I find the wealth I am in search of."

Mr. Noakes shook his head, as though to imply a doubt as to the likelihood of Jonathan Wild doing anything of the kind.

Jonathan had not seen this movement, and therefore took no notice of it.

Some fresh idea had evidently taken full possession of his mind, and from the manner in which he spoke it was tolerably certain that he was quite in earnest, and not in any way attempting to impose upon the credulity of his companion.

Either he was searching for wealth which he believed to be concealed, or else he was searching for something of equal importance.

He entered the rooms on the next floor.

They were larger and loftier than those above; but they were all empty.

When they again stood upon the landing, just before they commenced descending the next flight of stairs, Noakes looked inquiringly into his comrade's countenance.

"You may think I am disappointed," said Wild; "but if you do you are deceived—I am not. It is true I could not tell whether some discovery would be made up here or not, still it was unlikely. Now I have satisfied myself, and removed any doubts which I might feel. The reward has yet to come."

"And you still persist in the extraordinary thought that there is, somewhere in this mansion, a large treasure concealed?"

"I do. Nothing has yet occurred to shake my belief. Come on—there are yet many places to be searched!"

With the next floor the result was the same, and with the next, until presently they stood in the entrance-hall, at the foot of the spacious stone staircase.

In the rooms above they had not found a single article of furniture of any description, nor the least token that a foot had been set in them for many years.

Mr. Noakes now looked more doubtfully into the face of Jonathan Wild, and so he said:

"There's nothing yet. Does your opinion remain unchanged?"

"Certainly. I am now quite sure there's nothing in the upper part of this house, and, so far as I can tell, only the ground floor and the cellars beneath remain to be searched."

"And what of that?"

"Why, having the knowledge I now possess, I shall look all the more closely and attentively in those places, because I shall be driven to the conclusion that the treasure of which I am in search is nowhere else."

Mr. Noakes shook his head again, and he evidently thought that Wild's brain must be in an excited, wandering state.

"Perhaps," he murmured to himself, "it is the effects of his wound, the blood he has lost, and the wine he has drunk. He's in a kind of fever!"

Having brought himself to this conclusion, Mr. Noakes resolved to be most careful in his demeanour, and take care not to say or do anything that would be calculated to excite the ire of his companion.

Jonathan strode to the centre of the hall, and there he stood for at least a minute, looking successively at the surrounding objects.

He counted the doors and observed their appearance.

Finally, he resolved to begin with the one nearest his right hand.

He went to it, turned the knob, and tried to push it open; but, unlike the rest that he had tried, it remained immovable.

Grasping the knob tightly, he endeavoured to shake the door in its frame.

But so well was it secured that he found himself unable to do this.

"It is fast," he said—"fast as a rock! Now, then, we are upon the threshold of a discovery!"

His heart beat quicker, and although he strove to conceal his feelings, Wild was evidently much excited.

He commenced a rapid and vigorous attack upon the door, so as to force it open.

But it resisted him more resolutely than the other one that he had forced.

At length it showed signs of yielding, and then one more push caused it to fly back on its hinges.

"Come, Noakes," he said, "follow me! Give me the light—I will lead the way!"

Mr. Noakes willingly surrendered the lamp which he had held while Wild was at work, and again trod in the footsteps of his companion.

Looking around, Jonathan found himself in an ordinary kind of apartment, but perfectly dark.

He looked around him in vain for a window.

The shutters must have been fast closed indeed, for not a ray of light could be seen in any direction.

The little lamp he held was insufficient properly to dissipate the darkness that hung around like a huge cloud.

Still, they were able to see about them a little.

Jonathan still held his drawn sword in his right hand, and being armed with this weapon, he stepped forward confidently and fearlessly.

Then, when, as he judged, he had gained the centre of the apartment, he paused.

He lifted his arm above his head, so that the lamp should diffuse its light over as wide an area as possible.

He was then able to see the window, which, as he suspected, was quite closed by massive wooden shutters.

Opposite was a door, and no sooner did he catch sight of this than Jonathan strode towards it.

He pressed against it with the point of his sword.

It yielded to the touch, and slowly creaked open to the extent of a few inches.

Then a rush of cold air blew upon his face, and well-nigh extinguished the lamp.

"Come," he said to his companion—"don't lag behind—keep close to me!"

"I am here!" said Mr. Noakes.

"That's well."

Jonathan raised the lamp once more, and again endeavoured to look about him.

But this apartment was, if possible, plunged in a more profound darkness than the outer one.

The little lamp, now that it was no longer held in the draught, burned up steadily and clearly, and by degrees the various objects in the apartment were brought to view.

The eyes of both were becoming accustomed to the obscurity, and after continuing to gaze for a few moments they were able to see with much greater distinctness than at first.

The atmosphere was cold, however, and Jonathan judged by this that the apartment was by no means of ordinary extent.

CHAPTER DLXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES MAKE SOME STRANGE DISCOVERIES, AND MEET WITH A SURPRISE.

GRADUALLY and gradually one object after another seemed to grow out of the darkness, and before he had stood there long, Jonathan Wild was able to form a tolerably correct notion as to the dimensions of the room.

It must have been at least forty feet in length, by twenty in breadth.

In the centre, reaching almost from end to end, was a long, wide table, at which a very large number of people might have seated themselves.

All round this table chairs were placed, to the number of at least a hundred.

They were all of beautiful make, and ornamented after the fashion of an age long gone by.

They were stuffed, and covered with velvet of various colours—some crimson, some green, some purple.

The table itself was covered with a cloth of exquisite manufacture, and, from its size, must have been worth an immense sum.

The two intruders into this apartment looked about them curiously at the strange objects they beheld, but neither spoke.

At length Jonathan, as he held the lamp upwards, noticed that over the table were suspended four large chandeliers, each one carrying many wax candles.

No sooner did he make this discovery than he sprang into a chair, and from thence got on to the table, being all the time quite heedless as to the amount of mischief he might do.

Then, holding up the lamp, he lighted three or four candles in the first chandelier.

Having done this, he walked along the table till he came to the second one, where he lighted several more.

From there he went to the third, and then to the fourth.

Mr. Noakes looked upon this bold act with mingled astonishment and fear.

Having accomplished his purpose, Jonathan jumped to the floor.

"We shall see better now," he exclaimed. "I knew a discovery of no ordinary importance would reward our exertions."

A moment or so elapsed before the candles fairly burned up.

Then, when the wax of which they were composed began to melt, the apartment became, comparatively speaking, quite brilliantly illuminated—at least, it appeared so to Wild and Noakes, after having had only the feeble light of the lamp.

"This is a strange place, Mr. Wild," said the latter.

"Very," said Jonathan, gazing round him with fresh interest.

At the further end of the table was a kind of raised platform or dais.

This was reached from the floor by three low steps.

On this platform was a large, antique chair, a perfect miracle of complicated carving.

It was gilded here and there, and as the light of the wax candles fell upon it, it looked truly magnificent.

Behind this chair, a large piece of velvet had been hung up upon the wall.

On this could be seen many strange gold devices, which Jonathan was unable to decipher.

Then, down each side of the table, and before every chair, was a flagon, apparently of silver.

The windows were not only closed with shutters, but they were hidden from view by thick velvet curtains drawn closely over them.

It was clear the apartment had no other occupants save the two intruders, and, as he was quite satisfied upon this point, Wild sheathed his sword.

Then, holding his chin with his hand, he reflected deeply.

"What do you make of this place?" asked Noakes.

"How strange—how silent!"

"It is," said Wild.

"And what do you make of it?"

"Nothing at present. I was mistaken in my supposition. I begin to doubt now whether I shall discover the treasure of which I spoke."

"But could you not give a guess as to the meaning of this apartment being thus arranged?"

"It is one of the mysteries connected with this shut-up house," replied Wild. "What it may mean, without more evidence than we at present possess, would be difficult indeed to say."

"But you could guess?"

"I could."

"What do you guess it to be, then?"

"This room?"

"Yes."

"A council chamber."

"But by whom used?" asked Noakes, taking a step forward, and glancing around him in terror.

"That's the question," said Wild. "I am trying to find an answer that will satisfy myself. It is quite certain, however, that it is used by people who meet in secret."

"Conspirators?" suggested Noakes.

"It may be so, or it may not. I am inclined to think so now, but my first idea was different."

"They are no common people," said Noakes. "Do you observe the richness of every article the room contains?"

"I do."

"The table—the chairs—the silver flagons. And, look! Those chandeliers, though dark with age, are nevertheless beautifully made."

"You're right!" said Wild. "They must have been splendid specimens of rare workmanship!"

"And if not conspirators, and conspirators of no ordinary kind, who else could make use of such a chamber as this?"

"That's just what I am trying to ascertain," replied Wild. "There are many strange sights to be seen, if you only look for them in the right place. This, however, is the strangest I have ever seen."

Again, now that the room was more fully illuminated, Jonathan Wild turned slowly round upon his heels, and gazed intently upon every object.

But there was little of importance to be seen more than we have already described.

In various places on the walls mirrors were hanging.

At first they had been invisible, for the glass and the framework were so thickly covered with the crust of many years, that they could scarcely be distinguished from the walls themselves.

The whole of the appointments of the place were rich and elegant in the extreme.

"We shall find out more yet, Noakes," said Wild, "but not just at the present moment, I fancy. So much for this room. Look around you! Can you see any other means of exit from it save the door by which we entered?"

Both looked around the walls, but no other door presented itself to their view, but at length Jonathan said:

"If there is a door, it's a secret one, and well concealed. We will not look for that at present. Follow me!"

"Shall you leave the candles burning?"

"Yes—why not? I have little fear of an interruption. And, you see, the windows are so well covered with drapery that it is impossible for a single thing to be seen from the outside."

"As you like," said Mr. Noakes. "I resign the arrangement of everything into your hands."

"You cannot do better."

Again they entered the outer room, and again Jonathan looked around it.

But nothing more met his gaze than on the first occasion, and so he strode into the hall again.

Then, stimulated by the discoveries he had just made, he went to the next door on his right hand in order to open it.

He quite expected to find it fast, and he was disappointed when he felt it yield to a touch.

He entered, but the room was perfectly bare, and contained nothing worthy of a second glance.

The same might be said of the whole of the rooms on the ground floor which he visited successively.

At length they stood upon the threshold of the door Jonathan had forced first—that is to say, the door which communicated with that portion of the edifice occupied by the old man and his wife.

"It now remains for us to explore the vaults," said Wild. "Many cellars must extend beneath this mansion, and in some of them we shall certainly make an important discovery."

"But think of the danger of entering those vaults."

"Bah! you think of nothing but danger. You close your eyes to everything else; but I am not so chicken-hearted as you are, and don't intend to hold back."

"Jonathan Wild!"

"What?"

"You continually taunt me and sneer at me, and reproach me for cowardice."

"And have I not good reason? It's sickening to hear you!"

"You affect to carry things off with a high hand; but it's all affectation—not reality."

"What do you mean by that? Be careful what you say!"

Jonathan's tone and manner were both menacing, but Mr. Noakes had such an intense dread of entering any vaults beneath the mansion and exploring them, that he was willing to run the risk of angering his companion.

Therefore, he replied with as much boldness as he could assume:

"I mean what I say, Jonathan Wild! You swagger, and boast, and vapour, but there's no reality in it—you do all these things for mere bravado!"

"It's false! Beware! Follow me to the vaults!"

"I will not!"

"Do you refuse?"

"I do!"

"But you dare not—nor dare you remain where you are; but, indeed, I don't intend to allow you the opportunity!"

"Jonathan Wild!"

"Bah! I say to you, beware!"

"You have need of caution. I said not long since you were like a man rushing blindfold to destruction!"

"Cease!"

"I will not! You cannot persuade me that you have already so soon forgotten what that strange being said at the toll-gate!"

Jonathan Wild seemed at first as though he was about to utter a perfect howl of rage, but if such was his intention his voice suddenly failed him.

He trembled and shook to such a degree, that the lamp seemed every moment as though it would fall from his grasp.

The blood retreated from his face, leaving it of a sickly, yellow, corpse-like tint.

Mr. Noakes perceived that he had made an impression, and though he was not a little alarmed at his boldness at having said what he had, he determined to improve upon the occasion to deepen it.

"You may affect to despise those words, Jonathan Wild," he continued, "but in your heart of hearts you feel that they are true; you feel you know that what she has prophesied will assuredly come to pass."

"Silence!" shrieked Wild, at length recovering his voice—"silence! If you say another word upon that topic, I will slay you where you stand!"

But his chattering teeth and trembling limbs deprived this threat of its force, and therefore Mr. Noakes assumed a bold front himself—in fact, as Jonathan showed signs of fear, so did his own courage seem to rise.

"You will not," he cried, stepping back a pace or two—"you dare not!"

"Dare not?"

"No—I say you dare not. You pretend to be very valourous, and very courageous, Jonathan Wild, but it's all a pretence at heart—you are a greater coward than I am!"

"You are a fool, Noakes, or you would not say so!"

"I am no fool, for I know full well that you dare not carry out your threat of slaying me!"

"Why not?"

"Because the courage you possess is of that character, that it only makes any show at all when another person is by. I am certain, Jonathan Wild, in spite of all your boldness and apparent daring, that you would be frightened—frightened to death to be in the mansion alone!"

Wild laughed.

But it was a hideous, shrieking, unmirthful kind of laugh, and it was evidently uttered merely for the sake of concealing his true feelings.

"You can maintain a show of courage when someone is with you," continued Mr. Noakes, "but you can't if you are by yourself; that's the reason why you insist upon making me your companion. I know full well that's the reason, or you would not encumber yourself with me."

"Will you be silent?" roared Wild. "At least I have some power over you! Be silent, or tremble for the consequences!"

"Then give up your insane project of searching the vaults beneath this house."

"I will not!"

"Well, then, let me ask you whether you consider that what that old hag prophesied will come true? Do you believe that, in spite of all your acts, you will at length swing from Tyburn Tree?"

"No," he said, with a ghastly smile; "I am sure that will not be. Let what death will overtake me, that shall not! I have sworn it thousands of times, and I will be as good as my word!"

"That is the reason, then, why you recklessly and foolishly pursue the course you do. Tell me by what means you hope to escape the hangman's rope."

"Why, if I was captured—if I was again placed in Newgate, I would batter my head against the stone walls until life was extinct; or I would tear open an artery in my arm with my teeth; in short, a thousand things rather than my enemies should obtain that triumph over me!"

Mr. Noakes shuddered.

"It is well for you to try to turn the imputation of cowardice upon me, but we shall see—deeds shall prove which is the coward! Refuse me at your peril! Come this way, I say—we will descend to the vaults together!"

"Never!" said Noakes. "I know you dare not slay me—I am quite sure of that; and you may try to drag me down by main force, but if you do I will resist you to the utmost!"

"Come, come, Noakes," cried Jonathan, changing his voice and manner; "this will do no good. Let there once more be the same good understanding between us that has existed up to the present time. Are you willing?"

"Only on certain conditions."

"Speak—name them! What are they?"

"First, that you—"

What Mr. Noakes would have demanded is hard to say, for at that moment he paused in the middle of his sentence.

The reason was that the loud clanging of a bell somewhere close at hand struck upon his ear.

It was a terrific pull; and just as the sound was beginning to die away it was renewed with fresh violence.

"What—what's that?" gasped Wild, leaning against the door-post to support himself.

Mr. Noakes trembled and shook like an aspen-leaf.

His face was bloodless.

His lips moved convulsively, and his eyes glared in the extremity of fear.

At last he managed to gasp out:

"Lost, lost—all is lost! It is as I feared—the officers are upon us!"

Again the silence of that dreary habitation was broken in upon by a third pull upon the bell.

CHAPTER DDXXVII.

EDGORTH BESS SUCCEEDED IN ELUDING WILD JUNIOR, AND ARRIVES IN LONDON.

THE alarm of the kind-hearted waggoner was very great indeed when he found that his inquiries elicited no response.

What could be the meaning of this silence he was at first at a loss to imagine, and so he called out again in a much louder tone of voice than before.

But Edgorth Bess was as deaf to all outward signs as she would be if dead.

The dog whined and scratched, and then the waggoner, feeling convinced in his own mind that something serious was amiss, scratched his head and wondered what he should do.

"I often said," he muttered, "that talkin' was a fine thing, and here's a proof of it. Now, if I'd got some one to talk to, why, of course, I should know what was the best thing to be done. Come, miss, you needn't be afraid—they're gone now! Get up, and see yourself!"

Still there was no reply.

Then, having satisfied himself by a glance up and down the road that no other persons whatever were in sight, the waggoner drew aside the canvas and scrambled into the interior of the vehicle.

With hasty hands he removed the sacks, and then he saw the poor girl he had befriended lying calm, motionless and deathlike underneath the sacks.

It was quite a shock to him when he lifted the first one and caught sight of her pale, rigid face.

"Is she dead, I wonder?" he exclaimed, involuntarily; "or has she only swooned? What a fine thing talkin' is, to be sure! What shall I do?"

The waggoner had not had much experience in recovering females from fainting fits, but yet he had a dim and hazy notion that cold water was the thing required.

Accordingly he took down a jug from a rail by which it was suspended to the top of the waggon and then, alighting, he looked about him for some clear cold water.

First, however, he gave another anxious glance up and down the road.

But, as before, not a single living thing was in sight.

Even the cloud of dust which had remained for some time showing the direction which Wild junior and Nicholson had taken had quite disappeared.

"Now for the water," said the waggoner.

"There was a ditch at each side of the road, but the water was of so foul and stagnant a character that he shook his head, with the remark:

"That won't do, I'm sure! Where, in the world, am I to look for it?"

Just then he happened to perceive a little spring in the bank upon which the hedgerow was planted.

The water oozed forth slowly, and had collected into a kind of mimic basin it had formed for itself in the fine, gravelly soil.

With a cry of delight he filled the jug and hastened back to the waggon.

Upon reaching it he found that his fair passenger had recovered from the faint into which her fright had thrown her.

She was half-sitting up upon the sacks, looking around her with a dreamy, wondering expression.

For some moments she was at a loss to think where she could be.

The whining of the dog, however, as he importuned her to caress him, served in a great measure to bring back the past to her mind.

Just when she recollected that the last thing she had heard was the hateful voice of Wild junior, she saw the waggoner hastening towards her.

"There you are, miss! Well, I'm right glad to see you so much better! I did indeed fear you had gone dead; and not knowing what else better to do, I fetched this water, you see."

"Thanks!—thanks!"

Edgworth Bess reached out her hand and drank some of the water contained in the jug with great relish.

She was wonderfully revived by the draught.

Fresh strength returned to her limbs, and she looked up into the honest countenance of her preserver with a faint and feeble smile.

"I don't know how I shall be able to reward you for your kindness to me!" she said.

"I want no reward, miss. Lor' bless yer, I won't think about that, when I would have done it ten times over rather than you should have fallen into the hands of the couple of ugly-looking rascals who came inquiring for you!"

"Ah! they are gone?"

"Never doubt that, miss! They're far enough away by this time. I watched them along the road until there was only a cloud of dust left to show which way they had gone."

Edgworth Bess clasped her hands in thankfulness.

"I feared they would discover me!" she said.

"No, miss; it's all right, and a very good job it is! Why, now, my waggon may be the very safest place in all the world for you!"

"Why?"

"Don't you know they have looked into it once and satisfied themselves that you are not in it; so they will look everywhere else for you, and never think of looking into the waggon again."

"I hope such will prove to be the case," said Edgworth

Bess. "But you don't know the man. He's very—very cunning."

"Well, I don't care how cunning he is," said the waggoner, with great determination; "but if he finds out you are here, he won't get hold of you very easy, I can tell you that! I should try what virtue there was in my horsewhip!"

Edgworth Bess smiled, and felt thankful—oh, so thankful!—to think she had found one who was determined to protect her.

She felt easy and confident.

"Well, now, miss," said the waggoner, "seeing that you are so much better, I think the best thing we can do is to continue the journey. We're not far from London now, and I suppose that's where you're going to?"

"Yes—yes, to London. That is where I shall find my friends; at least, I hope so."

The waggoner shook his head.

"Ah!" he cried, "it's a pity you have to hope in the matter. You ought to know for a certainty."

"They may be searching for me," she said; "and, perhaps, miles away."

"Well, miss, I tell you, candidly, I hope not; for they're a couple of ugly customers who are after you, and you want a strong arm by your side all the time to protect you."

"I know that. Let me thank you again and again for what you have done in my behalf."

"Pooh—pooh! It's been just nothing at all. You're sure you're better, miss?"

"Oh, yes; much better."

"Well, then, miss, we'll start again; and I hope we sha'n't be troubled with those rascals again."

With these words, the waggoner scrambled into his seat again, and, after a few flourishes and cracks of his long whip, the team set itself in motion.

The horses were well trained, and performed their work almost as if by a kind of instinct; so that, when they had once started, they required but little attention in the way of driving. Therefore, the waggoner held the reins negligently in his hands, and turned round from time to time to speak to Edgworth Bess.

He was exceedingly fond of talking, and now he had an opportunity of gratifying his propensity, for Edgworth Bess listened attentively to all he said.

Every now and then, however, feeling anxious about Wild junior, and his companion Nicholson, she would entreat him to look carefully along the road to ascertain whether they were in sight.

On each occasion, the waggoner would shake his head, and say:

"No, miss; it's all right. They're not on the road, you may depend. They're in London by this time."

"And what part of London are you going to?" she asked.

"Well, I be goin' to St. Katherine's Docks, to get my load. Will that be anywhere in the direction you want to go?"

"Yes—yes. When we're in London—say when we are near Charing Cross—let me alight."

"All right, miss; wherever you like, of course. But I shall be main sorry to part with you, and that's the truth. I wish I could always make sure of such pleasant company on my long journeys."

"They must be very tedious."

"I don't know about that, miss, seeing as I don't understand what teesus means; but they're very uncomfortable and disagreeable, I can tell you that; for I often think to myself, 'What a fine thing talkin' is!' and yet I can hardly ever get any of it."

In such-like conversation as this, the time occupied by the journey to London was whiled away; and, at length, just as the business of the day was beginning, the waggon stopped in a little side street, branching off from the Strand.

"Will this do for you, miss?" asked the waggoner, in his kind, cheerful voice. "If so, why, perhaps it's all the better; because, you see, in this street there's a house where I generally stop just for a bit of a snack; and, maybe, you wouldn't mind taking a snack with me, this morning?"

Edgworth Bess availed herself gladly of this opportunity of obtaining some refreshment, and she warmly signified her willingness.

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES ARE ALARMED BY THE RINGING OF THE BELL.]

"V y good, miss! Well, here we are, you see, close to the public-house. That's it. The Old House at Home is the sign of it, and that's why I like to stop at it."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; and the landlady, she's a right-down civil body, she is, and no mistake! We often talk to each other. She's very fond of a talk, is that landlady, and that's why I like to stop at her house for a snack."

Willingness to converse was indeed about the greatest recommendation to the waggoner that anyone could have.

As soon as he had uttered these explanatory words, he secured the reins to his seat and got down.

Then, going to the back of the waggon, he drew aside the canvas, and assisted Edgworth Bess to alight.

She sprang to the ground easily.

The dog followed.

No. 124.—BLUESKIN.

Then this strange pair took a few paces across the pavement, and entered the old-fashioned-looking public-house, which has long since disappeared.

The waggoner was evidently well known to all the people at the place, for he nodded and spoke to everyone.

Then he sat down at a side table, and took his snack, which consisted of a quart of ale, a quarter loaf, and about two pounds of cheese.

The waggoner introduced Edgworth Bess to the landlady, and requested that she would furnish a comfortable meal.

To this the landlady assented, for the waggoner was quite an old friend, and a regular customer besides.

It was truly astonishing to behold the rapidity with which the bread and cheese and ale disappeared; and having hurriedly washed down the last morsel, he said:

"You must excuse me now, miss, but I must say goodbye to you. I have lost a goodish bit of time this morning one way and another, so I must make haste, or I shall not get to the docks at the proper time."

Again did Edgworth Bess pour out her thanks for his kindness.

He interrupted her by saying:

"It's nothing—it's nothing! And the landlady here of The Old House at Home will treat you with respect—I am sure she will, just the same as if it was myself; so good-bye to you, and may you soon find your friends and be happy!"

With these words the honest, warm-hearted fellow took his departure, and Edgworth Bess felt her heart sink at this parting with one who had shown himself a true friend.

CHAPTER DLXXVIII.

RETURNS TO JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES AT THE HOUSE TO LET, AND RELATES WHAT FOLLOWED THE RINGING OF THE BELL.

WHEN that loud ringing of the bell broke in upon the silence of that deserted mansion, even Jonathan Wild trembled and shook, while, for a moment at least, he shared to the full all the terror that was felt by Mr. Noakes.

It will be recollected that that individual had succeeded in plucking up a certain amount of courage.

He had been, as it were, forced at bay, and compelled to turn round in self-defence against his companion.

He had defied him, and was even about to impose certain conditions upon Jonathan, and, but for the interruption, no doubt they would have been acquiesced in.

The ringing of the bell seemed, however, by some mysterious process, to create a complete metamorphosis.

All his new-born courage vanished completely and instantaneously.

The first fear that had suggested itself to his mind was, that the police-officers had ascertained, by some means or other, that they had taken up their quarters in that habitation, and were about to make an attack upon it.

Therefore, when he spoke the hurried words we have already recorded, he stepped forward a pace and clutched hold of Jonathan Wild by the arm with such nervous force that an angry, growling oath resulted from the pain the grip caused.

"Stand off, fool!" cried Wild, who had by this time entirely recovered his self-possession—"stand off, I say! Beware!"

As he spoke, Jonathan Wild, by an easy exertion of his great strength, broke from the tightening grasp of his companion.

Noakes staggered back.

His limbs shook under him.

He would have fallen to the ground had he not providentially reached the wall, which supported him.

"Officers!" he repeated, between his teeth and quivering lips—"officers!"

"They are not officers, idiot!" returned Wild.

"How do you know that?"

"I do know it."

"How—how?"

"Because they would not come here unless they were either aware of or suspected our presence."

"Well—well?"

"And, in either case, do you think they would come ringing and making such an uproar as that on purpose to place us on our guard? Bah!—I have no patience to explain the matter any further to you!"

Again the bell sounded, and again it seemed to produce the mysterious effect upon Mr. Noakes.

He had gathered some sort of encouragement from Wild's remarks, but the mere sound of the heavy clanging strokes of the clapper of the bell against the sides sufficed to prostrate all his mental faculties.

As before, the ring was succeeded by another as soon as the echoes of the first had died away, and then there came another, after which, as before, there was a long pause.

From this it was pretty clear that three rings in succession formed some kind of a signal to those within—at least, that was the interpretation which Jonathan Wild placed upon it.

As soon as silence prevailed, Mr. Noakes, who could not get rid of his original notion, inquired:

"Mr. Wild, do you really think that they are not officers?"

"Think?—I am sure of it! If they knew we were here, they would seek an entrance to the place by the most secret means they could think of, and steal upon us and seize us unawares, and not give us ample warning of their coming."

There were sound logic and common-sense in this, and Mr. Noakes, in spite of all his fears, could not help being aware of it and feeling convinced.

"But," he asked, half trembling, "if they are not officers, who can they be?"

"That is the question," said Wild, "I am trying to decide."

"But why trouble about the point at all?"

"How do you mean?"

"Why not steal out of the house into the grounds, and, favoured by the darkness, get away altogether?"

"Bah!—I will not listen to you—you are ever harping upon one string. I will not leave, as I have said before, until I have fully investigated all these strange events, and come to a conclusion respecting them."

Mr. Noakes sighed.

"Those who are ringing at that bell," continued Wild, "are connected with the mysteries of this mansion. There can be no doubt about that—none whatever!"

Mr. Noakes made no reply.

"They have given the signal—three rings upon the bell. They desire admittance—but for what?"

It will be seen from the nature of these words that Jonathan Wild spoke them more to himself than to his companion.

It might be said that they were uttered half aloud.

Then the expression of his countenance changed as a sudden thought darted into his mind.

Seizing his companion by the arm, he said:

"Come—come!"

"Where?"

"We will leave the house."

A cry of joy rose to the lips of Mr. Noakes, but it died away there, and a smile of incredulity took its place.

"Come!" said Wild again, and as he spoke he dragged Mr. Noakes forward.

He was only too glad to follow, and, very much to his astonishment, he found that Jonathan Wild took his way in the very direction which they had been brought by the old woman. But just as they passed through the little door into the grounds, the bell began to ring for the third time.

"That's it!" cried Wild, in a half-suppressed voice.

"I guessed it, and now I am convinced!"

"Of what—of what?"

"That I interpret the signal aright. Quick, this way—we may yet be in time!"

Mr. Noakes could not for the life of him make out what Wild meant, and he began to think that the blood he had lost had wrought some strange effect upon his brain.

"Tell me," he cried—"tell me what you mean? don't leave me to guess all; anything is better than suspense!"

"Why, can't you see?" said Wild, still hurrying along through the grounds. "Does it not strike you that a particular signal has been given?"

"The ringing of the bell?"

"Yes—but not that simply, but the peculiar mode of ringing?"

"How so?"

"The bell has been rung three times thrice—that's the signal. Nine pulls upon the bell altogether, three close together, then an interval, and three close together again, another interval, and three close together once more."

"But what of that?"

"Silence! Speak another word at your peril! There is danger now, and everything depends upon your caution. Remember—don't breathe!"

Jonathan stepped briskly along the gravel path, Mr. Noakes following by his side.

It was intensely dark; objects close at hand could not be distinguished, and it was really wonderful to see with what facility Jonathan Wild made his way through that strange place.

He had never been in the neglected garden round the mansion but once before, and yet, in the profound darkness, he took his way through it with as much ease and certainly as he could have done had he been familiar with it for years.

There were those who said that Jonathan Wild possessed the uncommon faculty of seeing in the darkness, and certainly, if anything could have pointed to such a belief, his behaviour on the present occasion would.

Mr. Noakes was so excited and so frightened, that he could not form the remotest idea of what his companion was going to do.

He did not dare to hope that they were about to leave the premises altogether, Jonathan spoke too decidedly for that.

Suddenly he felt Wild press his arm in a significant manner.

At the same time a faint whisper reached his ears.

"Stand here. Move not—speak not!"

Noakes obeyed; in fact, he never once dreamt of disobeying the command.

Then Jonathan Wild, who had paused close to the gate through which he had gained admission to the mansion, coolly proceeded to unfasten it.

The murmuring of voices on the outside could be plainly heard, and, by the tone, he judged that the speakers were growing impatient and angry at having been kept waiting so long.

Therefore Jonathan Wild with all possible speed removed the fastenings of the gate and finally flung it open.

"Why are you so late, you old witch?" said some one, in a deep, sepulchral voice.

It was evident that the speaker imagined the old woman had opened the gate, as doubtless it was her duty to do.

In consequence of the darkness, and, besides, in consequence of Jonathan Wild standing so that his body was more than half concealed by the door, the new-comer did not observe the difference.

He strode in, and Jonathan, by straining his eyes, managed to make out that it was a tall figure wrapped in a horseman's cloak.

Then another followed, who said:

"Why did you neglect the signal?—why are you so late?"

"I am very sorry," said Wild—"very sorry!"

Noakes started.

He was terrified to death by what had taken place, and when Jonathan Wild spoke, the tones of his voice were so entirely changed, and so exactly resembled the voice of the old man, that he could scarcely believe anyone else had spoken.

It was a peculiar voice that the old man had possessed, and Jonathan Wild, having noticed it, was able to imitate to perfection.

The stranger who had spoken stopped as soon as Wild replied, and said:

"Why, is that you, William? How is it that you are here at the gate?"

"The old woman slipped down the steps about an hour ago, and has hurt her leg," replied Wild, in so offhand a way that no one could have believed the answer to be a fictitious one. "She tried to come at first, in spite of her hurt, but she could not, so I came, and that's why we were so long."

The stranger passed on, apparently satisfied with the explanation, and then Jonathan, turning his eyes round, saw something which immediately attracted the whole of his attention.

His eyes had now become to a great extent familiar with the darkness, and he was able to see about him—though very indistinctly—a crowd of figures all dressed alike, standing so closely together that he could not count them as they came in at the gate.

They appeared to be carrying some very heavy object carefully between them.

What that object was, Jonathan tried in vain to make out.

It was something dark and bulky, and of considerable length.

His curiosity was raised to the highest pitch.

The bearers of this burden spoke to each other in low, faint murmurs—so low that Jonathan could not make out a single word.

Yet he fancied they were all much distressed or troubled about something.

Then one, who was the last in the throng, said, in a voice which closely resembled that one who had entered first:

"Close the door!"

Jonathan thought he had better not trust himself to reply, and so silently obeyed this mandate.

The throng of strangers were apparently so deeply engrossed by what they were doing as to be unmindful of everything else.

Not one of them paused or looked back, or troubled himself in any way to ascertain whether the order that had been given was obeyed.

But Jonathan closed the door, and made it quite secure—at least, anyone would have judged that he had done so by the rattling of the chains and the creaking of the bolts.

But in reality he left the door so that he could throw it open and make his escape in a moment, should circumstances render it necessary.

He then darted to the spot where he had left Mr. Noakes standing.

There he found him, still in the same attitude as when he had left him.

"What do you make of that?" he asked, in a faint whisper.

"Make of it?"

"Yes. The mystery deepens, does it not? But we shall find it all out, rest assured! Come this way!"

Mechanically, as it seemed, Mr. Noakes followed Jonathan for several paces.

Then all of a sudden he seemed to become conscious that they were nearing the house, and, so soon as he made this discovery, he stopped abruptly.

"Why do you pause?" asked Wild.

"Why, surely—surely—"

"Surely what?"

"Surely you cannot be so mad—surely you cannot contemplate returning to that house?"

"Bah!—no more of it! I can't trust you to remain by yourself, therefore you must accompany me; and as for myself, I have determined to see all. So come—refuse at your peril!"

"I do refuse!"

Silently and yet swiftly Jonathan drew his sword from its sheath.

He turned the point in an instant against his companion's breast.

"Refuse again," he cried, "or disobey me in the least, and you die! One thrust, and all will be over! Shall I give it, or shall I not?"

"No—no—no—oh, no!"

"Then come with me, idiot, and be no more trouble! Those men who have just entered will neither capture nor harm us. Unless I am greatly mistaken, they are in a very similar position to what we are ourselves."

CHAPTER DLXXX.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES WITNESS A STRANGE SPECTACLE IN THE HOUSE TO LET.

HAD Mr. Noakes been less terrified than he was he would probably have been able to come to some conclusion regarding the strange events he had just witnessed.

But the fact was, his mind was wholly and solely occupied by one thought.

That thought, of course, was to fly—to get as far away from all human habitations and human beings as he possibly could.

Therefore, when Jonathan Wild spoke the words which concluded the last chapter, he looked up into his face with a vacant stare.

He could not comprehend by what means Jonathan had arrived at this conclusion.

It seemed to him at first sight very mysterious, and then immediately afterwards he came to the conclusion that the words had only been spoken in order to blind him to his danger.

Jonathan crept gently towards the house, and Mr. Noakes no longer attempted to resist following him.

"Look you!" said Jonathan, at last. "It may be as well to give you a word or two of explanation."

"I don't wish to hear anything."

"But you shall—I insist upon it!" cried Jonathan Wild, who seemed to take a particular pleasure in doing just the reverse to what his comrade wished, and in contradicting him on every occasion. "I am not such a fool, Noakes, as to thrust myself into unnecessary danger; but still, for all that, I cannot control the curiosity I feel to fathom this matter to the bottom. I am induced to do it because I believe it will turn out to our advantage!"

"But how can it?"

"That I can't explain at present—you must wait and see. How can I tell the exact turn events will take?"

"But is it not madness on your part to dream of entering the house?"

"No, I think not. Why is it so?"

"Because—"

"Because nothing. They don't suspect? Did I not deceive them at the gate?"

"You did—most admirably! You deceived me! I could scarcely believe at first that it was not the old man who had spoken!"

Jonathan grinned for he liked to be flattered for any of his numerous acquisitions.

"I rather think I did manage it pretty well," he said, with a satisfied air, "and that's why I am going to go still further. They are not suspicious."

"But when they enter," said Noakes, "they will find out all."

"No, I think not—I think not!"

"But they must do so!"

"I can't see that, for they will make their way—or I am greatly mistaken in all my calculations—to that room which presented such an extraordinary appearance when we entered it."

"Well, what if they do?"

"Why, can't you see in that case they will avoid that portion of the mansion inhabited by the old people altogether? Rely upon it, they will never suspect what has taken place!"

Mr. Noakes shook his head.

"Not another word!" said Jonathan. "Here we are—we shall soon know now! Listen!"

The door leading into the mansion was now reached.

It had been imperfectly closed, and therefore it was an easy enough matter to push it open a little way and listen.

The faint sound of voices and of receding footsteps struck upon their ears.

"All's well!" said Wild, with a chuckle. "They have not paused to make their way direct to that mysterious apartment."

"And so you will follow?"

"Yes. Cast off your foolish fears; there is no need for terror—believe me there is not!"

Mr. Noakes shook again.

"In this large, dark place we could easily elude pursuit. I shall soon be able to form an idea whether my expectations are likely to be realised; if not, why, we will slip down the stairs at once, mount our horses and ride off."

"Why not now?"

"Do not try my patience too far; be content to listen to my decision! When we do leave this place, we shall be tolerably safe; we have stood long enough to be rested, and long enough to cause our pursuers to give up the chase! Now come, and so soon as you make the least alarm I will run you through the heart with my sword; that's the most silent mode of taking your life that I can think of!"

Noakes shuddered as Wild added, fiercely:

"And I will do it, Noakes—I will do it with as little hesitation or remorse as I should stick my spurs into a horse who refused obedience to the rein!"

These words made a deep impression upon Mr. Noakes.

There was no mistaking their import, and he knew his companion well enough to feel quite certain that he was fully in earnest in what he had just said.

Jonathan Wild now stepped forward upon tiptoe, and made an imperative gesture for Noakes to do the same.

Rapidly and yet silently they made their way along the corridor and up the steps to the door of that strange, mysterious room.

The sound of voices and of footsteps had now ceased.

Suddenly, when they were within a few paces of the door, Jonathan stopped as though he had been changed to stone.

He turned icy cold.

"What is it?" whispered Noakes.

"The lights!" he replied. "Curses on my folly, I forgot that! Do you remember I lighted these candles and never extinguished them?"

"You did. I advised you to do so, but, as usual, you scorned what I said."

"Hush—no matter; there is no alarm at present, or we should hear more. Something unusual has occurred to this strange uncaught band—something which absorbs all their thoughts, and prevents them from taking notice of those circumstances which otherwise would not fail to attract the whole of their attention. Silence!"

Again Jonathan crept forward, and when next he paused it was upon the threshold of that outer room adjoining the mysterious apartment.

Now the murmuring of voices again reached their ears.

After waiting for a moment, Wild said:

"Come, all is well—there is no suspicion yet, they have not noticed anything strange. Quick—a discovery awaits us!"

Either a carpet or some substance resembling it had been spread all over the floor of this outer room, for as they walked across not the least sound followed their footsteps.

The door leading into the inner chamber was standing ajar.

A very feeble light came streaming through it.

Trembling with expectation and curiosity, Jonathan Wild at length paused close to it, and then waited for an instant previous to making the attempt to obtain a glimpse of the interior.

Half-uttered words reached his ears, but from the manner in which they were pronounced he imagined he was in no danger of discovery.

Those within had, at present, no suspicion of the real state of affairs.

Then he ventured to peep round the edge of the door into the inner room.

A sight then met his gaze which for a time completely enchained his attention.

Having been in the darkness for so long, that vast, mysterious chamber seemed to his eyes to be brilliantly lighted up.

But in truth it was only illuminated by the feeble beams of four wax candles—the very four which he had lighted.

The sight which he beheld was, in truth, a strange one, and certainly very different to what he had anticipated.

His conjectures regarding what the strange, heavy object could be that the mysterious strangers were carrying were now completely set at rest.

With their cloaks still muffled closely about them and their felt hats pressed tightly over their heads, the newcomers were standing in an irregular throng round the lower end of the table.

Upon this the heavy object had been.

It had been wrapped in a cloak, and when Jonathan first peeped into the room, one of the strangers was in the very act of throwing this cloak back.

The lifeless body of a man was then disclosed.

He was lying on his back on the large table.

His dress was rich, and the many glittering ornaments upon it sent forth bright scintillations as they caught and reflected the rays of light from the candles overhead.

"A nobleman," said Wild, to himself. "I can tell that by his dress. What does it mean?"

That he was dead was perfectly certain.

The features were white and pinched.

The limbs perfectly rigid.

The eyes glassy, and the lower jaw had fallen.

As the body was uncovered, so did those who stood around uncover their heads as though out of respect for the inanimate clay before them.

Then the one who had thrown back the cloak took hold of the dead man's hand.

"All hope of recovery is at an end," he said, in "deep, thrilling tone; "he is dead—quite dead, and no human being has the power to restore him to life."

Several murmurs followed this announcement, and the cloaked strangers crowded more closely around the body, as though they wished to take a closer glance at it.

"Then the murderers shall perish!" said another voice.

"They shall—they shall!" murmured the remainder.

"We can tell who has performed this deed, and they shall suffer, and so shall those who set them on. For this we will exact a deep and bitter vengeance!"

"Look your last on him. There, that will do. Now we will consult together as to what had best be done. Come this way."

The speaker drew the cloak over the body, and then, with a slow and heavy tread, walked to the other end of the room.

The others followed and crowded closely around him.

A whispered consultation then took place, of which Jonathan Wild was unable to overhear a single syllable.

It was perfectly certain that these men, for some purpose best known to themselves, had chosen the empty house as a place in which to hold secret meetings.

From the manner in which they had walked in and made their way to that particular apartment, it was palpable that they were familiar with the place.

Jonathan would have given much had he been able to recognise the face of the dead man, but he was too far off to see anything distinctly, and, moreover, the strangers had kept close round it.

That the death of this man, whoever he might be, was felt to be a very serious thing by the whole party, there could not be the least doubt, and it was unquestionably owing to the troubled state of their feelings, when they arrived at the mansion that they had not noticed the changed aspect of affairs.

This was sufficiently proved by the fact that they remained unconscious that the lights in the chandeliers were burning when they entered the council chamber, for such it appeared to be.

An oath of disappointment came to Jonathan Wild's lips, and then, giving one parting glance at those who were consulting together in the distance, he turned away.

All this while Mr. Noakes had stood closely by his side, but he had not dared to take one peep.

"Will you look in?" said Wild. "You can look if you wish it; but be quick, for I am going!"

"Going to leave the house?"

"Yes."

"Then I will follow you at once, no matter what is going on within. I don't want to waste time by seeing it."

"Hush—don't speak. Fortunately, those we have seen are at the extremity of that large apartment. Follow me silently!"

Mr. Noakes was only too glad to obey.

In a few moments afterwards the pair again found themselves in the neglected garden.

"Now for our horses!" cried Wild. "The difficulty is to find them. When we have done so we will ride off."

"You will? I can scarcely believe you are in earnest," said Noakes. "How is it you have so suddenly changed your mind?"

"I will explain all presently. Let us find the horses. Curses on my foes! There was a time when such a discovery as I have made to-night would have been worth a fortune to me. Now it is useless—quite useless!"

And as he spoke, Jonathan gnashed his teeth with vexation.

"Oh! would that I was again in my old position! But no matter; even yet, although the probabilities seem so slight, that time may come again. If it does, let them all beware—beware!"

"But the horses!" broke in Mr. Noakes—"but the horses! Where are they? I can't see them!"

He had not paid the least attention to what his companion had said.

CHAPTER DLXXX.

EDGORTH BESS FINDS ANOTHER FRIEND IN THE PERSON OF THE LANDLADY OF THE INN.

"FIND my friends and be happy," murmured Edgworth Bess, repeating the words the waggoner spoke when he bade her farewell. "Alas! I fear there is but little chance of the fulfilment of that wish! What shall I do now?"

Now that the waggoner had gone, she had the room all to herself, but not for long.

Other men came in.

Rude, turbulent, noisy, and they terrified her exceedingly.

The landlady, who was really a kind-hearted woman, noticed the poor girl's distress, and asked her to step into the bar.

Edgworth Bess willingly complied, for she wished to sit down somewhere so that she might have an opportunity of arranging her scattered thoughts and deciding what was the best step for her to take.

That Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, upon discovering her absence, would immediately set out in search of her she felt sure.

In what direction they had gone, how far they were from London, she had no means of ascertaining.

Nor could she in the usual way make any inquiries after either of them, for it was vital to their safety that their identity should be kept a secret.

At first it had been her intention to make her way to the house in Westminster where they had been lodging, but a very little reflection convinced her that this would be a very foolish and injudicious step indeed.

In the first place, Wild junior and his associate had evidently reached London before her.

First of all they would surely make their way to the lodging-house in the belief that she would fly there.

"No, no," she murmured—"I dare not—must not go there, nor even send. That dreadful man is beyond doubt waiting there in anticipation of my arrival. As soon as I presented myself I should be made prisoner, and if so, I should never be allowed another chance of making my escape!"

There was also the suspicion—nay, almost the certainty—that the landlady of this house was an accomplice of Wild junior's.

At any rate, Edgworth Bess felt certain that she could not believe anything this woman might say.

And so the more she pondered the more difficult did her position become.

She tried in vain to hit upon some plan by which she could rejoin her faithful friends.

She greatly felt the need of some kind, sympathising friend, to whom she could confide all her troubles, and upon whose advice she could rely.

Put the more she thought of the complications of her position, the more bewildered did her brain become.

Gradually she felt she was working herself up to a high pitch of intense nervous excitement, that would go far to incapacitate her for doing anything.

The only conclusion that she could arrive at was, that she would request the landlady of the public-house to allow her to stay there during the day.

It was now early in the morning,—that is to say, business in London had not long commenced.

At nightfall, she intended to steal forth, and, favoured by the darkness, commence her search for her two friends.

"Surely," she exclaimed, "when every object is wrapped in darkness, I shall be in less danger of discovery by Wild and his accomplices. Those who would detect me in a moment by daylight would pass me by unnoticed and unsuspected in the night."

The more she reflected upon this decision, the more inclined she felt to adopt it.

The only question was, would the landlady allow her to remain?

She had no money to offer in return, and it was doubtful whether the friendship and good feeling she had for the waggoner would extend to a penniless friend he might bring in with him.

Edgworth Bess trembled as she thought that the landlady might insist upon her quitting the house there and then.

If so, what was she to do? Where was she to turn? Where was she to hide herself from her pertinacious foe?

A refusal, however, would be more endurable than her present state of suspense, and therefore she resolved to put the question to the landlady as soon as she returned.

The poor girl had not long to wait.

"Can you—will you," she said, fixing her eyes appealingly upon the woman's countenance—"will you let me stay here for a little while longer—say till evening? I will not trouble you for anything more than leave to sit in this room, or in some other where I cannot be seen, and where I shall be of no trouble to you."

"Certainly I will," said the landlady. "Do you think I'm a bore constructor?"

This was an unanswerable question, but Edgworth Bess understood that her appeal was granted, and was profuse in her thanks accordingly.

Probably the landlady meant "boa constrictor," and was impressed with the idea that that particular kind of serpent was dead to sympathy and kindness more than any other.

"Never mind, my girl—never mind! Don't be thanking me in such a way for such a trifling matter! Why, I'd do ten times as much for anyone that was a friend of his. Why, we're quite good friends, and have been for many a year; and I shouldn't wonder if we didn't become better acquainted yet."

The landlady gave a peculiar smile as she spoke.

"You shall not sit here," she continued. "The room is a public one, and several people frequently drop in. Look! Come this way! Here's my best private parlour; and you're welcome to sit there, and stay in it, and have what you like to eat and drink as long as you like."

The landlady opened a door, and ushered Edgworth Bess into a small and plainly-furnished apartment.

There was an air of intense neatness over the whole, however; and, to the poor girl who had known so little of the comforts of life, that parlour seemed almost like luxury.

"I wish I could stay and talk with you for awhile," said the landlady, "and cheer your spirits up; but I can't just at present, because this is the busiest part of the day. Presently, however, I shall be less engaged, and then I will come in again. However, in the meanwhile you may, perhaps, be able to amuse yourself with some of these books."

The landlady pointed to a shelf containing about half a dozen volumes.

"They belonged to my dear departed. I keep them in remembrance of him. Ah, dear me, how fond he was of these books, to be sure! He would sit poring over them from morning till night. He was a wonderful reader, and I do believe it was that that killed him!"

"Killed him!" exclaimed Edgworth Bess, in surprise.

"Yes, killed him; for he used to come down in a morning, and, after he had had his breakfast, he would draw a flagon of the oldest and strongest ale in the cellar, light his pipe, sit down in his chair, and read one of those books; and there he would stay all day."

"Can you read?" asked Edgworth Bess.

"No, not I!" replied the landlady, with some disdain.

"I don't want to know how; but as you're young, I suppose you have been taught to read?"

"Oh, yes."

"Well, then, I daresay you will be able to amuse yourself. They're wonderful books."

"And yet you have never read them."

"No; but my dear departed used to read them to me—that is, whenever I'd listen to such lies and rubbish! His head was quite full of it. Why, look here, miss, this is a volume he was uncommon fond of."

The landlady took down from the shelf a book that, whatever might be its intrinsic merit, had a very unprepossessing appearance.

The covers were torn off, the back was in a very battered condition and presented numberless threads to view, while every page was dogeared, thumbstained, and in many places marked with beer and other strong drinks.

The margins in many places had been torn away, probably to save the landlord the trouble of reaching a proper spill to light his pipe.

"It isn't much to look at, miss, is it?" said the landlady.

"It's no beauty; but, for! it wouldn't do to judge by appearances in this world; if we did, why that book would be passed over unnoticed or put on to a fire. It doesn't look fit for anything else, does it?"

Edgworth Bess was fain to admit that the landlady was right.

"Well, then, miss, I can assure you that I have heard my dear departed declare over and over again that that was the very last book that ever he had read, the last of all he had got, and he was so fond of it he used to read it so often that he could almost say it off by heart."

"And did he ever read it to you?"

"Oh yes, many a time, but I never could bear to listen to it; there was ghosts and spectres, and fighting, and haunted castles, and men in armour, and I don't know what in it—quite enough to frighten any reasonable being to death; but for all that it may amuse you. Here, stop—take it. I am called; I'll run in again presently."

A sharp knocking on the bar counter, showing that some customer was impatient to be served, made the landlady put down the book with great haste and run out.

The description that had been given of the work was by no means an enticing one, and yet Edgworth Bess felt very curious about it.

There must have been something in the volume of an entertaining character she was convinced, or the landlord would never have devoted so much time to the perusal of it.

Despite the uninviting nature of its appearance, Edgworth Bess sat down near the table and drew the volume towards her.

The title-page and some preliminary leaves had been torn away; doubtless there was nothing very entertaining in them, and the landlord had thought he could not find a better use for them than to light his pipe with.

Therefore the first page of the book was before her, and although she turned it over and opened it in many places she was unable to discover what it was called.

This, however, was a point of minor importance, and so she began to read.

As soon as she had turned over the first few pages she began to feel a deep and strong interest in the incidents.

Ere long she became totally unconscious of all surrounding objects, and for a time she forgot her troubles and perplexities as completely as though she had been wrapped in deep, dreamless slumber.

It was a story of an age that was even, then, so long gone by as almost forgotten.

It was a story of a far-off and foreign land—the land above all others of chivalry and romance, and as she perused the glowing accounts of martial deeds she felt the blood tingling in her veins, and when the sufferings of some of the personages of the story were dwelt upon, tears rose quickly and thickly to her eyes, for then she was reminded of her own unhappiness.

Then, again, as she perused these incidents of a wild exciting, supernatural character, she drew her breath in short and fitful inspirations, while her eyes became fixed upon the page.

Time passed by, but she heeded not its flight.

The story began abruptly, and in the following words.

CHAPTER DLXXXI.

EDGWORTH BESS BECOMES DEEPLY INTERESTED IN THE STRANGE STORY OF OLDEN TIMES.

"It was on a cold and stormy December evening, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, and not long after that fortunate period when Peter, surnamed the cruel, was cut off from that life which he had stained with bloodshed, and rapine, and oppression, that a stranger entered a village situated on the banks of the Tagus, near to the eastern extremity of the kingdom of Castile, in Spain.

"He was old, and, though withered, of gigantic stature.

"His large, snow-white beard streamed in the fleeting wind.

"A grey coat, of black baize, was buckled with a leathern belt about his loins.

"He had on his feet sandals instead of shoes, and on his back he carried a large harp; while a long staff, ornamented on the top with a cross, sustained his wearied steps.

"He stopped at the door of the first neat-looking cottage that presented itself, and asked whether they would grant him lodging for a night.

"He was answered in the affirmative, and requested to walk in.

"Being seated, at the desire of the people of the house, he told them that he wanted not only lodging for the night, but food also; and apprised them at the same time that he had nothing to offer them in return but his prayers and a tune upon his harp.

"Your prayers are earnestly desired," replied a young man; "but other return we shall not nor should we accept. Even your harp, whatever delight it might afford us, shall remain untouched if offered in way of compensation for any little accommodation our poor hut can bestow."

"A feeble suffusion of red bespeaking something more than gratitude overspread the aged face of the pilgrim.

"He laid his hands upon his breast and bowed his head in acknowledgment, then sighed and said, while his words seemed struggling for a passage:

"He that inspires your heart, good youth, with the true spirit of beneficence will give you the reward for it!"

"The table was then spread with the best provisions which the cottage afforded, and the whole family, consisting of the young man already mentioned, his wife, an old man his father, and his children, sat down with the stranger to a frugal but wholesome supper.

"A pitcher of tolerable wine concluded the repast, the young man earnestly pressing the old guest to drink.

"The enlivening notes of hospitality, and the unaffected cheerfulness and good-nature of the cottagers, insensibly relaxed the austerity of the old pilgrim and warmed him into conversation.

"He listened with pleasure to the simple details of rustic enjoyment and the artless acknowledgments of domestic bliss.

"At length he spoke.

"Happy," he said—"most happy is thy lot, if there be happiness found on earth, and you have the wisdom to understand it. You have greater riches than are to be found in the palaces of princes or the stately homes of the affluent. I remember the time, indeed, when the castle of a nobleman or the arm of a knight was a never-failing refuge for distress, in whatever garb distress appeared; and when the proud turrets of the nobility burst upon the sight of the oppressed or unfortunate like the first beams of the orient sun on the eye of the night-strayed traveller, cheering, and enlivening, and diffusing hope and joy. Then reigned over this happy country Alphonso the wise, the valiant and the good; but now, at every gate, savage inhospitality, with stern denial, madly opposes the entrance of the poor, and chills the woeborn heart of misery, but crouches and basely bends the servile knee of respect to the pampered knave of fortune. From such, let my steps be turned for ever."

"Ah, father!" interrupted the young man. "Pardon the presumption of your faithful zeal, which thus ventures to break in on your discourse! But little should I merit your good opinion if I suffered you uninformed to say that now which to-morrow's setting sun should see you retract. To-morrow you shall see a man—"

"What man?" interrupted the pilgrim, warmly.

"The husband of the widow, the father of the orphan, the never-failing resource of distress—humble, though wealthy—gentle, though valiant."

"Young man, your youthful heart, impressed with some partial act of generosity—some unimportant benefit, rendered, perhaps, in a moment of capricious virtue,—overflows with a gratitude which blinds you—a gratitude which speaks more for you than for the object of it. Generous yourself, you overrate the favours conferred upon you by others. This is an error, but, I confess, an amiable one, and no uncertain pledge of a worthy heart. But who is this man—this very singular character of whom you speak?"

"Here every mouth involuntarily opened, and at the same instant pronounced:

"Don Isidore!"

"Don Isidore? Who—what Don Isidore?" impatiently inquired the pilgrim.

"Don Isidore de Haro," returned the host.

"Don Isidore de Haro? Good Heavens! Young man, recollect yourself—say what Don Isidore de Haro! Is he a native of this country, or how long has he lived in it?"

"As to his native country, I cannot say anything with certainty," returned the young man, "but I believe he is a Castilian by birth. He has been here but a short time, yet in that short time has gained the affections of all ranks of people."

"At this point the old man of the cottage took up the account.

"It is only two years," he said, "since Don Isidore came here to take possession of the castle and estate of Querro, which he honourably obtained from the affection of our good King, as a reward for his services. Where he came from I know not, but I have heard that he was all his life before in the wars."

"The pilgrim rose suddenly from his seat, took two or three hasty strides across the room, sighed bitterly, then again seating himself down, seemed wrapped in meditations, while the whole family, struck with astonishment at his evident perturbation, remained silent.

At length, somewhat recovering himself, he said:

"Pardon, good people, the emotions occasioned by the sudden recollection of some passages of a life strangely chequered with the vicissitudes of fortune; but this Don Isidore de Haro is, then, a good man, you say. Though rich, is he married?"

"He was married, but his lady had been dead some time before his coming here. His domestics say that sorrow for her death has driven him to this retired life. His grief seems unaltered and undiminished by time, though it is said that he was at first quite serene and calm under it."

"Has he no children?"

"Yes—two. The young gentleman named Alphonso, his eldest, is now about fourteen years of age."

"Alphonso? Has he indeed a son named Alphonso?"

"He has—the noblest youth that lives. I have the honour to be employed by Don Isidore as one of his instructors."

"Then you are a scholar?"

"Thank Providence, I am not entirely ignorant of letters; but by no means such a scholar as to instruct that young gentleman in letters. Father Thomas, who lives at the castle, does that, but I teach and practise him in some athletic exercises, for you must know that there is not one acquirement necessary to a soldier or becoming a gentleman in which he is not instructed, nor is there a youth of some years older than him in the country that can equal him at any of them; besides, he is reckoned a most accomplished scholar for his age; and, as to his person, you will judge of that when you see it. I will not pretend to describe it."

"Donna I bella, the daughter," he continued, "is about eight years old, they say, but has been ever since her mother's death with the sister of Don Isidore, who is married to a nobleman in the Court of Portugal, and it is said by the domestics that she is a child of unequalled beauty, and that as Don Alphonso shows in every motion the spirit and figure of Don Isidore, so Donna Isabella every day discloses more and more the delicate lustre of beauty and excellent temper of her deceased mother."

"Don Isidore, then, must be happy," cried the pilgrim. "Blessed with wealth, power, children such as you describe, and, above all, with the well-merited affections of his vassals and dependants, he must approach as near to happiness as the state of mortality will allow."

"Some say not," replied the peasant. "Those who have the constant opportunity of observing him remark that he labours under some hidden melancholy; indeed, all allow that he has never been the same since the death of his lady; and were it not for the amusement he finds in the instruction of his son, the employment of his mind in contriving and executing acts of beneficence, and in the conversation of the good Father Thomas, it is thought that he must sink beneath the weight of his afflictions. Indeed, Father Thomas is a most excellent man, for, besides his extraordinary piety, he is extremely charitable, and as a preacher and pastor is unequalled. But to-morrow you will see them all. Don Isidore will expect you. No one, whatever his condition may be, passes without calling at the castle, and it is a part of Alphonso's business to watch lest they should accidentally pass by, and to bring them home with him, from whence they generally carry away a good supply of clothes and food. Now, I doubt not that, while we are indulging ourselves here with the enjoyment of your company, we may run the hazard of disobliging Don Isidore by not having conducted you to him at first."

"Little more passed that night.

"The fatigues of the day called upon the old stranger to retire to his room, and the cottagers were by timely repose to prepare for the labours of the ensuing day."

CHAPTER DLXXXII.

EDGORTH BESS CONTINUES THE PERUSAL OF THE STRANGE STORY OF OLDEN TIME.

"NEXT morning the pilgrim, after having bestowed on his hosts a hearty benediction and his thanks for their hospitable shelter, took his leave and proceeded on his way towards the castle of Querro.

"It was little more than a quarter of a league from the cottage to the avenue, and as he walked very slowly, deeply immersed in thought, the day was advanced when he got to the gate of it.

"Here, seeing that the mansion was at a distance little short of that which he had already come, he sat himself down upon a large stone bench, in order to rest himself, and discuss at leisure the variety of subjects which occupied his thoughts upon the discourse of the preceding night.

"He had not seated himself long before he perceived a number of boys running towards him with the speed of a flock of frightened deer.

"One outstripped the rest, and leaving them far behind, reached the stranger before he had time to form a conjecture upon the nobility of his appearance.

"If the old man was surprised at the swiftness of his pace, he was astonished at his personal appearance, and still more at his address.

"The full, muscular form of his limbs, and the large size of his bones, with a stature gigantic for his age, gave a proportionate share of strength.

"His face, in which manly fire, dignity, and sensibility were blended, glowed with the colours of health and exercise, while an air, at once majestic and insinuating, diffused a charm over the whole that operated like a spell upon the beholder.

"Addressing the old man with a mixture of respect, admiration, and pity, he said:

"I hope, senior, you have not been long sitting in this place so unworthy your reverend appearance and years! Should it be so, I shall have to accuse myself of an unpardonable neglect, for which I should certainly receive a severe reproof from Don Isidore. Do, senior, get up. I will lead you to a place where you shall refresh yourself with food and repose, and where you will meet with a hearty reception. Here!

"He reached forth his hand to the pilgrim, who, grasping it in a mixed ecstacy of transport and amazement, snatched it hastily to his lips, and bedewed it with tears of affection.

"His utterance was choked in a tumult of feeling, and he walked slowly along, his young guide holding him by one of his fingers, which he had caught in his rapture, and still retained with a firm grasp; while the other boys, who had come up one after the other, surrounded them, gazing alternately at the beard, the dress, and harp which hung at the back of the pilgrim.

"Is Don Isidore at the castle?" inquired the old man, as they proceeded.

"No, senior; he has been abroad for some days; but all the servants have directions to obey punctually my orders in my father's absence; and you shall be well treated, although he is not at home. To be sure, he will be greatly delighted on his return, which is now hourly expected, to find you here, for nothing gives him so much pleasure as the company of strangers. At the furthest, he will certainly be back to-morrow. In the meantime, whenever my talk wearies you, Father Thomas will keep you in conversation more entertaining, as well as more suitable to the gravity of your years.

"At length they arrived at the gate of the castle.

"On its being opened, the stranger was surprised to find himself saluted with as much respect as if he had been a prince by the keeper, who emphatically pronounced:

"Welcome, stranger, whoever thou art—welcome to the Castle of Querro!"

"The old man felt sensations to which he had long been a stranger.

"As they passed through the court-yard they were accosted by a servant, who said:

"Don Alphonso, the horses are ready!"

"Very good, Pierot," replied the youth, "I will but introduce this stranger to Father Thomas and attend directly."

"Upon which the pilgrim, turning to his young friend, said:

"Do not, I pray, allow me to be the means of detaining you from your pleasures! Though the days of youth are past with me, I well remember the painfulness of restraint, and I already feel too great an interest in your heart to run the hazard of losing any share of it by taxing your kindness too severely!"

"Indeed," returned the youth, "the delight I feel in attending you would more than compensate for the loss of any pleasure. The servant who just now spoke came to call me to my riding-master,—riding is part of my daily exercise, but attending you is a duty much more material in itself, and much more productive of pleasure to me."

"Having brought his guest into the house, Alphonso led him into the great hall, placed him in the chair, and gave orders that immediate preparation should be made for his accommodation and refreshment, and sent also for Father Thomas.

"Upon the entrance of the latter, Alphonso sprang across the hall, took him by the hand, and led him over to the old man, who immediately rose, bent his aged knees, and besought his blessing, which the old man bestowed upon him, raising him at the same time from the ground and replacing him in the great chair.

"Father Thomas then seated himself, and, having surveyed the stranger with an earnest and scrutinising eye, sighed and pressed the hand of Alphonso with a warmth expressive of approbation.

"Then, addressing himself to the aged pilgrim, he said:

"Have you travelled far this morning, senior?"

"Only from the adjoining village," returned the old man, "where I was treated with a cheerfulness and hospitality that would charm the stubborn heart of misanthropy itself, by a young man, who said, if I am not mistaken, that he was one of this young gentleman's preceptors."

"It is Juanico!" cried Alphonso, in rapture. "If Juanico was able, he would be as generous as the first nobleman in Spain."

"Alphonso left the stranger and Father Thomas in discourse, while he attended to his duty in the menage. When that was despatched, he impatiently returned, and found he had finished his breakfast.

"He employed the whole day in showing him the gardens, woods, vineyards, and castle.

"The armoury particularly attracted the old man's attention. He looked with an eye of skilful curiosity at every part.

"Do you not wish," he said to Alphonso, "to be able to wear those?"

"I do very much," returned the youth; "nay, I am pretty sure that I am able even now, for I can run with the stoutest youth you saw with me on my back against Justico, who entertained you in the village, and I am sure the lad I carry is twice as heavy as one of these."

"Then why do you not try?"

"I am afraid," replied Alphonso, "that Don Isidore would suspect me of vanity, and I know there is nothing he hates so much as that."

"My noble child," cried the pilgrim, "modesty like yours should not go unrewarded, and if Don Isidore will deign to pay any attention to a poor man like myself, you shall on his return have a trial."

"Ah, sir," returned Alphonso, "my father regards the poor as much as the rich, when he finds them honest and brave. But surely you are not a poor man! I take you to be a very rich man!"

"An indescribable sensation thrilled to the pilgrim's heart.

"He seized Alphonso in his arms, held him for some time clasped in his embrace, and wept.

"Alphonso wept too. Why, he could not tell; his young heart was agitated with unaccustomed sensations of delight, and he smiled through his tears. The lustre of natural majesty broke through the sable weeds that veiled it, and the dignified mind of the youth, in estimating the worth of his fellow-creature, laid no account on that of his clothes.

"Next morning, while Alphonso and his new friend were engaged in the armoury, the trampling of horses announced the arrival of Don Isidore.

"Father Thomas met, and retired with him into his closet.

"As soon as permission was granted him, Alphonso flew to embrace his father.

"When the mutual manifestations of affection were over, Alphonso announced the presence of the pilgrim in the castle.

"I have been told all by Father Thomas, replied Don Isidore. 'I entirely approve of your behaviour to him, and thank you for so very honourably representing me in my absence. I am the more pleased with your attention to him because he is so very poor a man.

[EDGORTH BESS IS DEEPLY INTERESTED IN THE TATTERED VOLUME.]

"Poor?" repeated Alphonso. "Surely, father, you mistake? He is not poor. I never saw a grander man in my life!"

"Do not depreciate your own charity," replied Father Thomas. "You cannot but have observed the extreme poverty of his dress?"

"His dress? No, indeed!" said Alphonso. "I took no notice of his dress! If it be poor, as you say, I am sure I am sorry for it, for I cannot help loving him."

"Then, turning to Don Isidore, he added:

"I respect him as much—almost as much—as yourself. Then he has such a commanding air, and he talks so grandly of war, and honour, and courage, and armour, that I am sure he would delight you!"

"What Alphonso says is not without foundation," observed Father Thomas.

No. 125.—BLUESKIN.

"Well, then," said Don Isidore, "tell your friend that I kiss his hands, and shall be glad to see him by-and-by in the great hall."

"He is there now," said Alphonso—"I can hear the sound of his harp."

"Then let us go to him."

"Upon entering the hall, the old man rose, and, with a deportment majestic beyond expression, saluted Don Isidore, who, on his part, received him not with that arrogant affectation of humility which mortifies more than any other exercise of pride, but with that unfeigned condescension which made every benefit he conferred valued less for the magnitude of the gift than the truthfulness of the giver."

"In truth, he felt in the present case a veneration, if not awe, imposed upon him by the figure before him."

"I will not," said the old man, "do so much injustice to the character of Don Isidore de Haro as to suppose that the footing on which he finds a person of my own humble appearance in his castle will subject Don Alphonso to the imputation of rashness, or me to the censure of forward intrusion. Don Isidore may be sure that the kindness of the youth, flattering though it was, should not have been accepted, had not universal report persuaded me that it would have been approved of by his father.

"Venerable senor," returned Don Isidore, "I hope you will find that your opinion, and the report which gives it birth are not entirely misplaced. My boy, whose whole life has been one continual series of acts the most grateful to my feelings, has never done one of more satisfaction to me than procuring me the honour of your company. I am not," he continued, "a man of much ceremony, and shall therefore only tell you that my guests are to all intents of hospitality masters of this castle, and I beg that you will consider yourself so. Do me the favour to take your seat, and I will again wait upon you as soon as I have given some necessary orders."

"When Don Isidore retired to his apartment he could not help reflecting on the extraordinary appearance of the stranger.

"Pilgrims and itinerant bards he had often seen, but never one that at all resembled this, in whom he imagined he could distinguish remains of the warrior, and the defaced ruins of the man of dignity.

"That he was of a rank far above his present seeming he had not the smallest doubt.

"But what that rank had been, or how he had fallen from it, he could not conceive, and feared to inquire.

"Even conjecture was lost in the wide field of calamitous events.

"While he was immersed in this confusion of thoughts, Alphonso entered.

"There is something, my child," said Don Isidore, "in this old veteran's manner which exacts more than common respect, and bespeaks him of superior rank, though fallen. I confess an invincible curiosity to know who and what he is, but as the recollection of such things must be painful, I will rather content myself with ignorance of the matter, than indulge my curiosity at the risk of giving a single pang to his aged heart. I will therefore be silent on the subject, unless he chooses of his own accord to disclose himself to me. At all events, the great hall is a place where the difficulty he may have to be communicative must be increased by the frequent entrance of servants. Therefore I wish you to inform him that I shall be obliged to him for his company in my closet. It is no idle curiosity which I feel, but an anxious desire to heal, if possible, the wounds that fortune may have inflicted on him."

"Alphonso quickly returned with the old pilgrim.

"Don Isidore was surprised at perceiving that he had brought his harp with him.

"Being seated at the desire of Don Isidore, he proceeded, without a word, to tune his harp, while his face exhibited marks of strong emotions, and seemed pregnant with extraordinary events.

"Don Isidore would not break in upon him.

"After a short prelude, he began to play, accompanying it with his voice.

"Melancholy set her stamp on every note he sang.

"Don Isidore, who heedfully attended to catch from his verses a clue to his woes, was for a time all ear.

"He sung of fortune and fame, and rank, of friends, of children lost, and of the miseries of an unconnected, isolated existence here.

"Then he sung of war, till his harp, seeming to catch the enthusiasm of its master, struck such martial sounds as roused the blood of Don Isidore, and filled the young Alphonso with an ardour he was before a stranger to.

Hence he skillfully turned to the happy state of Don Isidore, whose armour hung up at once a monument of its owner's former prowess, and present peaceful honours, and a lesson of emulation to the rising spirit of his son.

"At this point Don Isidore fixed his eyes upon the old pilgrim, whose face, glowing with the awakened enthusiasm of his spirit, beamed with the glories of the warrior and of the bard.

"In mute amazement he for awhile gazed, tracing the lineaments of a countenance familiar to him, yet unknown.

"Thrice he essayed to speak, but, lost in surmise, astonishment, and doubt, as often faltered.

"At length, with difficulty mastering the tumult within him, he said:

"Ah, sire, am I mistaken, or do I behold—do I see the once beloved, and ever-revered—the glorious——"

"Unfortunate Baron de Rayo!"

"Don Isidore had barely strength sufficient to rise and throw his arms about the Baron's neck.

"At length, his great heart finding vent, he exclaimed:

"How—how is this? Alas—alas! Do I live to see this day?—the great Baron de Rayo—the glorious and the good—the plume of science—the thunderbolt of war? Do I live to see him thus?—do I live to see my first friend—my early director—he whose instructions and example first called my youthful spirit forth—pointed out the path to glory, and led the way to deeds of piety and virtue—divested of his honours and distinctions, travelling unattended—unconnected—like a minstrel through the country? Why—why is this? Penance it cannot be, for your soul was as incapable of guilt, as thy spirit of dishonour! So then, my friend—my parent—how comes this to pass? And why is this transport which I feel at thus finding you restored, as it were, from the dead, equivoiced by the anguish of seeing you thus fallen? Say, too, what of Gonzalvo, the companion of my youthful days?"

"All this while Alphonso stood gazing from one to the other in mute surprise.

"Don Isidore," said the baron, "whatever my griefs may be, I have yet room left in my bosom for a large portion of joy to see you once more, and to see you so happy."

"Here Don Isidore shook his head.

"I say again happy," continued the Baron. "The human, prone to discontent, will, if it lack real cause of misery, forge for itself stings and arrows out of the best benefits of life. You have had your afflictions, and I have had some conception of them; but by the time you have heard my tale, you will allow that all the sorrows you have suffered were joys compared to mine. But as for your son, let him go—let him leave us together. His heart, unused to aught but happiness, shrinks at the bare suggestion of our woes. Let us spare a recital which would only shock his gentle nature, and serve no purpose of instructor or utility."

"In compliance with this request, Alphonso took his leave; and as soon as he was gone, the baron said:

"It is an old observation, conceived in wisdom, and founded on experience, that wherever there is flattery, there is a fool and a knave in the case. I, for my part, think better of both of us than to offer flattery, or to expect it to be received. I shall therefore frankly declare that in that youth who has now left us Don Isidore possesses a treasure more than equivalent for all the losses of his life. Why it is I know not; but it is certainly a truth that from the instant I beheld him I felt myself so tied to him by the strongest cords of affection that to separate him from me would be to tear every ligament of my heart asunder. But I delay my promised history, and much I fear that the pain some passages of it cannot fail to give you will be but poorly requited by the gratification of your curiosity."

CHAPTER DLXXXIII.

EDGORTH BESS FINDS THE STRANGE STORY INCREASE IN EXCITEMENT AND INTEREST.

"ALPHONSO, BARON DE RAYO, as you well know, was of no mean distinction. His castle was as strong, his wealth as great, his vassals as numerous as any of his peers in the kingdom of Castile. His renown in war, and favour with his prince, not less the topic of admiration with the nation at large than the subject of envy of his enemies.

"His fortunes seemed founded on a rock, and his honours and domestic circumstances to bid defiance to the storms of adversity.

"Such they were when last we parted.

"Heaven had spared me one daughter, the only remaining child of a numerous progeny. The rest followed their mother to the grave ere they had passed the years of infancy.

"This and more you already know, but as it makes a link in the great chain of events I propose to relate, I choose to be circumstantial, even though it should render me tedious

"In the possession of that daughter I buried the remembrance of all my losses, and having no son, and being determined never to marry again, I adopted the son of my sister, the young Henry Gonzalvo, reared him as my own, and hoped by my influence with the King to get the title and honours of the old house of Rayo entailed upon him. And as at this time your father—a younger brother of a respectable branch of our house—bespoke my patronage for you, I took you to my castle, and, fancying that I saw in you the dawning of future greatness, determined to train you early up to arms. Your progress and unfolding powers justified my hopes; nor can I recollect many passages of my life that pleased me more than beholding in the brotherly contests of emulation between you and my Henry. The victory hung now on this side, now on that, till both were exhausted; for so perfect was the equality between you at the close of ten years—which you continued together under my eye—that it remained doubtful which excelled in vigour, dexterity, and martial ardour, or which in tenderness, fidelity, and mutual attachment.

"I looked upon you both with pride—with hope—and flattered myself that in each I saw a second self arising. But what was my exultation when, our glorious King Alphonso calling me to the war against the Moors, I brought you both with me, and found that your actions exceeded my most sanguine expectations?

"The King, you know, on the taking of Algerjiras, honoured you with a knighthood, and gratified my fond wish by entailing the family honours on Henry Gonzalvo.

"When our most beloved monarch died, at the siege of the Moorish fort of Gibraltar, I retired in despondence and grief, and brought Gonzalvo with me; while you, arrested by a thirst for glory, and disdaining a life of inactive dependence, remained behind.

"We returned—Henry loaded with honours, and I exulting in the reflection that the reputation of our family for celebrity in the field, and distinguished for valour and loyalty, was likely to suffer no diminution in the hands of its new representative.

"We had not been long at home, when I had the additional satisfaction of perceiving an event ripening which I had from the first anxiously desired, and which alone was wanting to give full completion to all the wishes or views I had on earth. In short, I perceived that a reciprocal affection was growing apace in the bosoms of Gonzalvo and my daughter, and, being determined neither, on the one hand, to injure their love by anticipated concurrence, nor, on the other, to throw any obstacle in their way by too vigilant observation, I gave the young couple just as much time for uninterrupted communication as I thought would serve to strengthen their flame without consuming their affection.

"Everything turned out according to my intentions. Henry, fearful of the event, retired to his father's house, and from thence gave me by letter a disclosure of his passion, with many expressions of apprehension, and, above all, deprecating my suspicions of perfidy and breach of hospitality in having paid his addresses privately to my daughter.

"I ascertained from my daughter that she returned his love, and gave my consent to their union.

"At this period Peter called forth all his forces to crush a confederacy formed against him by some discontented nobles, at the head of which were his mother and his half-brother.

"Peter was the legitimate son of our lamented King Alphonso, and I thought it was my duty to defend him without examining the merits of his case. Gonzalvo and I accordingly set out to join the royal standard.

"I will not enlarge upon the disgust the tyrant's whole conduct gave us. It, however, served to lessen, if not entirely remove, the regret at finding that you had long been a follower of Henry, Count Transtamare, his brother. You were right, as it turned out; but I acted upon principles of loyalty and allegiance, and found my consolation in the consciousness of intentional rectitude.

"To be succinct, we overcame the rebellion, and Gonzalvo and I returned to our peaceful castle with no other reward or compensation for our pains than the laurels we gathered on the field, which, under such banners as we fought beneath, were withered ere they could be plucked.

"Immediately on our return, the nuptials of my children were celebrated with all the pomp and dignity becoming their illustrious house, and my happiness was in due time increased by the birth of a son.

"The child was scarcely ever from my sight. I hung in raptures over him.

"A short time after this, Peter again called us forth. His reiterated breaches of faith, his cruelties and exactions, raised up against him a formidable power, headed by Count Transtamare, assisted by the renowned Bertrand Guesclin. I thought it our duty to attend him; nor could we, however willing at such a time to remain at home, decline the summons without tarnishing, or at least hazarding, our fame. We therefore prepared to depart, and the young child—who was named after me, Alphonso—was put out to nurse in a neighbouring village near the castle, my daughter being determined to attend her husband to Cordova. From this resolution, however extraordinary, nothing could dissuade her, and, everything being done that could render the journey convenient to her, we set out, and, without any incident worthy of relation, arrived at Cordova, which, to our astonishment, we found invested by Peter, his enormities having driven the inhabitants to the desperate measure of declaring openly against him.

"We were treated with every mark of distinction by all, and the singular heroism and conjugal affection of Maria raised her so high in everyone's esteem, and gained her such universal respect, that her condition was rendered much more tolerable than we could possibly have hoped for.

"Among those who were most forward in doing honour to our family was the Marquess de Punalada, a man of an illustrious house, and high in favour with the King. He had formerly been acquainted with Gonzalvo, and now renewed his intimacy with a zeal that gave us the more pleasure as the capricious and violent temper of the King made the condition of those who were not favourites, either immediately or collaterally, extremely precarious and disagreeable.

"We had little time for the cultivation of this intimacy.

"Henry was ordered off on a service of considerable danger and difficulty. I was ordered, together with all the older barons, to remain with the army at the siege, in order that the King might avail himself of our counsels, while Maria retired with the Countess of Dalmadao to the city of Ecceja, to wait the return of her husband.

"I shall not interrupt the thread of my story with a detail of the operations of the army, which, perhaps, you already know as well as I, but tell you that here I was informed that you had perished with the other adherents of Count Transtamare, with whom the tyrant broke faith so wickedly at Toledo.

"Something, no doubt the stings of a guilty conscience, fretted Peter, and inwardly preyed upon him. Naturally ill-disposed, he grew daily worse, and the noble loyalty of his subjects never was put to so severe a trial as in adhering to the cause of that weak, worthless tyrant.

"For a considerable time I had heard nothing from Gonzalvo or my daughter. I began to feel an uneasiness unusual to me at a neglect for which I was utterly unable to account, when one day I was put under arrest and hurried before the King.

"Unconscious of having committed any offence to merit such a gross indignity, I was busied in forming conjectures on the strange event, when, in going through the camp to the King's pavilion, I heard a herald proclaim my son, Henry Gonzalvo, a traitor.

"More at a loss than before, I dismissed the inquiry into the causes from my mind, and only looked to the consequences, which I determined to endure with that unshaken fortitude and dignity that became a noble Castilian.

"Arrived at the royal pavilion, I found Peter seated on his throne, a number of the nobility around him, and, as usual, the Marquess de Punalada at his right hand in conference with him, while his face appeared convulsed with a conflict of all the horrid passions that shake human nature struggling for the mastery of his soul.

"Perceiving me, he turned abruptly from the Marquess de Punalada, and, addressing himself to me, sternly said:

"When foul rebellion stains the branch of a family, and well-founded suspicion falls upon the chief stock, what reparation does justice to an injured monarch demand?—

what measures do his security require? Say, Baron de Rayo. I speak to you."

"When treason or disloyalty is proved against the house of Rayo, my liege lord," I returned, "I will be the first to pronounce a sentence of severest rigour, and call the execution of it justice."

"That base dissimulation," interrupted Peter, furiously, "which, under the plausible pretext of rigour and an affected zeal for justice, assumes the garb of innocence, but marks more strongly the deep-laid treachery of your views, and bids us but the more beware of danger."

"None," I answered, "but the disloyal and treacherous ever found an enemy in, or had cause to fear danger from, our house; and who but your Majesty dares accuse us of it? Let the villain slanderer—be he who he may—come forth, and my life shall be the pledge that I refute the calumny—and sure no common calumniator it must be who could shake that confidence which long and faithful services of ages had justly entitled the family of Rayo to claim from the Crown of Castile."

"Dost thou, then, dissembler as thou art," interrupted the King, "pretend ignorance? Why fled thy rebel son and joined the cause of Transtamare? Knowest thou nought of this—or wilt thou presume to say that he who knew no thought but thine, who moved but by thy guidance, and yielded to no impulse but the impulse of thy spirit, should have taken such a step without thy knowledge and concurrence? Thy nephew, too, preceded him in his rebellion, but he has paid the forfeit of his crime, and so shalt thou. We will show the proud Rayo that to offend us is some danger, and that as we raised so we can lay his honours in the dust."

"Gracious heaven! what was my indignation. Rage for some time deprived me of speech, almost of sense."

"After some pause, I rallied my scattered senses."

"The honours of Rayo," said I, "your Majesty has neither raised nor can extinguish. 'This body, it is true, is in your power, and must endure every outrage that jealous tyranny may choose to inflict upon it; but the honours of myself and family shall mock thy threatened rage even beyond the reach of thy power of revenge, and gain new vigour from the strokes of persecution."

"Mark," cried Peter, furious with passion—"mark ye, my lords, the recreant defies us! Take him from our sight, and hurry him straight to prison!"

"Yet, ere I go," said I, "let me, in presence of these noble barons, exculpate myself from a charge the barest thoughts of which raise in my soul scorn, abhorrence, and indignation."

"Here my feelings, like a torrent suddenly contracted, overbore my reason, and I added:

"Disclaiming all attachment and respect to him who wrongs me and aims a deadly blow at all my well-earned honours, I declare that merely to satisfy my peers I stoop to this vindication. Though Peter may have his own reasons for doubting the allegiance of his subjects, the virtue of Rayo may shield me from the charge of dissimulation."

"I then turned to the knights and nobles, Peter—weak, wicked creature—biting his lips with internal agitation."

"My lord," said I, "why my son has disappeared I cannot conjecture, nor did I know of that event (if it has taken place, which I yet doubt) till I came into this presence. That he has gone over to the arms of our adversaries I cannot believe, as I know that his allegiance to the throne was equal to my own. Over this some strange mystery hangs—a mystery which that God who sees and knows the inmost recesses of the heart, bears me witness that I am utterly unable to pierce, yet still I cannot believe that he would go and leave his wife a hostage, for sure he left her and—"

"Mark the subtle traitor," said the King. "He would insinuate that he knew nothing of his daughter's flight!"

"My daughter," I exclaimed—"is it possible? What new wonders are yet for me to hear? what new mysteries to be unfolded?"

"The barons seemed struck with my emotion."

"Yet, my lords," rejoined I, "let me turn to my own conduct, and show that I am abused. At the time that this war broke out, and the King called upon his people to rise to arms, my years might have exempted me, without imputation, from the service of war. Grown grey in the service of successive kings, dignified with honours, and covered with the rewards of a monarch who knew how to estimate my service, I might have stayed at home and enjoyed the repose necessary to my years. Did I, then, come forth in my old age to tarnish all the glories of a well-spent life—act the base dissembler's part, and play the hoary fool? I ask you, my lords, is it possible? Yet am I—without proof, inquiry, or even a full knowledge of the charge against me—treated as a criminal—a criminal against myself, my fortunes, and my fame. Observe, my lords, how this story hangs together. If we had determined on the project of which we stand accused, what hindered us from executing it in a manner and at a time more suitable to our views? Why delay the desertion to that time and place which alone could render it hazardous? Why should I be left behind? The cloud of mystery which hangs over it disqualifies me from speaking as I would, but my part must appear plain, and manifestly innocent. And, as for my son, I pledge my life for his fidelity."

"Here the King broke off my discourse, and, rising furiously, ordered me into confinement."

"I was hurried out of the pavilion, and the next day was conducted, under a strong guard, and lodged a close and solitary prisoner in a cell in the tower of Liguena."

"For a long time I was utterly incapable of reflection or of entering into an investigation of this unaccountable turn in our affairs. All within was wild chaos, confusion, and uproar."

"Time at length began to calm the perturbation of my mind, and the tumult within gradually subsided into deliberation."

"I found myself, however, as much at a loss as before."

"In vain I turned over every incident in my mind that could, by forced possibility, have given rise to the error. All seemed very strange, unaccountable, and inexplicable the more it was examined, and I had at length nothing left to think, but that my children, by some means which I could not develop, had been sacrificed to fraud and the subtle designs of some hidden enemies, envious perhaps of the honours of our house."

"Oh! my children," I would exclaim, "do you still live, or has the ruffian hand of barbarous power assailed your precious lives? If it be so, give the guilty to the vengeance of these arms, old and withered though they be."

"Thus, day after day, month after month, elapsed, having no diversity of incidents to chequer existence. I had no objects by which to measure time, and was uncertain what number of years I passed in that dreary mansion."

"Losing all hope of revisiting the world, I almost lost all desire too, and had laid my account with ending my days in that dismal prison, when one night I was visited by a dream or a vision, and to this hour I cannot determine which."

"Methought, as I lay in bed, Gonzalvo called to me."

"I looked up and beheld him, pale, emaciated, with every appearance of wildness and distraction in his face and air. I looked at him and wept; then stretched forth my hands to embrace him. He eluded my endeavour."

"Alas! my son," I said, "after so long an absence, is it denied to me to—"

"Sire," said he, interrupting me, "it availeth not. Depart you hence, and seek my lost child."

"I essayed to speak, but could not; I endeavoured to call him—he baffled all my efforts, and vanished, leaving me in an agony of consternation and grief."

"Next morning the impression of this phantom was so strong upon my senses that I was almost at a loss to determine whether it was a reality or a dream. While I was in a train of contemplation, the keeper entered my chamber."

"I asked him whether anyone had been admitted to me in the night."

"He said not, but at the same time informed me that he had that morning received orders to discharge from confinement all persons imprisoned there, Peter the Cruel being dead, and Henry Count Transtamare, who killed the tyrant, having succeeded to the throne."

"The coincidence of the dream with this my deliverance made an impression on me difficult to conceive and impossible to be described."

"I thought I saw the finger of Providence pointing out the way to some strange and momentous revelation."

"The tumult of my feelings—surprise, joy, astonishment, and suspense—was more than my enfeebled state could support.

"I was scarcely able to move, and for some days was unable to leave Liguena. When at length I was able, I was at a loss which way to go, but at last determined to seek the Marquess de Punalada, of whose friendship for Gonzalvo I entertained no doubt, and who would therefore be most likely to give me information of his fate.

"With weary steps I reached the city of Burgos. There I had the mortification to hear that my estates were confiscated and my blood attainted, and was, moreover, told that the marquess had quitted Court and retired to his estate in Andalusia long before the death of Peter.

"Thither, feeble and exhausted though I was, I repaired.

"After a long, wretched, and fatiguing journey, I reached a village near his castle, and was told that he then, and mostly, resided on his estate on the banks of the river Ebro.

"I was surprised at this intelligence, which nevertheless was sufficiently confirmed by the people of the village.

"I determined to find him.

"So, recommending myself to the Almighty, and beseeching him to endue me with strength and patience, I again turned my back on Andalusia.

"Not being able to travel in the state suitable to my rank, the little means I possessed being just exhausted, and, moreover, recollecting that it might be prudent for me to pass as much as possible unnoticed, I entered the town of Cordova, equipped myself as you see, and then proceeded on my journey, living occasionally at convents, and on the beneficence of the hospitable people of the country.

"My way was long, and, as I walked slowly, and was obliged to rest frequently, it was a considerable time before I got to the banks of the Ebro.

"The night before I reached them. I was visited by a dream nearly resembling that which I had in the prison of Liguena.

"Gonzalvo came in as before, and repeated the words: 'Sire, seek my lost child.'

"As before, I strove to embrace him, when, methought, he turned from me, uttering a sigh that seemed to shake his frame to pieces.

"We can no more,' he said, and walked away from me, when, methought, a ghastly wound on his head yawned and discovered his brains, and the blood ran in a torrent down his back.

"My soul, which till that minute was a stranger to the impression of fear, shrank with horror at the sight.

"I trembled, gave a loud and hollow groan, and awoke in an agony.

"I ardently longed for the return of day.

"It came, and brought no consolation.

"My dream had banished every gleam of comfort from my soul, and left nothing there but gloom, horror, and darkness. Yet shall I own to you that at intervals the pride of the warrior broke in upon my reveries, and painted to me imaginary prospects of revenge.

"I traversed the banks of the Ebro for many leagues, inquiring in vain for the Marquess of Punalada, till I came near that part which once owned me for its lord—a place I should above all others have avoided were it not for the hopes of seeing my grandchild, or, at least, hearing of him—an indulgence which I deferred only for the purpose of being first satisfied about his father and mother.

"As I approached, therefore, I felt all the torments of suspense and apprehension.

"At length, however, I arrived within a short distance of the castle.

"It was evening when I knocked at the door of the first peasant's cottage within the boundaries of the lordship of Montalto.

"A stranger appeared, who rudely demanded my business.

"I told him I desired to see Juan, the man of the house.

"If you mean Juan Navarre,' returned he, 'you must look for him somewhere else!'

"What, my friend,' said I, 'is not this his cottage?'

"No,' returned the clown; 'it was once his, but, thank God and my master, it is mine now.'

"And pray who is your master?'

"The Marquess de Punalada.'

"The Marquess de Punalada?'

"Yes, the Marquess de Punalada. The Baron de Rayo, its former owner, has been put to death for high treason, and the King gave that castle yonder, and this estate, to my master. It is not above three days since he left it, and went to his other estate in Andalusia.'

"Oh, heavens! what were my feelings! How I supported them I know not!

"The circumstance that Punalada, the specious friend of Gonzalvo, rather than any other person, should have got possession of our confiscated property, struck, like lightning, a thought across my mind—a suspicion of an act too full of horror, guilt, and wickedness, for man to perpetrate; and, in the fulness of my heart, I exclaimed:

"Oh, cursed villain!'

"The fellow, full of resentment at my abuse (as I suppose he thought, of himself), lifted his arm to strike me. I smote him to the ground, and retired.

"Proceeding hastily to the next cottage, which was that in which my grandson was nursed, I received an answer there to nearly the same effect.

"Apprehending that the peasant, recovering, might collect a number of his lord's vassals to assist him and fall upon me, in which case resistance or expostulation would be equally vain, I turned into a wood, and by a well-known path arrived at a village out of the power of the lord of the castle of Montalto, and calling at a cottage, took up my lodging for the night.

"Determined upon getting the best information I could, and above all to find out where my grandson was lodged, I prevailed upon the son of my host to go to the castle and the contiguous village and make the necessary inquiries.

"He returned soon, and brought me an account that there was not one of the former inhabitants living on the lordship; that all were put out and replaced by strangers, nor could it be found where any of them went.

"You will allow that nothing could now be added to the measure of my afflictions—it was already running over.

"Lost, then,' I exclaimed—'lost indeed, my Gonzalvo! My Maria, lost is thy child! I fear yourselves too! Where, oh where, blessed Father, shall my sorrows end? Whither shall I go? Where turn me to find my children, if yet they live? Alas, I know not! Here, then, lay thee down, wretched old man, and patiently await the hand of death which soon shall visit thee and heal thy woes; or go to the castle, assert thy right against the base vassals that possess it; slay all who oppose thee, till, thyself slain, thou shalt pull down a number to the grave with thee, and fall gloriously amidst the ruins of thy enemies!'

"Here, stifled with rage, I fell on the floor in a state of insensibility, to which a languor succeeded that in all probability tended to save me from the more acute effects of my passion.

"The good people of the cottage, much affected with my emotions, used every little art to console me, execrating the wretches who could aim a blow at a head so white as mine.

"Urged by their repeated solicitations, I at length took some food and went to bed. Here sleep, which usually flies from the couch of the unhappy, led on by fatigue, visited me.

"Still, I was haunted with the former dream with little variation, and determined to pursue as far as I could the admonition.

"I therefore first repaired to Toledo to inquire of the chief officers of Henry Transtamare's army whether Gonzalvo had ever gone over; and, after a most minute investigation, found that no such event had ever taken place.

"I thereupon resolved to commit myself to the direction of Providence, and search for my children either till I found them or lost my life.

"Under this determination, I first visited the Court of Navarre, then that of Portugal; thence crossed Spain again over to the kingdom of Arragon.

"Finding no trace anywhere of the objects of my pursuit, I formed the desperate resolution of going to the Moorish territory of Grenada, on the bare possibility of Gonzalvo's having been by some unlucky means enslaved by the infidels.

"Two years' weary travelling, supported by the alms of the charitable, could not deter me from my purpose. I therefore turned my face that way, and proceeded, supported by the hope which the frequent visitation of my dream inspired me with.

"The second night I took up my lodging among the charitable fathers of a Franciscan monastery.

"I informed them of my intention, giving them at the same time my reasons for it, and disclosing to them the whole of my misfortunes.

"One of them—a grave, wise, and learned man—undertook to dissuade me from it.

"He remarked that the disappearance of my son and daughter happened in a place and at a time that the Moors could not by any possibility have been instrumental to it. He said that he thought the much greater probability was that they had been, for some hidden purpose, cut off by the cruel hand of Peter, and that by going to Grenada I should only bring down additional misery on myself, and lose the small probability there was of recovering or finding out my grandchild, and he finally advised (in which all agreed with him) that I should rather go to Toledo, apply to the Archbishop, and through him get an order of Government to search for them.

"I perceived that, in the eagerness of my desires, I had confounded my judgment, and that I had, in the flame of pursuit, overlooked several material objections to my plan.

"That night I went to bed undecided in my intentions; still I was visited with the dream.

"Gonzalvo again showed his cloven skull, and again urged my departure in search of his child.

"Alas, my child!" said I, "whither shall I go?"

"Go!" said he. "Fate will instruct thee, and guide thy steps!"

"Methought I immediately went forth on the desired search. I walked with difficulty up a steep hill.

"At length I thought I reached a field, where two armies were drawn out in preparation for engagement. The trumpets sounded a charge. The martial clamour filled my soul with a transport not to be described. I wielded my lance, and was hesitating into which side of the scales I should throw my weight, when methought you, Sir Isidore, stepped forward, cased in full armour.

"You came down to me, and said:

"Noble Rayo, Isidore de Haro will give your children to your arms, or perish in the attempt!"

"With that, I thought you vanished, but soon returned; and, advancing towards me smiling, presented me a golden helmet, in which was laid my child—my Alphonso.

"I suddenly grasped the helmet, and snatched the child to my bosom, when, looking down, I perceived that the helmet, falling, had killed his father, who lay bleeding in agony on the ground.

"My woe and horror were unutterable.

"I turned the point of my javelin towards my breast, determined to rush upon it, when methought you held me, and, struggling with me, snatched the fatal weapon from my hand, and said:

"Grieve not! Be patient! All shall yet be well. I will be myself a father to Alphonso."

"In endeavouring to throw my arms about you, I awoke.

"This new dream furnished my heated imagination with new materials to work upon—a train of new ideas took place, and a new plan arose from them.

"Perhaps," thought I, "Isidore may yet live—perhaps uncorrupted, too. I will seek him out," thought I, "and leave the rest to the great disposer of events."

"I arose early next morning, and set forward on my way to the Court of Henry, with an intention to ascertain the fact whether you were dead or not; and, I confess, I was startled at the apparent past derangement of my mind, which could so long have dwelt upon my misery without thinking of so obvious a remedy as this probably offered.

"I travelled some days, when, accidentally passing through your village, I chanced to hear your name mentioned in such terms as convinced me that I was near the habitation of a friend. And now I am here, I must confess that I find myself, I know not why, in a state of more internal composure than I have for years been accustomed to; and weak though it may appear to you, the frequent visitations of Gonzalvo, and his injunctions in the dream, and the subsequent one in which you appeared, coupled with the circumstance of meeting you, the name and personal appearance of this lovely youth, together with a confused crowd of other ideas, rush on my mind with a force which reason cannot resist.

"Here he paused, and fixing his eyes on Don Isidore, as if to catch every passage of his mind through his eyes, he continued:

"Tell me, Isidore, in pity to a father's feelings, tell me: Knowest thou, or hast thou heard aught of Gonzalvo, or of my daughter? And, oh, do not delay to solve the torturing doubts of my wretched, careworn heart. Say, who is this youth—this Alphonso? Oh, say! for much my mind misgives me; and sure, if I be mistaken, the strong resemblance warrants me—in him Gonzalvo all appears in renovated youth, moves in every step, and speaks in every sentence that he utters!"

"Don Isidore, struck with astonishment at the conclusion of this story, stared for some time at the baron in transfixed silence.

"If the misfortunes of a family he so entirely loved affected him with sorrow, the whimsical transition from it to his son smote him to the soul.

"He loved the baron with more than filial tenderness, and as he always admired him for his extraordinary valour, so he revered him for his superior wisdom; but to see his soul so shaken and his understanding so enfeebled as to yield up his reason to the mere illusion of fancy, and to suffer his judgment to be so tainted by the false colourings of a dream as to call in question his property in his own child, shocked him beyond measure.

"The resemblance his son bore to Gonzalvo he had himself noticed, and with pleasure noticed, as it served to keep up the remembrance of a much-loved, long-lost friend and relation. But the baron's straining resemblance to a conclusion so wild and extravagant was a falling-off too lamentable not to overwhelm him with grief and astonishment.

"Unable, from those impressions on his feelings, to speak, he, for some moments, continued silent, his face imprinted with the strongest marks of concern, while the baron's hope gaining new strength from the pause, cast a visible gleam of satisfaction over his countenance.

"My dear lord and most valued friend," said he, after some hesitation, "to say that your misfortunes affect me as though they were my own, and that there is nothing within the compass of my power which I would not do to redress or relieve you from them, is to speak far short of my feelings and inclinations, and is no more than I trust you will readily believe. Would to Heaven that the remedy were immediately to follow the effort, and sleep should not seal my eyelids ere you found it! In the disappearance of Gonzalvo my loss is not less, nor did my grief fall short of yours, but with the extinction of hope my grief has abated; I have long ceased to think that he lives; some account of him, else, must surely long since have reached his friends, but as to the mode or cause of his disappearance I find myself as unable to form even a vague conjecture as you can be. As to the rest, hear my story and be satisfied.

CHAPTER DLXXXIV.

EDGORTH BESS FINDS THE OLD STORY INCREASE IN POWER AND INTEREST.

"You may remember that previous to our going against Algeziras we were entertained at the Court of Alphonso, then at Burges, and treated with uncommon marks of distinction. There was a vast concourse of nobility there, as well those who were going to the war as their friends and relations, who came to spend as much time as possible with them before their departure, and bid them a final adieu.

"Don Alvarez de Guzman was at that time the King's chief favourite, and of course the most considerable person present.

"The pomp and dignity of this great man's family contributed to the splendour of the Court, but no part of it so much as his fair niece, Donna Isabella de Guzman, who seemed to engross the eyes and admiration of the Court, and to eclipse all the young ladies then present, though there were many of the first in estimation, both for birth and beauty, in the train of the Queen Maria.

"As Gonzalvo and I stood in a familiar degree of intimacy with Don Alvarez, I had frequent opportunities of conversing with Donna Isabella. I found that her mind was as highly gifted with wit and enriched with knowledge as her person was with beauty.

"Not to trouble you with a detail of minute circumstances, interesting only to the parties concerned, we conceived a reciprocal tenderness for each other, and I obtained her consent to demand her in marriage from her father, and to that end to ask the assistance of Don Alvarez; but as her father was of a very high rank and proud position, and I at the time but a soldier of fortune, it was determined that I should wait till my services entitled me to rank, which, in the scene to which we were then going, was likely soon to happen.

"We privately plighted our faith to each other, and parted with mutual assurances of eternal and inviolable fidelity.

"Soon after we took the field.

"What happened then and afterwards at Gibraltar up to the time of your departure I need not mention. The King, you know, honoured me with knighthood, and on your returning home I resolved to remain with the army returning to Castile, actuated perhaps by a thirst for glory, but certainly by my passion for the fair Isabella too.

"And here, my lord, it may be proper to make an excuse to you for a concealment that favours too strongly of insincerity.

"My duty to you, who were more than a father to me, and the confidence which your friendship entitled you to demand a communication of so very important an affair; but the truth is, I was doubtful of success, and too proud to circulate the shame (as I then thought it) of a disappointment if I should fail. Let it satisfy you that I did not communicate it even to Gonzalvo.

"But to return whence I have digressed.

"I thought my newly-acquired honours gave me more reasonable pretensions, and made this a fit season to introduce the subject of my passion to Alvarez, not doubting, from the strong friendship he expressed for me, and which I thought was sincere, that he would willingly render me all the service he could on the occasion.

"Whatever his private feelings, on my opening the business to him, might have been, he affected to take my proposal in good part, but told me that to the King and Queen Dowager Maria I must make my suit, as they had honoured the young lady with their patronage, and had taken to themselves the task of providing for her a suitable alliance.

"The duplicity of Alvarez must have been obvious to anyone who was not blinded by excess of passion on one hand, and the security of sincere friendship on the other.

"I thought he was sincere; whereas, if I had only taken the pains to reflect, I might have seen that he should have taken the office of opening the matter to the King upon himself.

"However, as I stood tolerably well with Peter, I felt little repugnance to disclose my inclinations to him, which I did on the succeeding day, in the most modest way I could, concluding with an account of our reciprocal attachment, and of our engagement to each other which we had entered into previous to my taking the field.

"I was much surprised to see the King knit his brows, and discover manifest marks of displeasure, during the latter part of my speech.

"When I had done:

"Don Isidore de Haro," said he, "we have been pleased with thy services to our royal father, and have given thee proofs of our approbation. But think no more of this lady, as you value our favour. We have already provided her with a suitable match—our royal word is pledged, and cannot be departed from."

"I ventured to remonstrate, but he was inflexible, and I left his presence in a state compared with which the ordinary miseries of life were comfort.

"I sought Alvarez, and he told me that he was from the beginning apprehensive that I should not succeed, for that he had reason to believe the King purposed marrying her with the noble family of Garcias.

"With all the dissimulation of a true courtier, Don Alvarez affected to console with me on my misfortune, and left him nothing relieved by his discourse, though full of gratitude for his friendly sympathy.

"The agitation into which I was thrown by this mortifying refusal affected me so violently that I was taken extremely ill of a fever, the cause of which my pride urged me to keep concealed.

"In this extremity, I had nothing to support or relieve me but my dependence on the fidelity of my Isabella, whose soul was far above falsehood or caprice, and the indefatigable attentions of my faithful servant, Pierot, who, in his grief and care for me, brought himself into a state of health little better than my own.

"Thus was I nearly reduced to all the horrors of sickness, solitude, and disappointed passion.

"What," thought I, "avail my newly-acquired titles? I am a step of honour higher, it is true, but all my hopes of happiness are perhaps for ever blasted. Titles, rank, and all the pride of man! what are you but deceit? You mock misery, point the sting of adversity, and hold out the horrors of ruin to our view in tenfold amplification!

"In short, I not only forgot my honours, but myself also, and lived for some time almost unconscious of existence.

"I was roused from this state of torpid despair by an account that Peter was preparing to arm against our present King, then Count Transtamare.

"The news struck a gleam of light across my mind. Love suggested hope, and pride whispered revenge.

"I had known Henry during the life of Alphonso; we had often conversed and hunted together, and he professed a strong friendship for me as well as for Gonzalvo.

"You will not wonder, then, that the character of Peter, the insult he had already offered, and those which it was probable I might yet receive at his hands, joined to my respect and love for Henry, should of themselves even, exclusive of my passion for the fair Isabella, suggest to me the idea of deserting the service of the tyrant and flying to that of his adversary.

"The thought no sooner occurred than my resolution was taken, and I only waited for an opportunity of once more seeing my Isabella to carry it into execution.

"This opportunity soon offered.

"I informed her of the King's resolution, of my determination to retire, and wait for a more favourable time to complete our wishes. I conjured her to be firm in rejecting any proposals of marriage from another quarter, and assured her that it was my determination to take her from under the tyrant's power, or perish in the attempt!

"She answered that it was probable that would be effected without my interference, as the Queen-mother, Maria, in whose suite she was at the head of the confederacy formed against Peter, and in league with Count Transtamare. And finally, she assured me that nothing but death or my own inclination should keep us from uniting our fates together.

"We knelt down together, and with the holy rosary and crucifix clasped in our hands, swore to each other mutual fidelity.

"That very evening I departed, attended by my faithful Pierot, whose joy at getting fairly out of Peter's reach, which happened about sunrise the ensuing morning, burst forth in a strain of songs, jests, and observations, so simple, so pleasant, and so natural, that my gloomy reflections were insensibly banished from my heart, and I felt a transport the more exquisite as it was so long a stranger to me.

"When I reached Toro, where Henry was assembling his forces, he received me with open arms, expressed an earnest wish that Barons Rayo and Gonzalvo would shake off their attachment to the tyrant, and join him, but assured me that he well knew the refined principle upon which the baron adhered to the reigning monarch, and that rigid honour and integrity which governed his actions—but the event of this contest, be what it would, he and his family should be protected.

"Not to detain you with a recital of events which you know as well as me, the fall of Toledo was the fate of our cause. I escaped out of it by a miracle, and, still attended by my faithful Pierot, bent my course towards Portugal.

"The extreme fatigue of my body, joined to the anxiety of my mind, brought me again so low that I was obliged to take up my lodgings at a peasant's cottage on the banks of the river Guadiana.

"Here the genial temperature of the air, the wholesome, simple diet, the uninterrupted repose of the cottage and its inhabitants, whose cheerfulness insensibly found its way to my heart, and, above all, the exertions of my faithful Pierot to entertain and serve me, facilitated my recovery and made a considerable alteration in my spirits.

"I soon had strength to bathe and to hunt in the woods; and, pleased with the daily increase of my health and strength, remained there till I was perfectly recovered.

"It was not without great regret that I quitted this sweet, humble abode of innocence, hospitality and pleasure.

"After making the cottagers the best return I could for their hospitality, we separated, not without emotions of sorrow on all sides.

"I thought that Pierot would have broken his heart, and nothing less than his attachment to me could have torn him from them.

"Ah, your honour," said he, as we were travelling along, "that is what may be called living—that is a life after God's own heart! There we were neither afraid of crafty, undermining rivals, false friends, or cunning courtiers—there we had neither envy, jealousy, fraud, nor dissimulation—there we could lie down in our beds without any apprehension of death, but such as the Almighty might be pleased to visit us—without any fear of being one day pushed into the field of battle, and next day upon the scaffold—there were no tyrants to cut us off—no Peter to rob us of our sweethearts."

"This last word roused me from a state of repose in which the unusual calmness of our life at the cottage and the exhilarating influence of returning vigour had laid me.

"I relapsed into reflection.

"I began again to feel all the misery of being thus tyrannically cut off from everything that could render life supportable to me. I was stung to the quick at the thoughts of Isabella's being put into the hands of a rival; and as strength increased, the vigour of my mind increasing also, I began to examine the grounds of my despondence, and found that much of it was owing to a momentary awe impressed upon me by the furious and known relentless nature of the tyrant Peter, and the consequent depression of my spirits.

"I began to censure my too easy acquiescence, blushed for the meanness of my conduct, and heartily scorned myself for the abject dereliction of the duty I owed to my own happiness, and to the faith I plighted to Isabella.

"All allegiance to Peter was cast off; my fortunes were inseparably connected with those of Transtamare, which, though at present clouded, were far from extinguished, the wickedness of Peter himself being a more powerful engine in his favour than all the hosts of France.

"With this prospect, such as it was, I thought I could be content, could I only get possession of my Isabella.

"I should have told you that on the rupture between the queen-mother and Peter, she retired to her father's house.

"One difficulty only, therefore, lay in my way; but that was, to all appearance, an almost insuperable one, the probability being that, as Peter had crushed the confederacy, her father would not merely refuse his consent, but use every stratagem to deliver me up to the tyrant.

"I determined, however, to leave no means un essayed on my part, and to trust the rest to the affection of my Isabella, and the direction of Providence.

"Having thus adjusted the matter in my mind, I recrossed the Guadiana, and, disguised in the dress of a common Pisano, turned by the most unfrequented ways back through Spain towards Talavera, at a small distance from which—but where, particularly, I did not know—her father had his abode.

"After some days' weary travelling, I found myself near Talavera, and, in order to get proper information, determined to stop at the first cottage I came to.

"It was not long till one offered, of a most inviting appearance. With the cheerful consent of the people, I dismounted from my horse and entered, and found it within clean and well accommodated, beyond anything I could have hoped for, or had ever seen with peasants.

"After eating a hearty dinner, I retired to a small room to repose me after the fatigues of the journey, and soon fell into a profound sleep.

"I had not enjoyed it long, when I was awakened by a hand shaking me by the shoulder rather roughly.

"Surprise! I looked up, and saw Pierot hanging over me, with a face in which the most whimsical mixture of various expressions was portrayed.

"Joy, however, was the predominant trait, and I was pleased before I had reason to think I had cause to be so.

"'Lor', your honour," said he, "I hope you will pardon my waking you, but I could not, for the life of me, refrain. Oh, blessed Virgin! can you think it—the strangest, luckiest, oddest affair!"

"What!" exclaimed I. "Prithree say what it is?"

"Oh, your honour, I am half dead with joy, for to be sure nobody could have expected it! Did not I tell your honour how I dreamed last night that the horse you rode was all on fire under you, and yet never consumed or burned? and did I not tell you that it was a blessed dream, and that luck would come of it? and did not I tell you—"

"What, indefatigable babbler—what is it you would tell me?"

"Well—well, say what you will, dreams come out as true as the gospel of St. John of God."

"For Heaven's sake, Pierot, have you a mind to rack my brain to pieces with suspense, and make it as wild as your own? Tell me quickly what you mean, or, by Heaven—"

"Well, to be sure! If I thought your worship would be angry, my throat should have burst with the story ere I would have disturbed you! God knows, I thought that you would have flown through the roof of the house like a spark of fire up the chimney at the very mention of it."

"Hear me, Pierot," said I, hastily. "If you have aught that concerns my peace, which by the wildness of your looks and the incoherence of your words I am inclined to believe, let me have it in three words, or here I abjure you!"

"Three words, indeed—three words!" rejoined Pierot. "Lord of Heaven help you—it is worth three thousand words! But what are words? Three thousand pieces of gold—three thousand rubies and emeralds would be too cheap a purchase for such good—such delight—"

"Begone!" said I, in a rage. "Fly before I am tempted to commit some rash action, and annihilate you on the spot—brute—ass—barbarian!"

"Here I rose up in the bed, and lifting up a chair, was going to let it fly at him, when he walked away, muttering to himself, and getting outside the door, and half thrusting in his head, with a look of reproach, he said:

"You are too angry, then, to hear news of my Lady Isabella?"

"Graciously God!" exclaimed I, leaping from my bed—"Lady Isabella! Say again! Where? How? In what way? Tell me—tell me all!"

"Aha!" said he, triumphantly. "I thought your honour was not quite awake at first, or you would not have made such a difficulty of hearing my story! You must know, then, that in this very house, this that we now are in, and in that very bed in which you just now lay, and by that clean, orderly, neat, good-looking old body of a woman that you saw sitting in the wicker chair (well happy was her lot, and she says so herself)!"

"Sdeath! What of her?"

"There now, again; you cannot have patience, and I telling you in as few words as possible. By her, then, was your noble, dear, charming Lady Isabella nursed."

"Mother of mercy, is it possible?"

"Possible. Is my name Pierot? As sure, then, as it is my name, so true is what I say. Nay, this very morning did she bless this cottage with her presence, and to-morrow will come again; nay, if good luck befall, she may be here perhaps this evening, for it is yet far from night, and she sometimes comes after dinner."

"In a fit of rapture I threw my arms round my faithful Pierot, whose joy was nearly as great as my own, and who, while I was dressing, told me, in his disjointed, consequential manner, at which I should on another occasion have laughed, that the nurse, mentioning her young lady's name, and he, asking her if she ever heard of mine, declared that I had been almost the only subject of conversation between them for some time, and that she spoke of me as of a person already her husband.

"This account made me think that I should run no hazard in informing the old woman who I was.

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES SEARCHING FOR THEIR HORSES IN THE GARDEN OF THE HOUSE TO LET.]

"I called her, therefore, into the room, and told her. She wept for joy, and declared it was the happiest event she had for a long time known, as she was sure it would render her child (so she called my Isabella) completely blest.

"She had not long retired, when we heard the outer door open and a person enter. A confused, indistinct buzzing of female voices succeeded, and continued for some minutes. At length I heard a well-known voice—a voice more ravishing to my ears than seraphs' songs!

"Is it possible? Gracious Heaven! is it possible? Is my Isidore in this house?"

"Unable to contain myself, I burst from the room and caught her in my arms.

"Yes, my love—my faithful, my adored Isabella—your Isidore is here; and this blessed, joyful interview has more than recompensed for ages of affliction! Oh, my Isabella, didst thou but know what pangs—what sufferings mine have been!"

No. 126.—BLUESKIN.

"Here I was interrupted by the old woman with:

"I do not know, young senor, what your sufferings may have been, but many and many a tear has my young lady here in this very spot shed over your name; and even I, who did not know you, was fain to keep her company, she did so take on. But Lord, sir! I hope you will go fighting no more—fighting is a woundy, mischievous, unchristianlike thing, and no luck can come of it; and then my lady trembles so at the very thoughts of it that I wonder how you could have the heart to set about it."

"The old woman's gabble was a very seasonable relief to Isabella, who had sunk into my arms in a soft, speechless delirium of joy and surprise.

"As soon as cool reflection resumed its seat, I told her everything that occurred as I have already told it to you, and desired her advice upon the steps necessary to be taken to ensure our happiness.

"The division between Queen Maria and her son Peter, she said, had not altered the intention of the latter; and she candidly confessed that she had received her father's positive commands to entertain Garcias as her husband—that she was convinced all attempts to alter his resolution would be vain, and that my discovering myself would certainly be attended with utter ruin.

"Under those circumstances, she said, she was at a loss what to advise; but knowing my honour, and convinced of my sincerity and affection, was willing to adopt any means that I should prescribe to her.

"We now called the old nurse into consultation, and after some deliberation, it was agreed that we should be married the next morning at the cottage, and that the ensuing night she should leave her father's abode unobserved, and join me at the cottage, whence we should immediately depart and take shelter in Arragon till I could get intelligence where Count Transtamare had disposed of himself.

"Early next morning the old woman despatched her husband to a neighbouring village for a priest who lived there, to prevail on him to come to the cottage and perform the ceremony; and in the meantime, sent away a young lad, her son, to the town of Talavera, under pretence of getting medicines for her guest, who feigned sickness for the purpose, in order that he should be no interruption, nor suspect what was going forward.

"The old man being properly qualified to apply to the feelings of the priest—that is to say, having a purse well stocked with money—readily obtained his consent, and they both were betimes in the cottage to breakfast.

"Nothing was wanting now but the bride. With eager eyes I traced the path she was to come. I grew uneasy, then impatient. At last my heart sank into despair.

"At length she appeared.

"Oh, my Isabella!" said I, in a tone of tender reproach; "my heart was dying within me. The day was so far advanced, I began to fear you were detained!"

"Thou dead impatient!" said she; "dost thou not know that it is not yet eight o'clock?"

"Such are the thorny feelings, such the hopes and fears of true love."

"But why do I trouble you with a foolish detail of useless, uninteresting trifles?"

"Oh, proceed with it," said the baron. "Be minute—be particular; the most refined, intellectual sensation, the most exquisite delight, is that which arises from a nice investigation of the virtuous passions. Always an admirer of beauty—always the friend of love—age has not diminished my admiration of the one, nor my esteem for the other; and I declare that no part of your story has afforded me so much pleasure as the description of your passion and fondness for your amiable Isabella!"

"Ah, baron," returned Don Isidore, "amiable indeed! Had you known her—had that bliss but been reserved for me to see you clasp her in your fond, parental arms and bestow your blessing—"

"Hold, Isidore!" interrupted the baron. "Have I not griefs enough already? Wouldst thou that this, too, was added to the load? Alas! I fear—nay, I feel that I shall but too much deplore her loss upon the strength of thy description—to lose her when known might have been too much. But go on, my child—I interrupt you."

"To proceed; we were married in presence of the old couple, their daughter, who attended my Isabella, and my honest Pierot, who, perhaps, in excess of joy, fell not short of ourselves. He mused, he capered, he cried, and laughed alternately; and when the knot was tied, his reason overcome by the overflowing of his heart, he dropped on his knees at Isabella's feet, and, snatching up her hand, kissed it as if he would devour it, wept till he wetted it, and called her his master's saviour!"

"The priest gave me a proper certificate of our marriage, and departed, after having given the most solemn assurances of secrecy.

"Isabella returned to her father's house, and I retired to my room in a state of delicious transport that I was before a stranger to.

"I spent the rest of the day in framing plans of future happiness for myself and my Isabella.

"Impatiently did I wish for night. It at length came, and in due time brought my treasure to my arms.

"We set out without loss of time—Isabella mounted on my horse, while I rode on that of Pierot, and he and Inez, my wife's attendant, on a mule purchased of the old man for the purpose.

"I thought it most advisable to take the shortest road possible out of Peter's dominions, and therefore struck into one that led to the kingdom of Arragon.

"We arrived without any material accident at the city of Saragossa, where a rumour was in circulation that there was immediately expected a rupture between the kingdoms of Castile and Arragon.

"I directly despatched an account of this to the Count Transtamare, then taking refuge at the Court of France, in order that he might turn the rupture to the most advantageous account his policy might suggest to him.

"It was not long after that Henry himself appeared at Saragossa, entered into a league with the King of Arragon, and took the field once more against Peter.

"The prudence and valour of Henry gave victory to the Arragonian troops wherever he led them.

"I was seldom from his side, and can say that no man ever deserved good Fortune better, for as none showed greater power in winning her over, so none ever made a better use of her when won.

"The war was very successful.

"However, the King of Arragon thought proper to patch up a peace with Peter. Henry conceiving it prudent not to confide too far in him, returned again to Paris, attended by his wife Joanna—who had been rescued from the tyrant's hands—and by me and my Isabella.

"While we were in Arragon, my wife was delivered of a son—that same boy whom you honour with your regard. Henry was his godfather, and, with my consent, named him Alphonso, in honour of the King his father's memory.

"His mother, being extremely ill and weak after his birth, it was thought expedient to put the child out to nurse; and as we were to go into France, and it was necessary to leave the child behind, we despatched Pierot to Isabella's old nurse, at Talavera, to procure one she could depend on there, in order to be under her eye.

"The child accordingly was given to the woman sent by her with Pierot, and who went back attended again by him, furnished with a sufficient sum for three years' expenses, to be delivered to the old woman for disbursement.

"The anguish at parting with this dear, first pledge of our loves was unutterable; my wife's particularly was so extreme that she could scarcely support it; and she proceeded to Paris with a heart foreboding an eternal separation from her child.

"Of the various fortunes of Count Transtamare in his struggling for the throne with Peter, as you must already know them, I need not inform you more particularly, as it would break in upon the thread of my story. Suffice it to say I was with him in all; and even when domestic sorrow made me unfit for the world, I attended him.

"The sun of my bridal rose with brightness—but was, alas! eclipsed in its meridian!

"My wife had two children in the three years following the birth of Alphonso, who both died infants.

"In the fifth year she again proved pregnant—fatally pregnant. In due time she had a daughter, who closed the scene for me. Nine days after its birth I lost my comfort, my peace, my all in Isabella. She died, and left me the most miserable of all created beings.

"Yes, yes!—all joy vanished with my Isabella!"

"Here Don Isidore stopped, hastily arose from his seat, and retired.

"The good old baron, who saw and participated in his affliction, patiently sat, with brimful eyes, in expectation of his return.

"At length Don Isidore came back—took his seat—gave the baron a squeeze by the hand, with a look soliciting pity—and endeavoured to proceed.

"The baron purposely interrupted him.

"Did you hear nothing of your wife's father all this time, and did Don Alvarez take no steps to mediate between you and his brother?"

"I should have told you, in its proper place, that my wife opened to me the whole artifice and duplicity of Alvarez. It was at his instigation that the King resolved to marry her to Garcias, and she incurred his resentment by her resistance. When Isabella was brought to bed of her first child, I wrote to her father to inform him of the event, beseeching his blessing for his daughter and her child. He sent me a reply, gross and rude to the last degree, disclaiming all connection with his daughter, and threatening me with the utmost vengeance of the King.

"I despised the threat as much as I contemned the man, and contented myself with having done my duty to him.

"Meantime, I failed not in my inquiries about you and Gonzalvo, the recollection of whom constantly overcast even my happiest moments, as the frequent passing clouds preparatory to a storm darken the fair face of day.

"From the strange variety of contradictory accounts I received of you both, I had nothing left to conclude but that you had both fallen victims to the rage or jealousy of the tyrant; and I never could get rid of a goading reflection that by possibility I might by my desertion have excited the monster's jealousy and contributed to your ruin.

"As I had proved myself the zealous adherent and faithful servant of Henry, so he proved the most noble and generous of masters to me.

"When, by killing the tyrant, he got possession of the throne, one of his first acts was to bestow this estate upon me.

"He solicited me earnestly to remain about his person; but on declaring to him the state of my mind, and that nothing but the duty I felt to attend him in his dangers could have so long kept me from my so-much-desired retirement, he gave up the point, and honoured me by saying:

"How few, Don Isidore, are found, like you, ready to share in a monarch's dangers, and unwilling to participate of the splendours of his Court! Go, then. You know my power—be not distrustful of my inclination. Your services exceed the one, but not the other. Tax both to the utmost, and you shall not be disappointed. One promise only I exact from you, namely—that I see you once a year at least."

"He has ever since continued to load me with favours, and designs to provide amply for his son—for so he calls Alphonso.

"I was performing my promise of an annual visit when you first arrived here, and I still find him the same gracious and beneficent prince.

"One of his chief favourites is married to an aunt of my wife—the sister of her father. She affects friendship, but I can see that he and she abhor me, as they conceive a star between them and the inheritance of Don Pedro Guzman father-in-law's estate. But it is no matter. I know the King, and have no other feeling for them and their hatred than contempt.

"Since I came here, my chief prop has been my son Alphonso. His instruction has engrossed my whole care, my daughter being with the Marchioness del Oro, in Lisbon, who insisted upon taking her to herself.

"I must confess that the growing perfections of my son, every day disclosing some new beauty, beguile me of a portion of my sorrows.

"The clouds of misery that so entirely obscured my happiness begin to disperse, and the presence and conversation of you, my dear, revered patron and father (seizing the baron by the hand), will help to clear the whole hemisphere before me, and give the setting of my life that brightness which your counsel and protection afforded to its rising.

"One thing now on the expressions which have fallen from you about my son.

"When I consider the strong resemblance he bears to Gonzalvo—which I have often with pleasure noted, and which, considering their close consanguinity, is not so surprising, coupled with the circumstance of his bearing the name of Alphonso, which you say was that of Gonzalvo's son—I cannot so much wonder at your emotions.

"Nevertheless, one thing has struck me with astonishment,—that a soul so vigorous as yours—a mind fraught with all knowledge, and endowed with so much wisdom—could yield to the suggestions of a dream—a creature of fancy—a mere being of the imagination. To act by the monitions of such illusive shadows is to act against reason and against nature."

"Nature, my dear Isidore," returned the baron, "cannot give us a reason for all things, as most sceptics expect it should. That phenomenon, the marking of the fetus by external objects, and even by the workings of the imagination, is as much beyond the reach of human reason as the monitions of a dream or the appearance of departed spirits. The difference is, that the experience of almost all is in favour of the one—that of few in favour of the other. If, then, we be so ignorant of things immediately subject to our senses, what must we be in those of the soul abstracted from them?"

"Don Isidore shook his head, but said nothing.

"Dinner was served in. The happy Alphonso could hardly eat with the delight the baron's company afforded him; such charms has cheerful, accommodating old age for the tender heart of youth.

"It was that day determined that Don Isidore should proceed to Court to get the attainer taken off the baron, and that till that was effected he should remain undiscovered.

CHAPTER DLXXXV.

IN WHICH THE STORY OF OLD TIMES IS CONTINUED.

"WHEN Alphonso withdrew, after dinner, he was accosted by Pierot with:

"Don Alphonso (accompanied by a significant wink, and beck of his hand, as who should say, 'Follow me'), I have something to communicate to you."

"Alphonso followed.

"Pierot led him through the yard, then, looking about to see if the place was sufficiently secure from observation, he led him into the garden; thence, again, with the same precaution, into the vineyard, and thence into the field of exercise; then leading him into the very middle, as remote as possible from any place of concealment where listeners might stand, lest possibly some person might be there to hear what he was about to say.

"Taking Alphonso by a button, and staring full in his face with a look of infinite sagacity and importance, he said, in a whispering voice:

"Don Alphonso, do you know this old harper in the great hall?"

"How should I know, Pierot?" said Alphonso.

"Does my master, Don Isidore, know him?"

"Alphonso, unwilling to break the secrecy imposed upon him by his father, yetaverse to telling a direct falsehood, replied:

"How should my father know him, since he has not seen him many hours?"

"I tell you what it is, master— But, to be sure, it may be a silly thing I am going to say!"

"No matter," returned the youth; "say it, whatever it may be."

"Well, then— To be sure, I may be wrong, but my mind misgives me strangely!"

"What would you say? Don't fear! I shall never mention it! Speak out!"

"As I hope for mercy, the sight of the old harper made my hair stand on end; nay, the thought of him now makes my blood run in my body, and I wish he was well away from the house!"

"Why, what dost thou mean?" said Alphonso.

"I mean that—but— Well, I don't know how to say it!"

"Say it, be it what it may!" returned Alphonso.

"Well, your honour has often heard Don Isidore talk of the Baron de Rayo. He was a good man, to be sure; but that is no matter. I don't like to have anything to do with the dead! Well, you must know that this baron, within—I mean he that's like him—he, I say, was in the Tower of Liguenea for high treason, put there by that villain, Peter; and there he died, or, as some say, was put to death, by the orders of that devil incarnate, whom Christ pardon! Don Isidore took on so about him, and used to sigh and groan for him; and no wonder, for he was a father to him. Well, what do you think? But—but—I know you will laugh at me!"

"Indeed, Pierot, I will not! Let it be what it will, I shall not laugh at you!"

"Look you, Don Alphonso!" said he, clapping one hand on the top of his head and the other under his chin, "is this head I hold in my hands mine, or not?"

"Certainly it is, Pierot."

"Then, as sure as it is, the old harper in the hall is the ghost of the Baron de Rayo, who died in the Tower of Liguenea! It is, at least, his fetch! I knew him all the time he was at dinner, in spite of all his care to hide himself; and I trembled and shook like an aspen leaf, for he spoke in the same grand way he was wont to do at Montalto Castle! Lord! your honour's father, who does not fear the devil himself (St. John be our guard!) was as much afraid of the baron as a mouse of a cat—he was so grand! And it surprises me that Don Isidore does not know him, for all his coarse great coat, leathern belt, and long beard; but, to be sure, he is blinded by some charm! For my part, I know not what to do! I am afraid to tell Don Isidore, and I am afraid to let him remain unknown in the house, for God and his Holiness the Pope alone can tell what his designs may be; and though he was dearly fond of master when alive, who knows how the other world may turn his heart?"

"Pierot," said Alphonso, "keep this secret entirely to yourself; on no account let it go further! I will go and take proper means to find all out, and let you know. Meantime, be secret, I charge you!"

"Never fear, your honour; the world should not prevail on me to speak a word about it contrary to your orders! But, for the blessed Virgin's sake, let Don Isidore know soon, for I believe there is some ruination in the old baron's coming about the house!"

"Alphonso immediately flew into Don Isidore's closet to disclose to him and the baron the conversation between him and Pierot; and in order to make them more cheerful, he told them the whole, as it passed, but in a manner so pleasant and humorous, that they both, for the first time, relaxed into mirth, and gave way to a violent fit of laughter.

"The baron recollected the name of Pierot when Don Isidore mentioned him in his story; but as he was since advanced in years, he did not notice him when attending at dinner.

"It was agreed, however, to deceive him with regard to the baron's death—to let him know the truth, and bind him down to secrecy.

"For this purpose, he was called into the closet.

"As soon as he entered, the baron advanced towards him, and, in a deep and tremendous tone, said to him:

"Friend, this youth informs me—

"Here Pierot stood transfixed with horror—his face pale, his nostrils dilated, his eyebrows raised, and every other mark of a violent agony of fear upon him.

"With much difficulty, the baron preserved gravity enough to proceed.

"Dost thou know aught of me? Speak!"

"Ye—e—yes! That is, n—n—no!"

"Speak, and fear not!"

"Ah, Don Alphonso!" said Pierot, with a tremulous voice, "I did not think you would—"

"Speak!" said the baron again, with a voice that shook the room.

"Yes, your honour," said Pierot, hastily, "I did say to Don Alphonso as how I thought that your worship was—was—something—that is, a little like the deceased worthy Baron de Rayo."

"Here the baron took his hand, which—his mouth yawning wide with excess of horror—he endeavoured to withdraw, and, pressing it gently, said:

"And why not the baron himself, Pierot? Has ago and this coat so entirely disguised me that you thought me only a little like Baron de Rayo?"

"Your honour, then," said Pierot, brightening, "is not dead?"

"Certainly not," said the baron.

"Don Alphonso," said Pierot, "did I not tell you a month ago that there was to be luck in the way, and that I dreamed of a coffin flying with black wings over a gallow's—? a sure sign, as your worship knows, of good. But you are not dead?"

"No, indeed," said the baron, laughing.

"Then," said Pierot, dropping on his knees, "may God keep you so! It is true I told Don Alphonso that your fetch was here, but then I thought your honour was dead; and so—and so your worship knows that if you were dead you could not be here alive; and so I was not so much to blame. But, your honour, I was hugely frightened, although I am sure, though I say it, I would not turn my back upon e'er a he in the kingdom, excepting your honour, in fair living light. But for the dead, I always abhorred to have anything to do with them!"

"Well, then," said Don Isidore, "you now know the baron to be living, and have no further cause for fear; so make it your business to see that he is properly attended and served with the respect suitable to his dignity. But, mark me, let not, on thy peril, a single tittle of this discovery transpire!"

"I shall carefully obey your honour," said Pierot.

"It is very true," said Don Isidore, as Pierot retired, "a braver fellow, when opposed to men, never existed; but he is superstitious to an excess. Often has he persecuted—indeed, oftener diverted—me with his dreams; but mentioning of the dead seems to scare him. This is an unaccountable phenomenon in the human heart."

"Not at all," returned the baron. "He fears not men, because his senses are competent to judge of the danger, and apportion the power of resistance to it, in which case a boldness of nature gives him confidence and makes him estimate his own powers at the highest; but, in the case of spirits, his soul instinctively confesses the existence of such beings from false conception or early habit, attributes to them mischievous dispositions, while, being out of the compass of his sense, he cannot estimate their power, and therefore fears them. This, however contradictory it may appear to you, appears perfectly intelligible and natural to me."

"Next morning, Alphonso, passing at an early hour through the armoury, perceived Pierot hard at work.

"He had taken down the armour, and was cleaning them with all imaginable industry.

"What is all this for?" said Alphonso. "By whose direction is it that you take so much trouble?"

"Pierot, looking up in his face with a countenance full of sagacity and self-importance, said:

"We shall have rare doings now that the Baron de Rayo is here; he will be for tilting with you as he was wont with Don Isidore and young Henrico Gonzalvo. But tell me, senor, does the baron give any account of that sweet young gentleman? Oh, he was the flower of the country!—the cleverest, the handsomest—why, he was almost as big as the baron! Often—often, when I look at you, I think of him, for you are the picture of him, and so Don Isidore says. Ah—Lord help us!—where is he now? Have you heard, senor?"

"No, Pierot, I have not—not a word. But why this armour?"

"Why, there would be Don Henrico and your father, just when about your age—nay, before that—tilting, and lancing, and mook fighting, perpetually at it, and the baron looking on and instructing them. And now you shall see. I will wager my head against a truss of hay that before to-morrow night you will see this armour employed; nay, the old baron himself will be at it; but there is no armour to fit him."

"Alack, Pierot, he is old."

"Lord bless your honour, you little know what tough stuff the old codger is made of! I'll suffer our cook to cut off my middle finger and make a patty of it if I would not rather face any three men in our parish than him, old as he is. Only make him angry! Why, it was him that made Don Isidore what he was; and sure enough it was like master like scholar between them, for your father would fight the devil himself. There, at Algeziras, he cut his way through a hundred Moors, and brought intelligence to the King that saved the whole army from being cut off by the infidels. The King made a knight of him for it. I cannot tell you the particulars of it, for, if ever I talked of it as we rode together, he would stop me and blush as if he was ashamed of it."

"Well, Pierot," interrupted Alphonso, "I should not like to hurt anyone, but methinks war must be glorious sport. So grand—trumpets sounding—horses neighing—arms clashing—the King applauding! Oh, heavens—it must be delightful!"

"Where did you collect all those ideas, my dear—dear boy?" said the baron, appearing suddenly, "for surely you speak as feelingly, and, as pertinently, too, as if you had been already engaged?"

"I have read of them, sir," returned Alphonso, "and I think I should like to try them."

"And try them thou shalt, my boy!" said the baron, embracing him.

"I wish the baron may not have overheard me," thought Pierot to himself, recollecting his expression of 'old codger.'

"Should you like me for a master, my dear boy?" said the baron.

"Indeed I should, sir; but I wish you had a better office. It would ill suit you to bestow your time on a boy like me.'

"My dear boy," rejoined the baron, 'your father has consigned you entirely to my care, and in doing so has conferred on me the greatest possible favour. All my life used to arms, they will in old age be my best pastime; and perhaps it may not be unpleasant to learn that he who was your father's instructor in arms will be yours. This day, then, we begin; and with so promising a pupil, I have no doubt of doing everything.'

"That I will warrant you, old fellow," said Pierot, as the baron and Alphonso retired. 'If fighting will do, you will give him enough of it. By St. John of God! I believe the baron thinks that the Almighty made men for no other purpose but fighting. God have mercy on his old soul! I am sure it is time for him to think of something else; but I verily believe those fighting people think they are never to die, or that they have no soul to be saved.'

"With which words Pierot retired from the armoury, marking his forehead with a thousand crosses, and muttering as many pious ejaculations to the Virgin Mary.

"In a few weeks Don Isidore, according to a plan laid out by him, the baron, and Father Thomas, set off to Court, got the attainer of the baron reversed, and had special messages sent all over the kingdom, with letters from the gentry at Court, and orders from the King to the magistrates of the different towns, to search for Gonzalvo, his wife, and his child.

"By the King's desire, too, the Archbishop of Toledo sent despatches to all the heads of the Church throughout the country to the same effect.

"Thus the baron was able again to reassume his proper appearance, and had the consolation to think that if his children were living, there was a great probability of them being found, and to conceive a lively hope that he should yet press his grandson to his bosom.

CHAPTER DLXXXVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE STORY OF OLD TIMES.

"THE baron was surprised to find that his pupil had already acquired a considerable share of skill in the science of defence, and that he was an excellent horseman.

"His bulk and strength, too, were prodigious, considering his age; and the baron had reason to believe that he would one day ride foremost in the ring of heroes.

"In a few months, Don Isidore was prevailed upon to case himself in armour and enter the lists in mock fight with his son.

"Alphonso rapidly gained ground, and before the end of the second year Don Isidore pronounced him to the baron to be more than his equal in the encounter.

"His stature had enlarged to a size far above his father's; the puerile softness of his face began to harden into the firm features of manhood; the rude bulk of his limbs to form into most perfect symmetry; and the tender treble of his voice to increase into a strong, manly tenor.

"The heart of Don Isidore expanded with joy and raised him almost above mortality; while the pride and exultation of the baron sparkled in his eyes and gave new vigour and vivacity to his actions.

"If," said he, pleasantly, one day to Don Isidore—"if I continue to grow apace as I have done since I came to your castle, I shall be just of a proper age to go forth as Alphonso's squire at the time that he will be fit to enter upon the world."

"The sharpest afflictions find a period at last either in death or habit.

"Thus it was with those of the baron, who, though the messengers returned without being able to get the slightest trace of intelligence of his children, began to grow less wretched than he was.

"He found in Alphonso something on which to bestow his affection and employ his time, and the impression of his woes began to be insensibly effaced from his heart.

"The time when Alphonso should make his appearance in the theatre of life was approaching fast; and, as the first step was of the utmost importance, the baron, Don Isidore, and Father Thomas, held frequent conferences on the subject.

"But all their first plans were rendered abortive, and Don Isidore's happiness interrupted by an event as lamentable as it was unexpected.

"King Henry was suddenly cut off by poison, administered by the intrigues and jealousy of the Moorish King of Granada.

"On the accession of John, the son of Henry, to the throne, Don Isidore went to pay him homage; he was received, as the friend of his father, with distinction; and found the loss he had sustained in the late King's death in some measure supplied by the young King's choice of a minister and favourite, who was Don Juan de Padilla, a most particular and hearty friend of his.

"He therefore returned home more assured than he expected, and determined to send Alphonso to Court, recommended to Don Juan, as soon as possible, in order that he might be among the first who offered themselves as candidates for the favour of the young monarch.

"He accordingly set out, with all the appointments suitable to his views, attended by the trusty Pierot.

"On his arrival at Burgos, he delivered a letter from his father to Don Juan, who received him with marks of affection and esteem, assured him of his patronage and protection, and told him that he would take a proper opportunity to present him to the King.

"Don Juan was as good as his word.

"Sending one morning for Alphonso to come to him, he said:

"The King has, at my request, permitted me to present you to him, and has appointed this day for the purpose. He is young, of a charming temper, and most excellent disposition. He is already prepossessed in your favour, by gratitude for your father's service to the late King. You will find little difficulty, therefore, in making yourself agreeable to him."

"They went, accordingly, to the royal chamber, and were admitted to the young monarch, who, after a long conversation with Alphonso, and after having attentively examined his external deportment as well as his understanding, turned to Don Juan and said:

"Don Juan de Padilla, of all the young cavaliers whom you have hitherto introduced to me, this is he who fills up in my mind the most perfect idea of the true, gallant cavalier. His person is superior to any I have seen, and his conversation is a happy mixture of vivacity and good sense. Let him be near our person as much as is consistent with his honour and convenience."

"The early part of John's reign afforded the young Alphonso ample occasion to display his military talents.

"In various encounters with the forces of Portugal he carried victory along with him in almost every engagement; and, on the desertion of one of John's chief confidential officers, whose intelligence and knowledge of the Castilian army's situation might have given a decided advantage to the enemy, he pursued him to the hostile army, broke through a large body of those who surrounded the fugitive, seized him, and bore him through them triumphantly in his saddle back to the Castilian camp.

"When this prodigy of valour and prowess was announced to the King, he expressed his satisfaction in the most lively terms, and seemed to triumph not a little in his foresight and penetration in having at once discovered in Alphonso that superior heroism of which he had just given so striking a specimen.

"Peace being again restored, Alphonso became the constant companion of the King, from whom he received many flattering marks of favour, and among others knighthood.

"Among those youths of rank who kept about his person and laid claim to his favour was Don Rodrigo de Calvados, the son of a deceased nobleman, a favourite of the late King, and of Donna Maria de Guzman, sister to Don Pedro de Guzman, Don Isidore's father-in-law.

"By the address and intriguing disposition of his mother, he had been kept about the Court since his father's death.

"He was in his nature, subtle, pliant, fawning, and plausible.

"With those qualities he had contrived to engross much of the King's friendship to himself, till Alphonso stepped in, and almost without an effort engaged a share of it.

"Stung to the quick at the progress Alphonso made in the King's affections, and burning with envy of his superior accomplishments, he conceived the most implacable hatred against him, and wished for nothing so much as the destruction of his new rival.

"His chagrin became visible.

"His mother questioned him upon it, and he hesitated not to tell her the cause.

"The ambitious spirit of the lady could ill brook even a partial suspension of her views in favour of her son; her soul was up in arms, and her jealousy was as great of Alphonso's rising favours at Court as at the prospect he had of inheriting the estate of his grandfather and her brother, Don Pedro Guzman.

"The prowess of the youth made an open quarrel too dangerous an experiment; and surrounded as they were with crowds of spies, a plan of treachery was likely to be attended with equal danger, while his irreproachable conduct left nothing on which malice itself could ground an accusation.

"Thus puzzled, they knew not what to do, though they agreed that something must be done.

"It was a custom with the King to make parties of hunting, in which the ladies and gentlemen of the Court attended him.

"On such occasions they generally entered a great way into the depths of the forests where game was most plentiful, and there pitched tents for their accommodation.

"As it was now the season, the King ordered preparations to be made, invited a number of the gentry to attend him, and among the rest Alphonso Don Rodrigo and his mother.

"On the first day of hunting a large boar was started, which the King pursued, and, overtaking, was furiously assaulted by the animal.

"By some mismanagement of his horse, the King's spear missed the boar, who, turning short, with a rip of his tusk, gored the horse, which fell; and the boar was just repeating the blow when Alphonso stepped in between them, but in such a hurry that instead of piercing him through the breast he only opened a slanting wound in his neck, which rendered him more furious.

"The King, meantime, had disengaged himself.

"Alphonso, by a sudden and extraordinary spring, got from the boar before he could make another effort, and, meeting him with his spear, killed him on the spot.

"All this time Don Rodrigo stood at a cautious distance, complimenting the King on his fortunate escape.

"As soon as the company came up, every mouth was open at once, congratulating his Majesty on the fortunate issue of the affair, who, on his part, took Alphonso by the hand, and addressing the company, said:

"If my escape be an event from which you have derived any satisfaction, join in gratitude to him whose gallantry, under God, has effected it!"

"Alphonso was so overwhelmed with the compliments which were lavished upon him by all the company, that he could scarcely bear it; the goodness of the monarch was a weight too great.

"With difficulty he answered:

"If hazarding so worthless a thing as the life of Alphonso to save that on which the glory and happiness of a nation depend lays any claim to merit, I am overpaid by the success of the attempt! Do not, then, heap on me a weight I cannot support by thanking me for doing that which was my duty!"

"God forbid," said the King, "that we should set so little value on the services you have rendered us as your modesty would have us do! No, Alphonso, the gratitude of a King would be but poorly shown by mere professions. Your services shall neither be unrewarded nor forgotten!"

"Although Rodrigo and his mother were among the loudest in complimenting the youth, the new progress he had made by his heroism in the heart of the King, was like poison to their entrails.

"But when the ladies all expressed their admiration of his courage, beauty, vigour, and person, and above all, the modest dignity with which he received their praises, the malignant pair could scarcely restrain themselves; nor could Alphonso, had he known of their evil intentions, have wished them a greater curse than the company of their own feelings.

"What is there which a wicked woman will not do?"

"The aversion of Donna Maria de Calvados, which but for this late triumph might have remained smothered, now blazed with tenfold intensity.

"She riveted her eyes on him, and secretly wished that they had the power of those of the basilisk, that she might look him dead.

"As she looked at him, she thought she beheld features that she had once been acquainted with.

"This worthy lady had, previous to her marriage with Don Rodrigo's father, seen and conceived a tenderness for Gonzalvo, when he was first brought to Court. Nay, she had made overtures to him, of which his attachment to the daughter of the Baron de Rayo would not permit him to take advantage.

"It is no wonder then that the resemblance which Alphonso de Haro bore to that Gonzalvo should be soon recognised.

"She was astonished at it; she thought it beyond the usual course of nature, and measuring her belief by her wishes rather than by the facts, she set it down that he was really his son, and upon that suggestion, idle though it was, formed a plan which she determined to put in immediate execution.

"She informed her son of her suspicions, on which she said that she was resolved to act as if on certainty, and charged him to co-operate with her in informing the King.

"To this, Rodrigo objected that his doing so might raise suspicions in the mind of John, for that, he was so attached to Alphonso nothing less than positive evidence could shake him in his favour.

"The mother, aware of this circumstance as well as her son, now thought that an anonymous letter would be the best and safest way to try the temper of the King on the business.

"They sat down together, therefore, and produced the following letter, which Rodrigo contrived to have dropped in the King's private closet:—

"MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,—

"When treason lurks in any shape about your Majesty's throne, it is the duty of every subject to apprise you of the danger.

"A son of that traitor to the crown of Castile, the fugitive Henrique Gonzalvo, is now, under the false name of De Haro, near your sacred person. The old viper has eluded justice—crush the young one ere it stings you!"

"As soon as the King received this letter his esteem for Alphonso directly suggested to him the truth that it was the work of some envious enemy.

"He therefore sent for Don Juan de Padilla, and, first showing him the letter, told him his sentiments of it.

"Were not this artifice," said Don Juan, "too shallow for the genius of Donna Maria de Calvados, I should suspect her of being at the head of it; her whole life has been one continued scene of court intrigue, and she is most likely to be jealous of the favours you lavish on this young man in preference to her son, without considering the great difference in their talents and qualifications. As it is only justice to the youth the mask should be torn from the face of his enemies, I shall take the liberty to suggest to your Majesty a mode that cannot fail of discovering them."

"The young King, highly pleased, said he would join in it most willingly, and desired him to propose it.

"Order Alphonso to withdraw from Court!" said Don Juan.

"Order Alphonso to depart from Court?" interrupted the King.

"May it please your Majesty to hear me. The intrigues of your Majesty's enemies in the Court of Portugal require observation, and we have already agreed to retain some noble and faithful Castilian privately in your service there. Let Alphonso, under a feigned name, proceed thither among the rest, while I make it known that he is dismissed in consequence of this private admonition."

"And what end will this answer?" demanded the King, who did not relish the parting with Alphonso.

"Your Majesty shall know!" returned Don Juan. "When he is gone, your Majesty may express a desire to know to whose fidelity and good offices you are indebted for the admonitory letter, and doubt not but that, eager for personal approbation, they will disclose themselves!"

"The King immediately fell in with the plan of Don Juan, who sent for Alphonso, told him the affair exactly as it was, opened to him the plan, and concluded with telling him that it offered an opportunity of seeing Lisbon, which would not only amuse him but contribute to his information and improvement.

"Alphonso appearing much concerned, Don Juan earnestly inquired if the plan were agreeable to him.

"Oh, no—no, señor," replied Alphonso, 'but I am stung to the soul to think that I should have deported myself so as to make an enemy. But alas, this is a small concern!—the thought of giving trouble to my sovereign affects me most. What am I that so good, so great, so august a monarch should throw away a thought upon me? And what but injury can it be to me to discover who my enemies are, since I must necessarily revenge myself or despise them?' "

"Noble youth!" said Don Juan—"you are irresistible; yours are the sentiments of true nobility; I almost wish I could indulge you; but the King has made the affair his own, and will not be contradicted."

"Little preparation was necessary for Alphonso.

"The King sent for him, took him into his closet, assured him of his eternal friendship, and told him that he expected his return as soon as he could signify his desire for it, which would happen when a proper discovery took place, or when it was despaired of.

"Alphonso threw himself at the King's feet, kissed his hand and bathed it with tears of gratitude.

"May no disloyalty or disaffection but such as mine," said he, 'ever approach your sacred throne!'

"The King then, presenting him a paper to be delivered to Don Juan, and putting a costly ring upon his finger, bade him adieu.

"He waited on Don Juan immediately, who, reading the paper, told him that it was an order to pay him ten thousand piastres for the expenses of his journey.

"That night, Alphonso, attended by Pierot and two guides, set out for Portugal, and the next day it was whispered that the King had dismissed him in disgrace.

"From the first town, he wrote a letter to his father and another to the baron, informing them of the recent event, and desiring a letter to his aunt, the Countess of Leiria, in Lisbon.

"At the end of three days the guides left them, and he and Pierot were left to themselves.

"The latter, who was by nature sociable and loquacious, thinking the departure of the guides gave him a licence to converse with his master, asked him whither and for what end he was going.

"I am going, Pierot," said the youth, 'to see that grand and universally-admired city, Lisbon, and to search for adventures, as a valiant Christian knight should do!'

"I cannot understand what your honour means by adventures!"

"I am going, then," said he, 'to redress grievances and right wrongs—to protect, when it falls in my way, poverty and weakness against the violence and encroachments of the wealthy, the proud, and the strong!'

"God and the blessed Virgin prosper such intentions! To help the weak and the poor is good; but I doubt me your honour is too ready to fight for the strong and the great too! Now, although fighting be a very good thing on occasions when one is obliged to do it (and I can myself take and give a few hard knocks, as the saying is, when need requires, as well as another), yet, methinks it is a strange sort of a trade to follow, and very unfit for a gentleman above all others!"

"Why for a gentleman, Pierot?" said Alphonso, who liked his discourse.

"I'll tell your honour: When a poor fellow is reduced to get his bread by knocking others on the head, it is hard enough on him; but still, perhaps he can do no better; and if he endures hardship, or is knocked on the head himself, he may comfort himself with the thoughts that he might have endured worse; but here is your honour, who might be comfortable and warm at home, set out on a wild-goose chase to look for fighting, and after getting enough to satisfy a reasonable appetite on the part of the King, are now going, for lack of better, to look for more on the part of beggars!"

"But, Pierot, honour is as great a reward and as necessary to the existence of a gentleman as bread is to that of a peasant!"

"I should be glad to know," returned Pierot, 'what honour there can be in breaking bones, cracking of crowns, or poking spears into fellows? I think it would be more honour to be sitting at home with your father, or playing innocently with the old armour and the fierce old baron at home, at the castle of Querro!'

"But, Pierot," said the youth, 'if some of us did not fight, we should become a prey to our enemies, and to all bad men who choose to wrong us.'

"True enough, I say still, when it comes to one's hand. But why run our heads against stone walls, as the saying is? Your honour's father was as brave a warrior as any in Spain, but he was wise enough at last to go and stay at home in peace; and he has done more good and got more honour in one week since than he could have got in fifty years mad prize-fighting about the world. There is the old Baron de Rayo—why, I suppose he has fought more than a thousand tigers, and what is he the better for it?—what was his honour at last? Why, an old baize coat and a tune on the harp for his dinner. There was the noble Henrico Gonzalvo—he took a flight after honour, as you call it, and never came back again. Mark me, dear master, I am old, and can instruct from experience more than others from books. Honour is a very dangerous thing: it is like a ghost; you think you see it—you may catch at it, but you can never hold it fast; and, for my part, I have seen so much ruin brought about you all by it that I tremble at the name almost as much as I do at that of a ghost."

"Upon my word, Pierot, I had no conception that you were so ingenious a casuist! Proceed, for, notwithstanding your erroneous imagination, your argument pleases me."

"Well, then, your honour, there's Don—Don—Diabolo—oh! Don Rodrigo; he, too, is one of your men of honour. It seems that honour is got different ways, for the day you took a fancy to try how a wild boar's tusk felt, and ran so honourably between death and the King, Don Rodrigo shook from head to foot. I was near him. His face was the picture of death; and I plainly perceived other marks of fear, which I won't mention. Well, this Don Rodrigo is a man of honour, too. Now, the question is this: If honour be got by cowardice, is it worth the labour and danger of fighting for?"

"Pierot," said Alphonso, 'with all your simplicity, you have put a question now that would puzzle a learned clerk to expound; but still, from mistaking the subject. If, as you say, Don Rodrigo be a coward—which I believe is only the effect of your imagination,—it must be considered as a misfortune, not, dishonour. It is true he is in that case not a man of military honour, but he may be a man of moral honour; and, being a favourite of the King, the presumption is that he must be in some respects honourable. For know, Pierot, that the roads to the temple of honour are many, and it is of little consequence which a man takes, so he pursues that for which he is qualified by nature, and makes true religion his guide, and a clear conscience his companion.'

"Now your honour," quoth Pierot, 'hath tied a knot with your tongue which you cannot untie with your teeth, though they were each as strong as that said boar's tusks. You say honour is your aim. Very well. There are many roads, you say, to honour,—no matter which you take. Then why not take the plain, easy, comfortable path home? There, with your father and your friends, by-and-by with a pretty wife and a parcel of children, blessing all the poor with your bounty, they blessing you with their prayers. Ah, señor, there would be honour—there would be glory! But this pate-breaking, bloody, cut-and-thrust work—a plague upon it, I say! It is inhuman, unchristian, and abominable, and I cannot abide the thoughts of it, unless, as I said before, it falls in one's way, and then I will make the best use of the arms God gave me, and defend myself.'

"It was evening when this conversation passed between Alphonso and his faithful servant, Pierot.

"Just as the latter had concluded his last sentence, they were suddenly alarmed by the screaming of female voices at some distance before them in the forest.

"Alphonso, who, by the interruption of the trees, could not see the objects from whom the noise proceeded, spurred on his courser, and was followed close by Pierot, whose aversion to fighting was more the result of his reason than the dictates of his heart, and who in an instant forgot all his prudent apophthegms, and drove on his horse with as great eagerness as ever did knight of chivalry.

"After riding at full speed a few hundred yards, they found that the object of their pursuit had changed its position, and that the screams were more to the right hand, and observed that they were growing fainter, while the trampling of horses plainly bespoke a flight, and convinced him that no time was to be lost.

"They therefore turned to the right, and pressed forward with all speed.

"For a considerable time they followed the noise, sometimes coming nearer, sometimes losing the sound, till at length they observed before them a chaise, driving full speed, and guarded by a number of men well mounted and armed.

"At this sight they pushed their horses harder.

"That which Pierot rode being swifter than his master's, which was of the larger and heavier kind, he got up first, and concluding how things were, rushed eagerly by the horsemen, and with a stroke levelled the driver of the chaise, and then with a dexterous blow gave one of the mules which drew it a cut on the back of the neck which laid him dead, and effectually stopped the progress of the whole.

"Then turning upon the horsemen, who had been already charged by Alphonso, they both laid about them with such fury, that after laying one dead and wounding three others so that they could not escape, they put the remainder to flight.

"Alphonso then came up to the chaise, and found in it two ladies, one of whom had fainted and was supported by the other, who demonstrated every mark of dismay and distraction.

"The veil of the lady who fainted was kept carefully down by the other, which Alphonso perceiving, said:

"It is my earnest wish, lady, to render you and your companion who has fainted every assistance in my power, but I fear my presence may, for some reasons, be at this time improper. I shall, if that be the case, withdraw, and stand within hearing till it may be your pleasure to call upon me. Meantime, madam, fear nothing; for be assured that he who has had the felicity to step between you and the violence intended you will protect your person to whatever place you may think it expedient to go for security."

"Pardon me, sir," returned the lady, after a pause, in which she viewed the youth with an earnest eye, "if, in the consternation I was in at the scene which has just passed, I should have confounded innocence with guilt, and conceived that we had been saved from one ruffian only to be subjected to the violence of another; but, as the courtesy of your expressions, the delicacy of your manner, and, let me add, the nobleness of your air, proclaim you incapable of dishonour, I shall not scruple to put myself under your protection, and entreat your assistance to convey us to a town not two leagues hence, where I shall be tolerably secure till I can prosecute my journey. In the meantime, I shall be obliged to you to order your servant to bring a drop of water to the relief of this young lady."

Alphonso immediately ran off, and in a few minutes returned with some water in his helmet, which he, with many apologies, presented to the lady, who, removing the veil from the face of her who had fainted, discovered to the astonished youth the most exquisitely-beautiful set of features he had ever beheld.

"But if he thought them beautiful while bespread with the pale hue of death, what were his sensations when, as life returned, expression and colour were restored to her cheeks; and when, opening her eyelids, she stared wildly around her, and discovered a pair of eyes so far beyond any he had ever beheld?

"He was lost in rapturous astonishment, while she cried:

"Oh, save me—save me—in pity save me from the tyrant! Alas! where are we? Who is this cavalier? But why do I ask? He is one of the duke's creatures! Yet surely he looks noble, and wears not the face of a ruffian! Tell me, dear madam, where are we? Are we safe? What means this pause of quiet, so different from that which passed but now?"

"Compose yourself, my child!" said the elder. "All is well! The perturbation of your spirits calls for rest; therefore refrain, for the present, from interrogating me, and content yourself with the assurance that we are safe as yet."

"Bely, ladies," said Alphonso, "upon such protection as I and my servant can afford you, and rest assured that we will still defend you while we have life to move an arm!"

"It is not a few Portuguese that shall hurt you!" said Pierot, with a bow to the chaise, by way of hint to the ladies to be of good cheer.

"I already perceive that, my good friend," said the lady.

"Everything being arranged in the best manner circumstances would allow of, and the prisoners secured, the ladies and their gallant champions set forward towards the town, where they arrived at a late hour.

"The ladies retired to a chamber, while Alphonso and Pierot went to a magistrate, who despatched a guard to bring the wounded men, attended by Pierot to show the place.

"The ladies and Alphonso supped together.

"During supper, he sucked in the poison of love in such large draughts that he found little room for food, while the elder lady cursorily hinted that she was flying with her young ward into Spain to release her from the addresses of an importunate, amorous old nobleman of Portugal, whose influence at Court made it dangerous to offend him.

"She added that, finding her going, he had taken that violent method of procuring by force that which was denied to his rank, wealth, and solicitations.

"Alphonso paid her a handsome compliment on the generosity and disinterestedness of her principles; said that to give such youth, innocence, and beauty to the possession of old age, would be a crime worse than sacrilege; expressed his joy at having been instrumental to her safety, although he foresaw that his peace of mind for ever was the price at which he had purchased it; and concluded with a vehement declaration of love.

"The elder lady said that she hoped he would confine his discourse to such subjects as she could listen to; that, indebted though they were to his valour and generosity, their acquaintance was too short, their knowledge of each other too slight, the passion he had avowed too suddenly formed, to countenance either him in making such a declaration, or her in listening to it.

"She therefore entreated that he would be silent on that subject, else she should be obliged, however unwillingly, to retire.

"Alphonso bowed, and, for the rest of the short time they sat together, confined himself to the language of the eyes.

"Alphonso slept not the whole night.

"He tossed, he tumbled, he sighed.

"He formed a thousand strange, vague plans, every one of which he again rejected.

"At last he determined to discover to the ladies who he was, in order to secure a favourable reception.

"At daybreak he arose, and, calling Pierot, was by him informed that the ladies, after parting from him, had given orders for the chaise and fresh mules, and departed.

"Alphonso was in an agony of despair.

"He immediately took horse and pursued them in the route towards the confines of Spain till their horses were unable to proceed, and he found pursuit vain.

"Alas!" said he, "what a wretch am I to have seen such beauty, and to have it snatched from me in an instant! Ungrateful! No mark—no proof of gratitude or regard! Oh! would that I were dead!"

"As to mark—if you mean a token," said Pierot, "perhaps we have got one without their consent or desire. Look at this," said he, producing a picture of the young and beautiful object of his affection.

"Gracious Heaven!" exclaimed Alphonso. "How—where—by what means did you get this?"

"Why, when the alguazils and I went to the spot where we rescued the ladies to look for the wounded ruffians, we could not find them; and, searching about closely with the lanterns, I found that picture lying on the ground, which I brought back with a determination to give it to the lady; but now they are gone, I am glad you have it."

"Thanks, my honest Pierot!" returned Alphonso. "Never shall this be forgotten to thee! For this will be some comfort—some consolation under my miseries!"

"They then turned back towards Portugal by another road, and without further accident reached the city of Lisbon, where, to his great regret, he found that his aunt had, in consequence of the death of her husband, retired from Lisbon and gone on again into Spain.

CHAPTER DLXXXVII.

THE STORY CONTINUED.

"It was now that season of the year when the people of all Christian countries devote themselves to joy, festivity, and thanksgiving in anniversary commemoration of the birth of the Saviour of Mankind, when Alphonso set out from Lisbon on his return to Castile, in consequence of a message from the King, who desired him to leave Portugal and return into Spain.

"He had formed the resolution of seeing as much as he could of the country before his return, and therefore visited the city of Seville, purposing thence to proceed to Cordova, and so to Burgos.

No. 127.—BLUESKIN.

"He left Seville on Christmas Eve, and had already some near the ancient town of Corunna, when, hearing a more than usual noise of bells ringing, he demanded of a shepherd whom he accidentally overtook on the road what was the occasion of it.

"You must be a stranger to Spain, although you speak the Castilian tongue," said the shepherd, "not to know that to-morrow will be the nativity of our blessed Redeemer, and that on that account the bells are ringing."

"I am," returned Alphonso, "a Castilian and a true Christian, thank God, but a long journey and a variety of incidents prevented me from attending to the time. I knew it was the season, but was perfectly heedless of the day itself being so near. Shall I be able to reach Cordova to-night?"

"You may," returned the shepherd, "if your horse be able to keep the pace he is at and you happen to hit the right road, which, I assure you, is very difficult and very dangerous too, for there be so many roads before you, ranning like your fingers from your hand, that you will be very apt to miss the true one; and the caverns and old Moorish towers on the ridges of the Sierra Morena are filled with bands of robbers. However, keep to the right of yonder brow that is topped with a broken rock resembling a tower. As you proceed by that, you will keep still to the right till you come near the town of Palma; keep to the left of it and you will probably meet some goatherd who can direct you, if not, God and our blessed Virgin be your guide!"

"As soon as they parted from the shepherd, Alphonso quickened his pace.

"If I were allowed to advise," said Pierot, "we should proceed to the town of Palma, of which the shepherd spoke, and there go to midnight mass, and on the morrow proceed with a proper guide to Cordova, for it is not alone the robbers of which he told you that we have to dread, but, this being the season when the fairies and all sorts of goblins are wandering about and playing their frolics, who knows what mischief may befall us? And if we should chance to be misled by any of those malicious demons and beguiled into those mountains which look a thousand times blacker than night itself, we might possibly fall into the bowels of some monstrous cavern or tumble down some of those frightful precipices with which I am sure those mountains abound."

"Pierot," interrupted Alphonso, "why should you, being a Christian, suppose that we have more to fear from demons, as you call them, at this season than at another? I should suppose that we have rather less. However, I am positively determined to proceed; meantime you may remain behind, and follow me at your leisure. Your fears might probably produce those very mischiefs of which you express such apprehension, therefore turn you into Palma while I push on to Cordova."

"Pierot said not a word, but followed his master, who pushed forward briskly.

"Night drew on apace, and they insensibly became shrouded in the bosom of a deep forest bounded on either side by stupendous mountains, which, rising almost perpendicularly, hid their heads in the skies, and whose rugged protuberances seemed to frown with savage aspect on the narrow path that wound through the wood below.

"The awful solemnity of the scene was increased by a rapid rill of water which growled down the bosom of a gien, and, bursting into a sudden cataract, thundered on the rock below.

"Senor," said Pierot, earnestly, "hear me—for the blessed Virgin's sake, hear me! Remember that a fool's advice has saved many a wise man from ruin. I warn you that we are going astray. Return, for the love of Christ, and do not run headlong upon your fate!"

"Peace—peace!" returned Alphonso. "Didst thou ever see a spot so calculated to call up ideas of sublimity and magnificence? Didst thou ever see so charming a night? The moon herself seems to assume increased splendour to chase away the obtruding clouds and shine with unobstructed lustre on the business of this night."

"Blessed Virgin!—what is that?" exclaimed Pierot.

"What do you talk of?" said Alphonso.

"If I live," said Pierot, "I saw the strangest sight—"

"It is your fear, not your eyes that saw it," returned Alphonso.

"Just as he spoke he descried a person of more than common size before him, who seemed walking hastily through the path of the forest in the same direction that he was going.

"He spurred his horse into a round pace in order to come up with him.

"But though he at last pushed him to a gallop, the object still kept before him, till, coming to an angle formed by a narrow road at the foot of a perpendicular corner of the hill of immense height, he turned round it and got out of sight.

"Alphonso, still quickening his pace, turned it also, and found a vast open plain, extensive beyond sight.

"Nothing was to be seen.

"He drew in his bridle, and stood bewildered in contemplation, while all was wrapped in a silence truly awful.

"He was lost in astonishment, and remained for some time in a state of doubt and meditation.

"At length, turning to Pierot, whose fears were wound up to a pitch of superstitious horror not to be described:

"It is not possible," said he, "that this delicious plain should be uninhabited, yet can I see no trace of human residence, and the moon is so bright that I think I should if there were any. I will holloa aloud—perhaps there may be some one within hearing."

"He then called out with all his might, and was answered by an echo which reverberated his voice a number of times, increasing each time in loudness, till at last it died away in the same number of reverberations again.

"Utter dismay seized Pierot.

"Alphonso was not perfectly at ease.

"Not a soul appeared.

"He waited many minutes with impatience.

"I will holloa again," said he.

"For the mercy of God, senor," said Pierot, "take care what you do! Let us call upon Heaven, and turn our horses back again into the path we came!"

"Alphonso perceiving no track on the plain before him, agreed to do as Pierot advised him, and turned towards the road from which he had wandered in pursuit of the figure.

"He had scarcely gone three steps, when the air was filled with lamentable shrieks.

"He stopped.

"They ceased.

"Blessed Virgin!" said Pierot—"where are we got, or what can those screeches mean?"

"So!" cried Alphonso, rather peevishly, "do you not perceive that they are owls, which fly in clouds about us?"

"By this time he again thought him of the road, and, being at the corner, looked out for it, and perceived many paths leading through the forest in that direction.

"While he was considering which of them to take, a sigh of deep anguish, heaved as from the bosom of a behind him, caught his ear.

"He turned his head and again saw the figure walking at an easy pace.

"He wheeled round his horse and again pursued, observing it attentively.

"It had a long spear in its hand, and glided with amazing swiftness before him.

"Stop," said he, in a loud voice—"stop, and I swear by the God of Christians you shall receive no harm!"

"Immediately the vast concave of the hills was filled all round with an echo which in the most awful manner repeated:

"You shall receive no harm!"

"The figure outstripped him, and again disappeared.

"Alphonso paused.

"Then, turning to Pierot, said:

"There must be something in this. Come of it what will, I am determined to proceed in this direction," and then spurred his horse forward.

"He had not gone far when the moon all at once became obscured.

"The most dismal darkness, interrupted ever and anon with flashes of lightning, which served but to make it the more horrible, succeeded.

"Rain fell in torrents, while the wind blew as if it would root up the surrounding mountains from their bases and filled the air with groans and hollow sounds.

"He spurred his horse into a gallop, throwing the reins upon his neck, and leaving him to his own discretion or to that of a superior Guide.

"He had not ridden long before he found his horse stop suddenly, and, looking attentively before him, thought that through the dark void he could perceive a high wall with battlements.

"He again called out aloud.

"A tumultuous noise was heard, and all at once he perceived several large windows, resembling those of a church, illuminated by a strong light from within.

"Concluding it to be a chapel lighted up for the purpose of celebrating midnight mass, he blessed God for the miraculous event which led him to it, and, dismounting from his horse, sought out an entrance.

"There was none on that end, and the place on either side was so closely enveloped in thick underwood and bushes that he found some difficulty in getting through them.

"He pierced through them, however, and found on the side a door open.

"He entered it, and passing through an aisle perfectly illuminated, found himself in the body of a magnificent church and very near the altar.

"He wondered much to find that there was no one in it, but concluding the priests were in the sacristy and the congregation not come, he knelt down to pray.

"Scarcely had he been in this position two minutes, when music the most heavenly struck up, and he heard the 'De Profundis' chanted by voices more than human, and the whole fabric shook with the notes of an organ whose deep tones equalled those of thunder.

"He heard but saw no one, and was riveted to the ground with astonishment.

"The music stopped.

"A bell, that seemed to shake the church to its foundation, tolled, and he reckoned twelve.

"The lights vanished.

"His ears were assailed with the most piercing sighs.

"A hideous noise, like the crashing of a vast pile of falling rocks, was heard.

"He drew his sword and offered up a prayer to Heaven for his safety.

"A noise, as of the flight of an immense pair of wings passing through the air, was heard wafting its heavy way round the vaulted ceiling of the aisle.

"The resolution even of Alphonso could scarcely support it.

"'Whatever thou art,' said he, in a low and solemn tone, 'that hast led me into this perilous and awful place, I conjure thee, by Him whom the Almighty this blessed night gave as a ransom for our sins, to speak to thy intent!'

"He paused for a reply, while his bristled hair stood erect upon his head, and the marrow in his bones froze as into stone, and his head, even to the deep recesses of his brain, felt as if congealed into solid ice.

"He heard the clashing of a sword against armour. His mind was wrought up to the madness of horrid expectation.

"And straight, a figure, such as he had seen, but rendered visible by a lambent flame which played about it, stood before him.

"It seemed far above the common size; but its aspect was rendered still more formidable by an enormous warlike plume that nodded on its helmet, and seemed reflected, as in a mirror, on the brightness of the armour in which it was cased.

"Excess of horror wound up the shaking spirits of Alphonso, and he put himself in a firmer posture of defence.

"'Whatever thou art,' said he, 'approach no nearer. My trust is in the Almighty, and if thou be wicked thou canst not hurt me. If there be aught that I can do—'

"The figure sighed.

"Alphonso's fear was lost in compassion and curiosity.

"'Fear not, dear youth,' said the figure. 'Reserve your sword for vengeance.'

"With these words the helmet fell from his head, and disclosed a countenance of majestic sadness, pale and bloody; while long redundant hair entangled with clotted gore hung in loose disorder over his shoulders.

"Again it sighed, then glided backwards till it reached the wall, which yawned and shut him in.

"Alphonso, his senses suspended between amazement and pity, by a convulsive impulse of which he was unconscious, darted forward and plunged his sword after the figure into the wall, which, closing, held it fast.

"He exerted all his strength to draw it out in vain.

"While he was thus engaged, a strain of music, more soothing than human skill could produce, struck up and lulled him by degrees into a sweet and gentle sleep, and he sunk upon the ground.

"The figure was still present to his imagination.

"He dreamed that it took him by the hand, and leading him through a number of dark and intricate windings, presented him to Baron de Rayo, saying:

"'To your conduct I consign him.'

"And then presenting him with a key, said:

"'Take this, consult the baron, and be resolute. Nor bolts, nor bars, nor walls of adamant, nor human fraud, nor human force can resist those whom God has designed to be the instruments of Heaven's vengeance.'

"On which the armour of the figure gaped, a skeleton fell from it in fragments at his feet, while the coat closed upon him, the helmet and plumes lodged upon his head, and he found himself armed cap-a-pie.

"Encumbered with the unusual weight, he struggled and awoke, and perceived that day had dawned.

"His first sensations on awaking were little more than a dream.

"He was bewildered in a maze of awe and wonder at what he had seen, and in strange conjectures on that which he had dreamed.

"He could hardly determine at first whether the whole had not been a dream, till looking at the wall he perceived his sword sticking in it.

"He caught it by the hilt, intending to use all his strength to draw it out; but it yielded to a twitch.

"In doing this he missed his ring.

"He sought for it up and down the floor for some time in vain.

"At last, recollecting the violence of his efforts in the night to draw forth his sword, he turned to search there.

"There was a small heap of rubbish lying under.

"He scraped it up in search of the ring, which he found.

"Just as he took the ring up, he perceived a key lying in the rubbish, and snatching it up also, saw that it exactly resembled that which he had dreamed of.

"'Gracious Heaven!' he exclaimed. 'To what mysterious agency am I thus conducted?'

"Then kneeling, and devoutly lifting up his hands and eyes to Heaven, fervently prayed for fortitude and wisdom proportioned to the great work, of which he saw himself likely to be made the instrument.

"Having thus prayed, he found himself unusually invigorated and cheerful.

"He looked around him, and was surprised to find the face of everything entirely different from that which he had the preceding night conceived it to be.

"He found that the church had been suffered to fall to ruin.

"Branches of the trees without were striking through the half-demolished window cases.

"Weeds were growing near that which had been the altar.

"The ceiling was pierced with holes and breaches, which served as nests for various birds.

"There were no doors, but one small one, which were not stopped up.

"He got into one of the windows, and saw a large space resembling a garden, but filled with trees, whose spreading branches, interwoven with each other, almost excluded light or air, while the bottom was choked with noisome weeds, briars and bushes.

"This place was bounded on the other side by a large building, which, though very high, had no windows in that direction.

"He again descended, and went into the aisle, which he found in the same way enveloped in bushes.

"He sought for the door by which he had entered, and with difficulty found it.

"It was a winding passage through a wall.

"A great gate—once the entrance—he observed to be carefully closed up, but it was in a different direction from the passage at which he had come in.

"He then returned to the chapel, and with a scrutinising eye observed the place where his sword had stuck, in order to mark it.

"He took out his book, and accurately noted all the particulars, the altar serving him as the great guiding mark.

"Then going out through the aisle and narrow passage, with difficulty made his way through the bushes, marking it carefully, however, by breaking down some large branches.

"After winding round the wall, he found Pierot in such a state of horror and suspense as human nature was scarcely able to support.

"'Had you stayed much longer, senor,' said he, 'I should have expired. How have you the heart to endure such things, I cannot tell. I am sure I'm afraid of no living man that ever wore a head; and yet, if my hair be not turned white with fear, I much wonder at it.'

"'Why, what now?—what has been the matter?'

"'Matter, your honour?—matter enough! Why, your honour had not gone as long as I could reckon ten, when all the lights in the windows went out, and then I heard a clashing of swords, and then groaning, and then shrieks like those of unfortunate departed souls in trouble. I thought that the life would leave me. However, fearing you might have been attacked, I resolved not to act like a cowardly rascal, and got off my horse, drew my sword, and went round this wall. Then the noise ceased. I attempted to break through the bushes; but, oh Lord! if I am here alive, a thousand snakes began to hiss at me like red-hot horseshoes in water, so that I was fain, in spite of me, to draw back. When I returned to the place where I left the horses, I found that they had run off about the plain—a plague upon them! I ran after them, for the moon shone bright again, and a curse—confound the brutes!—they would not let me catch them till about ten minutes ago. I at last began to think of going in to look for you, and if I could not find you, to set off to Don Isidore's as fast as I could, to tell him the dismal news; but, thanks to the blessed Virgin, you are here, and, as I think, safe. So mount your horse, clap spurs to him, and, without once looking behind you, gallop away from this mansion of demons, fairies, ghosts, and devils! Lord, senor, are not you dead with fear? Make haste—make haste! And when you get out of the way of the demons, let me know what befel you; but do not say a word here, for they would set us all wrong in an instant, and keep us another night, perhaps for ever, in this abominable place, which looks somehow more black and gloomy than hell itself! Nay, I dare say that every step we move, we tread on the bodies of murdered people! Haste you, therefore, dear master of mine—haste you! Mount your horse, and let us be away as fast as our best legs can carry us!

"Pierot," said Alphonso, "I do firmly believe you to be, in an encounter with mere flesh and blood like yourself, as brave a fellow as ever Castile bred; but superstition makes you in other cases a coward to excess—I say to excess. What stronger proof can there be of this than your distaste to this place, which I solemnly declare I think to be the most charming spot by far that I have ever beheld? Here there is nothing wanting which can render the face of a country enchanting."

"Ay—ay!" interrupted Pierot. "God knows there are charms and enchantments enough in it! But, for mercy's sake, senor, make haste, and let us be gone before it grows dark! I dare say that the evening is approaching fast."

"There, again," returned the youth, "you betray the madness occasioned by your fears. Why do you not perceive that it is yet scarcely morning? Even now the sun barely springs from the top of yonder hill, and, with feeble rays, shines upon us so obliquely, that our shadows reach almost beyond our sight. I cannot leave this cheering spot till I indulge my sight with more of its beauties. Methinks I could live here for ever. Behold how yonder mountain steep, almost perpendicular, rears on the south its huge, stupendous head to the clouds, and shields the plain below from the scorching power of the sun's meridian heat; while the earth, as if grateful for its protection, spreads at its feet a rich carpet of never-fading green! Look, again, to the west. See where myriads of oaks and cork trees, ranged by the hand of Nature in gay and beautiful parade, one above the other, up the slope of that hill, spread, in kindly majesty, their arms afar, and join to form a canopy, unequalled in the palaces of princes, to shade the shepherd and his flock from the sultry evening's heat; and see, above them, on the grassy top, the shepherd now draws forth his flock to feed. This is not all. Behold where, on the east, the copious Guadalquivir rolls its majestic flood, fertilising the adjacent lands; while woods of olives, corn-fields, and vineyards cover its bosom with the wealth of Spain, and lovely orange groves fringe its banks with a rich tissue of green and gold. Oh, it is transporting! Here could I rest—here could I rest for ever!"

"Here a bell tolled for some time.

"Do you not perceive," continued Alphonso, "that, in the bosom of this thick wood, and beyond those stately ruins rising out of it, there must be a place inhabited? for that is the bell either of some nobleman's castle, or of some neighbouring convent tolling to matins? We will see."

"With this," he proceeded to mount his horse.

"Then," said Pierot, "if it must be so, it must be so. Come on, then; do as you like! It shall never be said that Pierot lagged behind, or that he could not stand fire as well as another. No—no. If Pierot be not as well able as e'er an Alphonso in the land (begging your honour's pardon) to endure a flaking of fire, sword enchantment, or demons, let him never receive mercy!"

"By this time, Alphonso was mounted, and, turning his horse towards the west, proceeded slowly through the valley, looking ever and anon around him—stopping his horse and musing at one time, admiring the beauty of the place at another, making such observations as he thought necessary to a future recognition of it.

"He soon perceived, on his left hand, a rising ground resembling a moat, which started from the root of the mountain, and, turning his horse, ascended it.

"From thence he had a more enlarged view of the plain below, and could distinctly observe, at the back of the old buildings in which he had spent his night, and close to them, a building, which, from having a belfry, he concluded to be a convent.

"Beyond this he thought he saw, though indistinctly, marks of unusual cultivation.

"He therefore dismounted, and, with much pains, clambered up the rocks, behind from whence he could perceive a magnificent castle, with turrets, moats, drawbridge, &c., and an extensive demesne, in high improvement, behind it.

"He wished to see some one to whom he could apply for information, but all near him was a blank and silent desert.

"Come, hither, Pierot," said he, "and be comforted. See you yonder convent?"

"I do, senor."

"Well, alight and come hither, and I will show you something more."

"Pierot ascended to him.

"Do you see yonder castle?"

"That I do, your honour."

"Do you observe the turret and drawbridge?"

"I do, senor."

"Well, what think you now?"

"Why, I think as before and more so, on account of that castle, for it is there your devil's deeds are done. Ah, Lord! your great men with castles think no more of taking the lives of men than old women do of killing chinchies, or cracking fleas! Lord help us! Still I say to your honour, let us be gone, for there is no more mercy in those castles than there is pity in the heart of a witch!"

"Pierot," said Alphonso, "how shall we find out to whom that castle belongs? Suppose you were to go thither and inquire."

"Why, as to that," returned Pierot, "if your honour commands, I will go, though it were to the mouth of hell. But I would almost as soon lose my life at once. Nay, I am sure I should never live to return to you again!"

"Well, then, generous Pierot," returned Alphonso, "I will not command, nor even permit, you to go; but we will ride up through the wood to those goatherds who sit on the hill beyond it, and they, perhaps, will inform us."

"Overjoyed to be released from the visit to the castle, Pierot approved of the proposal with alacrity, and they arrived at the verge of the wood, which was so thick that a person on horseback could not make way through it.

"They therefore rode along it, and at last came to a path or narrow road, which, from its direction, seemed to lead up the hill.

"By this path, after many windings and turnings, he got to the open space on the top, where he saw not far from him the goatherds sitting at their breakfast.

"He rode up to and accosted them with his usual courtesy, which they returned by inviting him to take a share of their fare.

"He felt himself not disinclined to eat, and, alighting, sat down cheerfully to a meal of bread and oranges, with some poor wine.

"While he was making a hearty repast upon those, he inquired what was the name of that beautiful valley, and whose was the castle, when the eldest of the goatherds obliged him with the following recital:—

CHAPTER DLXXXVIII.

EDGORTH BESS CONTINUES THE PERUSAL OF THE STORY OF OLD TIMES.

"I AM now old, and have all my life followed the business of a goatherd, and of course must have seen vast numbers of beautiful places, but never have I seen any place to equal in beauty this very spot of Vallesanto; and this, senor, all men will tell you was its reputation time out of mind; and the richness of its pastures, the coolness of its air, the plenty of its provisions, the content of its inhabitants, the sanctity of its contents, and the virtues of the family who were lords of it, made it the topic of conversation in all neighbouring parts.

"The present lord of all the country you see around is the Marquess de Punalada, almost as old as myself.

"He came to the possession of the estate and castle at an early age, and was beloved by all who knew him.

"His fame was not confined to this valley, for there were few in Spain who did not hear of and acknowledge his greatness.

"He married a lady his equal in rank, reputation, and fortune; but in charity, piety, and all the virtues that distinguish Christians, superior to all the men and women of her day.

"They lived long together in the greatest happiness, and had two children—a son and a daughter; and all the poor rejoiced in the prospect of finding one day, in the virtues of the children, a continuation of the advantages they had already derived from the charity of their forefathers.

"Soon after the birth of those children, the marquess was called on by the King to attend him to the wars, so he went, leaving his lady and family behind him—and from that time Vallesanto began to decay.

"Captivated by the King's favour, he grew proud, and forgot his good lady and children at home.

"However, at last he did come—but so different a man in his conduct from what he had been that no one would have believed him to be the same person.

"The marchioness took it sorely to heart, and died suddenly, and he again was so affected at her death that he hid from company, betook himself entirely to the convent, and many said that he was going to take the cowl.

"However, after some time, he quitted it and took his children to a distant part, where the King had given him a large estate; and then there were reports that my lady's spirit appeared at night and made the castle uneasy to him.

"Be that as it may, he came here but seldom, and for years the children remained at his other estate.

"At last, however, he removed them here, and the cause that was assigned for it was so extraordinary that, if I had not had it from one of his own domestics, I should not have believed it.

"In short, the young lady had fallen in love desperately, and, what was worse, hopelessly—it was with a picture.

"It was said to be the picture of some man dead God knows how long.

"However, this did not satisfy the young lady, but she must go to a Hadador,* who told her that whenever she should see a man who resembled that picture the house of Punalada would tumble to the ground.

"Some of her attendants informed the marquess of this prediction, in consequence of which he hurried her off here and shut her up in a chamber of the castle, where she was watched with the utmost vigilance.

"No one had access to her but the marquess, the father prior of the convent, her brother, and some old domestics, for, having in his fury ordered the picture to be burnt, he had nought to give the servants as a guide, whereas, had he kept the picture, he might have compared all comers with it, and so perhaps kept off danger.

"As misfortunes seldom come alone, the marquess perceived a new turn in the castle which threatened not only sorrow but shame.

"In short, he found that my young lord, his son, had fallen violently in love with his sister, and was abandoned enough to make odious proposals to her.

"The unhappy young lady, to shelter herself, told the marquess, who directly put her into the convent, while he himself, racked with some inward affliction, shut himself from all intercourse but with the padre prior.

"Meantime, people gave their tongues a loose, and talked strangely.

"The place, even the convent, was said to be haunted.

"A chapel, in which mass was sometimes celebrated, was shut up and let to run to ruin.

"In short, senor, nothing but misfortune, affliction, and bad luck has for many years attended the family, and the place, and the neighbouring goatherds have forsaken the valley upon account of frightful appearances that haunt it."

"Do you mind that, senor?" interrupted Pierot. "Why, good man, as his worship and I were last night—"

Alphonso darted an angry look at him, and he was silent.

"As for the matter of that," continued the goatherd, who observed Alphonso, "the man can tell us nothing new, so your honour need not have any scruples,—there is more talk than you think of, and, in truth, the marquess is now, for his tyranny, wickedness, and moroseness, more disliked and suspected than he was ever beloved, for though we of this place be poor, we have clear consciences, and worship God and our Redeemer, and hate wickedness so much that we would not like a king that was bad.

"Castilians, thank God, are good Christians, and would not barter with the devil, though they were to gain worlds and their wealth by the bargain.

"But to conclude this strange story.

"The young man, instigated by the devil, abandoning all sense of religion and virtue, and running counter to the course of nature, finding himself unable to prevail on his sister to indulge an incestuous passion for him, determined to enjoy her by force or stratagem; and to this end, with large gifts and great promises, bribed a servant who attended her to aid his designs, and, as she since confessed, to put a sleeping dose in her drink, and let him in at night.

"As God who directs things for the protection of the innocent and the punishment of the guilty, would have it, all his plans turned to his own ruin.

"Her chamber was in the uppermost story of the convent, and looked into a court-yard.

"By means of immense bribes, he found his way into the yard, while his accomplice—the lady's servant-maid—let down a ladder made of silk, which he had supplied her with, and which she fastened above to one of the iron bars of the window.

"He ascended.

"But just as he got near the window, the ladder gave way.

"He tumbled headlong down, and was caught on the spikes of the railing below.

"Meantime, the jade above threw out the ladder and went to bed.

"In the morning, his lordship was found dead.

"The marquess was with difficulty prevented from slaying himself.

"An inquiry was set on foot, and the holy brotherhood extorted from the wretch a confession.

"Soon after, the marquess brought from Court a nephew of his, who is to inherit the estate, and hoped to marry him to the young lady, but she absolutely refused.

"Thus things remain at present.

"His lordship drags on a horrible life in his castle, and the young lady a wretched one in the convent."

"By the time that the goatherd had finished his story, Don Alphonso had eaten his breakfast, when, rising, and in the most courteous terms thanking them for their hospitality, and the old man in particular for his story, he remounted his horse, and, being directed in his road, took his departure, having ordered Pierot to give each of them a piece of money and the old man five.

"They had not gone far, when Pierot, taking advantage of his master's indulgence, began:

"And now, senor, what think you of this same Marquess de Punalada? Is it not better a thousand times to be dead than lead such a life as he does? And I warrant he is more careful of it, too, than you or I of ours, and so it seems by his watching. And does not that show his wickedness? God help him—God help him! Bad as life is, he fears death may be worse. Oh, Lord—Oh, Lord! preserve me from the guilt of murder! If the devil so far got the better of me as to make me commit murder, I—I—I don't know what I should do! I would cut a hole in the ground, and bury myself in it! Murder? Oh, I freeze at the very thoughts of it! The greatest king in Christendom could not give life to a frog or a blade of grass! What must he be, then, who takes away the life of a christian? Yet—God help us!—such is the madness of the world, that nothing gets a man so great a name as killing another, and the more he kills the greater is his honour, as you call it! Ah, Don Alphonso, quit this life of war, and lead one of blessed peace, as a true christian should do!

* A fortune-teller.

"Upon my word, Pierot, I must allow that you apophthegmatise most ingeniously, but I cannot see how that which you have said could arise from the subject we were talking of."

"What! does not your honour think that the marquess has been guilty of murder? The way he lives—the haunting of the place! Besides, whilst the old man was telling you his story, another of the goatherds told me as much as made my blood run cold. I may be wrong, to be sure; but I would not for all the estates and castles in Andalusia have the conscience of the marquess."

"At last they got into the high-road, and early that evening arrived at Cordova."

"Here Alphonso found himself divided between two duties, and debated with himself whether he should directly proceed to Court to the King, or go to his father's to throw himself at his feet, and, in conformity to the monition in the dream, to consult the baron."

"After some deliberation, he determined to trust rather to the tenderness of a father than the caprice of a Court, and accordingly went straight to Burgos, from whence he despatched the two following letters by Pierot:—

"To Don Isidore,—

"As I approached towards home, I found myself divided between two conflicting duties—one to my father, the other to my sovereign; and though my inclinations fought on the side of the former, prudence carried the victory in favour of the latter. The King honoured me beyond my merits, and this raised up enemies against me at Court. It is to obviate their machinations, that I delay the happiness of throwing myself at the feet of the best and most beloved of parents—a happiness, however, which I shall not deny myself many days. Hoping soon to embrace you,

"ALPHONSO."

"To Baron de Rayo,—

"A great and portentous incident, of which I hope soon to inform you, calls me to hasten to the Castle of Querro. It is such as I dare not commit to paper, nor know I whether it should be unfolded to anyone else, even to my father. I am obliged first, however, to wait on the King, and will soon as I can receive your benediction in person. It is a supernatural monition I have to communicate. I cannot, therefore, express my anxiety on that account, and am apprehensive of delays on the part of his Majesty. If you could prevail on Don Isidore to accompany you to Burgos, you might perhaps find the fatigue of the journey compensated by the strange, eventful history I have to relate, the clue of which seems reserved for you alone to unravel. I can say no more in this way. Turn this in your mind, and bestow your prayers on

"ALPHONSO."

"Alphonso was received with every mark of tenderness by the King, who informed him that the author of the anonymous letter was too wary to fall into the trap projected for him, but that he was fully convinced Don Rodrigo and his mother were at the bottom of it."

"In little more than a week after he had despatched the letters to his father and the baron, he had the happiness of seeing them at Burgos."

"The latter was anxious to hear the promised story, and closeted himself for above an hour with Alphonso, who gave him an accurate account of every particular, not forgetting the goatherd's account of the Marquess de Punalada."

"The baron, after examining and questioning him over and over on the same particulars, at length was silent, and after ruminating for some time, desired Don Isidore to be called in."

"To him he made Alphonso again relate the wonders of Vallesanto."

"Don Isidore was astonished."

"It is," said the baron, vehemently—"it is the blood of Gonzalvo crying from the ground!"

"I own it is extraordinary," said Don Isidore, who, turning to Alphonso, sifted him with all his art, and confessed he scarcely knew what to say to it."

"Say to it!" exclaimed the baron. "We will act to it! Nor shall my soul find one moment's rest till the horrid secret is revealed. Don Isidore, your whole aid is requisite, and I demand it!"

"Don Isidore bowed assent."

"I request," continued the baron, "that Father Thomas may forthwith be sent for, together with one more attendant such as you can depend on."

"Juanico," interposed Alphonso.

"He is the very man I wish," returned the baron.

"Alphonso was astonished; he saw in the baron a new man. Youthful vigour reanimated every feature, enlivened every motion, and gave to his limbs a force, and to his whole air a formidable energy that ago never exhibits."

"Don Isidore was delighted."

"He once again saw that Baron Rayo that used at once to impress him with love and awe, and his soul again confessed the pleasing necessity of obedience."

"All shall be done, baron," said he. "Need I say that my hand, heart, and life are devoted to the accomplishment of your desire?"

"Yes—yes!" said the baron, striding across the room. "The stains, the sorrows, the disgraces, the murders that have brought the house of Rayo to the ground—though they cannot be repaired—shall be revenged—most horribly revenged—and this arm shall be the instrument!"

"But, dear baron," interrupted Don Isidore, "repress this rising choler—overcome those emotions, which, indulged, may perhaps be the means of frustrating your views."

"Here," said the baron, "take that hand. Does it tremble? Feel this heart. Beats it a higher or quicker pulse than usual? No; this that you call emotion is the fixed temper of my soul—the unalterable condition of my mind! By Heaven! I will mince that viper, and grind him and his house even to the last clod of his generation into dust!"

"Don Isidore was silent."

"Alphonso felt an unusual trepidation."

"The baron seemed to tread in air."

"Pierot was again sent back to Querro with a letter to Father Thomas, who in eight days more returned, together with Juanico, to Burgos."

"Every necessary preparation was made, and they—that is to say, the baron, Don Isidore, Father Thomas, and Alphonso, attended by Juanico and Pierot—set out for Vallesanto."

CHAPTER DLXXXIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE STORY.

"On the fifth day, they arrived at the entrance of the valley, just as the sun was half-way dipped behind the western hill, on which Alphonso and his servant had before breakfasted with the goatherds."

"Don Isidore looked about him as he advanced, wrapt in delight with the beauty of the scene."

"Never," said he, "have I seen anything to equal it."

"They came to a little rill of water, clear as the purest crystal, which ran towards the river in some places, forming the most enchanting pools—deep, pellucid, and sheltered by hanging willows, and in others babbling over pebbles with a sweet and lulling murmur."

"Alphonso had not seen it before, having entered the valley on the southward."

"This," said he—"only this was wanting to make Vallesanto more than terrestrial! Let us cross it at this shallow ford, and shelter us from observation in yonder clump of trees, while I point out to you the situation of the place."

"They accordingly crossed the brook, rode up to the clump, in the heart of which they found a beautiful recess, of an almost circular form, concealed, by a thickly-knotted underwood, from view; while an immense cork tree, which grew in the centre of it, extending its large branches, thick-set with leaves, afforded a roof almost impervious to the light, and which promised a shelter from the severest storms.

"Into this, after having dismounted, they entered, and led their horses.

"Alphonso then brought the baron, Don Isidore, and Father Thomas forth, and pointed out to them the perpendicular angular rock, the moat, and the wood, in which was buried the scene of their intended operations.

"The bell tolled. 'Twas for vespers.

"They returned to the thicket, where Father Thomas said mass, and all joined in prayer.

"When the bell tolls again," said Father Thomas, "it will be time for us to proceed. The fathers will then retire to rest, and, by the time we get there, all will be quiet."

"At length the bell tolled.

"The moon was quite obscured, and but a few scattered stars, but barely light enough to direct them on their way.

"Leaving the attendants to take care of the horses, they set out and crossed the plain directly towards the convent.

"As they approached it, they heard a foot before them treading with slow and heavy steps.

"They stood and listened.

"It stopped.

"They again proceeded.

"Again it was heard.

"Again they stopped.

"And again it ceased.

"It is the echo of our feet," said Don Isidore.

"Why not then of all our feet?" said the baron. "It is but a person."

"A violent stamp of a foot, attended with the rattle of armour, was heard.

"We come!" exclaimed the baron, in a tone of terrific intrepidity.

"Then, turning to them:

"Haste you! Let us forward—we are called!"

"At length they came near the wall.

"Beyond this," said Alphonso, "is the pathway. It is difficult to find it; nevertheless, I think I cannot fail of knowing it."

"They walked slowly on.

"I see a light," said Don Isidore, in a low voice. "Let us stop—we may be discovered."

"I see it too," said the baron, "but fear it not. It is friendly—let us go on."

"He then advanced and broke through the bushes, his vigour and alacrity surpassing the rest who followed.

"Father Thomas brought up the rear.

"Let me," said Alphonso, "go first, and find out the passage."

"He groped along the wall, and found out the narrow entrance.

"Here it is," said he. "Follow me!"

"They all followed.

"When they got into that part which he supposed to be the aisle, he said:

"Now I am at a loss to find the door into the chapel."

"I have brought a small lamp," said the baron. "We will strike a light; but perhaps it may discover us."

"A bell tolled, and straight the chapel within was illuminated.

"Blessed be God and our Redeemer!" said Father Thomas.

"They all said 'Amen' and entered the chapel.

"Father Thomas advanced to the altar, knelt and prayed.

"They all did the same.

"He said a short mass, and they arose.

"Here," said Alphonso—"here is the spot! Behold the mark of the sword!"

"At these words the light was suddenly extinguished, and they left in utter darkness.

"The baron then lighted his lamp, and, with Father Thomas, looked around.

"This," said the priest, "is the west. Here must have been the great entrance, and, lo! it is stopped up! This, then," said he, moving on, "is the north; and what should bring this pile of rubbish here I cannot guess, for over it there is no mark of ruins."

"That we will see," said the baron. "Let us remove it."

"He then drew a massy Moorish sabre from his side, and fell to work loosening the rubbish, while Alphonso and Don Isidore drew it away.

"At length the sabre met resistance.

"What can this be?" said the baron.

"He worked with his hand, and felt till he found a large chink.

"He put in the sabre and raised it up.

"It was a large stone.

"Here have been much pains taken," said he, "to jar those stones together."

"By this time he had got to the level of the floor.

"The baron picked away a layer of stones and found another.

"He groped again to find a chink, but all was solid.

"Alphonso knelt down and inspected it closely.

"It was an immense stone of four feet in surface.

"We must raise it!" said the baron. "See if there be the smallest opening in which to insinuate the point of the sabre."

"I cannot perceive one," said Alphonso. "But here I see the upper part of a regular arch."

"Where?" said the baron.

"Here—just where you removed the stones."

"We must remove that, too," said the baron; "it conceals some deed which shuns the light! The Almighty can, if it so please Him, disclose the adamantine entrails of the earth, and shall He not give us strength to accomplish this?"

"As he spoke those last words he fell vigorously to work till he found the under edge of the slab of stone that opposed his passage.

"Having made a way for their hands, they all exerted their strength, lifted it on one end, and thence turned it over.

"Underneath was a flight of stone stairs going downward, filled with rubbish.

"As one only could work in so narrow a place, an affectionate scuffle ensued who that one should be, Alphonso and Don Isidore both insisting on the baron's yielding it to them.

"They were interrupted by a noise.

"They listened.

"A sigh, which seemed to burst the bosom that it came from, filled the chapel.

"The baron worked with redoubled ardour, throwing up the rubbish that obstructed the stairs.

"Alphonso beheld him with astonishment.

"The alacrity of youth and the strength of Hercules seemed united in him.

"Here is a door—" said he.

"A hollow sound within stopped him.

"He hearkened, and distinctly heard the rattling of armour, and the sounds of hasty footsteps running to and fro.

"Endue me with strength," said he, "great Father of might! and tear up the rubbish as the enraged lion tears up the earth with his claws!"

"At length he got to the door, which opened outwards and was fastened within.

"Here," said he, "is a door without a keyhole, or any visible means of opening it."

"If," said Don Isidore, "we could with a knife cut an entrance for our hand, perhaps our united strength might get it open."

"Perhaps so," said the baron. "But where is the knife?"

"Here," said Father Thomas.

"Don Isidore took the knife and descended.

"He cut for some time.

"The impatient baron snatched it from him.

"The wood flew in showers from his hands.

"At length they made room for their hands, and the baron, Don Isidore, and Alphonso tore it open.

"It was fastened by a chain hooked to a ponderous stone within.

"Just as they opened the door a most transporting peal of music struck up, and voices, more than human, sung the 'Nunc Dimittis'."

"They entered, drew the door after them, and got into a passage, arched, low, and narrow."

"They went forward, the baron, with his sword drawn, leading the way, then Alphonso, then Don Isidore, and last, with a crucifix in his hand, Father Thomas."

"At the end of the passage they found the door bolted on the side next them."

"There must be some other way, that we have not yet seen, into this passage," said the baron, "for the door by which we entered, as well as this, was bolted on the inside."

"They looked attentively on either side, and saw none."

"Let us open this, then," said the baron.

"He opened it, and found a large, extensive cavern, filled with dead bodies in various stages of dissolution—some mouldered to dust, some half consumed, and some again in a more offensive state of putrefaction, lying on their backs with crucifixes tied erect in their hands."

"This," said Father Thomas, "is the cemetery of the convent. What shall we do here?"

"Hardly were these words pronounced, when their ears were assailed with a violent rattling of armour behind."

"They started and looked round them into the passage they had come through."

"Gracious God!" exclaimed Alphonso. "There is the figure."

"I see it," said the baron, looking at it with a fixed and undisturbed attention—"I see it! Oh, Isidore, dost not thou?"

"The tears rolled in torrents down his cheeks. He could not move, but uttered a groan that seemed to have rent his soul from its tenement."

"The figure stood."

"All gazed in a transport of horror except the baron, who seemed moved only by grief."

"It lifted up its visor."

"Oh, all ye saints of Heaven!" exclaimed Don Isidore. "Is not that Gonzalvo?"

"The baron put the lamp into the hands of Father Thomas, and advanced to it up the dark passage."

"Presently they heard the baron cry out:

"Speak—oh speak, Gonzalvo!" and instantly the crash of a heavy suit of armour falling to the ground."

"Come hither," said the Baron.

"They came up."

"Oh, Isidore," said he, "prepare yourself for such a miraculous event as will ever serve to remind you of the immediate agency of the Almighty, and strike scepticism and the reasonings of pigmy men dumb. Bring hither the lamp. Here we must enter."

"Why, this is a wall!" said the priest.

"We must enter it nevertheless," said the baron.

"The active mind and piercing eyes of Alphonso ended the difficulty."

"He found a low door, which, like the first, shut on the inside, but was opened with less pains."

"The foul and condensed air rushing forth blew out the lamp, and they were again in darkness."

"The young marrow of Alphonso froze with horror, and even Don Isidore was dismayed."

"The baron again struck a light, by which they found that they were in a small vault, arched overhead, and low."

"Alphonso struck his foot against something hard."

"He took it up."

"It was a short sabre, the blade of which was rusty all over, but a large spot near the end of the edge, embossed with a large raised incrustation of rust."

"Take that," said the baron to Father Thomas, "and keep it by you."

"The light of the lamp was too feeble to extend through the vault, small though it was."

"They therefore searched slowly along, step by step, and by the dim light it afforded, took the best view they could of the place."

"As they went along thus round the walls, Father Thomas, who stood in the middle of the vault, imagined that he found the ground beneath him move."

"He struck it with his foot, and a hollow sound issued from it."

"He called the rest."

"Here is something," said he, "probably worth notice."

"They came over, and, standing in turn upon it, each found it spring beneath his feet, and heard the hollow sound."

"The baron, without a word, began to dig away the earth."

"He had not removed half a foot in depth when he found a board."

"They all immediately assisted him, and the earth was removed from a bed of plank of several feet in surface."

"They tore it up, and beneath found a chest, in which was deposited a skeleton, the flesh of which was quite mouldered away."

"It was obviously that of a man of extraordinary stature."

"The baron touched it, and it sunk beneath his hand."

"He hung over it for some time."

"Is there not another," said he, "along with it?"

"They moved the earth about it; but there was none."

"They then turned to the chest again."

"The priest took the skull, which was not quite disengaged from the trunk, till he stirred it, and, attentively viewing it, he perceived that it was cloven across behind."

"The baron, looking at it, and showing it to Don Isidore, asked him rather sternly if he recollected anything about a dream."

"Don Isidore bowed in humble acknowledgment."

"The priest, whose curiosity on this occasion seemed greatest and most observant, felt round the chest, inspected the bones, the clothes, and every part of it."

"At length he said:

"Here is something more than flesh and bones."

"It was a seal ring."

"He presented it to the baron, who, looking at it attentively for some time, exclaimed:

"Oh, God!"

"Then, handing it to Don Isidore, said:

"Dost thou know this device? What say reason and scepticism now?"

"Don Isidore looked, started, and breathed short."

"Do I know it? Yes, on my soul, this is the ring of Gonzalvo. Here is his device, too, a hand and dagger, with Justar Fulminis, his motto."

"Well, Don Isidore," said the baron, "are you now convinced?"

"Although this be sufficient to convince me," returned Don Isidore, "I think we should leave no means untried to obtain every testimony this place can afford. Let us search further."

"I intend it," said the baron."

"He accordingly led them again, beginning at the door, round by the wall, viewing with closest inspection the ground, and stamping upon it to find whether it was hollow."

"At length they came to a heap, as they thought, of earth."

"The baron struck it with his foot."

"A helmet, and a coat of mail rolled about the floor."

"The baron took up one part, Don Isidore another."

"It is the armour of a giant rather than a common man," said the priest."

"It was my son's," said the baron. "Father, lend me your knife."

"He took the knife and scraped away the rust."

"Behold," said he, "our family device! And here read."

"They read aloud 'Justar Fulminis.'"

"Yes—yes, my child!" said the baron, vehemently. "A thunderbolt thou wert to thy enemies, but treachery beguiled and deprived thee of thy precious life, and now that arm which carried terror to the enemies of Castile and victory to thy banners is fallen to a clod of the valley!"

"Here the baron's anguish, like a stream long stopped in its course, burst in a torrent of tears and groans, which seemed to shake the arches of the vault."

"For some time he was silent."

"At length, turning to Don Isidore and Father Thomas, he said:

"Lay them as they were till all is ripe, and then shall

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES TAKE SHELTER IN THE HERMIT'S CELL.]

the arms of Rayo burst like a thunderbolt upon the heads of the guilty! Let us proceed."

"They then went further and found a leathern portmanteau, much decayed and full of insects.

"The baron strove to open it.

"It broke in pieces, and a silver-hafted dagger, with the aforesaid crest, a crucifix studded with rubies, and some papers fell out of it upon the ground.

"The baron searched it further, and in a private flap of it found a number of papers.

"Those papers," said he, "reverend father, together with this cross, and dagger, and the ring, we confide to you, requesting that you will seal them up. And you, Don Isidore, will witness the transaction till justice calls them forth."

"They reckoned the papers, Don Isidore and Alphonso writing their names on each, and the priest took possession of them.

"Although no more be necessary now, and it draws No. 128.—BLUESKIN.

fast towards morning," said the baron, "let us leave nothing unexamined."

"They searched round with the most scrupulous exactness.

"Not a spot, not a flaw in the floor or the walls, escaped their notice.

"While they were thus engaged, the young Alphonso—who was walking to and fro, busied in contemplating the scene before him, and felicitating himself with the thought that he had contributed to the disclosure of such a horrid affair—struck the hilt of his sword against a part of the wall, which sounded very hollow, and apprised them of it.

"They brought the lamp.

"Assuredly," said the baron, "my daughter was not spared. Perhaps there may be another depository of the dead here."

"He knocked at the wall—

"Felt it—examined it; and the more they advanced in a particular direction, the more hollow it sounded.

"At last they touched a door so neatly fitted that it seemed to be a part of the wall, but crevice or joint they could discover none.

"Determined, however, not to leave it unaccomplished, they persisted—the priest scraping and probing with his knife, and the baron with his sword; while Alphonso, looking lower, discovered a keyhole.

"Let us cut it here," said the priest.

"Hold!" said the baron. "For this, perhaps, our Alphonso has already found a key."

"Then, taking forth that which Alphonso had found, in pursuance of the monition in the dream, he tried it, and the lock flew open.

"Here," said the baron, 'let us look with humble adoration to the Great Disposer of events, and henceforth let wonder cease. His ways are in the great deep, and not to be searched out; yet man—puny creature—will estimate heavenly things by earthly calculations, and doubt of the extent of the power of the Almighty only because his feeble reason cannot comprehend it!'

"Just as he was opening the door, Father Thomas stopped him.

"Hold!" he said. 'We go on without considering how many hours have elapsed since we entered into those buildings. Morning approaches; I fear that day has already dawned. Discovery might ruin all; therefore, let us be gone.'

"You say well," said Don Isidore. 'It must be day-break.'

"Alas!" said the baron, 'much remains behind! Shall we go? Yet it must be.'

"Were I permitted to advise," said Don Isidore, 'we should immediately depart, carefully laying everything in such a manner as, if searched, to baffle suspicion.'

"They accordingly covered up the chest with the earth, Father Thomas devoutly pronouncing the 'Las Animas' over it.

"They then closed the door of the vault, proceeded next to the steps up to the chapel, where, closing the door, and laying down the large stone, they put the whole, as nearly as they could, in its former state, and departed.

CHAPTER DXC.

'CONTINUATION OF THE STORY.'

"THEY arrived at the bower just as distant objects were rendered visible by the increasing light of the morning.

"There they found their attendants anxiously expecting their arrival, having suffered much from apprehension, as well as cold.

"Everything now, however, tended to cheer and repay them for the hardships of the night.

"The rising sun by degrees chased away the cold, and rendered the air most exquisitely refreshing.

"Ten thousand birds filled the air with the harmony of nature.

"From the distant hills was heard incessantly the bleating of flocks innumerable; while the goatherds' pipes, and now and then the barking of their dogs, broke in occasionally, and finished the picture of this new Arcadia.

"After having refreshed themselves with some bread and wine which they had brought with them, they mounted, and set forward towards Burgos, repassing the river.

"The baron mused for some time.

"At last, breaking silence, and turning to the others behind him:

"Behold," said he, 'how magnificently the hand of the Creator has furnished the abodes of all his creatures! Not all the embellishments of art, strained to the last nerve of human skill—not all the proud domes raised story over story by the aspiring hand of architecture—not gilded ceilings, burnished arches, columns of polished marble, gold or silver, moulded by the hand of taste, and inscribed with the proud emblems of nobility—can be put in comparison with this one small speck in the works of Omnipotence; nay, let but the hand of art touch it, and its beauties vanish. Hark! every throat of the pretty feathered tribe swells instinctively with notes of grateful adoration; the flocks beat forth their praise; the noble ox, his appetite and mere corporeal functions all suspended in mute devotion, contemplates the beauties that surround him, heaves his huge sides with rapture, and in enjoyment pays his tribute to the hand that feeds him! Man—only man—swollen with the pride of reason (that dubious instrument by Heaven given, his blessing or his curse)—becomes the bubble of creation—sinfully spurns from him gifts like those, and to his own gaudy, perishable works resorts for satisfaction;—worse!—strains his prolific mind for means to desolate the face of fair creation—for spurious pleasures, which baffle in pursuit or poison in enjoyment, wages inexorable war against the will of Heaven; spreads his own brother's couch with serpents' teeth; ravages—ruins—murders!'

"Just as he had pronounced these last words, they came to a beautiful recess, resembling a stage, formed by the hand of nature at the foot of the mountain.

"Round it hills rose in a gentle slope, like the seats of an amphitheatre, and in the centre of it stood a large stone cross.

"The whole was surrounded by a prattling rivulet, which fell from the hills behind in a beautiful cataract. At the bottom, separating into two branches, it glided round this natural stage, and, meeting again below in one stream, fell into the river Guadalquivir at the distance of about a league.

"The whole was surrounded by stately cork trees, which lent a cool shade from the intense heat of the meridian sun.

"In this romantic spot was collected a crowd of men and women, dressed in all the fantastic finery of the country, and bedecked with boughs and flowers.

"One man, who seemed the chief, carried a garland in his hand, and, mated with a beautiful female, led them all in mazes through a dance.

"Don Isidore stopped and looked on.

"Nothing," said he, 'delights me so much as an assemblage of happy faces.'

"The dance stopped, and the people saluted our travellers with rustic civility.

"Pr'ythee," said Don Isidore, 'what is the occasion of this mirth and dancing to-day? Is it your tutelar saint's day?'

"Why, you must know, senior, that the village you see yonder is called Vallesanto. It has been in the possession of the present family ever since the expulsion of the Moors from this part of Spain; and if the blessed Virgin condescends to hear the prayers of its inhabitants, it will continue so for ever; for never were people so blessed as they are in a lord, and never was a family so blessed in return as they—if good works, the prayers of mankind, the smiles of Heaven, and being true Christians can make them so. Search out the best man in Spain, and we will set the worst of this family against him, and not be afraid of the comparison; and of all them that ever possessed the estate, the present marquess seems the best, for to the natural greatness of his blood and the hereditary goodness of his heart, he unites the gifts of his good uncle Jerome, prior of our convent, under whose care he was bred. You need not doubt, then, his being a good Christian, which, you know, is saying everything. As soon as he came of age, instead of lavishing the great wealth he got into possession of in feasts, and revels, and riots, in horses, dice, cards, or women, he laid it all out in charity, reserving to himself no more for his expenses than the poorest hidalgo in the country. He provides for the old and infirm, gives instruments of husbandry to young farmers, and tools to young tradesmen; he gives portions to young maids to procure them good husbands, and on their marriage supplies them with a capital to set them going. Not a person in the country but can bear testimony to his charity. Even the little children flock about him as he walks the street, skipping for joy like young lambskins after their dams, and get their quarto or ocharo to regale. In short, senior, nothing—not even the brute creation—fails to find tender protection and shelter from him. Well, sir, this day he is to be married. The whole neighbourhood is in one tumult of joy—grandeas come from all parts of the country—even the Marquess de Punalada, who has lived like a hermit since the death of his wife, comes forth to add to the meeting. All strangers passing are invited; and the marquess and his uncle will both be much pleased, and think it a great favour, if you cavaliers would delay your journey, and go to the Castle of Villaverde.'

"That is impossible," said Don Isidore; 'business of consequence obliges us to return with haste. We wish the worthy marquess all the felicity such virtues merit. I thank you, however, for the pains you have taken to inform me, and request that you will accept this (giving him a piece of money), and make merry with it on another occasion."

"Then, turning their horses, they proceeded on their journey.

"They had not gone far when they observed an inn which stood just at the point of two roads.

"Here they resolved to refresh themselves after the fatigues of the night:

"They accordingly stopped, and, having retired into a private room, held a conference on the subject of the night's adventures.

"From what we have seen," said the baron, "no doubt remains of the truth of my suspicions. That Gonzalvo has been murdered most foully is certain; that the skeleton in the chest is his, the ring is sufficient, not to mention the cloven skull, the portmanteau, and the armour; and that the Marquess de Punalada has been the murderer is little less than a matter of certainty."

"They all assented to those propositions.

"The questions then to be resolved are—

"First, how it has happened that the priory should be made the scene of slaughter—a place, one would think, too holy for such deeds of darkness?

"Next, what provocation or inducement brought on the murder; and, lastly, what has been the fate of my daughter?"

"All these things remaining still in obscurity makes me wish to return to-night to the vaults. Perhaps we may discover further.

"In my opinion," said Don Isidore, "the development of all you mention hangs entirely on the discoveries we have already made. Instead, therefore, of making an unavailing journey to the vault, we should, in pursuance of our first plan, proceed to Court and give the King a full and circumstantial relation of the facts from the beginning."

"And desire him," said the baron, "to open the lists, and permit me to call the villain to a public vindication of himself in single combat."

"I think that you mistake me yet," interrupted Don Isidore. "Single combat, indeed! No, far be it from me to think of staining the noble warrior's sword with the blood of a murderer! No, let justice—"

"Hear me, Don Isidore," interrupted the baron—"hear my fixed resolves. He must fall by this arm. I cannot become an assassin or an executioner, therefore I must fight him. Fear not thou the event; in such a cause, a pigmy's arm would wrest a victory from a giant. Besides—but thou thinkest that I am old—too old—I may be so, but know, Isidore, that even at this age that man bears not arms in Spain from whose crest Rayo would not now—even now—old though he be, hope to pluck the laurel!"

"My dear baron," returned Don Isidore, "I must say you still mistake me. Of the event of the combat I have no doubt; and if, as you seem to surmise, I had any, that arose from an apprehension of your age, I should—and I hope you believe it—step forward myself as the champion of our cause. The process you propose would smother future discovery, and many things of greatest moment—perhaps even your daughter's life (for who knows but she yet may live)—might all be lost in this one rash act. Consider, baron, it is not a mere point of honour you have to discharge—it is not a doubtful claim on justice you have to enforce; you are not so destitute of proof as to resort to the sword—no, your proofs are already in your reach, and justice to your family demands that your oppressor should be brought, not to an honourable issue of the sword, but to the ignominious sentence of the law. As to your age, baron, it has nothing to do with it, for, in a case where the demands of honour called forth the sword, I know not the hand more fit to draw it than yours. If it failed, and mine should sink after it, remember that I have a son—"

"Ay, Isidore, you have a son—such a son as I once had—one to whose arm the fate of empires might be trusted. But, believe me, you have shaken my intentions for the present. My daughter may live—said you not so? Look you, Isidore; accustomed as thou hast been to read my heart, which ever has been written in my actions, thou canst not but have observed how much more precious than life—nay, than ten thousand lives—has honour ever been in my opinion. Yet would I, to make good that one transporting hope—to save my daughter, to hug her once more in these arms—give life, fame, fortune, and everything to the winds—forego all honours, all worldly hopes, and take the fate of the most forlorn wretch that draws existence from the pity of mankind! But it may not be. She must be gone—she was not spared!"

"However," said Don Isidore, "though unlikely, it is not impossible. Is it not better to proceed by such temperate means as may insure our work at least from further mischief? I say, then, we must desire the interference of the King, and even this must be done with caution, for Don Rodrigo is nephew and presumptive heir to the marquess; and his mother, who is above all women crafty, may, by circumspection, discover, and, by address, defeat us. My advice, therefore, is that we repair to Burgos, and that Alphonso gain a private audience of the King, and prevail upon him to grant you a hearing, in which case there does not remain a doubt of justice being done."

"Father Thomas and Alphonso added the weight of their opinion to this advice, and the baron agreed.

"Meantime," said Don Isidore, "let us take some refreshment, remain here this night to rest, and early to-morrow morning set forward on our journey."

"Just at that moment they observed from their windows a cloud of dust arising at a distance and moving towards them.

"They soon heard the trampling of horses, and presently saw a carriage, drawn by six mules and surrounded by armed men.

"It drove by the inn, and turned towards the town of Villaverde.

"They called their host, and asked him whose it was.

"He answered that it was the Marquess de Punalada, 'who, for a wonder,' said he, 'appears abroad, going, I suppose, to the wedding. Ay, ay, he has armed men enough to keep off the ghosts. Oh, Lord save us and keep us a clear conscience!'

"This marquess, then," said Don Isidore, "is much afraid of ghosts, is he?"

"Afraid, senor? Why, he is the talk of the whole country," replied the host. "We have sometimes such work with him. It was but a few nights ago he called up all the servants in the middle of the night, said that some one was going to kill him, made them arm themselves and search all round the castle, and at last could not be persuaded but that some person had come to him as he lay in bed and shook a bloody poniard over him, threatening him with speedy death.

"He keeps almost continually locked up in private places, and never walks even in the great gardens, though walled with battlements, without two chosen domestics."

"Sometimes he disappears for days together, and is not seen by anyone, and the people of the castle think that he is then with Father Gregorio, the prior, though how he gets there they cannot tell, as the walls of the castle are between them.

"Be this as it will, one of the lay brothers saw him once in the prior's cell at a time that he had not passed the gate.

"Some say that he deals with the devil. Some say one thing, and some say another. Some talk of my lady's death; but as for me, senors, remember, I say nothing.

"Besides, now I think on it, you are strangers to me, and might do me mischief; but, thank God, I can keep a secret!"

"We," returned Don Isidore, "are above doing you a mischief, and hope you will not think so ill of us; so, if you have a secret—"

"Lord, no, your honour—no secret! What everyone knows is no secret. Why, he screeches, and talks to himself, and says the wickedest things, when he thinks that no one is in hearing—such as that God cannot pardon him, and the like. Despair, you know, is one of the seven deadly sins. As for my part, I would not take the wealth of Spain to be in his skin this night, for, though I do keep an inn, I am an honest man, and never committed murder."

"Murder?" exclaimed Don Isidore. "Why, did the marquess?"

"No, no, your honour—oh no—not as one would say! God forbid I should say so! But, then, when a man is afraid of his own shadow, and shrieks—"

"I understand you," said Don Isidore, touching his lips with his fingers by way of denoting silence. 'You are a wise fellow, and I commend you.'

"But, senors," continued the host, quite flattered, 'only think of his immuring his daughter, a sweet young lady, in a cell of a convent only out of fear of a prophecy of a cursed witch. But that cost his son his life, who was—but God forgive him, he's dead! Then there is a poor youth he has bred up for charity. Some say he is his own bastard; but I cannot believe it—he is too good for that. Be that as it may, he treats him cruelly. Sometimes, when he meets him, he screeches and orders him to be turned out, then again sends and has him brought back, for the lad would be glad to go. And would you believe it, one day, about four days ago, he was missed; messengers were sent in search for him; they found him in a broken building behind the convent, where he was looking for birds' nests; and only think, the marquess was going to poniard him, and at last laid him in irons, calling him villain, cut-throat, traitor! Lord help us, the boy would not cut the throat of a chicken, though he wanted his dinner by it; not but the fellow is brave enough, for now that he's grown he's as strong as a mule. It is not six months since a great gang of robbers descended the Sierra Morena, and plundered the whole country, carrying away everything, cattle, corn and all. The marquess was then abroad, that is to say, buried in his castle. What does the young Fernando do but claps on a suit of armour, and at the head of a few peasants sallied forth, attacked the banditti, took their chief and kept him in bondage at a small village till all they had remaining of the stolen property was restored. The marquess, being informed of it, sent to have the fellow detained just as all was returned; but Fernando said that he had already passed his word, and would send his sword through anyone who should presume to detain him, adding, that it was better to have the things restored to their poor owners than to hang such a worthless wretch, and then dismissed him with an earnest exhortation to reformation and repentance. All people were astonished at the grandeur of his sentiments, particularly as he was a foundling, and as the saying is, begot in sin. But as soon as he went home, the marquess became outrageous, threatened him with death, laid him in irons, and kept him on bread and water for a month. When set at liberty, he walked about sad and silent, and spoke to no one. One day sauntering down a long lobby in the castle, the marquess suddenly opened a room door just facing him, screeched, and almost fell into fits at the sight of him. The castle was alarmed. His lordship declared that he was watching there to assassinate him. The youth called Heaven to witness his innocence, and begged that he might be permitted to withdraw from the castle and ease his lordship's mind, who seemed to abhor the sight of him; assuring him that though grateful for past favours, he was weary of such continual illusage, upon which the marquess swore he should never go outside the walls of the castle, and gave orders for his being strictly watched. Ever since, he remains there as it were a prisoner. He is seen sometimes walking on the battlements attended by two men as guards. No one can tell the cause of this, but everyone knows it can be nothing good.'

"You interest me much in the fate of this youth," said Don Isidore; 'and your account astonishes me beyond measure. There is something in the marquess's conduct to him so far surpassing the bounds of common malignity that, coupled with his terrors and screechings, denotes some guilty mystery.'

"Why, senor," said the innkeeper, 'he seems almost as much afraid of everybody—nay, for matter of that, of himself, for he cannot abide to be alone at night. Indeed, most of the domestics are terrified at night, and declare that the whole castle and its gardens, nay, the whole priory and valley, are haunted!'

"Here he was called, and obliged to leave his company and his story unfinished.

"A strange account this!" said Don Isidore.

"A very natural one," said the baron.

"I cannot account for it," said Don Isidore; 'but I feel a propensity which I cannot overcome to go towards the castle and take a view of it. The unmerited fate of that youth—who, from our host's account, seems to have something noble in his soul—fills me with, I cannot say how, an ardent wish to see him. Were I superstitious, I should deem those desires predictive. Perhaps—nay, it cannot be—'

"What?" said the baron, hastily.

"In truth," replied Don Isidore, 'my thoughts were so absurd that I almost blush to own them. If this should be your orphan grandson?'

"A flush of red crimsoned the cheek of the baron.

"What if it should be? But, oh, it cannot be! Why keep him there? And yet his jealous apprehensions, his shrieks of horror! But it cannot be. No, Isidore—no! When he had gone so deep in guilt as to murder the father and mother, he would not stop at the child, much less would he keep him as a continual memento of his guilt. No—no, it cannot be—it cannot be!'

"Yet," said Don Isidore, 'suppose we go? It can do no injury, and will at least give us a more perfect idea of the situation of the castle to serve us on a future occasion.'

"I agree!" replied the baron. 'Let us go.'

"As soon as they had dined they departed for the castle.

"As they approached it they saw, or thought they saw, the country become more gloomy, and their imagination, influenced by their opinion of the marquess, viewed it as a place cut off from the goods of Providence, where grass grew not, and where the affrighted earth drew back into her womb her natural produce as fearful to trust it to the hands of such a monster.

"They rode along the wall and perceived that they were strongly intrenched behind a deep ditch, over which, as they advanced, they found a drawbridge drawn up.

"Passing further on, they observed that the wall turned to the southward, and, continuing their route along it, saw that it joined that of the priory.

"They turned back again, and, as they approached the drawbridge, observed three men walking on the wall.

"On their nearer approach, Don Isidore, courteously saluting them, inquired to whom that noble castle belonged.

"One of them returned the salute, and informed him that it belonged to the Marquess de Punalada, that the marquess was from home, and said that he was sorry the arrangements of the castle forbade him from inviting them during the marquess's absence.

"Our travellers had not the smallest doubt, from the youthful voice and manner of the speaker, but that he was the young person of whom such honourable mention had been made by the innkeeper.

"Don Isidore, therefore, accosted him:

"Young gentleman," said he, 'though I should be sorry to break in upon the arrangements, or trespass on the privileges of the castle, I cannot help entreating that you would have the goodness to direct us in the road to Cordova, from which I know not how we have insensibly diverged, and as the roads about here are rather intricately crossed and mixed with each other, you would considerably augment the favour by descending and instructing us particularly how we may avoid going again astray. We are travellers, and, like all travellers who hope to profit by their toil, wish to get the best account possible of the country which we pass through, and here have been unable to find any but uncouth and ignorant peasants incapable of instructing us.'

"You honour me too much," returned the youth, 'by your invitation; but there are reasons why I cannot avail myself of it.'

"Just as he said this, one of the men who was along with him spoke to him in a whisper.

"The three consulted together, and, then, making a sign to Don Isidore to wait, they descended, and letting down the drawbridge, passed over.

"The young man stepped forward and joined Don Isidore and the baron.

"As he approached, the whole company riveted their eyes upon him, and were much pleased, and indeed surprised at the dignity of his mien, the firmness of his deportment, the vigour of his limbs, and the noble, manly expression of his countenance, in which strong character was strongly marked.

"The baron felt a lively emotion of tenderness towards him.

"Don Isidore not less, while Father Thomas had all those sensations which a good heart meliorated by Christianity may be supposed to feel for virtue groaning under oppression.

"They dismounted from their horses, and, leaving them to the care of the servants, walked aside with him.

"He began to speak.

"But an unaccountable sensation broke his utterance, and alternately overspread his face with a shifting red and white.

"However, he informed them that this was the castle of Punalada, as he had said before, and that it was surrounded with walls a considerable length backwards, even to the ground of the convent of Vallesanto. That the marquess was a man of immense estates and great wealth, highly favoured by the Court, but yet so fond of retirement, that he chose rather to live here for many years past than go into the world and assume that figure in which his rank and fortune entitled him to.

"You are his son, then, I presume?" said Don Isidore.

"No sir; I am indeed the creature of his adoption, preserved by his charity, and now supported by his bounty; but whose son I am, alas! I know not, nor perhaps shall never know. At present, the marquess, by his adoption, is entitled to all those duties which I should pay to my natural parents—perhaps no more."

"Then you are happy?" said the baron.

"The youth hesitated.

"At length he said:

"If I answer in the negative, let me be acquitted of any intentional ingratitude to my protector. I have never gone so far before, and I confess I am astonished to think by what irresistible power your notice of me exacts a confession which I have never made to anyone. The marquess has been kind to me—I owe him everything, yet am not happy."

"Why?" said the baron, earnestly.

"I wish," replied the youth, "to serve my King and be a soldier; but I am not permitted. The marquess (for what reason I cannot tell) is averse to it; it is his will I should not go, and I must submit. Apprehending, as I suppose, that I have formed a design to depart for that purpose without permission, he has ordered me to keep within the walls of the castle, and assigned me a guard; but he need not. I think obedience to his will a duty, and no earthly power shall make me guilty of a breach of it!"

"Nothing could equal their astonishment at the noble sentiments and ingenuous spirit of so young a man.

"The baron gazed upon him as if his eyes had lost their wonted motion.

"Don Isidore took him by the hand, pressed it, and said:

"Unhappy parents, whoever they are, to have lost such a son, and happy he who has acquired such a one even by adoption."

"The marquess," interrupted the baron, "must be sensible of the treasure he possesses. He is fond of you, is he not?"

"Alas! venerable sir," replied the youth, "he, on the contrary, seems to abhor me, and—why, I know not—to consider me as a person unworthy of trust or confidence—as a villain—as a traitor!"

"Here his colour shifted to a deadly pale, and a tear gushed in spite of him from his eyes, while every muscle of his face seemed agitated.

"In short, sirs," continued he, "to be plain, the marquess has of late so treated me that every tie of affection is broken, and the only ligament which now remains to bind me to him, is gratitude—a bond which no true Christian can break. I trust that God will grant me the grace never to violate it. Thus have I, seniors, seduced by an unaccountable feeling which draws me to you with resistless force, deviated from my accustomed maxims of silence. To have at once reposed in you the secret of my heart, appears now strange to myself, yet does it not give me one painful sensation; on the contrary, I feel more tranquil at heart than I have for a long time been."

"Fear not, excellent young man," said Don Isidore. "You speak to men of honour—nay, more, you speak to those who feel their hearts entwined with yours in the reciprocal folds of affection equally strong as yours—equally unaccountable to themselves."

"Let us," said the baron, "call you child. If affection entitles you to that appellation, we claim a stronger right than the marquess."

"And at all events," said Don Isidore, "remember that if the caprice of the marquess, his death, or any other circumstance should leave you at liberty to make a choice, Don Isidore de Haro will be ready to take upon him the office of the father and the friend."

"Don Isidore, you would engross all to yourself," said the baron. "You must allow the claims of the childless to be paramount to yours, and such is mine. My child—for I will call you so," said he, "I am old, and can instruct you, therefore hear me attentively. Hope not that time, reason, or moral, or religious sentiment can work any change in the marquess's heart in thy favour. To use the helpless orphan of his protection with inhumanity, and put bonds upon his mind and person, shows him to possess a soul either naturally depressed, or labouring under some malignant suspicion or hidden animosity, which broods in his heart, but dares not appear and trust one youth. Man in intercourse with man seldom rests at the first stage of good or evil; but when he confers an unmerited benefit, or offers an unprovoked injury, carries the folly of the one act or the wickedness of the other to extremes. Never did I know a man that did not delight in fostering the worst brier he had planted—never do I remember a man who could forgive the innocent he had injured. Let this be your caution—this the guide of your conscience. That gratitude which has outlived affection is a mere religious duty, and, like that of forgiveness of our enemies, extends not to self-injury, involves no positive esteem, enjoins no positive attachment, but merely bids that we pray for, and wish rather good than evil to its object. In this am I right, father?" turning to the priest.

"Perfectly," replied Father Thomas.

"One word more," said the baron, taking him by the hand. "Fly this castle, as you value life, or wish for the protection of Heaven. Guilt saps its walls, vengeance holds its sword over it, and the thunder of Heaven, ere many days be past, will shake it to its foundation! Fly, therefore—quickly fly, and when once thy resolution shall be taken, let this be thy guide."

"With these words, the baron gave him a scrip of paper.

"The youth looked with astonishment at the baron as he spoke.

"He was overawed by the dignity of his looks, while the words he spoke sunk to the inmost recesses of his soul.

"Don Isidore," continued the baron, "we must have this youth between us, for, as of Alphonso, so of him—neither of us will give up his share. And you," said he, "my children," taking both their hands, and putting them into each other, "remember that after this day, if ever you should happen to meet, you meet as brothers."

"With joy," said Alphonso, "I accept from your hands that which was before denied to me—a brother."

"And I," said Fernando, "with gratitude for the acquisition, earnestly hope that I may be worthy of it."

"At this instant one of the servants called out:

"Don Fernando, it is time to return. You know what would be the consequences if we were detected here."

"I shall return directly," said Fernando.

"Then, turning to the baron and Don Isidore, he continued:

"Your advice, seniors, is engraven on my heart; and, if I should fail in persuading the marquess to let me forth, depend upon it I shall take a proper opportunity to claim your protection. In the meantime, may Heaven protect you, and grant you all the happiness you deserve! Reverend father," said he, turning to the priest, "your blessing."

"God bless you, my son!" said the priest.

"And now, my brother—since you allow me to call you so," said he, to Alphonso, "let us embrace and depart."

"He then turned from them, called his attendants, and, tripping over the drawbridge, hauled it up, waved his hand as a last adieu, and disappeared.

"Our travellers had not gone far from the castle, when Pierot, touching Alphonso on the arm, and making him one of his significant becks to drop behind, said, in a low voice, his eyes staring, his mouth round as a circle, and his brows lifted up in astonishment:

"Answer me two questions which I shall put to you. Is this country all enchanted, or is it not? And who, tell me—who do you think that young cavalier is like? Let me see whether we be all bewitched, or whether it is me alone that the devil plays his pranks with."

"And is this," said Alphonso, "the cause of your important beckon to me to fall behind with you? To what end lead those two ridiculous questions?"

"I'll tell you what, señor—if you were to hang or burn me I cannot but think that I am bewitched, for when that youth appeared, and I first saw him, I wiped my eyes again and again, and I doubted whether I was awake; but to the very last I was bewitched, for, if I was not, how could he appear to me to be my master, Don Isidore?"

"Why, Pierot," said Alphonso, looking earnestly in his face, 'are you out of your senses? What strange notion is now running in your precious noddle?"

"May I live," replied Pierot, 'if that young cavalier did not seem to me to be the very same man that carried away my lady, your mother, from her father's, near Talavera, that married her, and that is now there riding before us. Nay, your honour need not stare, for to be sure, it is all bewitchment and sorcery, for there is nothing about us here but conjurers, magicians, spirits and witches, and I wish we were well out of it.'

"Alphonso, seriously alarmed, spurred his horse and rode up to the others, and, in terms of affection and tenderness, deplored the insanity of Pierot, and told them the whole of what had passed, and besought them to examine him.

"Did I not tell you," said the baron to Don Isidore, 'never did I see so strong a resemblance—that of this youth to Gonzalvo is not greater than that of Fernando to you. It is a strange, mysterious business! Would that we could get to the bottom of it!"

CHAPTER DXCI.

CONTINUATION OF THE STORY.

"As soon as they arrived at the city of Burgos, the baron, Don Isidore, Father Thomas and their attendants remained at their inn, while Alphonso went to Court.

"He first made it his business to see his patron, Don Juan de Padilla, and besought him to obtain for him a private audience of the King, to whom he said he should, in his preference, unfold a business no less surprising than horrible.

"The King, not less inclined to oblige his minister than to serve his favourite, instantly granted him the audience in presence of Don Juan.

"Alphonso began by entreating his Majesty to believe that nothing less than a business of a most serious moment could induce him to call upon his Majesty's attention in so very serious and urgent a manner.

"He plighted himself to prove, to the conviction of the world, one of the most execrable conspiracies that ever was conceived by man in his most abandoned wickedness—a conspiracy formed against the honour, the fortunes, and the lives of a house distinguished in the service of the crown of Castile, carried into effect, concealed for many years, and at length discovered by means more than ordinary, by the intervention of the avenging hand of Heaven.

"He said that the affair was so intricate, so dependent on a variety of proofs, and so very difficult of explanation, that it would be necessary, as well for his Majesty's ease as for the more perfect elucidation of it, to have the principal personages of it before his Majesty; and he earnestly entreated to have the liberty of bringing them on the morrow in attendance before him.

"One of them was Don Isidore, his father; another, the Reverend Father Thomas Augustino; and the third, Baron de Rayo.

"How?" said Don Juan. 'Baron de Rayo! Is he not dead? and have not his estates been confiscated, and his titles extinct?"

"That the baron's estates were confiscated, and his blood attainted by Peter," said Alphonso, 'is too true; but it is equally true that he lives, and that the attainder was taken off by our late King Henry. The conspiracy and consequent frauds and murder that led to that—'

"How? Murder!" exclaimed the King.

"Even so, my liege. Murder most foul, perhaps worse," returned Alphonso. 'I say, and I undertake—at the hazard of my life, and, what I value more, your Majesty's favour—to prove, that the house of Rayo has sunk beneath the hands of a villain and murderer!"

"This is strong language," said the King.

"It is, my liege," said Don Juan; 'and such, as I presume, Alphonso, ere he uttered it, was prepared to make good.

"Then what is the scope of your present demand?" said the King.

"That the persons I have named be permitted, on the morrow, to come before your Majesty, in presence of Don Juan and such other persons as your Majesty may think fit, there to lay before you the whole of this transaction."

"I grant it," said the King.

"May your faithful servant," said Alphonso, 'presume to suggest the necessity of secrecy, for the present. Don Rodrigo is nearly concerned in the event, though not in the guilt."

"Enough," said the King. 'To-morrow morning, at ten o'clock, I will, for greater caution, be at Don Juan's house. There we will hear of this extraordinary affair."

"In the morning, Alphonso, attended by Don Isidore, the baron, and Father Thomas, repaired to Don Juan's house.

"He received them all with every mark of esteem, and particularly treated the baron with distinguished respect.

"They discoursed upon the business in hand, and Don Juan assured them of the King's resolution to render justice to the baron.

"At the appointed time, the King came, and with him the Corregidor of Burgos.

"The King desired Alphonso to proceed.

"Alphonso entreated that the Baron de Rayo might be permitted to explain the nature of the case.

"The baron began from the commencement, and after deprecating the imputation of egotism if he spoke of himself, which the nature of the case demanded, gave an account of the services of himself and family to the State.

"He then described the heroism and achievements of his son, and drew a picture of the sufferings of him and his daughter, which affected the King extremely.

"He then adverted to his own miseries, his imprisonment, wanderings, want, and, finally, his reception by Don Isidore.

"Here Alphonso took up the affair with an account of the incidents at Vallesanto.

"Don Isidore then began with the story of the search.

"And, lastly, Father Thomas produced the ring, sabre, crucifix, and dagger, and the papers found in the portmanteau sealed up, all of which they jointly and severally swore to.

"Don Juan was astonished.

"He said that the leading circumstances of the tale tallied exactly with facts in his recollection.

"He was intimate with Gonzalvo, knew his device, believed the ring was his, and would certainly know his armour, as they had often fought together; and he particularly recollected that the Marquess de Punalada suddenly retired from Court soon after the disappearance of Gonzalvo.

"From the letters, which were almost fallen to pieces, were collected the following sentences:—

"LETTER I.

"You have not an hour to lose, Gonzalvo—Padre Pablo will tell you all—Haste you away; a moment's delay may put your wife, beyond your power, in the embraces of the King."

"LETTER II.

(Opened the second, but probably the first in point of date.)

"There is a convent, with the prior of which I have some power—Two of my domestics will attend you there—No other place affords you a sanctuary against the disappointed—"

"LETTER III.

"Leave it to me to develop the affair to the baron—All your property, papers, &c., I will secure for you—Depend on the continuance of my good offices."

"Here the corregidor demanded whether there was any mark or signature by which to ascertain who had been the writer of those letters.

"My lord," said the baron, 'his Majesty and you will observe that, in this strange discovery, evidently made under the directing hand of Heaven, presumptive evidence is the utmost we can yet reach. The identity of the person murdered will be admitted sufficiently proved when the ring, the armour and the letters directed to Gonzalvo, found with the skeleton—the skull of which is split transversely, and the instrument lying in the place—are taken into consideration. The question, then, is, whether this proof be not sufficient to induce your Majesty to set on foot an inquiry, to call the father-prior of the convent to account for that crowd of suspicious circumstances, and thence to draw more ample proof of the guilt of the accused?”

“This,” said the King, “is certainly reasonable.”

“The corregidor agreed with his Majesty.”

“Your Majesty, then, sees,” continued the baron, “that the next consideration will be how to do this in such a manner as to prevent the cunning of those concerned from rendering the inquiry abortive; and as I have turned the whole through my mind, and have considered it with so much the more attention as I am most concerned in the issue, I will, with your Majesty’s permission, suggest a plan which, I trust, will meet with your approbation.”

“The corregidor desired him to explain himself.”

“My scheme,” said the baron, “is this. In the first place, let some of your lordship’s most intelligent officers, duly authorised, proceed with us to the vaults, and there take full cognizance, and testify to your lordship in writing what shall appear to them. Let this, along with the testimony of the reverend Father here, of Don Isidore, and of Don Alphonso be made up into a record, and deposited, together with the ring, armour, sabre, and letters, in the archives of your Court. On this your Majesty will ground an order for the arrest of all parties suspected; and, in the execution of this, care must be taken to prevent any impediments, by collusion or otherwise, being thrown in the way of justice. To this end, while one armed force surrounds the castle of Punalada on one side, and another the priory on the other, we, with a chosen few of your Majesty’s appointment, will enter the vault by the passage, and be ready to receive anyone that might enter it through the castle. I have many reasons for expecting, from the execution of this plan, much success, seeing that the sudden concussion of unexpected fear has often shaken from the soul of a hardened sinner a guilty secret, which the deliberate operations of justice, nay torture itself, could not wring from him.”

“The corregidor then declared that, notwithstanding the miraculous tenor of the whole transaction, everything which had fallen from the baron carried so much the sterling weight of truth, as, joined with the evidence, and his and the other witnesses’ known integrity, served to bear down all doubt of his sincerity, and he entirely approved of his plan for facilitating a full discovery and ensuring justice. And, in conclusion, he added, that he would appoint a proper person to go and hold the inquest desired.”

“The King, on his part, assured the baron that, on the proof of what he had advanced being established—(of which, by-the-bye, he had little doubt)—every practicable reparation should be made to him and his family.”

“For,” said he, “exclusive of the demand of justice, I shall think something especially due to the friend of Alphonso.”

Alphonso, penetrated with gratitude, knelt and kissed the King’s hand.

“The King and corregidor retired.”

“Don Juan kept them all that day at his house.”

In the evening an officer arrived with a letter from the corregidor to the baron.

“He had orders to proceed directly on the inquest.”

“They resolved to set out that night.”

“It was agreed, however, that the servants should remain behind to prevent unnecessary speculation.”

CHAPTER DXCII.

CONTINUATION OF THE STORY.

“It was just twilight when they arrived in the valley.”

“They proceeded to the bower, where, according to a prior determination, the baron and Don Isidore remained with the horses, while Father Thomas, the officer, and Alphonso went to the chapel.”

“Arrived at the mouth of the subterranean passage, they struck a light, and found the place just as it had been left by them.”

“The obstructions being now few, they got down without much loss of time.”

“Alphonso soon found the little door that opened into the vault.”

“The officer entered, crossing himself, and was smote with horror at the spectacle presented to his view.”

“He examined the skull, the armour, everything, and took down an accurate account of the whole in writing.”

“In order to establish the point of the relative situation with the convent, Father Thomas opened the cemetery and showed him the bodies of the deceased fathers of the convent, which he likewise exactly noted, and then again returned into the vault.”

“Alphonso then took out the key and opened the door at which the baron had before stopped at the suggestion of the priest.”

“They now entered a long, vaulted gallery, which branched off transversely on either side the door.”

“While they were in this state of suspense, their ears were struck with the notes of soft music, which seemed to come from the extreme end of the right branch of the vaulted gallery.”

“They paused.”

“The music died away.”

“They then, with as little noise as possible, went forward.”

“Again the music struck up, and they could distinctly hear a female voice, as sweet as that of a seraph’s, accompanied by a guitar.”

“They stood and listened attentively.”

“But they could hear no distinct words.”

“At the conclusion of a stanza it ceased, and a sigh, that would have rent the knotty heart of apathy itself and extorted pity from the remorseless savage of the woods, followed it.”

“They again, as cautiously as possible, stepped forward, and at the end of the gallery found that it again branched off to the left.”

“At this instant they heard another sigh, and presently a voice, tuned by the hand of harmony itself, exclaimed:

“‘Oh, blessed and most merciful Redeemer, when shall my soul take its flight and shelter itself in thy bosom from the miseries of this life?’

“He took advantage of the speaking to step forward without giving alarm, and perceived before them a glimmering light faintly break across the gallery.”

Alphonso, who carried the lamp, laid it down at the turning.

“They came to a door, across which near the top was cut a hole of about a foot long, and four or five inches broad, grated with small bars of iron.”

“Father Thomas stepped forward, cautiously peeped in, and beckoned to the others to do the same.”

“They beheld in a low, gloomy chamber a lady on her knees before a couch praying, with eyes and hands devoutly uplifted to Heaven.”

“Her face, which they could distinctly see, bore every mark of dignity and beauty, but faded and strongly impressed with the vestiges of care, thought, and affliction.”

“Her lips ceased to move.”

“The tears gushed in torrents from her eyes.”

“She dropped her arms upon the couch.”

“Then sank down with her face between her hands, uttered a heartrending sigh, and remained motionless.”

“Alphonso’s heart beat so strongly as to agitate his whole frame, and he breathed short and hard.”

“Father Thomas feared he might be heard, and drew him away.”

“The officer continued to observe what passed within.”

“Presently a door opened in the extreme end of the room, and he observed a large man, seemingly of above the middle time of life, enter.”

“He had a lamp in one hand, and a sword in the other.”

“The lady started, and, seeing him, arose, and sat down on the couch.”

“He joined her, and seating himself, with an air of familiarity, by her side, addressed her with:

“‘Always in tears! What! shall I be ever patient, only to excite fresh insult? Shall I find you still incorrigible? And does not the apprehension of my power yet subdue your stubborn soul?’

“‘Alas! my lord,’ returned the lady, ‘is a lapse of so many, many years in this dreary cell under all the miseries of anxiety and incertitude—is the resolute endurance of violence, insult, and opprobrious abuse—is the firmness with which I resisted the active endeavours of your hireling priest, who betrayed his God, and used the sacred privilege of confession to pour pernicious poison in mine ear, and act the pander's part—is the fortitude with which I resigned my infant to that death with which you menaced him, rather than wrong my most beloved lord—are my vows, solemnly made and registered in Heaven—are the mortifying scorn with which I have always treated your protestations, and my contempt and hatred of your hideous person—are those fervent petitions, which now, for many years, I have, every hour of the undistinguished day and night, waited to Heaven, with the sighs of an afflicted heart, to smite your guilty head, and level it with the dust—are all these, I say, openly expressed, and every day avowed, yet insufficient to convict the presumption of your heart, or convince you of the folly, as well as wickedness, of your hopes? Begone! Or, if nothing will convince your senseless vanity, nor quell the fiend that works within you, but assurance sealed with blood, take my life! But, oh, that would be mercy—an act above the reach of your gloomy soul! Nay, strain all your cruelty to the utmost—let all the petty vengeance of a base soul be let loose upon me; but cease to torture me with repetitions of your foul, polluted vows, nor insult the ashes of my murdered husband, whose arm, when living, could have crushed you into dust!

"Once for all, then, hear me, madam," said the man. "Here I solemnly swear—"

"How shalt thou swear? By what? Unhappy man, who hast already broken every tie that binds man to man, every bond that connects the creature with its creator, who hast so far outstripped all precedent of sin as to leave your crimes without a name, and run beyond the pale even of Heaven's mercy."

"If there," interrupted he—"if there be yet left in Heaven's mercy one ray of hope to glean upon my soul, may it be cut off and consign me to utter darkness if I do not now once for all speak the irrevocable purpose of my mind—my firm, unalterable resolve. Your son, as I have already told you, convicted of treacherous designs against my castle and my life, now awaits his doom in chains!"

"What, was his talking with a few armed men treachery?"

"Nay," interrupted the man, "but he mentioned a name which this—"

"What name?" exclaimed the lady.

"Hear me, proud woman!" interrupted the man, hastily—"hear me, nor disturb me with your raving. By that oath which I've just sworn, he dies! One thing only, and that you know, can save him."

"Then let him die!"

"By Heavens, he shall die before you!"

"And thinkest thou, monster, that, after yielding up the life of my child, I can stoop to tremble at the manner of his death? No, let it be!"

"One week," said he, rising, "I allow you for deliberation; at the end of that time, shouldst thou remain stubborn, though my own death should go hand in hand with it, and eternal perdition wait on death, it shall be done!"

"Then moving to the door, and casting at her a look full of horror and fury, he said, sternly:

"Think upon it," and withdrew.

"For one week, then," said the lady, "I shall not be afflicted with sight of you."

"Remember," said he, returning, "a week—by Heaven, but a week!" and again retired.

"The lady then threw herself down upon the couch, wept bitterly, and remained immovable.

"The priest then withdrew, and brought away the others, saying it was probable that nature, exhausted, was sinking into sleep.

"And who may those people be?" said the officer.

"Hush!" said the priest—"let us begone."

"They returned into the vault, and shut the door after them.

"Be particular," said the priest to the officer, "in noting the conversation you have just heard."

"I shall," said the officer. "This armour we must bear away—it is the corregidor's orders. The rest I can well report."

"Everything passed with the secrecy they wished.

"They found the baron and Don Isidore with the horses, and, mounting, were out of the valley by day-break.

"As they went along, Father Thomas, in whose mind the expiration of the week appeared with all its horrors, pressed them to hasten forward, telling them, in general terms, that if they were not back in a week, dreadful consequences might ensue; and as it was full four days' journey to Burgos at the common rate of travelling, it was found expedient to put their horses to the push.

"The baron could not comprehend what Father Thomas meant, nor would the latter tell him, but amused him with a story of his own fiction.

"The truth was, Father Thomas, knowing the warm, impetuous temper of the baron, was afraid to tell him what passed in the vault, lest it should rouse him to some act of rashness that might defeat all their projects; and had enjoined Alphonso and the officer to be silent on that head.

"They arrived at Burgos on the evening of the third day.

"The urgency of the case being a sufficient excuse, the officer that night made a faithful report to the corregidor, and Don Juan, hearing the whole, went to the King.

"They viewed the armour, and Don Juan, having it cleansed in the proper places, said he would bear witness to its being Gonzalvo's.

"The priest then gave an exact account of the scene in the lady's chamber.

"The King was horrorstruck.

"Never," said he, "have I heard of such an accumulated guilt."

"The baron was much agitated.

"At last, with much difficulty, he said:

"It must be she; it is—it is my daughter, and that youth to whom we spoke at the castle is her son."

"Then, turning to the King and bending his aged knee, he said:

"A boon, my liege—I ask a boon."

"I grant it," said the King.

"My boon, then," said the baron, rising, "is, that this very night measures may be taken to secure the prior and heads of the convent of Vallesanto and the Marquess de Punalada, with his domestics."

"I will not only do so," said the King, "but will even take it as a favour if Don Juan will go along with you."

"Don Juan cheerfully assented, and received orders to direct three troops of horse to hold themselves instantly in readiness to march.

"In the meantime," said the King, "I shall send for the Archbishop of Toledo to attend me, in order to get his warrant, without which, I should not wish to touch the convent."

"The next morning all marched properly instructed and authorised.

"The baron and his party went out of the city by a different route from Don Juan and the troops.

"On the evening of the fourth day they reached the valley, and according to the plan settled between them, the baron and Don Isidore and two troops went round by the Villaverde road to the castle, while one led by Don Juan and attended by father Thomas and Alphonso, went towards the convent, where, after giving proper instructions to the commanding officer, they left them and proceeded to the chapel, removed the usual impediments, and found their way into the vault.

"Here having viewed everything, Alphonso drew forth the key, opened the door, entered the transverse passage, and proceeded gently towards the door that looked into the lady's chamber.

"They perceived her lying asleep upon a couch, and a lamp burning on a table by her side.

"Here they impatiently waited the sound of the trumpet from the castle gate, each straining his eyes to get a view of the lady's face, yet daring not to make a noise.

"At length the wished-for signal was given.

"The trumpet sounded.

"An universal clamour and noise were heard at a distance.

"The lady still slept.

"A clanking of chains was distinguished approaching the chamber on the far side, and the door flying open, the man seen before appeared dragging along the ground by the hair with one hand the unfortunate Fernando, who,

[JONATHAN WILD SHOTS THE GAMEKEEPER.]

being shackled, could not stand; and in the other, brandishing a sabre, while fury, wildness and terror rendered his countenance horrible beyond expression.

"Here, madam," said he, dragging the youth to the foot of the couch, "the hour is come, and your son is brought to die at your feet!"

"The lady suddenly started from her sleep, screamed, threw herself upon her son, and swooned.

"You have now," said he to Fernando, "brought treason to my doors, and 'tis fit that you should die. To make vengeance more complete, I will wait till your mother revives to behold it!"

"Alphonso could no longer restrain himself, but, rushing against the door, splintered it to pieces.

"Villain!" he cried, "hold your murderous hand, or you die this instant!"

"The marquess started at the word.

"He looked up.

"At the sight of Alphonso, the sword fell from his hand.

No. 123.—BLUESKIN.

"His hair stood erect.

"His knees knocked against each other.

"His face assumed the very image of death.

"He was bereft of speech with the agony of his fear, and his eyes glared without any appearance of motion.

"At length, he threw himself prostrate on his face and swooned.

"In the meanwhile, the lady, assisted by Don Juan, came to herself.

"She stared wildly about her.

"Is he dead?" she said. "Oh, no! Is not this he? Alas! I have not seen my child these many years!"

"She then looked down eagerly on her son, who, on his part, seeing his friend Alphonso, exclaimed, in ecstasy:

"Gracious Heaven! is this Alphonso? Surely it is? Ah, where, Alphonso—where is the Baron de Rayo?"

"Ha! What saidst thou, my child? Did you say the Baron de Rayo? It cannot be! Ah, no; my father is long since numbered with the dead, else I should not be here, nor you!"

"While this was passing in the subterranean part of the castle, the officer had summoned, in the King's name, the lord of the castle to open the gates.

"The marquess, who had, in his consternation at the first account of their arrival, proceeded to the act of desperation already mentioned, was sought for in vain over the castle.

"The prior, perceiving the convent gate besieged by a troop, immediately betook himself to his wonted passage, to seek the marquess.

"His route lay through the left branch of the vaulted gallery already mentioned, and thence along by the door of the lady's chamber.

"Hearing a noise of words, he thought the marquess was there, and, in his precipitation, burst into the chamber, just as the lady had ended her last sentence.

"Nothing could exceed his astonishment.

"He started back, but she saw him and cried:

"Ha! officious pander, art thou come to help thy lord and master and fill up the measure of thy iniquities by new butcheries?"

"Father," said Don Juan, stepping up to him, "I arrest you in the name of the King!"

"Then, turning to Alphonso, and pointing to the marquess, who still lay prostrate, he continued:

"Lift up that recreant lord, and let us bring them both from this place towards the castle, which, it should seem, lies this way."

"They then lifted up the marquess, who, opening his eyes, stared at Alphonso and exclaimed:

"It is—it is the murdered Gonzalvo!"

"They hurried him and the prior suddenly through the door by which his lordship had entered; while the lady, who had all along kept her eyes fixed on her son Fernando, at the name of Gonzalvo cast up her eyes and caught a side glimpse of Alphonso just as he pushed the marquess through the door.

"She screamed—started from the body of her son, and calling out 'My husband—my husband!' flew towards Alphonso, while he and Don Juan were beyond measure shocked and astonished.

"Don Juan, apprehending her to be delirious, laid hold of her, and, with some reluctance on her part, brought her back to the couch.

"She screamed and struggled violently.

"Oh, villain—villain! Are you, too, a murderer? And will you keep me from my long-lost lord, whom I thought dead?"

"She then paused, and, turning to him, said:

"Is he indeed alive, or has my sight been blessed with the shade of my husband?"

"For Heaven's sake, dear lady," said Don Juan, "compose yourself, and prepare your mind for news that will delight you; for though your husband be not alive, your deliverance from the tyrant is at hand, and all will yet be well."

"Just at these words, they heard a great noise.

"I must go," said Don Juan—"my presence may be necessary."

"Good Heavens!" said the lady, looking earnestly at him. "Is not this—Alas! my recollection is gone, and time and grief have effaced names from my memory. Were you not a friend of Gonzalvo's?"

"I was."

"Your name?"

"Don Juan de Padilla."

"The same," said she. "Does my father live?" she asked, eagerly.

"He does," replied Don Juan. "I must away, and will bring him to you soon."

"Don Juan at length found his way, directed by the noise, through a long, dark, vaulted gallery, which led him to a small closet, whence, following the sound, he passed through several chambers, till at last he came to a large hall, where he found the marquess and the prior surrounded by a crowd of soldiers and domestics, to whom the baron was explaining the nature of the affair, and the manner of the discovery of the marquess's villainy.

"The marquess sat crestfallen, with his head dropped upon his breast, and the prior endeavoured to expostulate with the baron, and throw the whole odium of the business upon the marquess.

"The entrance of Don Juan put an end to the whole cabal.

"He ordered the marquess and prior to be confined in separate places, to prevent any collusive arrangement with regard to their confession.

"Fear not," said the prior. "I will confess all. Here I shake off all that false levity which has hitherto restrained me from discovering this bad man's guilt. Everything that I know, from the beginning to this minute—even the little share that I have had by winking so long at it—shall be candidly and without reserve laid before you."

"Here the marquess started like one suddenly roused from sleep.

"To the King's mandate," said he, addressing Don Juan, "I bow with due submission, and shall attend you, sir, whithersoever you shall be ordered to lead me. But let not the calm artifice—the monkish subtlety of that wretch heap more guilt upon me than is properly my own. What share he has had in my misfortunes, you shall all soon know. Then will you see what mischiefs may lurk beneath the monkish cowl. Heaven, incensed, demands expiation of a foul offence, and shall have it, if the most unequivocal avowal and ample confession, rendering to the last letter of the truth justice to him and to myself, can lead to it. To this end, I will draw up, and afterwards sign in presence of you all, a full confession of this dark affair. Let me have but two hours to myself, for the purpose, undisturbed in my closet."

"After consulting together, it was agreed that he should be allowed the time required, but not in his closet.

"Pens, ink, and paper were therefore allowed him in a room in a distant wing of the castle where he could get at no papers or evidences to destroy them, while guards were stationed beneath the windows and at the door.

"Meantime, they entered his closet, where they locked up and sealed all his papers.

"They then proceeded to the vault, where the young Fernando was released, and the baron once more pressed to his bosom his long-lost daughter.

"When the indescribable emotions of paternal and filial reverence had a little subsided into calmness, they led her forth into the upper part of the castle, where, the unaccustomed air and light overcoming her, she swooned.

"The baron, Don Juan, and the rest continued their search, and were astonished at the number of vaults and subterraneous passages which lay in all directions round the foundations of the castle and convent.

"They concluded by closing up the vault where the bones of Gonzalvo lay, till arrangements should be made for a proper interment.

"Three hours had been thus spent, when they returned to the hall, and, finding that the marquess had not yet come forth, proceeded to the room where he was.

"They knocked at the door, and, receiving no answer, opened it, and found the unhappy man covered with blood and in the agonies of death.

"They raised him up, and he expired.

"He had cut the great artery of the neck entirely across, and so had rendered assistance, had it been at hand at the minute, ineffectual.

"A paper, fresh written and signed by him, lay on the table.

"Don Juan took it up and delivered it to Father Thomas, who read it aloud in the following words:—

CHAPTER DXCIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE STORY.

"THIS castle was once a nunnery, and is coeval with the convent of Vallesanto; this will account for the number of subterraneous passages which unite them.

"In an invasion of the Moors they took possession of it and dispersed the nuns.

"One of my ancestors drove them hence and got the estate from the King as the reward of his valour, hence the convent became in some sort under the dominion of the lord of this castle, who, by various entrenchments on the rights of the church, got at last the sole appointment of prior to the convent.

"The monster who is now prior was bred, by my father's charity, about this castle, a mendicant child. He was the companion of my youth, the depository of my secrets, the confidant and agent of my amours, and when, by my father's desire, he took the habit, he became my confessor.

"On my coming to the estate, I kept him in my family, intending to give him the priory on the death of the then incumbent.

"Meantime I married, and found in the marchioness a most tender and affectionate companion and a gentle corrector of my vices.

"I was happy; but the enemy of mankind envied me my bliss, and, in the shape of that friar, plunged me into eternal, endless perdition.

"Gonzalvo brought his wife to Toledo. I saw her, and was smitten with her beauty, yet for a time I had virtue enough to resist the flame.

"I confessed it to Father Pedro. He used his endeavours to mitigate it by letting in at first a ray of sinful hope.

"Here I first stumbled, and never recovered myself till I fell into the abyss of guilt in which you see me.

"With the subtle casuistry of a church logician, he refined away the criminality of adulterous indulgence by opposing it to the sin of suicide, for so he denominated my forbearing, at the risk of my life and health, which were obviously declining.

"He laid a plan—even now, after an interval of twenty years spent in buffeting the assaults of conscience, my blood runs cold to think of it. He not only devised the diabolical plan, but he aided in the execution of it. The marchioness was in the way—she fell sick—the reverend father found her a physician—and she died. The prior of this convent fell sick and died also.

"Hitherto all fell out, or rather was conducted, to the accomplishment of the chief plot. Gonzalvo was made to believe that the King looked with an eye of lust upon his wife. I was his close counsellor and friend, and persuaded him to carry her away with the utmost secrecy, and deposit her in a nunnery which I told him was here.

"The father was their guide. I hastened to the castle while he conducted them through the convent into the cemetery, from which, he said, the lady should pass into the nunnery. She was accordingly led into a remote room of this castle, near the passage to the cemetery, while I went forward with two assassins, hired for the purpose by the priest.

"We led Gonzalvo into that vault where his body was found, and, as he stooped to enter (his great height making him stoop more than us, and he consequently being more exposed), one of the assassins smote him with a sabre and split his skull.

"With the priest's help, we took a shell and some boards from the cemetery, and, putting him in, buried him on the spot.

"When this was done, the priest whispered me privately that our safety demanded the death of the assassins. He did not allow me time to deliberate, but, turning suddenly round, plunged a dagger into the breast of him that was nearest, and then assailing the other, who resisted, I dispatched him with my sword on the instant.

"The virtue of the lady set her above all my efforts. The officious churchman proposed force. I attempted it, but in vain. The feeble efforts of a weak woman were sufficient to beat me from that object for the attainment of which I had waded through a sea of blood.

"By bribing the nurse, I got her child into my hands, and daily threatened him with death if she did not comply. In vain. She resisted—and remains as pure in person as in soul.

"By a feigned tale to the King, I got all the family estates confiscated and put in my possession. If my crimes admit of any mitigation, let it not be forgot that I saved the Baron de Rayo from Peter's fury, who, incensed with the baron's haughtiness, would, but for me, have put him to death. Let this speak in favour of my innocent daughter.

"Fernando's nurse lives. She is in—

"PUNALADA."

"Here the knocking at the door cut off the rest, and left them in doubt about the nurse.

"Don Juan ordered the domestics who were at hand to take away the body of the marquess, then sealed the papers in presence of all, and gave strict orders to keep the prior in custody.

"He then took Fernando—who was so bewildered with the wonders of the day that he scarcely knew whether what passed was reality or a dream—by the hand, and saluted him by the name of Gonzalvo, congratulating him at the same time on the fortunate discovery of his parents and his certain accession to rank and fortune.

"While they were making the proper arrangements for securing everything to abide the King's pleasure, a woman came in and informed them that the lady had recovered from the fit, but was delirious.

"The baron and Fernando immediately proceeded to her chamber.

"Come hither, my father," said she, "and give your daughter a last blessing! And you, my son, come and take mine."

"Why," said the baron—"why a last blessing? This sickness, produced by the shocks and surprises of to-day and the change of air, will soon wear off, and days of happiness yet attend you."

"Never, my father—never! I have seen that which assures me—

"What have you seen, my Maria?"

"As I live, I saw my Henry—my husband—in that hideous vault! I this day saw him!"

"Calm," said the baron—"calm those violent agitations, which proceed from an error—an error which I can explain, and will effectually. He whose figure so deceived you is the son of Don Isidore de Haro, your cousin and Gonzalvo's, but so exactly the counterpart of my son, that I never see him without astonishment. His likeness struck the guilty marquess into a paroxysm of horror that shook reason from its seat, and made him his own accuser."

"Isidore lives, then?" she said.

"He does," replied the baron. "The friend, the support, and the protection of your father's age, and to this son of his we owe, under God, the discovery of this horrid affair. As soon as rest has fitted you for a new surprise, you shall see them both, and hear everything. In the meantime, let this assurance appease the perturbation of your mind, and try and take some rest."

"With this they departed.

"Meanwhile, an account of the marquess's death and the arrest of the prior reached the convent.

"All there was uproar—the guard would let no one pass.

"At length a requisition was sent from the young lady there to be permitted to pass to the castle, and see her father, though dead.

"This was readily granted.

"She flew round, passed through the court-yard, and entered the great hall in a state of distraction, calling aloud on her father.

"She passed by Don Isidore, Don Juan, and everyone who met her, without seeming conscious of their presence.

"At length she met Alphonso.

"At sight of him she stopped short, and stared with a fixed attention.

"Her bosom heaved, her colour shifted from red to white and back again.

"Her limbs trembled, and she was falling, when he caught her in his arms.

"She remained insensible for some time.

"At length recovering, she again regarded him with a steady gaze, and, in a deep, piercing tone, said:

"Thou art he, and the prediction is accomplished? The house of Punalada is in ruins!"

"Then, breaking from him, she continued:

"Show me where my father is!" and darted from their sight.

"That day Don Juan and Alphonso, with one troop of horse, and the prior their prisoner, set out for Burgos, as well to lay the whole before the King as procure a proper conveyance to remove the lady from the castle.

"The King was horrorstruck and astonished.

"He forthwith called a council, of which the Archbishop of Toledo made part, in which it was determined that the prior should be handed over to the Grand Inquisitor—that the attainder of Gonzalvo should be entirely erased from the records of the Court—that the title of Punalada should be extinguished, and the marquess's whole fortunes confiscated, and that so much of them as had before belonged to the baron and Gonzalvo, together with one half his original estate, reserving a small annuity for his daughter, should pass over to the baron and his issue, the King reserving the other half to himself to bestow on Alphonso.

"That day proclamation was made of the marquess's death, attainder, and forfeiture, and of the reinvestiture of the baron with his estate, rank, and title.

"They returned to the castle of Punalada, with a carriage of the King's to convey the lady to Court, the King being desirous of offering her every mark of distinction, and a vehicle for the remains of Gonzalvo.

"When they arrived, they found that Don Rodrigo had been there, and, on being refused admission to his uncle's closet, and possession of the castle, had set off in a rage, threatening them all with the indignation of the King.

"The body of the marquess had been consigned to the earth with the ignominy attached to suicide, and the lady was recruited, and not only willing, but desirous to quit the castle.

"When Alphonso was, after proper precaution, introduced to her, her astonishment was greater than ever it was before.

"She knew not what to think, what to say, or how to conduct herself.

"She looked at everyone round her in turn, to read in their faces some solution of a mystery that she could not help thinking was involved in it.

"Her husband—her beloved Gonzalvo stood before her.

"Astonishment drank up her tears—she could not cry, yet she would if she could to ease her heart.

"With much difficulty, at length she faltered out:

"Is this, then, really the son of Don Isidore do Haro?"

"The baron looked grave—Don Isidore more so.

"It is so," said she. "Yet it is strange!"

"It is the will of God," said the baron. "And shall we presume to scan it?"

"No," said she—"no! However irreconcilable it may be to our weak senses, it must be right."

"Here she paused.

"This confusion of resemblance," she said, "Don Isidore, points out that union which should always subsist between our children. Therefore suffer me to treat Alphonso and this our son as equally our children."

"You speak my very soul, madam," said Don Isidore, "for my attachment to your son is not less than yours to mine, and there seems already to subsist between them the affection of brothers."

"The youths were delighted, and all parties were as happy as their different circumstances may be supposed to admit of.

"Preparations were made for their departure.

"The baron got the remains of Gonzalvo, even to the dust in the chest, carefully put into a coffin, and laid in the vehicle.

"Then, after seeing the King's officers take possession and seal down everything, the baron, Father Thomas, and Don Isidore, got with the lady into the carriage, and proceeded towards Burgos, while Alphonso and his friend Fernando rode by their side.

CHAPTER DXCIV.

THE STORY CONCLUDED.

"It was pretty far advanced in the night of the fourth day before they came near the city.

"Alphonso and Fernando, taken up with reflection and mutual congratulations on their happiness, dropped behind, and had fallen into conversation on the beauty of the night and the brightness of the moon, when, just as the carriage turned the corner at the extreme end of an olivary, and got out of hearing, a band of armed ruffians rushed from the covert of the trees upon the two youths, who had no person to aid them in resistance but Pierot.

"Before they were prepared to defend themselves, one of the ruffians from behind buried a dagger in the shoulder of Alphonso, and felled him to the earth.

"Fernando, on the instant, saw the stroke given, and smote the ruffian to the ground.

"He then vigorously attacked the rest, and, Pierot coming up to his aid, beat them all off but three, who lay weltering under the wounds given them by Fernando.

"Pierot then pursued and stopped the coach, relating at the same time what had passed.

"Don Alphonso," he said, "is killed, and we may as well all at once put an end to ourselves!"

"The lady screamed.

"Don Isidore burst from the carriage, and, followed by the baron, ran up to the field of action, and found Fernando weeping over the body of Alphonso.

"Where," said Don Isidore,—"where is my boy? Where is my Alphonso?"

"Let us lift him up," said the baron, "perhaps life may yet be in him."

"Gallop forward," said Father Thomas to Pierot, "and see if there be a house at hand to which we can carry him; and go you and bring a surgeon directly. Perhaps something may yet be done."

"Just at this instant, a mounted patrol of the Ronda came up.

"The baron hailed them.

"Here hath been murder committed," said he. "Have you got a light?"

"Yes," said the officer, and, displaying a dark lantern, dismounted, and examined those on the ground.

"Alphonso was bleeding profusely.

"They lifted him up, tore off his coat, and perceived that the wound had entered his shoulder-blade very deep.

"They did their utmost to stop the effusion of blood; and the captain of the troop, being informed by one of his people that the carriage in waiting belonged to the King, drew forth a leathern bottle with wine, and poured some of it down Alphonso's throat.

"He soon exhibited some slight tokens of life, and his pulse moved.

"They brought him to the carriage, where they found Donna Maria inconsolable, and, by the direction of the officer, moved forward to an inn not far distant; while he and his men took charge of the wounded ruffians, and brought them after.

"Alphonso was laid on a bed at the inn, with little symptom of life.

"A surgeon soon attended, and declared that it was impossible he could recover.

"Donna Maria was distracted, and, impelled by an uncontrollable feeling which overcame her, hung upon him, and kissed his clay-cold lips.

"She was at last drawn away to give room to the surgeon, who, examining narrowly, began to be of opinion that the wound had not reached any vital part, and observed that he must have been hurt elsewhere.

"He therefore examined him carefully, particularly about the head, and found a considerable swelling just above the ear.

"Here," said he, "is the chief injury. Can you tell me how he received it, or from what sort of weapon?"

"He got but one stroke," replied Fernando, "and that was in the shoulder."

"Then the hurt in his head has proceeded from his weight in falling; and the loss of blood from the shoulder is, in that case, rather useful than injurious."

"While they were thus speaking, Alphonso began to breathe hard, then groaned.

"The surgeon ordered a glass of water, with which he wetted his lips, letting a little down.

"Still the word was death.

"In the meantime, the officers of the Ronda had got the wounded assassins to the inn.

"One appeared, from his equipments, to be a gentleman of considerable rank, but he was in as hopeless a state as Alphonso.

"Another was in the livery of a servant, and a third had the appearance of a baron.

"The two last were coming to themselves, but the first seemed quite senseless, though he breathed.

"They were all desperately wounded, particularly the gentleman, whose arm was cloven at the joint of the shoulder almost from his body.

"As the accident happened at the distance of less than a league from the city of Burgos, Don Isidore, on his arrival at the inn, wrote off to Don Juan, informing him of the affair, and entreating proper assistance to be sent out.

"Don Juan himself arrived in two hours after the messenger was dispatched, and the King's surgeon along with him, who, on examining Alphonso, inquired whether he had indicated any disposition to vomit; and, on being answered in the negative, declared it to be his opinion that he had only been extremely stunned by the fall, and added that, in all probability, he would soon come to himself.

"He ordered his head to be chafed with warm spirits, his extremities to be rubbed, and some warm wine poured down his throat; in short, he took his measures so well, that, before morning, the youth was restored to his senses, though extremely weak.

"Don Juan did everything he could to cheer the baron and Don Isidore, assuring them that the King intended to make ample amends to the family for the injuries it had sustained; and that he intended the first honours in the state for Alphonso, whom he loved more than any of his favourites, though much had been done to injure him in his opinion.

"Nay, such," he said, "was the attachment of the King that he would not inform him of the present accident before he came away, to avoid giving him unnecessary pain."

"When the two inferior assassins came to themselves, Don Juan, the baron, and Don Isidore, were informed of it; and, coming to the room where they were, Don Juan was immediately desecrated by him who wore the livery.

"Whose servant are you?" said Don Juan, severely.

"I am the servant of Don Rodrigo de Calvados," said the fellow.

"Oho!" said Don Juan. "And where is your master?"

"There, your honour," said the fellow, pointing significantly to a bench where the gentleman's body lay.

"Then it was he who set you on this enterprise?" said Don Juan.

"God bless your honour!" returned the fellow, "I knew not what I was going about till I was in the very heart of it. This honest man here, who looks like a devil than a man, will tell you more; I was only a servant."

"Don Juan, looking at the fellow, perceived that he was a bravo, and ordered the two to be immediately carried, under a strong guard, to jail.

"The next day, Alphonso was much recovered, but complained of a violent pain from the wound in his shoulder.

"He was, however, declared by the surgeon to be able to proceed slowly to Burgos.

"The gentleman assassin, Don Rodrigo, too, was able to proceed on a litter.

"A strong guard was ordered for him, and he was deposited in the jail, and a surgeon ordered to attend him.

"His mother was almost mad with vexation and disappointment; but all her interest, all her tears, all her falsehoods, and all her address, were of no avail—she could get no one hardy enough to apply to the King in his favour.

"During Alphonso's illness, Donna Maria constantly attended him.

"But a considerable time having elapsed, and the wound continuing in the same state, the surgeon expressed his surprise at the slowness of the process, and frequently adverted on symptoms of a feverish kind, for which he could not account.

"One day, making those remarks in the hearing of Pierot, that honest soul said that he fancied he could tell the cause of it.

"Why, what is the cause of it, wise man?" said Don Isidore.

"Love, your honour!" replied Pierot, bluntly.

"Love! In the name of God, with whom?"

"I'm sure, your honour, I don't know, and I believe it is more than he knows himself; the picture that hangs about his neck perhaps may tell, though I doubt that, too, for they were strangers."

"Are you mad, fellow?" said the baron, hastily.

"No, your worship," replied Pierot, "I am not. I hope I do the best, at least, that I can to avoid it; for I neither go out to seek fighting adventures, nor do I fall in love with every pretty girl in distress, which seems to me to be the ways of going mad nowadays. I will tell you what I know."

"He then told them of the adventure with the two ladies in Portugal, concluding with an assurance that since his young master had seen them he never had had one hour's peace, nor, he believed, been right in his head.

"Don Isidore seemed extremely uneasy.

"He retired to a room, wrote letters, and despatched a messenger with them instantly to the castle of Querro.

"The rest of the day he seemed extremely unhappy, nor could the baron, or any of his friends account for the strange alteration in his manner.

"Next day he put the question of his love, with some delicacy, to Alphonso, who candidly acknowledged that a lady he had met with on his travels in Portugal had gained entire possession of his affections, and, though he scarcely hoped ever to see her again, he could not help cherishing the love with which she inspired him, and indulging some small hopes.

"He then told his father the whole story, and concluded with showing him the picture.

"At sight of the picture, Don Isidore turned pale, his lips quivered, his whole frame trembled with the agitation of his mind.

"He was for some minutes speechless.

"At length, breaking silence, he exclaimed:

"'It is as I fear! Oh, unhappy youth!'

"'Good Heavens, my father!' exclaimed Alphonso.

"To what strange story is this dreadful agitation a prelude?"

"Alas! my unhappy child," said Don Isidore, "prepare to hear that which must pierce your soul with horror! Yet you must know it—though instant death attend the information—you must know it! That young lady—Good Heavens! do I live to tell it to my son?—that young lady with whom you were so deeply enamoured is—your sister!"

"My sister?"

"Yes, your sister! And she, that lady, whom you rescued along with her is mine—the Marchioness Del Oro!"

"Then I am undone!" exclaimed Alphonso—"undone here, and lost to all eternity!"

"Say not so, my son," said Don Isidore. "We are to believe that the Almighty, who is merciful, will judge by the intention, and not assign the punishment of a deliberate crime to a passion involuntary and unintentional. This horror that you feel is in itself an expiation if it be followed up with a firm determination to expell the poison from your soul."

"Ah, there—there, my father—there lies the horror! I fear I must cease to live ere I cease to sin, if loving—"

"Ha!" interrupted Don Isidore, "hold your impious tongue, nor utter in my presence language so detestable! If so lost in guilt as to dare the thunder of the Almighty—which, slow to execute, emboldens sinners—dost thou not fear that a father's indignation should rise and crush you into ruin?"

"Alas, my father! How do you mistake me!" said Alphonso.

"Perhaps I do," interrupted Don Isidore. "Yet it is to me a subject of that nature, the bare imagination of which harrows up my soul. I am not fit to speak upon it! I shall therefore retire, and content myself with offering up my prayers to Heaven in your behalf, nor will I again behold you till I have firm assurance that you have banished the hellish passion even to the last shadow from your breast, or that death has snatched you from its power!"

"So saying, Don Isidore withdrew, leaving the unhappy Alphonso in a state of distraction, horror, and grief.

"It was the first time in his life that a word engendered in anger had fallen from his father, and his last expressions smote him the more poignantly to heart.

"On Don Isidore's meeting the baron and Father Thomas, they were astonished at the strange discomposure of his air and countenance.

"They were both alarmed, and, almost in a breath, asked him for Alphonso.

"Would to Heaven," said Don Isidore, "that the assassin's poniard had cut him off ere he should have lived to tell the horrid tale—he is in love with his sister!"

"They stared aghast.

"Yes," said he, after telling them the story, "it is not guilt alone that meets the scourge in this life, for I am cursed as Punalada was, and incestuous love blights my family."

"Hold—hold, Don Isidore!" interrupted the priest. "Judgment belongs to God—resignation is the duty of man; beware, therefore, that while you denounce vengeance against your son and call him sinner you are not yourself dipping deeper in sin than he. It appears, from your own account, that at the time he first conceived this unhappy passion he knew not the object of it was his sister; in the outset, therefore, no sin is imputable, since we must believe that God judges us by our means of knowledge. To expect him, then, on the instant to dislodge a deep-rooted passion is to expect more than human nature is capable of performing. It must be the work of time and strong, virtuous resolution; and, believe me, that every effort of his to overcome it will be more acceptable in the eyes of the Almighty than ten thousand acts of mere passive, negative virtue. I know and will answer for his principles, and have no fear of the event but what arises from the state of his health. I shall, therefore, go and converse with him, and I entreat that in the meantime you will, on your part, recollect that gusts of rage and boisterous invective are, above all things, incompatible with the mild spirit of that glorious religion which all adore; though some of us, to be judged from our actions, would seem to be ignorant of it."

CHAPTER DXXV.

EDGORTH BESS COMMENCES HER SEARCH FOR BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD, AND ENCOUNTERS JONATHAN WILD.

In a short time Father Thomas returned, with a face unusually imprinted with sorrow.

He desired that a physician should be immediately sent for, for Alphonso was raving mad.

A messenger was directly sent for a physician.

He came, and declared Alphonso to be in such a state as left little room for hope.

Exhausted as he had been already, he was afraid to bleed him, and expressed a fear that the feverish delirium would act upon the spirits, and carry him off.

"He ordered him a medicine, and, desiring to be called upon the appearance of any new symptom, went away.

"As night advanced, Alphonso grew more outrageous, and they were broken in upon at supper by the faithful Pierot, who told them that he was tearing off the dressings from his wound, and that four of them were unable to hold him.

"They all rose immediately, and went to his chamber.

"Donna Maria herself would not stay behind.

"They found him in a most dreadful state of furious insanity, tearing himself to pieces, while the blood gushed afresh from his half-healed wound, and the attendants were lying about the room, bruised by the flings he had given them against the walls.

"The baron ran directly to him, pinioned his arms behind his back, and, with the wrists of a giant, held him down.

"Don Isidore came in to his assistance, and they brought him to some order.

"In a few minutes growing insensibly weak, he languished away, and sunk into a swoon.

"By this time the surgeon who was sent for came, and prepared to re-dress his wounds.

"The patient's back was covered with blood, and he ordered it to be washed while he prepared his dressings.

"Donna Maria herself undertook the task.

"She washed away the blood, while the baron held the basin.

"Suddenly, to the astonishment of all, she screamed out:

"'Mother of God—my son!' and sank back upon the bed.

"Does it please Heaven,' said Don Isidore, 'to mock our miseries and send insanity throughout us all? Do I dream—or has this lady dreamed? Canst thou tell me, baron, whither tends all this strange, extravagant incident that marks our fortune of late and makes the adventures of our house more like romance than reality?'

"In our affairs,' replied the baron, 'the real is so interwoven with the marvellous, that the whole seems tinged with the colours of romance, and seeks the aid of proof. Such proof is now before us. This youth is her son, and my grandson. There lies proof indelibly written by the hand of nature on his body.'

"By Heaven!' exclaimed Don Isidore, 'the madness grows round, and I myself, I fear, shall shortly catch it!'

"If madness be,' returned the baron, warmly, 'it is with yourself, Don Isidore, who hold up your own rash opinion, founded upon circumstances subject to error and imposition, against the testimony of nature itself, and boldly confront the written characters of Providence. Behold those grapes, painted by the hand of nature!'

"Just at this moment, the lady, who had been supported by Father Thomas, came to herself.

"Give me—give me my child!' she said.

"If I live,' said the baron, 'some strange fraud has been practised on us both—a fraud most likely never to be developed. That Gonzalvo's son has exactly this mark I can give testimony. Now let us see whether Fernando has it.'

"Fernando declared that he had not.

"Then it is certain,' said the baron, 'that this is the son of Gonzalvo.'

"It is strange,' said Don Isidore—'it is beyond all comprehension strange that a child nursed under the inspection of—But what do I say? To-morrow I will send off to Talavera and have the old woman, at whose place he was nursed, brought, with her whole family, here.'

"Reserve your arguments,' said Father Thomas, 'to a fitter occasion. At present let us look to the lady, who seems to stand in need of care little less than the young gentleman.'

"The next morning Pierot was despatched to the village near Talavera to bring the old woman who had been nurse to Don Isidore's lady, her whole family, and the nurse who was employed to suckle their child, directly to Burgos, but with strict injunctions not to apprise them of a sentence that had passed.

"During this juncture Alphonso's fever had a fortunate crisis.

"He recovered the use of his senses, and, though extremely weak, gave some hopes of recovery.

"It was thought advisable to keep the discovery a secret from him till such proof should be had as would put it past a doubt one way or other.

"At length Pierot returned, and with him the nurse who had suckled Don Isidore's child, and her husband, the old woman having been for some time dead.

"Don Isidore ordered them to be conducted into the room where Donna Maria was, and where the baron, Father Thomas, and Fernando attended.

"It was agreed that Father Thomas should speak to her.

"Nurse,' said he, 'I presume you are well enough acquainted with the principles of our holy religion, and the extent to which they reach, to know the dreadful punishment attending any kind of fraud. If you do not, I will tell you, that, however it may be concealed from mortal eyes, it cannot be concealed from the Almighty, who will not fail to punish it with everlasting torments. When detected here, it meets the heaviest punishment of the law. Of both these, nurse, you and your husband stand in imminent danger; nor can anything but a fair confession save you from being handed over instantly to the cognizance of criminal law. Answer me, then, as you hope for mercy here or salvation hereafter, where is the child of Don Isidore de Haro, whom you, for purposes best known to yourselves, have changed, imposing for so many years upon him the charge of a child not his own; while, on the other hand, you may have devoted his to misery, want, or even death? Speak the truth, and, believe me, nothing else can save you, for, of one part of the charge against you, we have unquestionable evidence.'

"I will, father—I will!' exclaimed the nurse, throwing herself on her knees. 'I will tell the truth; and though, to save myself from ruin, I was guilty of concealing the story from Don Isidore, I am as innocent as the child unborn of the changing, as you shall know.'

"One day, after I had brought Don Isidore's child home to nurse, a woman with a child on her breast called in towards the close of the day, said she was a traveller, and begged a lodging. She added that she was travelling from Andalusia to Saragossa, and must be away by break of day next morning. As we never refused a Christian shelter, we ordered her to stay, and gave her a share of what we had. The weather was extremely hot, and we all lay on mats in the piazza of our cottage. Just at day-break we heard the stranger move. She got up and bid us adieu, and went away. We wished her to stay for breakfast, but she refused, alleging that she had a long journey before her, and must not delay.

"When we arose, the child was asleep in the cradle, so that, altogether, the woman had been gone three hours before I went to take it up. Guess my sorrow and surprise when I found that the vile wretch had changed the child. I knew it directly by a bunch of grapes on the back, though in other respects the children were very like each other."

"Why did you not tell Don Isidore, then?" said the priest.

"Had I been inclined to do so," replied the woman, "it would have been impossible, for he and his lady, we were told, had gone into France. But you shall hear. I ran directly to my husband, who was at work, and told him. He was going to kill me with his sickle. He immediately broke off from work and went in pursuit of her, charging me to say nothing till his return, as he was pretty sure of overtaking her. But, Heaven help us! he was all the time going further from her, for we afterwards found that she had told us wrong, and was going towards Andalusia, instead of returning from it. At night he returned, weary and broken-hearted. We knew not what to do. We feared to discover the matter, and thought it best to leave it to chance. The thing passed on. The old woman, my lady's nurse, was deceived, and, finding that we had no reason to fear a discovery, we thought it best, as it could not be remedied, to say nothing. This, I call God and our Redeemer to witness, is the whole truth, and I hope you will think that I am not so much to be blamed."

"Just as they had finished examining the woman, a letter came, directed to the baron.

"It was from the King's officer at Punalada Castle, and was in these words:—

"MOST EXCELLENT LORD,—

"In our searches through the many subterranean vaults under this castle, we found, starved almost to death, a woman, who says she has been confined many years by the marquess. She imagined at least fifty years, but that, from her story, is impossible. She adds that she has a secret of the utmost consequence to unfold—briefly to this effect:—

"She was nurse of Don Henrique Gonzalvo's son—was seduced by a priest (whom I suppose to be the prior) to give up the child to the marquess—that at last being prevailed upon, she travelled with it towards Andalusia, and falling by accident into where a child of Don Isidore de Haro's (whom she knew to be the cousin of Gonzalvo) was at nurse, she determined to save the child whom she loved from the intentions of the marquess, which she thought might possibly be wicked, and accordingly left Don Gonzalvo's in the bed, and carried away Don Isidore's. So, by this account, the youth Fernando, it is probable, is Don Isidore's, and the other your grandchild. The woman is in custody, so take your measures accordingly.

"P. S.—The woman is dying, and has made an oath to this effect."

"Here," said the baron, giving the letter to Don Isidore, "all is cleared up. Fernando is yours—Alphonso is mine."

"Alphonso shall still be mine," replied Don Isidore, for he shall be married to my daughter. I wrote to my sister, who arrived at Querro Castle the day after we left it, from Portugal, whence she was obliged to fly to escape the importunities and power of an old nobleman, who had fallen in love with my daughter. She wrote me an account of her rescue by a young Spaniard, long since from Seville. I have now received her answer to my letter, and am happy to find that the impression Alphonso made upon her niece keeps pace with his love for her. When Pierot first hinted the affair, I suspected the fact just as it turned out. Come, baron," continued Don Isidore, "let us give a loose to joy—each of us has gained without the other being a loser, and these events, which at first appeared so adverse, will serve to unite our families by additional bonds of affection."

"The body of Gonzalvo was buried in great pomp at Montalto.

"Soon after, Alphonso received Don Isidore's daughter to his arms.

"He was also invested with half the estates of the marquess, by the King; the other half, with Punalada Castle, being, by his desire, settled on Fernando, who inherited also his grandfather Guzman's estate.

"Don Rodrigo was sent to the mines.

"His mother was condemned to banishment.

"And the prior of the Convent of Vallesanto was doomed to perpetual imprisonment in the Inquisition.

"Father Thomas received the priory as a gift, from the hands of the Archbishop of Seville.

"Lastly, the baron lived, not only to see Alphonso and Fernando the first warriors in Spain, and created barons, but to instruct a great-grandson in the rudiments of the science of warfare.

"And at last died at an amazing age, surrounded by a numerous race of heroes, the descendants of the old and illustrious HOUSE OF RAYO."

Edgworth Bess closed the volume with a sigh.

Looking up, she was surprised to find that night had already come.

The perusal of the volume had occupied her for many hours.

It answered its purpose admirably.

In the deep interest she felt in the fortunes of the various characters, she forgot for awhile her own troubles and misfortunes.

She saw how, after a length of time, those who had been sorely tried were made happy at last, and she wondered whether such would be her own fate.

She hoped so, and that was why she sighed.

At this moment the kind-hearted landlady entered.

"You have been interested?" she said, interrogatively.

"I have."

"I knowed you would be, because my old man was so uncommon fond of reading it."

"I am deeply—deeply grateful to you for all your kindness to me," said Edgworth Bess. "Believe me, I am not what I seem, and I trust the day will come when I shall be able to reward you."

"Reward?—I want no reward! It's but a trifle I've done, and I'd do more any time for the man who brought you here."

"You are very kind, but I must depart. Night has come, and my search must commence."

"Nay—nay, I do not intend that we should part thus! You must take some refreshment before you go."

With much difficulty Edgworth Bess suffered herself to be persuaded to partake of a frugal meal.

She was exceedingly anxious to go on, but yet she was prudent enough to remember that it would be well to embrace this offer, for how could she tell when she should be able to obtain another meal.

At length she took her departure.

The last words uttered by the landlady were:

"Remember that while I live here you need never want for shelter or a friend. I like you much; so do not forget. If you are disappointed in your search, do not fail to come back to me."

"I will not—I will not," said the poor girl, weeping, for she was so unaccustomed to words of kindness that when they fell upon her ears they drew forth a torrent of tears.

As a parting gift, the landlady placed in her hands a small sum of money.

After this, Edgworth Bess quitted the safe shelter of that happy roof.

Out into the streets she went upon, alas! an utterly vain expedition.

She was running no trifling danger, too, for there was the danger that she might encounter her worst persecutor, Wild junior.

In what direction to look for her two stanch protectors, Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, she knew not.

She had nothing but chance to guide her.

Her first thought was to repair to the house in Westminster, and inquire of the people who lived there whether they had seen anything of her protectors.

But this idea was rejected almost immediately.

She remembered that she had seen Wild junior on the road before her.

Beyond all doubt, he would make his way to that very spot, expecting to hear tidings of her there.

Then, he would not be likely to leave without placing some kind of watch near the spot.

Above all, however, Edgworth Bess was firmly impressed with the idea that the people who kept the house were in the pay of her persecutor.

Under these circumstances, therefore, it was manifestly unwise to go anywhere near the locality of Westminster.

Yet, on the other hand, Jack Sheppard and Blueskin might be there.

The night was dark and drear.

A chill wind blew off the surface of the Thames, causing her to wrap her scanty clothing close around her.

Onward she went, wildly, foolishly, aimlessly, knowing not whither.

At length she paused.

The streets were almost deserted, and suddenly voices struck upon her ear.

She listened, and as she did so her heart grew still.

The voices came nearer.

She recognised them.

They were those of Wild junior and his associate, Nicholson.

Edgworth Bess was so alarmed at this sudden rencounter that she knew not what to do.

Her limbs failed her.

Louder and louder grew the voices.

Nearer and nearer came the two men she so much dreaded.

The street was a quiet and deserted one.

How easy it would be for them to spring upon her, to overpower her, before anyone would have time to hasten to her assistance.

What should she do?

She feared she was about to fall on the pavement, and she stretched out her hands to save herself.

Her fingers encountered wood-work.

Mechanically she looked up, and, as she did so, her heart once more became animated with hope.

It was a portion of an old projecting doorway which she had grasped.

Terror left her sufficiently in possession of her faculties for her to be aware that it was scarcely possible Wild and his companion were aware of her presence in that street.

How easy, then, to hide.

She had but to ascend a couple of steps and conceal herself in the shadow of the doorway.

Unsuspecting, and not knowing her presence there, surely they would pass on.

With trembling limbs, she crept into the shadow.

On came her foes.

She crouched down in one corner, and, breathless with dread, awaited the result of her experiment.

Would they find her?

That was the question, and, in spite of common sense, her fears suggested the worst to her.

CHAPTER DXCVI.

ONCE MORE RETURNS TO BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD.

BEFORE we narrate the strange adventures which befel Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes in the garden of the house to let, we will return for a brief space to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, of whom we have so long lost sight.

No doubt the reader will remember when and under what circumstances it was we left them.

It was after their horrible discovery of the dead bodies in the post-chaise.

By whom those murders had been committed there was no evidence to show; but our friends jumped immediately to the conclusion that no other person living could be guilty of such a deed save Jonathan Wild.

They were forced to beat a rather precipitate retreat, for they heard a troop of horsemen approaching.

They would stop at the post-chaise, and as soon as they ascertained the state of affairs, would push on at full speed, in order, if possible, to capture those who had committed such a dastardly crime.

The officers caught sight of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard when they halted on the top of the hill, and they pushed forward with redoubled speed.

Our two friends were much alarmed, for they feared, and with justice, that the murders would be laid to their charge.

If this was so they would have great difficulty in clearing themselves from the accusation. Indeed, it is questionable whether they would succeed in doing so at all.

With these few words of explanation we resume.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard galloped on at full speed down the hill, and, as soon as they reached level ground, looked about them for some place where they could shelter themselves, or get out of sight of their foes.

But no place whatever presented itself that afforded the least prospect of answering their purpose.

They had no resource but to gallop on at the top of their speed.

Suddenly, Jack stopped.

"What are you pulling up for?" cried Blueskin, in the utmost astonishment.

"Here!"

"What is it?" asked Blueskin, stopping also, and placing himself beside his comrade.

"What is to be done?" asked Jack. "My horse has fallen dead lame!"

"Confusion!"

"What is to be done now?"

"I know not."

"Nor I."

"Cannot you make him move at all?"

"See."

Jack attempted to put his horse in motion.

The creature limped a few steps painfully.

"How awkward!" said Blueskin, looking apprehensively behind him.

He expected each instant to see the officers appear at the top of the hill.

"It is in the near fore-foot, Jack," he added.

"I know that."

"What is the cause?"

"Galloping too hard down hill, I suppose."

"Alight."

"It will be no good."

"It is your only chance. Look at his foot. It may be a stone or something of that sort."

Jack was in a desponding mood, and so he shook his head.

"I don't think that is the cause," he said.

"Look and see."

Jack alighted.

He was ready to give himself up for lost.

The reason was because he felt so bitterly disappointed. It was foolish, but he had imagined that it would be an easy enough matter to get upon Jonathan's track, and to wrest Edgworth Bess from him.

Instead, however, of this, they had failed to obtain anything that might be called a clue.

Now they were themselves pursued, and from what he knew of the pertinacity of police officers, he was aware it would be no easy matter to shake them off.

This was why he was so dispirited.

He stooped down and raised his horse's foot.

The moment he did so, an ejaculation escaped his lips.

"Ha!" he said. "I could not have believed this!"

"What?"

"It is a stone in his shoe after all."

"Out with it, then, and be quick!"

"All right!"

"The officers have reached the top of the hill!"

"Curse them!"

"They see us!"

"They cannot fail to do so!" replied Jack, busily engaged in extracting the stone.

It resisted his efforts entirely, and he began to be afraid that after the stone was out his horse would still be lame in consequence of the tightness with which it was wedged in.

"They wave their arms!" cried Blueskin, who was watching keenly all the movements of the police officers.

"Are they coming?"

"Yes—they are descending the hill at full speed."

"Wait a moment!"

"Are you ready?"

"Nearly! Ah! That will do!"

The stone at last fell to the ground.

"I am afraid, Blue—"

"Of what?"

"That his foot is injured."

"Never mind fearing! You seem quite depressed."

"I am—I am."

[THE TERROR OF EDGORTH BESS AT THE APPROACH OF WILD JUNIOR.]

"Shake off the feeling, then! Mount, and gallop away. We shall soon get rid of our pursuers, and then remember what we have to do."

"Do not remind me of it."

As he spoke, Jack mounted.

The officers now were very close behind.

They had been making strenuous efforts to overtake our friends.

They did not recognise them at present.

It was probable they would do so, however, if they came much nearer.

"Hold—hold!" they cried, in chorus. "Hold, in the King's name! Surrender, or we fire!"

Of course Blueskin and Jack paid no sort of attention to this speech.

Not without many misgivings, Jack put spurs to his steed.

The creature's foot was evidently very tender and painful, for it limped at every step.

No 130.—BLUESKIN.

"On—on!" cried Blueskin. "Pay no attention to that. It will soon wear off! On, I say, without you are tired of your life!"

Goaded by the spur, Jack's horse galloped on.

As Blueskin had prophesied, the stiffness to a great extent wore off, and the animal moved more freely.

They were pleased to find that they were gradually getting away from the police officers.

At length the distance was much increased.

Nevertheless, their foes hung on perseveringly in the rear. Presently Blueskin cried:

"Ah, Jack, I have a thought! Forward—forward: we shall do them yet! I know where I am now! Hurrah! we shall get rid of them nicely!"

Jack was surprised at his comrade's exultation, and wondered what could be the cause of it.

"What have you thought of, Blue?" he asked.

"Follow me, and I will tell you. Over that hedge first, and across the meadows!"

"All right."

As he spoke, Blueskin backed his horse so as to be in readiness to take the leap.

Jack followed his example.

The hedge was not a high one.

Had it been, their horses in their present exhausted condition, might have jumped short.

In another instant both alighted safely in the meadow beyond.

The officers were so close behind that the fugitives could hear them utter a shout as they beheld the execution of this feat.

"Come on, Jack!" cried Blueskin, "keep close to me! Make good speed while we can!"

"They have jumped the hedge as well," said Jack, looking back.

"Never mind."

"They are gaining upon us too—I am sure of it."

"Forward, then, or we may be too late."

"Too late for what?"

"For my scheme to be of any good."

"What is it?"

"Wait another moment, and you will see. I can show you better than I can explain."

Jack's curiosity was roused.

Perhaps Blueskin was aware that his words would produce this effect upon Jack, and cause him to urge his horse to better speed.

As for Blueskin himself, he was more apprehensive about the safety of Edgworth Bess than he liked to confess even to Jack.

Every moment that she remained in Wild's power was an additional danger.

On her account more than his own, he was anxious to outdistance the officers.

Capture would be the destruction not only of themselves, but Edgworth Bess as well.

He directed his course straight across the meadows, Jack still following him closely.

Suddenly they came in sight of a large sheet of water which threatened to put a stop to further progress in the direction they were taking.

Jack looked right and left, and saw it was a river.

It was broad, and the current powerful and swift.

"There you are, Jack," cried Blueskin; "you can guess now what I intend to do."

"Perhaps I can."

"You must not mind a wet skin; it will be rather uncomfortable, I know."

"Then you are going to attempt to swim across that stream?"

"Yes; I believe we can do it safely."

"Then our foes will follow us."

"I don't know that. The passage looks far more dangerous than it is in reality."

"The current seems very strong."

"That's almost a deception."

"How do you know that?"

"I once swam across, many years ago, myself."

"And the passage was not difficult?"

"Not very; yet, of course, not without danger. But here we are upon the brink. Now, then, forward, the horses will swim, and the current will carry us some distance lower down before we can reach the opposite side. This will be an advantage to us, for the river is wider there."

Another loud shout came from the police officers in the rear, and if Jack Sheppard had up to that moment any hesitation about doing as his companion advised, it vanished then.

The horses seemed by no means willing to plunge into the water, but, urged by the spur, they were compelled to do so.

No sooner did they feel themselves in the water than, with a natural instinct, they struck out with their feet and swam excellently.

He directed their heads to the opposite shore; but, as Blueskin had mentioned, instead of reaching it in a straight line, they were carried towards it in an oblique direction.

Luckily for the fugitives, the current carried them away from their pursuers.

Glancing back, Blueskin saw the officers rein-up suddenly on the brink of the river.

They were gesticulating fiercely, and no doubt were holding some kind of consultation.

Some appeared willing to plunge into the stream and run the risk, but others held back and shook their heads.

In the absence of any commander, they did nothing, but remained in a state of indecision.

"Blueskin," cried Jack, "are we safe?"

"I hope so."

"Is there any other means of crossing the stream than the one we have adopted?"

"None of any service. There's a bridge, but then it's two miles from here nearer to London."

"Then, if they attempt to cross over by that, we shall be all right?"

"Yes, I think we are all right now. Look!"

Jack did so.

The officers were still pausing at the edge of the river, debating as to what they should do, and watching the fugitives.

To them the feat appeared to be a very perilous one.

To a certain extent, they were desirous of doing their duty, of course, yet at the same time they endeavoured to preserve their own persons from injury as much as possible.

They dreaded pistol-shots more than anyone would have imagined; and, as to the water, they did not like the idea at all.

In England, swimming never has been anything like a general accomplishment, and, of all the officers, there was not one who had learned this useful art.

To them, the passage of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard seemed full of the utmost danger.

They were carried along at an exceedingly rapid rate by the current.

Therefore, as the officers were resolved not to imperil their lives by drowning, they remained watching and consulting until the fugitives landed safely on the opposite shore.

"Come—come," said one of them at this juncture, "this sort of thing won't do, you know."

"What will, then?"

"Why, when it is known that we have lost those two murderers through not following them across this river, we shall be reprimanded."

"Oh, bother!"

"We shall, and you all know that as well as I do. They will say, the fugitives could cross over safely, and so could we."

"Well, then, if that's your way of thinking, why don't you take your horse into the river and show us the example of swimming across?"

"I am not going to be the only one," was the reply; "without you all join me, I sha'n't."

"Look here," said another, "the best thing I can propose is this."

"What—what?"

"Lower down there is a bridge; let us gallop towards that, and ride over it, and then continue the pursuit. We may come up with 'em after all; and if we don't, the fact of our keeping up the chase will look as though we tried our best to capture them."

After much time had been lost in discussion, this plan was agreed upon, and the officers galloped off to the bridge.

Their only hope was that Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, when they got on the opposite side of the stream, would be lulled into a state of false security.

If this was so, there was a chance, and just a chance, that they would be able to come upon them at unawares.

Whether they succeeded or not in this attempt, or whether they had to abandon the chase as altogether hopeless, time alone can show.

CHAPTER DXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES SUCCEED IN MAKING THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE GARDEN OF THE HOUSE TO LET.

It is now time to return to Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes.

When we last left them, it was in the garden attached to the mysterious empty house.

Fortune had favoured the two villains so far as to enable them to escape into the open air undetected.

Wild, to Noakes's infinite relief, professed himself exceedingly anxious to be gone.

But the reflection which the past events had created filled his breast with rage and mortification.

It vividly brought back to him the time when he had held a position exactly opposite to his present one.

He had given utterance to some foolish regrets, and some equally foolish threats of what he would do should he once again succeed in obtaining his former power.

Of his doing this, however, the probability was slight. To these ravings—properly speaking, they could be called nothing else—Mr. Noakes paid no attention.

His desire to leave that place had by no means abated. If anything, it had increased.

Therefore, while Wild was pouring out these speeches, and making fierce stabs and thrusts at the air, as though it was a mortal enemy, Mr. Noakes was looking in every direction for their horses.

"Where are they?" he had exclaimed. "I can't see them."

"Curse you and the horses too!"

"What for?"

"You think of nothing else."

"Take my advice, Mr. Wild."

"Bah!—I don't want it."

"You will dally here until it is too late. Those men inside are desperate characters, and would not shrink from a trifle. Let us mount and depart."

"Get the horses, then, and don't stand chattering there."

"Come with me," returned Noakes, endeavouring to show as much spirit as he could. "I don't intend to wander about and look for them myself."

The change in his companion's manner could not fail to attract Jonathan Wild, and the last words appeared to have the effect of bringing him to his senses.

"Come," he said, gruffly, "let us make no more fuss about it—let us seek them and begone."

"Willingly."

"But, from the bottom of my heart, I wish I had had anyone for a comrade but yourself."

"Then let us part, Mr. Wild; I don't desire your company, and we can't agree."

"You would like to go, no doubt," was the reply, "but you shall not while you are alive."

"But I promise—I will swear—"

"I wouldn't believe a thousand of your oaths, and so be silent. It doesn't suit me to part with you."

"I wish it did."

"I know you too well, Noakes; don't think you deceive me as to your character."

"You labour under a mistake."

"I know the first use you would make of your liberty if we parted."

"You do not."

"I do," was the reply. "You would go straight and surrender yourself to the authorities, and give evidence against me, by which means you would probably obtain your own pardon."

"No, no, Mr. Wild—believe me, I would not run that risk."

"Hold—no more."

"Let me speak; now that the subject has been mentioned, let the point be settled once for all."

"It is settled now."

"But will you not believe me, Mr. Wild, that if we part I would take every pains to get out of this hateful country as soon as I could?"

"Noakes."

"What?"

"Do you hear me?"

"Of course I do."

"Then understand that there is one thing, and one thing only that can divide us, and perhaps that may not do so."

"What is it?"

"Death!" was the reply, "Until you die or I die, or until Fate overtakes us both, you shall never leave me! Now, stop it, I want to hear no more."

"But—"

"Let it be sufficient you know your destiny; for the future it is linked with mine, and nothing can break it. I advise you, then, to make yourself as comfortable as you are able; but you can please yourself about that—I don't care. Now, then, for the horses."

So saying, Wild began in good earnest to search about among the trees for his steed.

This was no easy task.

From long neglect the whole of the ground had been thickly covered with trailing vegetation that made walking almost impossible.

Suddenly, however, they perceived a flash of light at one of the windows of the mansion.

"I told you how it would be," cried Noakes, in a triumphant voice. "You have wasted time that ought to have been occupied in galloping away. Now we shall find ourselves unable to move."

"Silence, fool!" was the reply. "Look about you and secure the horses."

The flash of light was followed by another and another, so that it would seem that a discovery of some kind had been made, and one of no small importance.

Presently, Jonathan Wild sprang forward suddenly.

"Hurrah!" he cried. "I have my horse now. Noakes, where is yours? it will be close to this no doubt."

Noakes looked around, and directly afterwards saw his own steed.

It allowed itself to be caught unresistingly, and the two companions in crime hastened to seat themselves in the saddles.

By this time, however, a general alarm pervaded the premises.

They could hear the loud murmuring of voices, and then presently a door was dashed violently open.

A crowd of persons rushed tumultuously into the garden.

Many carried bright lights, so that the whole scene around was rapidly revealed.

Shading their eyes with their hands, they looked carefully around them.

Then a voice exclaimed:

"There they are—there they are!"

"Where?" shouted a chorus of voices.

The speaker raised his hand and pointed.

"They are on horseback, yonder. They go, look—look, we are betrayed! Our own lives and our own safety demand the death of those spies!"

"To the gate," cried another—"to the gate—there is no other means of escape but that; let us intercept them there and slay them!"

"That's the play! This way—quick, my friends—quick: there is not a second to be lost!"

With a sudden rush the whole party dashed through the garden in the direction of the gate.

Doubtless they were well acquainted with its exact position, and would be able to reach it in the briefest possible space of time.

But Wild and Noakes possessed no such knowledge.

The only advantage they had consisted in their being mounted, while the others were on foot.

Chance alone, however, could guide them to the gate.

"Follow me closely, Noakes. Draw your sword and be in readiness for action! Now, then, quick!"

The horses stumbled once or twice, and made their way with great difficulty through the tangled weeds and briars.

The particular faculty of being able to see with tolerable distinctness when all was obscurity around, rendered Wild good service on this occasion.

It must not be forgotten that he had found his way from the house to the gate, and had admitted the conspirators.

To some extent he had noted the position of different objects, and all at once a cry of satisfaction escaped his lips.

"Here is the gate, Noakes," he cried. "I will have it open in a second! Fortunately, it is only bolted."

Jonathan alighted, drew back the bolt, and flung the door open.

But before he could seat himself again in the saddle, the conspirators made their appearance upon the scene.

All had their swords drawn, and they made a violent and terrific attack upon Noakes.

To escape them, he touched his horse with the spur, and bounded out of the gate, leaving Jonathan to contend against his enemies as best he might.

With something of his former strength and spirit, Jonathan Wild uttered a terrific howl, and swung his heavy sword around him.

It beat down those of the conspirators as though they had been mere laths, and before they could recover guard again, he had darted through the doorway and disappeared.

Undauntedly, however, those who had attacked him pressed forward.

"Noakes," he cried—"Noakes, where are you?"

There was no response to his words.

But as he listened, he fancied he could hear the faint clatter of a horse's hoofs.

"He's trying to give me the slip!" he ejaculated. "Well, no matter, I will overtake him before he goes many yards."

Satisfied that his companion was on the road before him, Jonathan urged his horse forward by every means he could think of.

The poor beast was thoroughly tortured and maddened by pain.

It tore along at a speed, such as it had never before made in the whole course of its existence.

Plainer and plainer grew the clatter of horse's hoofs before him.

The house to let was left far in the rear.

Of the conspirators nothing could be seen.

A few minutes more of that headlong pace brought Wild on a level with Mr. Noakes.

That worthy heard him coming, and tried his utmost to get away.

But it was in vain.

His horse could not proceed at such a rate as Wild's did.

"So you thought to get away from me, did you?" cried Jonathan, savagely. "I've a good mind to make you feel it! Don't try it another time. You will be unwise to arouse my temper!"

"You are mistaken," said Noakes. "Did you think I was trying to get away from you?"

"It looked d—nably like it!" was the reply. "You left me in the lurch and galloped off at full speed; but you see you have failed on this occasion, when you had such an excellent opportunity, and so you will do, no matter how often you try it on."

Mr. Noakes muttered something, but what it was Wild could not distinctly hear, nor did he trouble himself to ask for the speech to be repeated.

As he looked around him, he perceived various indications of the approach of morning.

Travelling by daylight was exceedingly dangerous, or, at least, by no means so safe as travelling by night.

Therefore Jonathan began to seek for some place where he could obtain temporary shelter.

Nothing that seemed in any way calculated to answer his purpose met his view.

But they appeared to be in a very thinly-populated part of the country—a part where there did not seem much likelihood of meeting with persons who would observe their movements.

Accordingly, Wild continued to push on until the day had fairly begun.

The sun was high in the heavens, and the whole scene around them presented a delightful aspect.

But Jonathan saw nothing pleasing in it.

CHAPTER DXCVIII.

JONATHAN WILD SHOOTS THE GAMEKEEPER.

As the day progressed, Jonathan Wild became more and more alive to the necessity of seeking out some place where he could remain in concealment until nightfall.

Still he was unable to see anything that suited him.

In the distance was a windmill, and, from the appearance of it, it seemed to be deserted and half in ruins.

He could not fancy the idea of taking up his quarters there, however, and as his eye fell upon it he shook his head.

He recollected his last unpleasant adventure, and the narrow escape he had had from capture.

Then a little way off on the left was a dense mass of trees.

Beneath the shelter of these they could surely conceal themselves.

And yet Jonathan felt a repugnance to going towards it. As, however, no other place offered itself, it became a matter of necessity.

Accordingly he directed his horse's head towards it, after having first satisfied himself by a scrutinising gaze that no human being was in sight.

Mr. Noakes preserved a deep and sullen silence.

There was a look of extreme chagrin upon his countenance, from which it might be presumed that he was greatly disappointed at his failure to escape from the clutches of Jonathan Wild.

That such was his hope and intention is pretty evident, in spite of all that he said to the contrary.

At length the shadow of the trees was reached.

Before they had gone many paces, Jonathan observed a narrow, beaten path.

This he resolved to follow.

It was only a few yards in length, and terminated before a rude stone building.

It was only about six feet in height, and formed of pieces of stone rudely piled together.

In front was an old weatherbeaten door, which hung half open on its hinges.

From the appearance of the place it would seem that at some time or other some person had taken up his quarters there.

Whether or not it was occupied now, Wild could not precisely tell, but he resolved speedily to satisfy himself upon this point.

Alighting, therefore, from his horse, he led him by the bridle towards the door.

Mr. Noakes imitated his actions.

"All is well," said Jonathan, suddenly, as, throwing the door open, he revealed a small, irregularly-shaped chamber, scarcely more than ten feet in area.

"Queer place this," said Wild.

"Very. What can it have been, I wonder?"

"I don't care one jot," cried Wild, "what it has been, so long as it serves our present purpose—that is all we have to look after."

"How still the place is," continued Jonathan. "I think we shall be safe here for the remainder of the day."

"I trust so. What shall we do with the horses?"

"Don't turn them loose—secure them in some way to a tree, so that they cannot stray far; it might be necessary for us to mount them suddenly and ride off."

The rein was unbuckled from the bit on one side and used as a tether to keep the horses near one spot.

The cattle being thus disposed of, Wild and Noakes returned to the singular-looking building.

There was scarcely room for both of them inside it, but nevertheless they contrived to squeeze themselves in.

On one of the stones larger than the rest Jonathan perceived presently a rude kind of inscription.

Not without some difficulty, he partially made it out.

"I can explain the meaning of this now, I think," he said, addressing his companion. "Look at that inscription. I make it out to be that some old bigot, who has amused himself by playing at being a hermit, has made it his cell."

Noakes looked, and saw that the inscription ran to that effect.

It also stated that the place had been erected by the said hermit himself.

"Never mind him," said Wild, "so long as we can remain secure from observation. That is the great point."

That they would be successful in this seemed very probable.

A hermit's cell would certainly be situated in the most out-of-the-way spot that could be thought of.

There was little fear of anyone paying it a visit, and, having made themselves as comfortable as the nature of the place would permit, the two villains waited patiently for nightfall.

Ere long, however, the pangs of hunger began to make themselves felt, and, in order to satisfy them, Jonathan shot a couple of birds that happened to alight at no great distance.

They were pheasants, and this made Jonathan wonder whether the place he was in was used as a preserve for game.

He bestowed scarcely a second thought upon it, but set to work along with Noakes in preparing a meal.

In this manner time wore away, Mr. Noakes remaining silent, except when some question was addressed to him by Wild.

At last Jonathan exclaimed:

"Oh, if I could but be revenged upon my chief enemies, I should be content—that is all that I desire!"

"And in attempting to gratify it," was the reply, "you will bring ruin down upon your head."

"I have failed as yet, but success will come at last! Assist me, Noakes, in this, and you will have cause for gratulation."

"Why so?"

"Because, as soon as ever my revenge is gratified, I will go straight away from England and never set foot upon its shores again."

Noakes was silent.

"Indeed," continued Wild, "I am growing so weary of being hunted up and down, that there are moments when I feel more than half inclined to forego my schemes and set out for the sea-coast at once."

After such an admission as this, it was not likely that Noakes could forbear from urging his favourite point.

"Abandon all thoughts of revenge," he said; "your enemies are by far too powerful for you to reach them. While there is yet time, make your escape; do not leave it until too late."

"I will think of it," was the reply—"I will think of it."

Some time afterwards, Jonathan laid himself down to sleep, giving Noakes strict injunctions to keep watch.

It was not that he stood so much in need of slumber, though he could not tell what would happen during the night that was approaching, nor could he be certain how long a time would elapse before he had an opportunity of sleeping again.

In this manner, slowly and tediously enough, the hours passed by, until darkness came.

As soon as they judged it prudent to leave, they got their horses in readiness for the road, and mounted.

Ere they had gone ten steps, however, they heard a crashing of branches, and the next moment a man appeared.

He was attired as a gamekeeper, and in one hand he carried a gun.

"Hold!" he shouted. "So I've found out who it is that poaches here at last? Now, then, give up quietly, will you? If you don't, I'll fetch you down with this gun—it is well loaded with slugs!"

So saying, the gamekeeper placed the gun to his shoulder, and pointed it at the heads of Noakes and Wild.

The latter was in anything but an agreeable humour, and this interruption exasperated him to a degree.

"Take that!" he cried, as soon as the gamekeeper had finished his speech.

While uttering these words, Jonathan, with great suddenness, drew forth a pistol.

He aimed it full in the man's face, and pulled the trigger.

A report instantly succeeded, and the man, staggering back, sunk upon the ground.

"Now, then, Noakes, forward!" cried Jonathan. "We must get clear of this spot pretty quick! That shot will bring all the rest of the keepers round us, no doubt!"

Mr. Noakes was terrified, and required but little urging. At full speed they galloped out of the little wood, and were speedily on the high-road.

The darkness favoured them greatly, and, after going for some distance at a rapid pace, Jonathan slackened his horse's speed.

"It's all right!" he cried, looking back. "There's no pursuit, and if we go on at this headlong rate, we shall attract attention."

Noakes was still surly, so he reined-in his horse without making any reply.

Every hour he was growing more and more exasperated with his companion's conduct.

Above all did this encounter with the gamekeeper enrage him.

Their purpose in riding away from London had been to get to some place where they could keep quiet for awhile.

So far from having done this, Wild had, wherever he went, left a mark of blood behind him, or else committed such acts as could not fail to draw down universal attention.

Remonstrance he had found perfectly useless.

There was only, indeed, one thing he could think of, and that was to give Jonathan the slip at the very first opportunity that occurred.

His former failure told him this would be no easy matter, yet he pondered over the idea in his mind, and was not without the hope that he should hit upon some means of ensuring success.

Of course Wild could not fail to notice his companion's unusual silence.

It vexed him, for he always found it a great relief to talk.

At length he asked:

"What are you so silent for, Noakes?"

"Because it's no good for me to speak."

The words and tone in which they were uttered told him there was such a thing as drawing a cord too tightly.

He might exasperate Noakes to such a degree that, in his blind rage, he would commit some foolish deed which would involve the destruction of both.

It would have vexed Jonathan greatly to have been left alone, and therefore, had he been ever so sure that Noakes would not betray him, he would not have given his consent to a parting.

For the first time for a very long period, Jonathan Wild gave himself up to a little serious thought.

He pondered soberly over everything, and the more he reflected the more unsafe and perilous his position seemed to be.

Looking at things with a calm eye, and judging dispassionately, he could not avoid coming to the conclusion that ere long there must be an end to the present state of things.

He was not without experience in such matters, and he knew, however daring and successful a course might have been pursued by anyone, the result was always the same.

"I must be speedy in what I have to do," he muttered, in a half-audible tone; "there must be no time lost now; all my energies must be bent in one direction. Revenge and safety—those are the two things I must ever keep before me. When I have satisfied the first, I shall be content to remain quiet anywhere—the chief object of my life will have been attained. Then will come the question, what shall I do with Noakes—how shall I dispose of him?"

Hearing his name mentioned, the latter turned half round in the saddle, and exclaimed:

"What did you say, Mr. Wild?"

CHAPTER DXCIX.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES COME TO A BETTER UNDERSTANDING WITH ONE ANOTHER.

"NOTHING—nothing!" replied Wild, hastily, and in some confusion, for upon hearing the question asked, his first thought was that he had been overheard in his plottings.

If such was the case it was quite certain it would widen the breach already between them.

Not without anxiety, then, he glanced furtively into the countenance of his companion.

"I thought I heard you mention my name," returned Noakes. "I was not quite sure—I was thinking."

Jonathan gave a sigh of relief.

"You were mistaken," he said. "What were you thinking of?"

"I was cursing the hour when chance first threw you in my way! It is through you, and you alone that I owe all my misfortunes! Had I not listened to your voice I should, at the present moment, be Governor of Newgate, and not a wretched fugitive hunted from one part of the country to the other!"

"I don't know that, nor you either! But what has occurred to vex you lately?"

"Everything!"

"Well, Noakes, just pay attention to me for a few minutes."

"Say on!"

"What is past and done cannot be undone—you admit that, don't you?"

"Certainly!"

"Well, then, we are companions, and I don't choose that we should separate. Instead of cursing the past would it not be better for you to consider what will be the best thing to do in the future?"

Mr. Noakes was literally astounded to hear Jonathan Wild speaking in such a reasonable strain.

He looked at him incredulously, being at first unable to believe that so great a change had taken place in him.

His next thought was, that Jonathan had some deep-laid scheme in his brain, and this was but the commencement of the unwinding of its convolutions.

From what is known of the man, the reader will admit that this was a very reasonable supposition.

With something between real and assumed indifference, Noakes replied, with a half-offended air:

"I have tried that, Mr. Wild, and found it useless,—you are deaf to the voice of reason."

"I have been."

"And are you not now?"

"No."

Mr. Noakes could hardly credit the evidence of his senses.

"Did I not tell you," continued Wild, "a little while ago that I should consider of what you had said?"

"You did."

"Well, then, I have considered."

"And with what result?"

"That you are in the right. I can see it now that I have suffered myself to be led away by my rage and by my strong desire for revenge."

"Then—then," said Noakes, hesitatingly—"do you really contemplate leaving England?"

"I do."

"But when?"

"As soon as it is possible to do so."

"Then turn your horse's head in the direction of the sea-coast," cried Noakes, "and in a few hours we shall be safe from pursuit."

"Not quite—your forget that there are several little obstacles in the way which must first be surmounted."

"What are they?"

"The chief is money—how much have you about you?"

"None."

"And I have only a little more, so that, you see, before your intention can be carried out, gold must be obtained from somewhere."

Mr. Noakes sighed.

"It will end in our destruction," he said. "I can see that plain enough."

"But we will be careful, Noakes. Do you overlook the fact that we must have money to pay our passage when we get on board ship?"

"True, I had forgotten that."

"And no wonder,—you fixed your attention upon one point, and one point alone, never thinking of the difficulties you may have to encounter in reaching it."

Noakes felt that there was truth in this.

"I am inclined to reason with you to-night," said Jonathan, though, as may be supposed, he had a motive for this change in his tactics.

"I am glad to hear it," said Noakes, "and I hope some conclusion will be arrived at—for me, this life is worse than any death could be."

"I think we have arrived at a conclusion," replied Wild,—“it is, to leave England for some other land. All that we have to do is, decide upon the means of carrying out our intention."

"True."

"Money, you grant, is absolutely necessary. Well, then, I will consent to forego all my schemes of vengeance, and direct the whole of my attention to obtaining the sum we require."

"And when you have obtained it—"

"We will set sail."

"Mr. Wild."

"What?"

"In time back, when our positions were different, I heard many strange rumours concerning yourself."

"No doubt."

"Among them there was one which seemed at least to have common sense for its foundation."

"What was that?"

"It was reported on all sides that you had concealed in various places a large amount of money. The general impression was that it was buried in various parts of the country, in small sums, and that you alone knew the secret of their situation."

Wild laughed.

"There was foundation for that report," he replied, "though how the fact got abroad I can't tell."

"Everyone believed it," continued Noakes, "especially those who had the least idea of the amount of business you transacted."

"And so you believed it?"

"I did, and believe it still."

Jonathan laughed again.

"Now," continued Noakes, "if you are sincere in what you say, disclose where the money is buried. Let us go and obtain it; we shall then have sufficient to answer every purpose."

"Noakes."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"I am, in a manner of speaking, forced to say it, but you are a clever man—a very clever man indeed!"

"As how, Mr. Wild—as how?"

"Well, then, I confess that the money I made by my trade I buried in several places, in small sums."

"You did?"

"I really did."

"Then—"

"Stay—don't get so excited! The worst of your cleverness is, you always contrive to overlook something. Now, in the present matter you have overlooked a serious point."

"What is that?"

"Did you never consider that I might at some time or other have unburied this treasure myself, and disposed of it elsewhere?"

Mr. Noakes looked blank.

"But you have not done so—you are only telling me this to deceive me."

"You can be of that way of thinking if you like," said Jonathan, grinding his teeth savagely; "but I can assure you it is the truth, nevertheless. Curses on my folly—I wish I had left it where it was!"

"What do you mean?"

"Just this,—when the report got wind that my money was buried, I thought there would be many people on the search. I imagined, too, that all my movements would be closely watched."

"Yes—yes!"

"Therefore, I decided that it would be unsafe to let the treasure remain buried any longer; and so, using great care, I went at irregular intervals to the various places, and on each occasion dug up a portion and transferred it to my pockets."

"Well, what did you do with it then?"

"Like a fool, I placed it in a bank. I imagined that was a profound secret. I did not deposit it in my own name, but in one formed by a transposition of the letters in Jonathan Wild. By degrees I kept adding fresh deposits to the amount, until at length the whole reached a sum little short of twenty-six thousand pounds!"

Mr. Noakes gasped for breath.

"And—and—that money," he said—"what became of it?"

"It was stolen from me," said Wild, in an angry tone—"stolen from me by one who ever acted a traitor's part towards me!"

"Who was that?"

"How he became possessed of the knowledge of the secret," continued Wild, without heeding the question, "I know not, and events proved that he did obtain the knowledge. While I was in prison in Newgate, my son, George Wild, went to the bank, and, forging my feigned name, drew out the whole amount; and from that moment to this I have neither seen nor heard of him!"

Mr. Noakes was quite overcome by the bare mention of such a sum of money.

"And he took it all?" he asked.

"All but a mere trifle,—nothing worth mentioning. Curses on him! But the time will come, I hope, when we shall meet again, and then I will make him bitterly rue the hour! He has been a curse to me from the very first; but he shall suffer for all! No arguments—no entreaties—nothing shall cause me to overlook this last act!"

"Did he not once serve you the same trick before?" asked Noakes.

"He did; and when he returned I overlooked it, and forgave him for it. He nearly ruined me then, but I recovered my position. When he came back he promised to aid me in all my plans. I knew what a useful ally he would be, and so, you see, I forgave him."

"And," asked Mr. Noakes, "was that the whole amount you possessed?"

"Every guinea."

"Challenge your memory, Mr. Wild—think again. In burying so many different sums of money in so many different places, is it not possible you may have forgotten one?"

"No—that is a false hope. I kept a careful record in a book of every one, and took especial care to visit all."

"And you have no more money?"

"Not any, Noakes; so abandon that thought at once. Money, however, we must have, whether we remain in England or whether we quit it. Assist me to obtain some, and I will go."

"A little will suffice," said Noakes, after a pause. "We might sell our horses—they would fetch something."

"No doubt. But, then, there's something else to be borne in mind. When we get to a foreign country we must exist. I am not the man to settle down at my time of life into a mere working machine. Before I leave these shores, I must obtain money enough to live upon—at any rate, for some years to come. It is no use attempting to go abroad without money in your pockets."

"Then," said Noakes, "it appears to me the prospect of going away is, after all, as far off as ever."

"Not so—not so; for I am more sick of this life than you imagine. But I have a plan."

"What is it?"

"We must put our heads together, Noakes, and devise some excellent scheme by which we can obtain all the money we require at one stroke; then we will depart. You see that is reducing the risk materially."

"But where is such an amount to be obtained?"

"That I cannot take upon myself to say at this moment. It will require much consideration. A rash resolve might prove fatal to both of us. May I hope that there is a better understanding now between us?"

"There is, Mr. Wild,—here's my hand upon it. I am wholly anxious that you should consider the future—not wholly disregard it."

"Well, you see what I am disposed to do now."

"Yes, and I am quite content, for you may depend, should either of us be taken prisoner, such a close watch will be kept upon our persons that escape will be utterly out of the question."

"Very true—very true."

And Jonathan Wild shuddered, for just at that moment he happened to remember the prediction which had twice been uttered by the old hag.

CHAPTER DC.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD RE-CROSS THE RIVER AND CONTINUE THEIR SEARCH FOR JONATHAN WILD.

LEAVING Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes journeying along the highway, we will return to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, and relate what befel them after crossing the river.

The officers quite made a mistake in their calculations when they imagined the fugitives would remain anywhere about that spot.

No sooner had they landed and shaken the moisture from their apparel than Blueskin exclaimed:

"Now, Jack, forward—forward! We must not lose a second—every moment is of the utmost importance to us!"

"I know that!" said Jack. "But which way are you going now?"

"Straight on at present. Let us follow the course of the stream—we can debate as we go along!"

This was done.

Looking back, Blueskin observed the officers ride off, and instantly divined what was their intention.

"They are going to ride over the bridge, and think to get at us by going round that way. We shall beat them, I feel assured. On—on!"

"Suppose," said Jack, "we were to ride a little further and then swim across the river again; there does not seem to be so very much risk in it, and ten to one if we should not by that means throw the officers off the scent altogether."

"A good thought, Jack; we will carry it out!"

"Now?"

"No, not just at present. Let us push on, and wait long enough to be certain that the officers are out of sight."

"I think we are better on that side of the river than this," continued Jack.

"Why?"

"Because I feel convinced we are on Jonathan Wild's right track. If it had not been for the officers we might probably, by this time, have discovered him. At any rate, he would be on the other side of the stream, and so we must make our way back there."

"I quite agree with you, Jack. Depend upon it, no one else could be guilty of such a crime."

In this supposition Blueskin and Jack were both mistaken.

Jonathan Wild had not committed the murders in the post-chaise, therefore they were misled.

They had got upon a false scent, and unfortunately they had no suspicion such was the case.

Of course, all was owing to the false information they had received at the first.

Even if they did overtake Jonathan Wild, and even if they captured him, what a disappointment it would be to find that he had no hand in the poor girl's abduction.

At present this event was not likely to occur, for at that time Jonathan Wild was very many miles away from them in the interior of the country.

Both considered the project of recrossing the river a good one; and now, having gone, as they believed, a sufficient distance, they determined to make the attempt.

The river was very much broader at this point, but to counterbalance this disadvantage was the fact that the current was by no means so rapid.

Therefore, with little difficulty they were able to cross almost in a straight line.

Immediately upon landing they pushed on, being exceedingly anxious to overtake their ancient enemy.

Gaining presently an elevated piece of ground, they paused, and looked around them.

Far away in the distance, they could perceive a number of small moving objects.

They knew in a moment what they were.

They were the heads of the police officers which were just visible above the tops of the hedgerows as they galloped along.

But though they looked far and wide, they could neither see anything of Jonathan Wild nor any token of his presence.

Again Jack's heart sank.

In a saddened voice, he exclaimed:

"It's all over, Blueskin—all over! Think of the length of time she has already been in his power, and here we are no nearer to discovering her than we were at first."

"We cannot say that," replied Blueskin. "For my own part, I believe we are much nearer. You must continue to hope on—keep up your spirits. Nothing will be gained by despondency."

"But I can't help feeling despondent. In this affair, Fate seems set against us altogether!"

"It does, indeed; but do not linger here, Jack. Some of those officers may perceive us in the distance, then we shall have them on our track again. Forward!—forward! Surely we shall learn something ere long!"

After some discussion, it was resolved that they should return to the high-road, and gallop along it, looking closely on all sides for some traces of their enemy.

Under all the circumstances, this was really the most reasonable thing they could attempt.

A gallop of a few minutes brought them to the main road; and, after glancing behind them to ascertain that none of their foes were near, they set forward, Blueskin with renewed hope in his heart.

It was indeed a most disheartening circumstance for them that Edgworth Bess should have disappeared just at the moment she had.

They believed they had succeeded in overcoming all their difficulties, and, in fact, had it not been for this unlucky event, she would doubtless have been in a fair way of recovering her possessions.

Now the prospect seemed distant enough.

Miles and miles were travelled, still without the least sign presenting itself.

They did not dare to make any inquiries, but had to trust entirely to their eyesight to guide them.

The reader scarcely needs to be told that they were unsuccessful in making any discovery.

But as time passed on, Jack's horse began to show symptoms of intense distress. Probably it had received some serious injury in consequence of the stone having lodged in its foot.

At any rate, it was now completely knocked up, and it was no longer possible for them to continue on their way at anything like a rapid rate.

Every mile, indeed, the poor animal seemed to grow more and more exhausted.

Blueskin's, however, held up bravely.

It was evidently a superior horse altogether to Jack's.

This circumstance caused them not a little dismay, as speed was of such vital importance to them.

"Something must be done, Jack," said Blueskin; "it will not do to go on like this."

"There is only one thing can be done that I can think of."

"What is that?"

"To obtain another horse."

"I fear that will be impossible."

"Why so?"

"Because we have not money enough to purchase another."

"We must have one by some means—the enterprise cannot fail from that."

"But if we steal one there will probably be a hue and cry raised about, and then we shall find ourselves involved in fresh difficulties."

"I don't see how we are to avoid it."

"We must think—we must think."

A silence of several minutes' duration took place, but even during those few minutes Jack could perceive a perceptible difference in the rate of speed made by his horse.

"We shall come to a stop soon," he at length ejaculated—"it's a sorry jade. That man has deceived us."

"I don't know that," replied Blueskin; "few ordinary horses could stand against such continued and violent exertion."

"I must have another, that's certain," said Jack, positively. "Now, for instance, what a satisfaction it would be if I could meet with some one on the road, and persuade him to exchange."

Blueskin laughed.

"That's droll," he said; "in fact, quite like one of your old ideas."

"Such a thing might be done."

"But you would have to offer some very powerful inducement."

"That remains to be seen; however, another mile, and you will see my horse ready to lie down by the roadside."

"Hark!" exclaimed Blueskin. "I can hear some one coming. Listen!"

Jack did so.

The regular beat of a horse's hoofs could then be heard.

"Yes," he said—"some one is travelling our way, and by the sound, I take it he is mounted on a capital nag."

"Could you persuade him to exchange, Jack?"

"I don't know. I might, perhaps."

"Should you mind trying?"

"Not at all."

"Well, then, do so."

"I will. Ride on, Blueskin, and leave me behind. Don't go altogether out of sight, but just watch my proceedings. I may require your assistance."

"All right!—I wish you luck; but if, by fair means, you can persuade that traveller to give up his horse, it is very strange indeed to me."

"Watch the result," said Jack. "Ride forward at your best speed—I will follow slowly, so that the traveller will quickly overtake me."

Blueskin obeyed without another word.

He had every confidence in Jack's cleverness.

In past times he had seen many instances of it, and he quite believed his companion clever enough to obtain what he required by some skilful stratagem.

Jack Sheppard remained stationary for some time, watching his companion as he receded in the distance.

Then, finding the traveller was not very far behind him, he set his own steed in motion.

The few minutes' rest produced a beneficial effect upon the creature, for now it set forward at much better speed than before.

On came the traveller very much more rapidly.

Once Jack Sheppard ventured to glance back over his shoulder.

He caught sight of the traveller, who appeared to be a cavalry officer in undress uniform.

To the rider Jack paid but little attention, he had eyes only for his steed.

His heart quite gave a bound when he found what a glorious creature it was.

Even in the distance he could perceive that its action was superb.

At present, however, he had thought of no plan, nor, indeed, did he trouble himself much to do so, but preferred to rely more upon chance, and upon seizing upon some occurrence and turning it to his advantage.

He quickly discovered one favourable circumstance.

When the traveller was only a few yards in the rear, Jack pulled up.

He was at the foot of a rather steep hill, and he allowed his horse to ascend it at a walk.

He made a calculation in his own mind that the officer, if such he was, would probably do the very same thing.

As a great deal depended upon this, Jack watched for the result with some slight amount of anxiety.

To have looked back would have appeared suspicious, so he relied wholly upon his sense of hearing.

CHAPTER DCI.

DESCRIBES THE CLEVER STRATAGEM JACK SHEPPARD MADE USE OF TO OBTAIN POSSESSION OF THE TRAVELLER'S HORSE.

He was not kept for any length of time in a state of suspense.

He was almost ready to utter a cry of delight when he heard the traveller draw in his horse, and reduce his speed to a walk.

But even although their paces were the same, such was the superiority of the traveller's horse that he quickly gained upon Jack Sheppard.

When only a little distance separated from the officer, Jack turned in the saddle and made a bow.

"Good day, sir," he said, in a pleasant, off-handed way, and just in the manner that travellers were in the habit of accosting each other in those days.

Jack found his supposition regarding the stranger was a correct one.

He was a cavalry officer in undress uniform.

In a pleasant tone of voice he returned the salutation.

In those days when travelling was such a widely-different thing to what it is now, perfect strangers frequently fell into conversation on the highway.

When they met with an agreeable companion it was pleasant enough, and, moreover, many found it an advantage, for it was much safer than travelling alone.

Three more steps placed the officer abreast of Jack, who immediately exclaimed, in a voice of the greatest enthusiasm:

"That's a magnificent creature, sir, upon my word—a most magnificent creature! I never in my life saw an equal to it!" And Jack looked at the horse in real and unaffected admiration.

No man who owns a horse can be insensible to a compliment paid to it,—in fact, it is a weak point; therefore, the stranger, making a half bow, replied:

"It is a fine animal, certainly—the best I ever had beneath me."

"I shouldn't wonder," said Jack; "it's everything, so far as appearance goes."

"And in everything else."

"Then you have a treasure indeed," added Jack. "Now, look at my horse. Tell me what you think of it."

The officer stroked his chin.

"I am a blunt man," he said. "You have given me your candid opinion of my horse, haven't you?"

"I have."

"But perhaps if I was to give you my candid opinion of yours, you would be offended."

[JACK SHEPPARD ASTONISHES THE CAVALRY OFFICER.]

"Oh, not at all—not at all!"

"Well, then, to speak the truth, I must say it is the sorriest-looking jade that I have set eyes on since I left London this morning.

"Just so," said Jack, as though he fully anticipated such a reply—"that's what everybody says. That's the only drawback my horse has."

"The only drawback?" said the officer, puzzled to understand him.

"Yes; but for that he would be perfect."

The officer laughed.

"You are inclined to be merry," he said.

"No, not at all. I tell you, the only thing that can be urged against my horse is, that he is not good-looking—in fact, he is decidedly bad-looking."

"I quite agree with you there."

"But," continued Jack, "for everything else he is invaluable, whether it is at a walk or a trot, a canter or a gallop—he excels all that ever I have tried him with; but if he can surpass himself in any one thing it is in leaping. Ah! sir, I should like you to see him leap!"

The officer looked as though he would have liked very much to see it, for Jack's horse at that time was in such a jaded state that it was hardly able to put one leg before the other.

"Of course," he said, addressing Jack, "I may believe just what I think proper—you would not force me to take all you say for gospel?"

"No, no—I'd scorn to coerce anyone; but there's a way of removing all doubts."

"And what's that, pray?"

"Why, ocular demonstration. Wait a little, sir—we shall get to the top of this hill presently, then I will show you what my horse can do—I promise you will be astounded."

"But do you really mean, in sober earnestness, to say that he can leap?"

"He can. You understand he is not in very good condition now, for I have travelled very many miles, and it is quite time he had a bate; nevertheless, in spite of his looks, you will see him perform with ease what many a well-bred racehorse could not accomplish."

"Indeed!" said the stranger. "You make me curious. I should indeed like to see him!"

"You shall—you shall if you will only walk with me to the top of this hill!"

"We are more than half-way up already," said the stranger. "But when you talk about your horse being able to leap, and trot, and gallop, and such like, you must not think of putting him by the side of mine."

"But I should, sir," said Jack, positively—"I should, sir! I should in every other respect but that of appearance—there, of course, I give in, for I grant your horse is handsomer in every way than mine; but handsome is as handsome does—that's what I always think."

"And you're quite right," said the officer. "Upon my word, I hardly know what to think of you. Surely you must be making jest at my expense."

"I beg you will disabuse yourself of any such ideas, sir. I trust you are a gentleman—I take you to be such—otherwise I should not have entered into conversation with you."

"You have not been mistaken, sir," said the officer. "I trust you will fully pardon me for what I have said; I assure you I meant no harm."

"Oh! don't say another word—pray don't say another word, I beg! It is really not worth while to tender point with me!"

"I might say the same thing," replied the stranger. "I should never have thought of laying out any money on him, I can assure you, if I had not witnessed his performances."

"And I will warrant when you see him you will be ready to bet any money on him."

The officer shook his head doubtfully.

"I can see you are still incredulous," continued Jack, "but I will convince you ere long: a minute or two more, and we shall be at the top of the hill. I shall want you to allow him a minute or two for breathing time—nothing more."

"Oh! all right; and in the meanwhile I will show you what my horse can do, and that will surprise you, I rather fancy."

"Now I come to look at his points," said Jack, "he's a noble animal, scarcely to be matched. I should think. I suppose no money would tempt you to part with him?"

"Oh, I don't know that—I never set much store on horseflesh; in fact, I think it unlucky to keep one after you have once been offered money for him."

"Indeed! Well, now, just for curiosity's sake, tell me what you would take for him? Don't dream, however, for a moment that I wish to purchase, for nothing would induce me to part with the one I have."

"You surprise and amaze me," replied the officer; "but if you wish me to name the price I will do so."

"Pray do then!"

"Well, a hundred and fifty guineas is the very lowest price I would take for him."

"Is that all?"

"All?" said the officer. "Pretty well, I think, for one bit of horseflesh that might be injured and turn out worth nothing at all to-morrow."

"You surprise me!" said Jack. "I should have valued him at double the money. I know this, three hundred guineas would not tempt me to part with my sorry jade, as you call him."

"I hope you do not take any offence at my expression?"

"Oh! none at all—none at all! It has been said by many before to-day, and I am quite used to it. Very likely I should have said the same myself, but ever since I have had this horse I have been fully sensible of the value of good looks."

It was just at this moment that the summit of the hill was reached.

They paused, according to agreement.

"Now," said the officer, who was a little piqued by the way in which Jack had spoken, "while your horse is recovering his wind, I will show you something according to promise."

"I shall be very happy, sir," returned Jack.

"Well, then, do you see that gate?"

"I do."

"It is a five-barred one."

"So I perceive."

"And not only that," continued the officer; "do you perceive how some one has been at the pains to twist all that hawthorn into it so as to prevent people from climbing over?"

"Of course I do; that makes it more than equal to another bar in height."

"Precisely—that is what I wanted you to admit. Now you will see that, with the greatest of ease, my horse will jump clear over, and his hoofs shall not touch the highest twig."

"Then," said Jack, with an air of delight and interest, "if he can do that he's worth a thousand guineas at the least!"

"Well, sir, you shall see—pray observe!"

"I am all attention."

The stranger backed his horse as far as he could from the gate, then, releasing the rein, he just pricked him with the spur.

He bounded forward like a greyhound.

In good earnest, Jack was interested in this experiment.

He scarcely thought the horse capable of performing such a feat.

To his astonishment and delight, the noble creature leaped clear over the obstacle, and alighted in perfect safety on the other side.

"At all risks," he muttered, between his teeth, "that horse shall be mine!"

The stranger reined-up in the meadow, and, turning his horse's head towards the gate again, made him leap over it, and he alighted in the road.

"Wonderful!" said Jack, with the air of one entirely overcome with astonishment—"truly wonderful! I could never have believed it if I had not seen it myself!"

"Pooh! that is nothing," said the stranger, patting his horse's neck, proudly—"that is nothing! But I should very much like to know whether your horse that you set so much store by could do it."

"This is hardly a time to make a fair trial," said Jack, "but I have no doubt he could—that is, under one circumstance only."

"And pray what may that be?"

"That I sit in the saddle myself."

"Can that possibly make any difference?"

"Oh, yes; every difference! Now, for instance, if I were to alight and you were to get upon his back, neither caresses nor blows could force him to leap."

"That's more astonishing still!" said the stranger.

"But pray tell me, am I right in understanding that if you ride on his back he would jump it?"

"Just as easily as yours," said Jack, positively.

"I am still incredulous; but it is an extraordinary animal if it will only jump with one rider."

"I have often known it to be the case," said Jack, "and I should not wonder if yours is the same."

"Pooh—nonsense!"

"Is anyone else in the habit of riding him besides yourself?"

"No—no one."

"Well, then, I will bet you a couple of bottles of wine that your horse would not leap over that gate with a stranger in the saddle."

"Done!" said the officer. "I'd bet you a hundred if you wished it!"

"No, no—let the bet be an even one!"

"But it is not fair," said the officer—"not at all fair!"

"Why not?"

"I am sure of winning!"

"I am of a different opinion," said Jack, "and if you like, we will put the bet in this way: that your horse will be unable, or rather unwilling, to leap over that gate with me on his back."

"Done!" said the officer again. "That's quite fair and straightforward."

As he spoke he alighted.

Jack did the same.

"Perhaps," said the latter, "you will be kind enough to pay particular attention to my horse for a moment?"

"Oh, certainly—certainly! You are a good rider," added the officer, as Jack sprang on to the back of the other horse.

"Yes, I have been in continual practice, in fact, as long as I can remember. There's nothing like beginning to learn to ride when you are young."

"True—true! But, sir?"

"What?"

"Look upon your two bottles of wine as lost. I can tell by the look of my horse that he will go over the gate like a feather. You don't weigh half so much as I do, so I am sure he will carry you easily!"

"Well, you know my opinion," said Jack. "For your horse, of course, I cannot answer, though I can for my own."

As he spoke, he backed his horse in the same way as the officer had done, and touched him smartly with the spur.

He gave three bounds, and then went clear over the gate, leaving a good six inches to spare.

"Aha—capital!" roared the officer. "You've lost—you've lost! I knew you would! Gad, it's capital!"

CHAPTER DCIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN AT LENGTH OBTAIN TIDINGS OF JONATHAN WILD.

THE cavalry officer laughed immoderately.

He was delighted to think he had won his bet so easily.

Not for one moment did he dream such a cruel trick had been played upon him.

Now, when Jack had jumped over the gate, nothing would have been easier or more simple than to have galloped off at full speed across the meadows.

But that natural love for fun and frolic which had been such a characteristic in his early career sprang up again with irrepressible force.

The adventure should not end here, he was determined on that.

Therefore, with the greatest imaginable coolness, he stopped his horse, turned him round, and again made him face the gate.

As before, the noble creature cleared the obstacle easily.

"Aha!" cried the officer, full of exultation—"I told you how it would be! You've lost—you've lost!"

Jack pulled up, but did not attempt to dismount.

"My dear friend!" he cried, in an offhand tone. "I beg your pardon, though perhaps you'll excuse me for calling you by such a familiar title?"

"Oh, certainly—certainly! What need is there for any ceremony between us?"

"None whatever, in my opinion," replied Jack, "and I am glad you think the same. I think it is a pity for friends to act too much upon ceremony."

"But you have lost the bet, have you not?"

"I have."

"That's all right, then."

"But you must remember that you have something to do. Just put my horse to the gate, and the result will surprise you!"

"No, I would rather you try him first," said the officer.

"As you like; but I was going to observe a minute or two ago—"

"What—what?"

"That however delightful it may be to meet with a friend on the highway, you ought to be upon your guard in forming acquaintanceship with strangers."

The officer looked at him doubtfully.

"You should also beware," said Jack, as he gathered the reins in his hands, "how you permit another person to mount your horse."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this—he might be so fond of the animal as to feel disinclined to dismount."

"But that's absurd!" said the officer, going a step nearer, as though a suspicion of the truth had entered his mind.

"Not at all—not at all!" said Jack. "In the present case, although I set such a great store by my own horse, I prefer yours. You cannot grumble at the exchange, I am sure, so good-bye! I have the honour of wishing you a very good morning!"

With these words on his lips, Jack Sheppard touched the horse sharply with the spur, and away he went down the road at a most prodigious speed.

Quite a minute elapsed before the officer moved.

He was dumbfounded with astonishment, and stood gazing after the retreating form of his steed.

It was not until Jack disappeared amid a cloud of dust that he recovered the use of his faculties.

The first thing he did was to utter a string of most awful imprecations, such as no one would have expected to come from the lips of such a gentlemanly personage.

Then, furious with rage, he mounted Jack's horse, upon which so many premises had been lavished.

It was in vain, however, that he used both whip and spur with the greatest briskness; the tired-out, jaded beast was insensible to both, and could only be got to move at a sluggish pace.

The idea of attempting any pursuit of his own horse was simply ridiculous, and, to his great chagrin, the officer had to abandon the attempt.

With him, however, we have nothing further to do. We must return to Jack Sheppard, and give an account of his proceedings.

At the rate he went, he overtook Blueskin in a very few minutes.

The latter, accustomed as he was to Jack's exploits, could scarcely believe the evidence of his own eyesight.

It seemed such an outrageous and impossible thing to induce a man to exchange a good horse for a bad one.

Yet, it had evidently been done, for the road had an upward tendency, so that when they reined-in their steeds they were able to see for a considerable distance behind them.

Blueskin turned his head, and looked over the hedge.

There was the officer, sure enough, whipping Jack's horse in a furious manner, but failing to make much progress.

In a few words, Jack explained the means he had adopted to bring about this result.

His companion could not help laughing heartily.

"You are a genius, Jack—you are; there's no mistake about that—a regular genius!"

Jack laughed too.

But soon a shade of uneasiness came over his countenance, for at all once he remembered the object they had in view.

It was only necessary for him to think of Edgworth Bess, and then his feelings underwent a total alteration.

"No success as yet," he said—"no success at all, Blueskin! What shall be our next step?"

"I think it would be wise to rest awhile."

"No, no—I can't rest!"

"I do not speak particularly on our accounts," said Blueskin, "though I confess I am weary enough myself!"

"And so am I."

"Then let us halt at the first quiet inn we come to."

"Shall we be known?"

"I think there will be but little fear of that."

"Well, then, if you think it will be for the best, I consent."

"Why, you must remember that Jonathan Wild would not go far with his prisoner without coming to a halt."

"I see."

"We may be lucky enough to hit upon the identical inn. If so, we shall obtain important information; at any rate, there is a chance of learning something, if we only make our inquiries carefully."

"Then I am willing," said Jack—"quite willing, for I am sick and faint for want of food."

This understanding having been arrived at, the two friends rode at a rapid rate along the highway.

As before, they continued to keep a sharp look-out on all sides of them, but, as before, without meeting with any result.

At last they turned into a cross-country road, and, proceeding some distance along it, came to a roadside public-house.

The place was private and retired, so, after a brief deliberation, they resolved to put up for a short time.

An ostler made his appearance the moment they stopped in front of the inn.

Our friends caught sight of him, and no sooner had they done so than they fixed their eyes upon him, being filled with the greatest curiosity.

The man's face had evidently been seriously injured, and his face was crossed and re-crossed in every direction by numerous pieces of sticking-plaster.

This gave him a most hideous and grotesque look.

The plaster was very dirty, as though it had been on for a length of time.

There was every indication indeed that his face was rapidly getting well, and this circumstance made Blueskin and Jack aware of how serious the injury must have been in the first instance.

"Well, gentlemen," he said, "what do you want?"

"To put up for an hour or so," said Jack, "if you can accommodate us."

"Oh yes—never fear for that, sir!"

He hastened forward and took hold of the horses by the bridle while both alighted.

"Walk straight in, gentlemen," he said, "through the front door yonder. You'll find them all inside. I'll attend to your horses well, never fear!"

"Do," said Blueskin; "it will be nothing out of your pocket, depend upon that!"

The man touched his forehead, and the two friends hastened towards the inn.

As soon as they had crossed the threshold they were accosted by an individual who appeared to be the landlord.

He greeted them with a profusion of bows, and behaved in a most obsequious manner.

It was not often that two such guests stopped at his house.

"Would you like a private room, gentlemen? I have one,—every accommodation."

"Yes," replied Blueskin, "a private room, by all means!"

"This way, then, if you please."

The landlord ushered them into a scantily-furnished room, upon the door of which was painted in white letters the word "Private."

"We have travelled far," said Blueskin; "and our appetites are keen. Get us a good, substantial meal—the best you can procure quickly—and some of your old ale."

"All right, gentlemen; I will see to it in a moment—no time shall be lost."

With all possible despatch a meal was speedily upon the table, and the landlord remained in the room, in order to wait upon his guests.

Like most of his race, he was chatty and communicative.

Blueskin was anxious to draw him into conversation, and had no difficulty whatever in doing so.

"Has anything particular happened lately?" he inquired, by way of commencing a conversation.

"Nothing very important lately, sir, for, you see, this is a quiet, out-of-the-way place."

"Yes, I know that—there doesn't seem to be another habitation for miles."

"There is not, sir—there is not; and it's a house of little trade, I can assure you. We have few chance customers, such as you might be, gentlemen; and if it was not for the people who stay here on market day we should be very badly off indeed."

"Well, now, if things are so quiet," said Blueskin, "what might be the most important event that has happened lately?"

The landlord scratched his head.

"I can hardly tell you that—it has been so long since anything important did happen. Yet, stay—I have just thought—"

"Of what?"

"Why, of the ostler. Somehow or other, that fact quite escaped my recollection."

"What might that be?"

"I will tell you, gentlemen, all about it. It's a very singular affair—a very singular affair indeed!"

Jack and Blueskin waited for him to proceed.

"You saw how his face was bandaged up?"

"Yes, and thought at the time, how seriously he must have been injured."

"You are right—he was seriously injured. I wonder he was not killed upon the spot!"

"And is that the singular circumstance?"

"It is. You will admit that when you hear it. Pray listen!"

"We are listening."

"Well, then, gentlemen, some short time back two travellers pulled up in front of the inn, just by the horse-trough yonder, and just as you might have pulled up to-day."

"Well?"

"But it was not well, as you'll hear very quickly. Joe, the ostler, went up to them, just as he might have gone up to you when you arrived and he asked these travellers whether they intended to stop, just as he might have asked you."

"He did so," said Jack, losing patience. "But never mind that part of it. Go on!"

"Well, gentlemen, to make a long story short, these two travellers declined to alight, but asked for ale to be brought them for them to drink while their horses were having a little hay and water."

"And what sort of looking men were they?"

"Well, rather disagreeable and disreputable—not at all the kind of men you would like to meet with on a dark night in a lonely place. That was what Joe the ostler thought, and so he looked at them very intently. One of them he felt sure he recognised. He had seen him more than once before, and although he was greatly altered, yet he was sure he was not mistaken."

"He recognised one of them, you say?"

"Yes."

"And who was that one?"

"Can you guess?"

"No."

"Then you never would, gentlemen. He was no other than—than—"

"Who?"

"Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER DCIII.

THE LANDLORD CONCLUDES HIS NARRATIVE, AND JACK AND BLUESKIN DISCOVER THEIR ERROR.

BOTH Jack and Blueskin started, for this announcement rather took them by surprise.

Nothing that the landlord had said previously was calculated to make them suspect it.

"You seem astonished, gentlemen, and well you may; but I can assure you that it was no other than that daring villain!"

"You do surprise us!" said Blueskin. "I did not know he had been in this part of the country!"

"Oh yes, sir—I have heard of him since, not far from here!"

"But," inquired Blueskin, eagerly, "if the ostler recognised him, what was the result?"

"Why, he got his face smashed for his pains!"

"How was that?"

"We imagine that Jonathan Wild guessed what was passing in his mind—so, suddenly and without any preparation, he dashed a quart jug, out of which he had been drinking, full into the ostler's face, and then rode off, followed by his companion."

Jack and Blueskin were greatly excited.

"And what followed," they asked—"what followed?"

"Wait a moment, gentlemen, and I'll tell you. I heard the news, and ran out, wondering what could be the matter; there was Joe just getting up off the ground, with his face covered with blood. I could scarcely get an explanation from him, he was so excited. He ran into the stable, mounted a horse, and rode off barebacked, with nothing to guide the animal but a halter!"

"But Jonathan Wild escaped?"

"Well, yes—he did. But not long after Joe had disappeared we heard some more travellers coming; and when they came in sight, they turned out to be police officers. They no sooner heard that Jonathan had passed that way than they clapped spurs to their steeds and went off at a prodigious rate. In a little while they overtook Joe, for when he heard they were behind him he pulled up and waited. He led the way, and they managed to get in sight of the two villains."

"But if they escaped," said Blueskin, "we do not much care about hearing the rest."

The landlord looked at them in surprise.

"I can tell you the remainder in half a dozen words."

"Do so, then."

"Joe soon found that the officers were not so well mounted as he was, and so he urged his own horse to the utmost. He had pistols, and presently came close enough to use them. He fired, and, as he found afterwards, his shot took effect; but just then, unluckily for him, his horse got his legs entangled in the rope attached to the halter, for in his excitement Joe let go of it. Down went the horse with a crash, throwing Joe upon his head, and there he lay insensible. He was brought back here, and we thought at first he would never recover. You see he's getting better rapidly; and he declares as he did from the first, that he shall yet live to see Jonathan Wild dangle from Tyburn Tree!"

"I hope he may!" said Jack, between his teeth. "But who was he wounded?"

"We learned afterwards from the officers that it was Wild's companion, Mr. Noakes, once governor of Newgate."

"Indeed! But he was not killed, I suppose?"

"Oh no! The officers continued their pursuit, and had some more adventures with the villains in a wood, where they discovered a gang of coiners; but Wild and Noakes again escaped, and since then I have not heard anything about them."

"But this must be some time ago," said Blueskin.

"It is."

"How long?"

"I can't say with any degree of certainty—several weeks."

"And you have not seen Wild since?"

"No."

"Nor heard anything of him?"

"Nothing at all. But excuse me, gentlemen, you seem to be deeply interested in all these particulars!"

"We are. We have reasons of our own for being so; and you must excuse us if we keep them to ourselves."

This was all the information they were able to obtain from this quarter.

Previous to leaving, however, they got into conversation with the ostler, who described to them the exact position of the wood in which the coiners had been discovered.

The two friends then rode off.

But the intelligence they had received so far from bringing them any satisfaction, only made them feel disappointed and anxious.

It seemed pretty clear that they were not upon Wild's track.

If he had gone that way he would surely have been seen by some of the people frequenting the inn.

Moreover, they concluded that after such a series of adventures and escapes, Jonathan Wild would be by far too prudent to venture in that part of the country again.

"Jack," exclaimed Blueskin, at last, "I am afraid we are on the wrong track!"

"I fear so, too. We must have been misled in the first instance. I believe that the watchman led us astray."

"But don't you think that Jonathan carried her off?"

"I can't think of anyone else who would be likely to do such a thing, or who would attempt it."

"Nor I. And yet—"

"Yet what?"

"It seems to me that he must have as much as ever he could do to keep out of the clutches of the officers; the pursuit after him has been hot and close—we have every evidence of that."

"You are right."

"Well, then, do you think it at all likely he would venture back to London, and to a quarter of it, too, where he is so well known?"

"It hardly seems likely; but you know what a character he had for daring in his desperation—who can say what he might or might not attempt?"

"No one; and besides, if Jonathan has not carried her off, who has?"

"That's the difficulty! Yet stay—we should have thought of him before—there is one we have forgotten!"

"Who—who?"

"That desperate and atrocious villain, Wild's son—he may have done this!"

"You are right! Depend upon it, it's his work and no one else's. We should have thought of him before—there would be no obstacle in the way of his carrying her off; there has been no pursuit after him."

"Yes—yes. I feel quite sure that it is not Jonathan Wild who has carried her away, but Jonathan Wild's son."

The more Blueskin and Jack Sheppard considered upon this point, the more convinced, if possible, they became that they had at last discovered the perpetrator of this deed.

But their anxiety on the poor girl's behalf was, if possible, greater than it had been before.

Of the two, George Wild was more to be dreaded than even his rascally parent.

At his hands they were well aware Edgworth Bess would receive no mercy.

Neither supplication nor resistance would avail her in the least.

They now occupied themselves with considering what would be their best mode of proceeding.

"For the present," said Blueskin, "we cannot do better than abandon our pursuit of Jonathan Wild."

"I think so too."

"But as soon as Edgworth Bess is placed in safety, we will commence our campaign against him. We will know no rest or peace until we have brought about his capture."

"And," added Jack, "when we have seen him dangling from Tyburn Tree, then, and not till then, shall I feel content."

"Well, then," said Blueskin, "how shall we commence our operations?"

"I know not."

"But we must think—we must try and come to some conclusion as to the point from which we shall commence to make our inquiries. It is unfortunate that we are not able to make our inquiries as many others would. For our own sakes we are compelled to make use of so much caution, and we dare not on any account make ourselves known."

"In my opinion," said Jack, "we cannot do anything else than inquire of all the people we meet that it may be prudent to get into conversation with."

"Perhaps so; you see how successful we have been in this last instance."

"You mean with the landlord?"

"I do. Who could have guessed that we should have learned so much important information from him?"

"I should not, certainly."

"And yet, you see, he has quite changed the current of our thoughts. Judging by this, is there not a probability that we may meet with some one else who may do us the same service?"

"Possible, but, I am afraid, not probable."

"I don't know. Look yonder."

"What can you see?"

"A waggon and a team of horses."

"Just so."

"Now, that man probably has travelled a considerable distance. He is going in the direction of London, as you see. If George Wild has passed him with Edgworth Bess as a prisoner, we shall certainly hear of it from him. He could not fail to notice it."

"I am not so sure of that. These men often go driving along with their eyes shut."

"Let us try. If we make our inquiries carefully, no harm can come from it, and very likely a great deal of good may."

"Be it so. I have not the least objection. I am willing, indeed, to try anything at all calculated to answer the end we have in view."

This being decided upon, Jack and Blueskin rode on towards the waggon which they saw approaching.

"Good evening," said Jack, as soon as he came close to the waggon.

"Good evening, gentlemen—good evening!" was the reply. "Very happy to see you—very happy indeed!"

"How is that?" asked Jack, pausing.

The waggoner stopped his team.

"I will tell you how it is, sir," he replied. "The fact is, I'm fond of a little talk—in fact, I do think if there's one thing more delightful than another, it is to have a little talk."

"I quite agree with you," said Jack. "Especially if you can obtain an agreeable companion."

"Ah, that's it! An agreeable companion—that's everything!"

"I am exceedingly fond of a chat myself," Jack continued, determined to humour the man in this point—"in fact, that was why I said 'good evening,' though I must say it is not often that I meet with such a civil reply as you gave me."

The waggoner looked quite pleased at this compliment.

"Well, sir, I be fond of a talk—that's the truth. I think it's so uncivilised for people never to open their mouths or say a word. Don't you, sir?"

"I certainly do."

"But as I happened to remark—or, I believe, as you happened to remark first—an agreeable companion is everything in such a case."

"Certainly."

"Ah, I have just parted with a sweet one—a sweet companion, gentlemen."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; and when I say just, I don't mean just exactly, for it was yesterday when I left her."

"Her?"

"Yes, her; what more agreeable companion can you have than a woman, I should like to know?"

"None—none certainly."

"Then why did you ask in that tone? making so bold."

"You're quite free to inquire," said Jack; "the reason was, I was running my head against the notion that your agreeable companion must be a man."

"Ah, sir, that's quite a mistake—the men are not half talkative enough for me—not half talkative enough."

Jack's own private opinion was, that a good listener would be best as a companion for the waggoner, for he went on at an amazing rate, as though he would like to monopolise the whole of the conversation, though what he said amounted to very little.

The mere fact of the man mentioning something about a female who was an agreeable companion sufficed to attract all their interest and curiosity.

It might be that in the end, it would turn out nothing to them, but if so, after listening patiently to what he had to tell, the waggoner would certainly answer freely any questions they might put to him concerning his adventures on the road.

CHAPTER DCIV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN AT LENGTH SUCCEED IN OBTAINING INTELLIGENCE OF THE WHEREABOUTS OF EDGORTH BESS.

"You rouse my curiosity," said Jack.

"Do I, sir?"

"Yes, you do."

"About what?"

"About that agreeable companion of yours."

"Oh, ah!"

"When you speak about her your face quite shines."

"Does it though?"

"I assure you it does, and your eyes brighten too."

"Ah, well, gentlemen, I don't wonder at that. I find I look just how I feel."

"And how is that?"

"Why, highly delighted—quite overjoyed—that's how I feel; and yet I don't know why I should, poor thing; she was in trouble enough!"

"Trouble?"

"Yes. It wasn't many words I was able to get out of her; she was half frightened to death, and sobbed and cried ever so."

Jack and Blueskin, upon hearing this, had great difficulty in controlling their excitement.

Yet they were afraid to ask any direct questions, or show that they at all suspected who the waggoner's agreeable companion was.

Had they done such a thing he would have considered it strange, would have required an explanation, and perhaps would have refused to tell them any more.

Then again there was a strong probability that they might be allowing themselves to be buoyed up by false hopes.

"I feel very anxious to know more about her," said Jack, with a beating heart; "just try and tell us straight-forwardly from the commencement all that you know concerning her."

"I will, sir—I will with the greatest pleasure, I assure you—with the greatest pleasure!"

"Then do so."

"I will; I love to have a talk. I often think and wonder to myself what would this world be if there was no such thing as talking in it."

"Very wretched and disagreeable no doubt," said Jack, impatiently.

"I believe you. That's a subject I often ponder over as I go walking along by the side of my team. People might look at me and fancy I was thinking of nothing, but it would be a mistake. I keep trying to picture to myself what the world would be like."

"Very interesting, no doubt, but do not forget that I should like to know something more about this agreeable companion."

"Why so?"

"Oh! for nothing in particular—it is so very rarely that you see or hear of one, that I want to gather all the particulars."

"Well, gentlemen, I can assure you it's quite a curious story. Yesterday, as I was a-comin' along this very identical road, just as I might be comin' along it now, I saw a girl sitting down by the roadside."

"A girl?"

"Yes."

"What was she like?"

The man paused a minute, and said:

"Why, like a female."

"Ha, ha!" said Jack, laughing,—"that's a good joke—a very good joke, upon my word,—you're quite a wit!"

"Well, you might think so, sir, but I had no thoughts of making a joke—leastways, not then."

"Then you did not understand me."

"What did you mean, then?"

"I wanted to know whether she had a pretty face, and how she was dressed."

"Well, I didn't see her face at first, because it was covered with her hands, but I saw her dress."

"And what was that like?"

"Why, much like the same dresses that women generally wear, and she wore a round hat, like most women do too."

"And her face?"

"Well, I don't know as to its being a pretty one. I should be inclined to say it was, but others mightn't."

"Why not?"

"Because that's all a matter of fancy, as I daresay you know very well. I thought it a beautiful face, although she was crying as though her heart would break, and as though she was in very great sorrow indeed."

"Go on," said Jack, huskily—"go on. What happened next?"

"Well, I saw her in the way I said, and I thought to myself, 'Poor girl, she's on the tramp to London, and very tired she looks!'"

"And what did you do then?"

"Why, when I came up to her I stopped, and asked her if she would like to ride in the waggon."

"Did you?"

"Of course I did."

"Then accept my thanks—my best thanks—for that kind act."

"What?" said the waggoner, opening his eyes to a prodigious width.

"Nothing—nothing."

"But what have your thanks got to do with it?"

"Nothing at all. It was a foolish remark,—I was so carried away by what you were saying."

The waggoner looked doubtful.

"Go on," said Jack, hastily—"go on. What did she say?"

"Why, she thanked me as pretty as could be, and got up in the waggon, and I was as merry as a cricket, for I thought what a comfortable ride to London I should have with some one to talk to."

"And did she talk to you?"

"Well, not so much, sir, as I could have wished; still she did talk a little, and, in spite of her sorrow, she tried to smile and be cheerful, in order to show herself grateful for what I had done, though it was little enough, goodness knows."

"Nay, nay," cried Jack—"there I disagree with you! It—it—it is the intention, not the act," he added, for in his excitement he almost betrayed himself again.

"It was a very strange affair, altogether," continued the waggoner; "for after awhile I heard the sound of horses' hoofs, and this girl I am telling you about was very much frightened. She said they were pursuers of hers, and that the consequences to herself would be fearful if they discovered her. She said, too, that she had with great difficulty escaped from them, and that they would be all the more violent in consequence."

"And you?" asked Jack—"what did you do? What happened next?"

"Well, sir, I thought it was a pity that anyone so pretty should fall into the hands of a couple of rascals, so I told her to lie down in the waggon and cover herself over with some empty sacks, which she did."

"Yes—yes. Don't continually pause in your narrative—go swiftly on to the end!"

"Why, I should think you must know her, sir," said the waggoner.

"Perhaps I do—I can't tell, though, until I have heard more. Go on—go on!"

In a very roundabout fashion the waggoner told Jack the termination of the adventure.

He related how George Wild and Nicholson came up to the waggon and questioned him; and from the description he was able to give of the former, Jack and Blueskin had no difficulty in recognising him.

Their joy may be imagined when they heard that Edgeworth Bess had been so fortunate as to escape, and that the two villains had gone riding on towards London.

"You were quite right in your conjecture," said Jack, after a pause—"I do know that young girl. She has been carried off by those two men, and we have been searching vainly for her. Now we shall find her, no doubt."

"I hope you will, gentlemen—I hope you will!"

"Describe to me, then, exactly the situation of the public-house you left her at—we will go there at once."

The waggoner complied with this request without hesitation.

Both our friends thanked him repeatedly. Indeed, the waggoner grew quite fidgetty, they lavished so many praises upon him.

Having obtained these tidings, it may easily be imagined that Jack was full of impatience to be off.

No consideration of danger, however great, would have kept him back from London.

Then, at all risks, he was resolved to repair to the inn, where he hoped he should really discover the object of his search.

With some difficulty they got rid of the waggoner, after having obtained all the information from him that he possessed.

Then Jack, turning his horse's head towards London, cried:

"On—on, Blueskin—keep close behind; I cannot linger now! Forward—forward to London!—I am burning with impatience to reach the inn! Quick—quick! I trust we shall not be too late!"

Blueskin scarcely liked to give utterance to his own fears upon this point.

Some long time had elapsed since the waggoner had left her, and he thought it was scarcely possible that she would remain at the inn many hours.

He half anticipated a disappointment, though Jack did not.

He was elated with hope.

To both, however, it was a great source of satisfaction to feel certain that she had escaped unharmcd from the clutches of Wild junior.

The narrative of the waggoner was quite sufficient to prove this.

She had escaped, and had reached London in safety!

There was just a chance that she might have fallen into the villain's power again; but this was too dreadful a thought to be entertained.

At length, without the occurrence of any particular incident, the inn was reached.

The day was drawing to a close when they encountered the waggoner, and this was a considerable distance from London.

By the time they reached the metropolis night had fairly set in.

A deep darkness filled all the streets, therefore Blueskin and Jack made their way along without being much in fear of detection. As for Jack himself, he never once thought of the risk he was incurring.

A cruel disappointment, as the reader is aware, awaited them on their arrival.

The landlady answered their questions promptly and truthfully.

To their inexpressible grief, they learned that Edgeworth Bess had quitted the house on the preceding evening, since which time the landlady had neither seen nor heard anything of her.

She described how Edgeworth Bess quitted the house, though she could not tell them which direction she had taken.

She stated, however, that she had made a promise to the homeless girl that if ever she was in want of aid or of a friend she was to come there.

Although so filled with grief, Blueskin and Jack both expressed their warmest thanks.

They earnestly requested the landlady, if she saw Edgeworth Bess, to entreat her to stop, promising that they would call in a short time, if their search proved unsuccessful.

With very different feelings in his breast to those which held possession of it when he entered, Jack Sheppard took his departure, and again they commenced their apparently hopeless search.

CHAPTER DCV.

EDGORTH BESS ELUDES GEORGE WILD AND NICHOLSON BY A HAIRBREADTH.

It was vexatious in the extreme that Blueskin and Jack Sheppard should miss Edgeworth Bess by so mere a chance.

Before we describe their proceedings after leaving the inn, we will return to Edgeworth Bess, who, it will be remembered, we last left crouching down in the shadow of a doorway.

She could hear at no great distance the much-dreaded voice of Wild junior.

He was in search of her—had, perhaps, some knowledge of her whereabouts.

She was almost ready to faint with apprehension at the bare thought that he might discover her present hiding-place.

This alarm so gained upon her that she felt she could not bear to remain any longer in that position.

She clasped her hands tightly over her temples, and tried to decide what was the best thing to be done.

How could she escape?

Her limbs trembled so excessively and her heart beat so feebly that she felt it would be vain and foolish to attempt to dart into the street and run away.

With some difficulty she raised herself from her crouching position, and in doing so her hand encountered a small object.

It was cold.

It was a kind of projection from the door-post, and for a moment, in the agitated condition of her mind, she could not make out what it was.

It was the round knob or handle of a bell.

No sooner did she make this discovery than the thought entered her mind that the people within the house, although total strangers to her, might be willing to afford her shelter and protection for a few minutes—until, indeed, her persecutor had left the neighbourhood.

She imagined no one could possibly refuse such a simple act of kindness.

Urged on, too, by the approach of her foes, she rung the bell.

The door was opened promptly.

Without uttering a word, Edgeworth Bess sprang across the threshold.

She found herself in a narrow passage, which was feebly illuminated by an oil lamp.

"Did you want to see missus, ma'am?" said the girl who had opened the door.

"Yes—yes!" answered Edgworth Bess, faintly, and scarcely knowing what she said, for the whole of her faculties, mental and physical, were occupied in listening to what was going on in the street.

But the closely-fitting front door shut out all slight noises.

The servant-girl opened another door, and said:

"Please, missus, you're wanted."

In another moment, a decidedly elderly female, with a far from amiable-looking countenance, made her appearance in the passage.

"Do you want me?" she said. "Pray what's your business?"

"I—I wish to know," said Edgworth Bess stammeringly.

"Oh! yes, come about that card in the window I suppose," said the elderly female, jumping to a very erroneous conclusion. "I have apartments vacant if you would like to take them."

"Yes—yes—at least—that is——"

"Of course you would like to see them," said the landlady. "Here, Mary, bring a light."

"No—no," said Edgworth Bess. "I am so fatigued—so exhausted—so much agitated, that I scarcely know what I am saying. Let me sit down for a few minutes, and then I shall recover myself. I feel as if—as if——"

"What?"

"As if I should faint."

"Come in here; this is a quiet room; you can sit in it by yourself for a few moments, and then we will talk about the apartments."

"Very well."

"Can I do anything for you?"

"No—no, I am much obliged to you—no one can tell how much. Let me be for a few minutes, and then I shall be able to explain all."

Bang—bang—bang! came three heavy blows upon the front door of the house.

The elderly female started violently, and Edgworth Bess uttered a short, sharp cry.

"Some one else has seen the card, I shouldn't wonder. Excuse me a moment," she said. "I will go and see."

So saying, she abruptly left the room, closing the door behind her.

Edgworth Bess sank down upon a sofa totally incapable of making the slightest movement.

But although her physical faculties were thus bound up, she was able to hear distinctly, and so understood every word that was said, as well as to be fully aware of all that was going on about her.

She heard the door open, and then a voice, which jarred terribly on her nerves, said:

"I want to see your mistress, girl—now, at once!"

"Step this way, gentlemen—pray step this way," said the elderly female.

She ushered George Wild and Nicholson into another room.

She closed the door, and Edgworth Bess was unable to overhear another syllable.

But still her state of semi-unconsciousness continued.

It is scarcely to be expected that George Wild could be aware of the presence of Edgworth Bess in the house at that particular time—in fact, his errand had nothing to do with her; what he wanted was explained almost in the first words he uttered.

"I see," he said, gruffly, "that you have a card in the window."

"Yes, sir."

"I want to know whether you can find accommodation for us?—two bedrooms and one sitting room?"

"Dear me, gentlemen, if you'd only come a moment sooner—only a moment sooner."

"What do you mean?"

"If you had, then I could have suited you better than anyone else in London. As it is——"

"What?"

"Well, I scarcely know how to tell you—indeed, I don't know whether the rooms is took or not took."

"What are you talking about?" said Wild. "Answer me my question plainly!"

"Well, sir, so I will. I have some excellent apartments—two bedrooms and one sitting-room; this is the sitting-room, but——"

"Never mind your buts—go on!"

"Well, sir, I may as well explicate everything."

"I don't want to listen to your explanations!" said George, gruffly. "I want to know whether you have the rooms to let or not; if you have, name your own price, and it will be paid."

"Name my own price!" said the lodging-house keeper. "Ah, sir, I knew you were a gentleman at the very first glance, and that's why I was anxious to have you for a tenant. Now, if you would only listen to what I have to say, it would only take me a moment."

"Well, well—say on. What is it?"

"Hardly a moment before you knocked, a girl came in."

"What girl?"

"I don't know, sir—quite a stranger to me, but she was in a perfect flutteration—yes, sir, in a perfect flutteration. I make out that she wants the apartments, though she hasn't said as much. She was so agitated and so terrified that she could not speak at all, and she is sitting down now to recover herself."

Hearing these words, Wild junior started, and gave vent to an expression of astonishment.

"Describe her," he said, quickly. "What sort of a looking girl was she?"

The landlady, as well as she was able, gave him a description of the appearance of Edgworth Bess.

"D—n me!" he ejaculated, to her great amazement—"d—n me! found at last—found at last! Come on, Nicholson, my boy! Now, you old Jezebel, show us the room where you say this girl is!"

"Old what?" cried the lodging-house keeper, with a scream—"old what?"

"Devil!" said Wild junior. "Where's the room, I say? If you don't tell me——"

He did not trouble himself to complete his sentence, but significantly drew forth a pistol, and cocked it.

"Oh, sir!—oh, oh!—oh, don't! I beg—pray don't! Put that horrid thing away—the bare sight of it frightens me to death!"

"Then will you show me the room?"

"Oh yes, good sir—yes—decidedly yes! That's it—the one facing you on the other side of the passage."

With a kind of howl, such as Jonathan Wild himself used to utter, George sprang into the passage.

He placed his hand upon the knob of the door opposite.

He turned it.

But the door would not yield.

It was fast.

Some horrible curses then immediately fell from his lips.

Retreating a step or two, he lifted up his foot, and kicked the door with terrific violence.

The lock or bolt by which it was secured was of a flimsy description, and gave way at once.

He dashed into the room.

"A light—a light!" he cried—"bring a light!"

Nicholson seized the oil lamp burning in the hall, and hurried towards him.

He held it high above his head in the air, and by the aid of its sickly beams they glanced rapidly round the apartment.

It was vacant.

"Curse her!" ejaculated George. "The old jade has deceived us! So she is not here!"

"Look here!" exclaimed Nicholson. "This seems to give colour to her statements. We are just one moment too late!"

He hurried across the room to the window while he spoke.

It was open.

A rush of cold air came in.

"Escaped!" said George. "D—n me, the old she cat was right! Come on—she must be close at hand! Quick—we shall have her yet!"

So saying, George Wild sprang through the window into the street.

The lodging-house keeper had been struck dumb with amazement, and at first could not do anything to hinder the proceedings of her strange visitors.

Just as Nicholson was about to follow his employer, however, she recovered.

"Murder!" she shrieked—"murder!—thieves!—fire! Oh, stop them! Murder—murder!"

[EDGORTH BESS MEETS WITH AN OLD FRIEND AT AN OFF-ORTUNE MOMENT.]

She seized hold of Nicholson while she spoke.

"Let go, will you?" he said, savagely. "Let go, and stop your squalling! Oh, you won't! Then take that!" With these words, he flung the heavy iron lamp full in her face.

The lodging-house keeper uttered a loud scream.

She relaxed her hold upon Nicholson, and fell back with a crash on the floor of the apartment.

Laughing loudly at this little practical joke—for so he considered it—Nicholson leaped through the window and ran after George Wild, whose form he could just distinguish in the distance.

Although they looked closely and carefully everywhere around them, they failed to catch sight of Edgworth Bess.

She had disappeared as completely as if she had sunk into the earth, leaving no trace behind.

Still the mere knowledge that she had been so lately in the vicinity was quite enough for George Wild.

No. 132.—BLUESKIN.

He felt sure that if he persevered that his search would in the end be rewarded.

Therefore he hurried up and down the streets in every direction, looking eagerly on all sides of him, but without result.

He cursed, and gnashed his teeth together in his disappointment, when, after upwards of an hour's fruitless search, he was compelled to pause by sheer exhaustion.

He was forced to come to the conclusion that she had again taken refuge in some house, and if such were the case he might search in vain for her.

Finally, he resolved to do the only thing that lay in his power, and that was to keep a close watch all round about the neighbourhood of the house from which she had escaped.

The suddenness of her disappearance convinced him that she could not have gone far.

CHAPTER DCVI.

EDGORTH BESS ELUDES WILD JUNIOR, AND FORTUNATELY MEETS WITH AN OLD FRIEND.

LEAVING Wild junior and Nicholson to keep their dreary watch, we will make an account of the proceedings of Edgorth Bess.

The state of half-insensibility into which the proximity of George Wild had thrown her, passed away as soon as she ceased to hear the detestable accents of his voice.

She heard the door closed, and at the self-same instant she rose to her feet.

That Wild junior had come to make some inquiries respecting her she did not doubt.

That the lodging-house keeper would answer him truthfully was tolerably certain.

It was, therefore, high time to be off.

Her first act was to hasten across the room to the door and secure it.

Then advancing to the window, she threw open the casement and sprang out into the street.

With the speed of a hunted hare she dashed along, taking no heed of her steps, and paying no attention to the streets through which she passed.

Suddenly, however, an ejaculation fell upon her ear.

Alarmed and excited as she was, yet she was conscious there was something familiar in the sound.

The voice was one that she had often heard before.

But yet she could not tell to whom it belonged.

Having such a few friends as she had, it was not likely she would be in doubt regarding the voice of any one of them, and therefore she was forced to the conclusion that it must be one of her foes.

With a slight scream of despair, she hurried onwards with redoubled speed.

To her intense agony and fright, however, she felt herself seized by some one.

Then it seemed to her as though all the earth was slipping away from under her feet.

She was about to faint, and nothing saved her from unconsciousness save the words that fell upon her ears.

"Thank Heaven!" said a voice—"I have found you at last! Look up, and don't feel alarmed! Your troubles are over now—all will be well!"

Edgorth Bess did look up.

Suspended from a rope that stretched from one side of the street to the other was a miserable oil-lamp.

By the dim, uncertain light that shone through the thick and dirty glass she perceived standing near her and holding her by the hands, the figure of a man.

He seemed past the middle age, and his body was bent in an awkward manner.

His countenance, although not by any means an agreeable one, was lighted up by a smile.

There was an expression in his eyes, too, which showed that his pleasure at this meeting was unfeigned.

For a moment Edgorth Bess taxed her memory in vain to know who this could be.

Then, all at once, recollection dawned upon her.

He was Steggs.

It is not to be wondered at that she did not recognise him at the first, for, as the reader will remember, he (Steggs) had received many severe injuries since she had seen him last.

The fearful fire in Wild's house had disfigured and scarred his features to such a degree that his whole face was materially changed.

Its effects were also visible in his body, which was wasted away.

"No one knows how long I have been searching for you!" he said. "But no matter! I have found you at last, and not too late. Do not tremble so! Believe me, there is no cause for alarm. You know me, do you not?"

"Yes," murmured Edgorth Bess, faintly.

"I am Steggs—you remember Steggs? I proved myself your friend on more than one occasion, and for a long time my sole business has been to search for you. At last I have succeeded, and I am content."

"I need a friend," said Edgorth Bess, returning the friendly pressure of his hands, "perhaps more so now than ever."

"Then be content—you have found one! Things have changed greatly with me. I have now the power to do much."

"Then save me—save me! Take me far away from this locality!"

"What is your fear?"

"George Wild. You know him—Jonathan's son?"

"Never fear," said Steggs—"he shall not harm you!"

"But he is a violent, desperate man, and I dread him even more than Jonathan himself. I have had the narrowest escape from him that I possibly could have."

Steggs saw how great a state of agitation she was in, and hastened to relieve it.

He did the best thing he possibly could to effect his purpose, for he hurried her away from the spot where this brief conference had taken place.

"Where are you taking me?" she cried at length, when she found herself nearing an aristocratic quarter—"to what place are you taking me?"

"I will explain to you as we go along. I have much to say, for you must be in ignorance of many things that have occurred, and which have produced a startling effect upon your fortunes."

"I know nothing scarcely after my escape, when Jack was shot just as he was entering the boat."

"Well, then, in the first place, your uncle, Abel Donmull, your persecutor, and the originator of all your misfortunes, is dead."

"Dead?"

"Yes. There is no conclusive evidence to prove that he fell by the hands of Jonathan Wild. His skeleton was discovered in one of the cells beneath the thief-taker's house—I say the skeleton, for the rats had devoured everything except the bones."

Edgorth Bess shuddered.

"And Jonathan Wild—where is he?"

"That I know not, though now I have discovered you I shall try hard to find him. His house was burnt down on the night when you escaped. I was there lying almost helpless in consequence of my wound, and was awoken by the suffocating smoke. By good fortune, the papers proving who you are, and placing your identity beyond all doubt and question fell into my hands. George Wild had them, though where he obtained them from I cannot tell. I watched him conceal them beneath a plank in the flooring of his chamber. I took them from there and concealed them again. On the night of the fire I managed to escape with my life, and so save the papers from destruction."

"Then I do, indeed, owe you much," said Edgorth Bess; "you have proved yourself a friend indeed; but I promise you shall not go unrewarded for your trouble. But the papers—where are they now?"

"I placed them in the hands of the Secretary of State. I crawled to his house as well as my injuries would permit me, and placed the packet in his hands. That caused a warrant to be issued for Jonathan Wild's arrest. He was tried and condemned to death, but through the connivance of the Governor of Newgate he escaped."

"Then the Secretary of State has seen those documents. Does he acknowledge me?"

"He does, and has offered a reward for anyone who will give tidings of your whereabouts. The matter has been placed in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, and all that is required is your presence."

"And you will take me to him?"

"Yes, I am doing so now."

"And you are sure that I shall have but little trouble in making my claim good?"

"Not the least trouble in the world."

"And I shall be rich and powerful?"

"Yes, very powerful. You will be in a position to preserve and protect those who have so long been your friends."

Edgorth Bess clasped her hands together with delight.

"That is what I desire," she said—"that is all I have been wishing for. Can it be possible that it has come to pass at last?"

"It has—it has, indeed!"

"And Jack and Blueskin—can you tell me what has become of them?"

"I cannot. A long—a very long time has elapsed since I saw them."

Edgorth Bess paused, and remained for several moments in deep thought.

"How shall I obtain intelligence of their whereabouts?" she asked, at length.

"I will see to that," said Steggs. "Now I have found you, I shall be able to turn my attention to your two friends, and to my bitter foe, Jonathan Wild. It will be a glad moment when I can assure them of your safety."

"And to what place are you now taking me?"

"To the residence of the Lord Chancellor."

"And shall I remain there?"

"That will depend entirely upon yourself. You must understand that you are now what is called a ward in chancery, and will continue to be so until you reach your majority, then you will be placed in full and entire possession of all your wealth and estates."

The prospect was a pleasing one to Edgworth Bess, and she remained for some time longer plunged in a delicious reverie.

She was building up castles in the air, all of them alas! to be soon demolished.

She imagined that not only were her own troubles over, but those of her two friends as well.

At length Steggs paused before the entrance to a plain but substantial-looking mansion.

"This is the place," he said—"this is the residence of the Lord Chancellor."

Edgworth Bess looked up, half in doubt and half in fear.

"I have only one caution to give you," he said, "and that is—say no more about your two friends than you are absolutely compelled; in fact, leave all to me, and wait until I can bring you tidings respecting them."

"I promise readily and gladly to all. I will obey you in all things, and follow your slightest wish."

"In that case, then, you will do well."

"But may I rely upon your exertions?"

"You may—you may indeed! I will serve you faithfully until my death!"

"Thanks—thanks!"

"As soon as I have seen you safely in the charge of the Lord Chancellor, I will leave you and begin my search after Blueskin. Doubtless I shall find him, or hear some intelligence. As soon as I do, rely upon it I will make you acquainted with it."

"Let me see you again before you start out upon this enterprise," said Edgworth Bess; "I may have some suggestions to make to you; but now my brain is in such a whirl and I am so excited that I can scarcely remember anything."

"I will do so—I will see you early in the morning. And now I believe our arrangements are complete."

"Yes—yes!"

"Then, above all things, remember the caution I have given you. You must not forget the danger in which they stand, and you must be aware of the great necessity there is for the greatest discretion on your part."

"Do not fear—do not fear! I will not forget any of your injunctions."

"Then, as all is so far arranged, follow me!"

The strange-looking pair had paused a few moments during this brief colloquy, but now they set forward again.

Steggs had taken hold of Edgworth Bess by the hand, and he led her towards the entrance of the mansion.

The poor girl's heart fluttered strangely as she ascended the steps before the door.

Her companion noticed it, and he entreated her to be calm, and assured her there was no need for apprehension.

Steggs then knocked loudly and importantly at the door.

It was flung open at once.

He was known to the footman who answered his summons, and Steggs was permitted to lead Edgworth Bess in unquestioned.

"Tell his lordship I am here," said Steggs, "and that I wish to see him upon a most important business. Tell him, too, that I have a young girl with me."

The footman stalked away, and presently returned.

The agitation of Edgworth Bess had by no means abated, and when the footman conducted them along the hall, and paused before a massive door, her heart beat with so much rapidity that she was almost deprived of breath.

A faint voice cried "Come in!" as soon as the footman knocked.

The door was flung open, and the next moment Edgworth Bess discovered that she had crossed the threshold.

CHAPTER DCVII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES RESOLVE TO PUT UP FOR A SHORT TIME AT THE LONELY INN.

THE remembrance of the prognostications uttered by the old hag made a deeper impression upon Jonathan Wild than he would have cared to confess even to himself.

He shuddered at the bare thought, and several moments elapsed before he could recover his composure.

"We must not talk about capture," he said, huskily, to his companion; "that must never be."

"We are in continual danger of it," returned Mr. Noakes.

"Not so," returned Jonathan, grimly; "I have determined, at any rate, to avoid that."

"Avoid capture?"

"Yes."

"By what means?"

"By death! I would rather die ten thousand times than submit myself to any of the police officers. It would be easier to do so than to witness their exultation."

"But are you in earnest in what you said a short time since?"

"What was that?"

"About leaving England."

"Certainly I am. Did I not tell you I was thoroughly sick of this life?"

"You did."

"Come, Noakes, we may as well understand each other upon this point as not."

"What do you mean, Mr. Wild?"

"Are we both agreed to leave these shores?"

"I can answer for myself. I have earnestly desired it for a long time."

"I know you have. But bear in mind that we cannot go as we are."

"You said so," replied Noakes, gloomily.

"It is the truth."

"Well, have it so. What then?"

"Simply this. Are you willing to aid me, to back me up in every plan that seems likely to secure our object?"

"You mean in obtaining money?"

"Of course I do, and I want to know whether you are willing to do your share?"

"I am—I am."

"That is well."

"But I am not half so bold and daring as you are, Mr. Wild, and therefore shall be able to do little."

"Do all you can, and don't croak about danger and the like. I shall be satisfied then."

"And you will commence endeavouring to obtain this money soon?"

"At once."

"To-night?"

"Yes, to-night."

"And in doing so you will run no unnecessary risk?"

"Of course I shall not. Although I am determined never to allow my foes to take me prisoner, I am not anxious to quit this life."

"But you are so rash."

"You think so because you have not a bold spirit."

"And which direction shall you take?"

"We will make towards the Essex shore; we shall stand a better chance of embarking from that point than, perhaps, any other."

"I should think so too."

"On our way," continued Jonathan, "we will devise the best means we can for obtaining the money we require. If possible, we will take it at one bold stroke, the danger will thus be diminished."

This being agreed upon, the two villains took their course across the country in the direction of the place that had been mentioned.

Noakes did not know it, but in doing this Jonathan Wild kept much closer to London than he was aware of, or than he would have considered safe or prudent.

Little more was said, certainly nothing of any great importance. Their conversation turned upon the sole subject of their escape.

Mr. Noakes was exceedingly delighted to think he had at last persuaded Jonathan Wild into adopting this course.

He was quite another being.

He believed safety was in sight, and that he should soon be out of danger.

Whether he was correct or not in these anticipations time will quickly show.

The country through which they passed was very thinly inhabited.

As they went on their way in the night, and these were the only lights they saw.

There was no sound of pursuit.

Nor in the rear were there any indications of pursuit, so that, taking it altogether, Wild and Noakes were much more comfortable than they had been for a length of time.

At last, about an hour before midnight, Jonathan espied before him in the distance the swinging sign of a roadside inn.

In the darkness he could not tell whether there was any village in the vicinity, or whether it was only a kind of halting-place or half-way house between two towns.

From the appearance of the country through which he had lately passed, Jonathan judged the latter to be the more likely supposition.

"Do you see that inn?" he asked, raising his arm and pointing towards it.

"I do. What of it?"

"We will stay there for awhile."

"Stay there?"

"Yes. Why do you ask the question in such a tone of alarm?"

"The risk, Mr. Wild."

"Bah! you have begun again. You will try my patience. Let me ask you what danger there could be in staying awhile at a public-house in such an out-of-the-way place as this?"

To this question Mr. Noakes could give no direct answer, and therefore he remained silent.

"We will not stay long," added Jonathan, "and I would not think of halting at all if I did not believe that it was perfectly safe to do so. Here, however, the chances are a thousand to one against their having heard anything of us. I do not fear for a moment that we shall be recognised."

"But what is your object in stopping?"

"Firstly, because of our horses."

"They have had rest."

"I know that; but who can tell how soon the time may come when it will be necessary for us to put them to their speed? If they flag, we are lost."

"I know all about that; but—"

"Well, then, horses will not travel far or well without good, sound corn. Of this, as you know very well, they have had little for some time, and that is one of my motives for staying here, because I think they can have it with safety to ourselves."

"And have you another reason?"

"Yes."

"What is it?"

"To supply a want of my own."

"What want?"

"Brandy. I must have brandy, Noakes; to me it is the essence of life. I have gone long without it, but I can go no longer. I must have brandy, Noakes—brandy!"

"It is long since either of us had that, or a good meal either."

"And so you are willing to stay now?"

"Quite willing, for, upon consideration, the danger does not seem to be so great as I imagined."

"Of course it is not. Be cautious in your behaviour, and leave the rest to me. I will safely get you out of all difficulty, never fear."

Noakes had great faith in Jonathan's powers, and placed great reliance on them—and with good reason, for had he not on many occasions extricated him from positions of extreme peril?"

Every time Wild had come off unscathed, if we may except the slight wounds both had received.

In good truth, in spite of his fears, Noakes was glad enough of the chance of sitting down for awhile and resting himself.

He was entirely worn out by fatigue, and, moreover, he was half famished with hunger.

But a few minutes more brought them to the inn.

They pulled up in front of the building.

No notice was taken of their arrival, and Jonathan had to bawl loudly before anyone appeared.

At length the figure of a man emerged from the inn.

"What did you please to want, gentlemen?" he asked.

"We are here for a short time," returned Wild, gruffly; "what is, if you can find accommodation for us and our horses?"

"There's every accommodation," was the reply—"the best accommodation both for man and beast."

"Very good, then, take charge of our horses. Where is the landlord?"

"I am the landlord."

"And are you ostler too?"

"No, but I have got the laziest, most good-for-nothing fellow for one that ever lived. Dan—Dan!" he bellowed; "come here, and be d—d to you!"

Apparently this was a powerful invocation, for a strange-looking being—half-man, half-boy—came shuffling towards them.

"Where the devil have you been skulking to?" roared the landlord.

"I was a comin', sir."

"Coming be d—d! I tell you what it is, Dan."

"What, master?"

"If you don't alter, you must leave."

"All right, master. I guess you notice—there!"

"You shall leave this day week, d—n you!" returned the landlord.

"All right, master—don't put yourself out about it! Take it easy like I do!"

"You be d—d!"

"Yes, master."

Between them they held the two horses, and Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes alighted.

"Look after the horses, Dan," cried the former. "Give them plenty to eat, and trust to me."

"All right, sir."

The ostler led the jaded horses towards the stables, and Wild and Noakes followed the landlord to the inn.

"I have every accommodation," said the latter. "Would you like a private room?"

"Yes."

"Then I am very sorry, gentlemen, but I really haven't one at present."

"Then what the devil did you ask for?" growled Wild, kicking open a door and striding into a room.

This appeared to be a tap-room or kitchen where people sat down together in a free-and-easy way to partake of what refreshment they thought proper.

Several persons were present, seated at the various tables, when Wild entered so unceremoniously, and they all looked up at him in curiosity and surprise.

Jonathan's keen eye rested for a brief space of time upon the countenances of all present.

Then he drew in his breath with a feeling of relief.

They were all evidently farm labourers, or people employed in agricultural pursuits.

Doubtless they lived somewhere near at hand, and probably had never made a longer journey than ten miles in the whole course of their lives.

In this case, when communication between distant and out-of-the-way places was so very imperfect, it was scarcely likely they would be able to recognise the fugitives.

There were no newspapers then penetrating to remote country places; and the only means they had of obtaining news, was by asking questions of those travellers who happened to go there, and who had journeyed from some distant town.

Such a state of things can scarcely be realised by people living at the present day.

But such was the case then, and continued to be for many a long year afterwards.

It is to this fact, and this alone, that Jonathan owed his repeated escapes.

Now everyone in the land would be on the look-out.

Accurate descriptions would be sent everywhere, and the latest intelligence quickly and easily transmitted.

The only inland towns where the inhabitants were kept posted up in the events of the day were those at which mail coaches stopped to change horses or for other purposes.

CHAPTER DOVILL.

JONATHAN WILD ALARMS THE LANDLORD OF THE ROAD-SIDE INN, AND OVERHEARS A SINGULAR STORY IN THE TAP-ROOM.

KNOWING all this, Jonathan Wild decided upon his course of action immediately.

Assuming a swaggering gait and a bullying manner, he strode across the room, and seated himself in the place nearest to the fire.

Endeavouring to imitate his boldness of demeanour, Mr. Noakes followed in his steps, and seated himself by his side.

Then the landlord stood in a respectful attitude, waiting for orders.

"Brandy!" roared Wild, in a voice that made the room ring again—"brandy!"

"Hot or cold water, sir?"

"D—n your water—I want none of it! There's enough in it already! Bring me half a pint in a jug!"

Probably this was the first time the landlord had received any such order, and for a moment all he could do was to stare with astonishment in the face of his customer.

"A half a pint?" he said.

"Yes, and be quick with it!"

"And what will you take, sir?" inquired the landlord of Mr. Noakes.

"The same as me," returned Wild, answering for him. "And now make haste!"

As he spoke, he picked up the huge poker, and this action so terrified the landlord that he bolted out of the tap-room into the passage at once.

Jonathan, however, had no hostile intentions towards him.

He thrust the poker between the bars into the hottest part of the fire, and there allowed it to remain.

Some kind of conversation had been going on when the two new-comers entered, but all lapsed into perfect silence.

They had enough to do to look at and observe the motions of the new-comers.

The landlord was some time before he returned, and Jonathan Wild kept muttering impatiently to himself and vigorously stirring the fire.

The fact was, the landlord of the village inn was so completely taken aback by the manner in which he had been spoken to and the orders he had received, that, as soon as he got into the bar, he plumped down on a chair and remained still for at least a minute.

Then, with many shakes of the head, he took down two jugs off a shelf, and poured into each of them half a pint of brandy.

Having done this, he carried them back into the tap-room, and not without some degree of apprehension.

Truly, Wild's appearance and manner were enough to alarm anyone.

The landlord was unquestionably the greatest bully there was for ten miles round, and he was always hectoring to those who would submit to it.

But Jonathan Wild overawed him, and he was inclined to be quite humble, and civil, and respectful.

He bowed humbly as soon as ever he reached the threshold of the tap-room.

"So you've come at last, have you?" exclaimed Wild, with an oath. "D—n me if I didn't begin to think you were never coming at all!"

He accompanied these words by drawing the poker from the fire and flourishing it round his head.

By this time it was red hot.

The landlord's terror increased, and even Noakes was slightly alarmed.

The landlord believed he had got a madman to deal with, and so, putting the two jugs down on the floor, he hastily disappeared.

"Fetch them here," said Wild to Noakes. "What a fool the man is, to be sure!"

Noakes obeyed immediately.

Jonathan, as soon as he obtained his jug, thrust the red-hot poker into it, and stirred the brandy vigorously round and round, to the intense astonishment of the other persons who were assembled.

Then, flinging the heavy piece of iron down into the fender and causing a prodigious clatter, he placed the jug to his lips, and drank off half its contents at a draught.

"Ugh!" he said, with a shudder. "That landlord deserves to be roasted alive and to be basted with his own gravy for watering his brandy to such a degree!"

Noakes did not try the red-hot poker, but contented himself with sipping his fiery beverage in silence.

Then Wild called for a pipe and tobacco, and, having obtained these articles, he leaned back in his seat, and closed his eyes.

Mr. Noakes drank deeply of the brandy, and its fumes mounted quickly to his brain, so that in a short time he was glad enough to follow his companion's example and to close his eyes too.

After they had remained in this position for some time, maintaining a profound silence, the men's tongues gradually loosened, and the conversation which the entrance of Wild and Noakes had interrupted was resumed.

Then some more came in, and seated themselves near the fire.

"It's a 'nation cold night, and no mistake!" said one, rubbing his hands briskly together. "I am almost friz."

"Did you come by the old mill?" asked another.

"Yes."

"Did you see anything?"

"No, I didn't see nothing—did you?"

"No, not myself, but I've heard that the ghost is to be seen there again."

"What ghost—what ghost?" inquired several.

"Haven't you heard?"

"No, not till you spoke. What's it all about?"

"Why, I've been told the ghost has been seen again at the haunted mill."

"I don't believe it."

"Well, I wouldn't say that," exclaimed a huge fellow, at least six feet in height—"I wouldn't say that."

"Say what?"

"That I didn't believe it. Ghostses is ghostses, and I'm well aware of it."

"Well, Roger, did you ever see one?"

"Yes, I did."

"Where?"

"At Stubbs's mill."

"When—when?"

"Oh, it's a good many years ago now—five-and-twenty, I should think; but I recollect as well as if it happened yesterday."

"What was it like, Roger?" asked several, in an eager whisper.

"Why, a great, tall figure, wrapped all in white, and with a face as white as one of the squire's sheets. I seed it, and it made my blood run cold for many a long day afterwards."

"And have you ever seen it since?"

"No, and don't want to. For five-and-twenty years I've never been past Stubbs's mill after dark, and not a coach-and-four and a bagful of money should persuade me to do it."

"How was it you happened to be by then?"

"Why, I was young and foolish then, like a great many more I know, and didn't believe anything. I had been sitting here rather late, but at last they turned me out, and I went home. You know my nearest way at that time was right past old Stubbs's mill."

"Along the footpath across the meadows?"

"Yes; that cut off a 'nation great corner in the road. I don't much care about that footpath by daylight, but five-and-twenty years ago, or more, I didn't care for it at dark."

"Well, go on, Roger. What about the ghost?"

"Ah! you speak as if you don't believe it; but wait till you have seen one—you will alter your tone then."

"I daresay I shall; but go on—go on."

"Well, then, I tell you, I took the footpath across the meadows, being, as that was, the nearest way home, and just as I was getting over the stile by the mill, what should I see but a tall white figure go gliding over the grass! I could not take my eyes off it, do what I would, and I couldn't move off the stile. Away it went, just like a shadow, only white—sometimes fast and sometimes slow."

"And was it coming towards you, Roger?"

"No, no, or I should not have lived to tell the tale."

"Which way was it going, then?"

"Why, to the old mill—for it was an old mill five-and-twenty years ago. You know the flight of wooden steps leading up to the door in the mill side?"

"Yes, yes; but they are half broken away now."

"I know that. Well, she glided up these steps one by one, but without seeming to touch any of them."

"She—she?" cried several.

"Yes—she."

"How did you know it was a woman, then?"

"Why, wasn't it Poll Powell's ghost? Of course it was! Who else's ghost could it be? I knew it, although she looked so tall and so white, and went up the steps so strangely."

"And what did the ghost do then?"

"Why, she passed into the mill, and I saw her no more."

Roger drew a long breath, and it was evident, although such a long time had elapsed, the impression produced upon him had not worn off.

"And what did you do, Roger?" asked several.

"Why, I ran off home as fast as I could, but not past the old mill. I was almost dead with fear, and I dropped down as soon as ever the cottage door was opened; and never since that day, as I said before, have I been past the haunted mill at night."

"They say this ghost has been seen again!"

"Yes; several have seen it lately. Just the same tall, white figure gliding over the fields and entering the mill."

"And who was Poll Powell?" asked another of the company. "Do you recollect her, Roger?"

"I should think I do. I am only just turned sixty, now; but yet I can remember her for fifty years. She was only a little girl then, and one of the prettiest girls in the village—I thought her the prettiest! We grew up close together, for her father's house was close to mine, and I often used to see her in the fields, and I made up my mind that when I was old enough I would have her for my wife, although she was a good bit older than me—but I thought that wouldn't matter."

No one would have expected that the rough-looking being who spoke these words could have displayed so much emotion at the remembrance of the past; but his voice grew very husky, and a tear glistened in his eye.

"There's plenty in the village knows the tale," he continued. "How I made love to her, and how she listened to me sometimes, and at others only laughed at me. But I made up my mind she should be my wife!"

"At that time the haunted mill, as we call it, was in full work, and it was kept by a miller named Stubbs, who had an only son, named Jasper."

"They carried it on between them, and were quite looked up to by the people in the village because they were so much better off than any of them."

"Well, Poll used to take the wheat to the mill to be ground, and there Jasper saw her and fell in love with her. He was a dashing young chap, with a smooth and oily tongue—just one to steal a girl's heart and then throw it away afterwards. He looked with a favourable eye upon Polly Powell, and made love to her whenever she went to the mill. Curse him!—curse him!"

CHAPTER DCIX.

OLD ROGER TELLS THE STORY OF THE HAUNTED MILL.

ALTHOUGH he was leaning back with his eyes shut, and seemingly fast asleep, not a single word of this conversation escaped the ears of Jonathan Wild.

At first he had only listened mechanically, but soon his feelings changed, and he listened as eagerly as anyone there present.

Whether this was in consequence of the interest possessed by the story itself, or whether it suggested to his plotting brain the groundwork for a future plan of operations we cannot at present tell.

Let it be sufficient to say that he listened with more than common interest to every syllable, and was ready to utter an ejaculation of impatience whenever Roger paused in his narrative, or whenever anyone interrupted him.

For Mr. Noakes, too, the story possessed a strange kind of fascination.

Strangely enough, he became impressed with the notion that he either had been, or should be in some way, connected with it; but that was mere fancy.

Old Roger shook with passion as he cursed the young miller who had looked with loving eyes upon the girl he intended to make his wife.

After a little while, however, he recovered himself, and then he continued:

"It was not long," he said, "before I found out how the land lay. I guessed her secret, and quickly became convinced that my suspicions were well grounded."

"Not only did the miller speak words of love to her, but the foolish girl listened to, and believed, what he said. Many and many times they met, but always in secret, for Stubbs was a purse-proud man, and would never have consented to a marriage between his son and one so poor as Polly Powell. I don't believe the old man ever suspected what his son was after. Perhaps he did, for it came out afterwards that young Stubbs was paying his attentions to a young lady who lived in the next town."

"It was clear he wanted Poll for no good, and so the event quickly proved."

"All noticed what a great change came over the poor girl, though none could guess the cause of it—not even myself—and she refused to say a word to satisfy the curiosity of anyone."

"But she grew paler and thinner day by day, and was often found in out-of-the-way places, where she fancied she would be unseen, weeping bitterly; but, as I have told you, she would not confide the cause of her grief to anyone."

"She was very unkindly treated at home, for her parents were angry with her for remaining silent. It was to no purpose, however—they could not get a word from her."

"And thus several months passed away. One night she went out, as she often did, and therefore nothing was thought of it. But the usual hour for retiring to rest came, and Poll did not return. They waited all night, and the next morning came without bringing her, and then her parents grew alarmed."

"The intelligence quickly spread, and people shook their heads wisely."

"Ah!" said one, "I don't wonder that the poor girl should run away. She has every excuse, poor thing! The way you treated her was shameful! Depend upon it, she has run away and gone to London!"

"That came to be the general impression. No traces or tidings of her could be seen or heard. She had disappeared completely, and therefore people believed that she had left her home in consequence of the unkind manner in which she had been treated."

"But, for one, I didn't believe this. I had jealous eyes looking all around, and my belief was that young Stubbs had had something to do with her disappearance. But I didn't dare to utter my suspicions aloud. I was compelled to keep them to myself, for I was poor and he was rich, and I was to a very great extent dependent upon him. I determined to keep a very close watch upon him, and I did so. I am bound to confess that I never saw anything suspicious in his behaviour."

"Well, time passed on, and by degrees Poll became forgotten. None of her relatives were rich enough to make a journey to London in order to ascertain whether she had really gone there, and so they were compelled to content themselves as best they might, and bear their loss in silence. But it was a hard and bitter thought to them that her absence was due to their harsh treatment. But by degrees the reproaches of the neighbours ceased, and, as I told you, Polly Powell was forgotten by almost all except her parents and myself."

"There were no signs of guilt about Jasper; he looked just the same as ever, and but for my jealousy I should have considered my suspicions groundless."

"Then, at last, as I told you, when I stayed here so late and went towards the cottage where I lived across the meadows, I was thinking about Polly all the while; and as soon as I saw her hurrying across the meadow I knew her; had it been anyone else, I believe the fright would have killed me. I ought to have had the courage to have followed her into the mill, but I didn't."

"In the morning I told my story, and the whole affair soon got wind—and before mid-day it was on the tongue's-end of everybody.

"It got round at length to Jasper's ears, and when he heard it first, many people were standing round. Instantly he turned deathly pale, and was covered with confusion. He staggered back, and clutched a wooden beam that formed a support to the mill with nervous terror. Everyone noted it, and drew their own conclusions from it.

"To such a pass did these events come, and so much were they talked about, that nothing would appease the people but a thorough and searching investigation into the whole affair.

"Jasper was so overcome that he was laid upon a bed of sickness, from which he could not rise.

"One day—I remember it well—the constables were sent for, the squire, and other magistrates attended, and it was determined that the old mill should be searched, for rumour said that the remains of Polly Powell would be found there, and rumour for once spoke the truth.

"The mill was searched carefully in every part, until at length they came to the foundations. The under portion was filled up with rubbish, the accumulation of many years. This was all carefully turned over and examined.

"The result was, that the remains of the unfortunate girl were found there, and clasped convulsively in her arms was an infant. A further search disclosed an iron bar, that was used in the mill, and a clasp knife. All these articles were carefully removed.

"The commotion was intense.

"The bar of iron was recognised to be one that was used in the mill, and which had been missing since the night on which Polly Powell disappeared. The clasp knife, too, was well known to be Jasper's, for his name was engraved upon it.

"The constables went in a body to the miller's house. They forced the guilty wretch to rise, and overcome by guilt, he poured out a full confession of the details of his crime. He had engaged the poor girl's affections, and she had placed reliance on his hollow promises.

"All wonder at Poll's strange behaviour now ceased.

"The mill was their usual meeting-place. One night she came there, and Jasper, wearied and tired of her, treated her so harshly that her heart almost broke, and in the midst of her grief she gave birth to the child that was pressed so tightly to her breast.

"It was then the impulse came over him to rid himself of all the trouble by one blow, and therefore he struck her a heavy blow with the iron bar. This he believed had killed her.

"He went down into the foundation of the mill, and removed a quantity of rubbish there, then, opening a trap-door in the flooring, he ruthlessly cast the mother and her babe into the abyss. But a low, wailing cry ascended from the dreary depths below. One or both of his victims lived.

"The fury of a demon then possessed him. Drawing his knife, he leaped down through the trap-door and finished his barbarous work.

"Upon this confession he was taken to prison and brought before the judge. He was found guilty, sentenced to death, hanged, and then his remains were hung upon a gibbet, the remains of which can still be seen a few yards from the mill.

"Old Stubbs was bowed down by grief, and soon expired. The mill was deserted and allowed to fall to rack and ruin. No one could be found who was willing to become its tenant—no one would go near it if they could avoid it, and so from that day to this it has been called 'The Haunted Mill.'

"That's the story, then," added old Roger, after his auditors had all drawn a long breath at the conclusion of his narrative—"that's all, and now let me ask you whether you would believe in ghosts if you had the experience I have had?"

"And—and," said some one in a shaky voice, "is this ghost to be seen again—the ghost of Mary Powell?"

"That I don't know," returned Roger. "Surely now, her spirit ought to be at rest. No—no," he added, with a shake of his head, "it can't be her. I would sooner think that some other barbarous crime has been committed near the spot."

This was a suggestion that filled all their breasts with horror.

"Who has seen it?" cried another—"who has seen this ghost?"

"I don't know who has seen it, but it's talked of by many."

It was just at this juncture that the landlord entered the room.

"Come—come," he asked, "are you going to stay here all night? If you are, you had better pay for your lodging; if not, be off, for I am going to close the shutters; I shan't sit up any longer for anybody!"

It was quite a regular thing for the landlord to turn his regular customers out in this manner when the hour grew late, so, without a murmur, they emptied the vessels before them, and one by one took their departure.

But although it would have been at least half a mile nearer for many of them to have taken the path across the meadows and gone past the old mill, not one of them attempted it.

They even shrank back from the little wooden stile on the roadside that led into the fields.

Upon hearing the voice of the landlord, both Wild and Noakes opened their eyes and again looked about them.

"Brandy," said Wild, fiercely, as he emptied his jug—"more brandy! Be quick, and don't put so much water in it as you did the last time!"

He held out the jug to the landlord as he spoke, who took it with a trembling hand, and then rushed precipitately from the room.

CHAPTER DCX.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES REPAIR TO THE HAUNTED MILL, AND ARE STARTLED BY AN APPARITION.

The landlord made good speed on this occasion.

"There you are, sir," he said, entering the room and placing the jug on the table. "Would you like to stay here all night, gentlemen; I have every accommodation?"

"No," said Wild, "we'll be off. Tell the ostler to get the horses ready, and then let me know what the reckoning is."

Jonathan drank off his other half-pint of brandy, while Noakes was finishing his first.

Strangely enough, however, the spirit did not produce an intoxicating effect upon either.

It merely made them bolder and more courageous than they had been.

"Why not have stayed here all night?" said Noakes, as soon as the landlord had left the room, "we appear to be perfectly safe."

"No doubt we are," said Wild; "but I have something else in my mind—it will not answer my purpose."

"What do you intend to do?"

"That you will quickly see—never mind it at present."

The landlord again made his appearance, bowing at every step.

"How much is there to pay?" said Jonathan, thrusting his hand into his pocket.

"Nine-and-sixpence, sir."

"Here's half-a-guinea, and keep the change, though you're a d—d bad waiter!"

"Thank you, sir!"

"Are the horses ready?"

"Yes, Dan will have them round at the front door by the time you can get there."

Wild and Noakes both rose, and made their way to the front of the inn.

Here they found the ostler waiting for them.

The two villains quickly mounted, and Jonathan tossed the ostler half-a-crown.

"There," he said, "take that, and drink my health with it."

At the same time he spurred his horse viciously, and the creature tore along the road and was out of sight directly.

Mr. Noakes followed close behind.

Jonathan galloped on for some distance, until, in fact, he came to the summit of a hill, and here he pulled up.

Mr. Noakes quickly placed himself by his side.

Then Jonathan took a long and careful survey of the country around him.

A very spacious view could be obtained from that hill, especially by daylight.

Now, however, it was not possible to see to any great distance.

Wild looked up to the sky.

It was covered with dark clouds, which were rushing violently along at a rapid rate.

Suddenly, through a long, rugged rift, the moon peeped forth.

As if by magic, all the landscape was revealed, and Jonathan Wild availed himself to the utmost of this opportunity to look about him.

"There it is!" he exclaimed, exultingly—"there it is!"

"What—what?"

"There—there! Can you see it?"

"The old mill?"

"Yes."

"Yes, I see it. What of it?"

"Keep your eyes fixed upon it then, and remember the direction as well as you can."

"Surely you are not going towards it?"

"Indeed! but I am though."

"For what purpose?"

"Can you not guess?"

"No."

"You heard the story that old man told?"

"Of course I did. What's that to do with us?"

"A great deal, as you will find. I am going there."

"But to what end?"

"Can it be possible that you are so dull of apprehension as not to understand?"

"You don't intend to take up your quarters there, surely?"

"Indeed I do!"

"Then I shall not accompany you."

"Why not?"

"Because—because!"

"Are you afraid of ghosts?"

"Well, no—not exactly that!"

"Bah! don't be a fool, Noakes! Look at things with an eye to our own advantage! As soon as that old man began his story I made up my mind what to do."

"What was that?"

"To take up my quarters in the mill. Can you not perceive the immense advantages we should derive from it, and are we to be scared away by a mere shadow?"

"But what are these advantages?"

"I am going, first of all, to make an examination of the place. If I find it to be what I anticipate, we shall be able to conceal ourselves there as long as we think proper. There will be no fear of discovery, for the country clowns about here will not have the courage to approach the spot. Of necessity, we shall be some time in collecting the amount we require. The lower portion of that old mill will be just the place to conceal it."

"But—but—"

"I suppose you have some foolish objection to going there?"

"I have!—I don't own to being very courageous, and if there's one thing that I am more afraid of than another it is ghosts!"

"Bah!"

"It's all very well for you to affect to despise them, Jonathan Wild; some day or other you will probably think differently!"

"Noakes!"

"What?"

"Just listen to me once for all and all—for once! Are you listening?"

"I am."

"Well, then, I intend to stand no more of your foolery—not a bit of it, understand!"

"What foolery?"

"Make any more objections to this reasonable proposition of mine, and I no longer consent to leave England. Now, then, you may take your choice—which will you do?"

"You are too hard upon me, Mr. Wild."

"Not at all. You are a fool, and cannot see what is to your benefit. Now, then, answer me quickly—will you come with me to the mill or not?"

Reluctantly Mr. Noakes murmured an assent.

"Come, then—no more hesitation. This way—follow me over yonder fence."

As he spoke, Wild pointed to some low palings dividing a field from the high-road.

Over these the horses leaped easily, and then they made their way in almost a direct line for their destination.

During their journey, the moon once or twice peeped through small openings in the clouds, and enabled them to correct any error they might have made in their course.

Mr. Noakes, however, was by no means anxious to push forward.

Of the two evils presented to him, he had preferred rather to accompany Wild to the mill than to abandon the project of leaving England.

But the idea of doing this presented to his mind a thousand terrors—terrors of which he was half ashamed himself, but which nevertheless had the complete mastery over him.

He was compelled to keep pace with his companion, however; and, after a short ride, Jonathan drew rein, and waited for the moon once more to light up their proceedings.

He saw that there was a large gap in the clouds of very great extent, and that it was in the direct course of the moon.

Another moment, and the bright, pure light illuminated everything around with a brilliancy that was absolutely startling when compared with the darkness which had previously prevailed.

Another low paling, about three feet in height, alone separated him from the field in which the mill stood.

Upon this object the eyes of Wild and Noakes became immediately fixed, and upon it, too, the moon seemed to concentrate all her rays, so that there was not a single portion of the old structure that was not brought into vivid relief.

It presented a most dilapidated appearance.

The sail had long since rotted away and disappeared, and the wooden rails over which they had been drawn were broken in many places, leaving the fragments sticking up strangely.

A curious kind of moss had overgrown all the lower portion of the structure, and all around was quite a mass of rubbish, consisting of fragments which had been torn by the force of wind and weather from various parts of the mill.

There were the steps, ruinous and broken, just as old Roger had described them.

There was the little black door at their summit, leading into the interior—the little door through which poor Mary Powell had passed and never emerged again in life.

There was a strange kind of fascination in the place, and how long Wild and Noakes would have continued gazing upon it is hard to say.

But a sudden movement on the part of both their horses distracted their attention.

The creatures were evidently greatly terrified.

Their eyes seemed almost starting from their sockets.

At the same instant, both Wild and Noakes looked across the meadow in the direction to which the horses' heads were turned.

At the same instant, there came from their lips a startling cry, which still further alarmed the horses.

Jonathan Wild and his companion trembled from head to foot.

They rubbed their eyes.

Could they be dreaming, or was there indeed some truth in what the men had said? Was this a confirmation of their statements?

Surely yes.

Sweeping over the long rank grass in the meadow was a tall white figure.

Its face was turned to the mill, towards which it advanced with a strange, jerking, spasmodic motion.

Breathlessly did they gaze upon this strange spectacle.

It was no delusion of the senses, no hallucination, no phantom conjured up by their fears, and visible in their minds only.

No, it was there—something evidently palpable.

Both saw it at the same time—both were terrified, and so were the steeds as well.

Fright completely froze up Mr. Noakes's faculties.

He had the strongest desire to turn and fly far away from that spot.

But his body refused to yield obedience to his will, and his eyes remained riveted upon the ghastly object before them.

Onward over the meadow it went still, with the same odd, jerking motion, and yet making marvellous speed.

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES WATCHING THE APPARITION.]

In a perfectly straight line, it took its way towards the flight of broken steps.

In something less than a minute, the white figure reached the foot of them.

Then, with just the same movement, it ascended.

Upon reaching the top, the figure paused.

The moon now shone upon it with what appeared to be a preternatural brightness.

The broken wood-work of the old mill formed a background, which threw out in clear and startling relief every outline of the strange white form, and, as they continued to gaze, Wild and Noakes perceived that in its arms it held some bulky object, which it appeared to be pressing to its breast.

From the distance where they stood, it was impossible to see distinctly what this tightly-clasped object could be; but their imaginations quickly made it out to be nothing else than the form of an infant.

No. 133.—BLUESKIN.

In a second the figure turned round, and seemed to vanish through the door leading into the mill.

The disappearance of the white figure broke the spell which bound both Wild and his companion.

The latter, with a yell of fear, was about to turn round and gallop off, when Jonathan, with an oath, seized hold of the bridle of his horse and frustrated his intention.

"Fool!—idiot!" he shrieked. "Where are you going now?"

"Away—away!" said Noakes. "Anywhere but in this place! Away—away! I can't stay here! Death—the most lingering and tormenting death—would be infinitely preferable to life near this spot! Away—away!"

"Peace, fool!" cried Wild, angrily—"peace, fool! We must see further into this matter!"

Just then a huge cloud swept suddenly before the moon's disc, and in a moment the whole surrounding scene was plunged into deep and impenetrable darkness.

CHAPTER DCXII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES WATCH THE DEPARTURE OF THE SPECTRE FROM THE HAUNTED MILL.

BUT for the grasp Jonathan Wild continued to hold upon the bridle of Mr. Noakes's horse, that individual would certainly have left the spot.

A furious struggle took place, which was put an end to by Jonathan saying:

"Well, be it so; we will ride away and quit this place, and I will altogether abandon the project of leaving England."

No other words could possibly have had such an effect upon Mr. Noakes as those.

Their departure for a foreign land was the sole object that engaged his thoughts.

It was never absent from his mind, and he looked forward with delight to the time when he should be at rest and no longer tortured by a thousand fears, as he had been for so long.

"You know your power over me," he said; "I would endure much rather than that idea should be lost sight of."

Wild laughed.

"Now tell me what you wish to do, and why you desire to pry into this matter."

"For once I will explain all my motives to you."

"It would be better if you made a practice of doing so."

Wild took no notice of this remark.

He went on:

"While I sat in the public-house listening to the tale told by that old man, I instantly concluded that the old mill was, above all others, the one best suited to us."

"You mean as a hiding-place?"

"Yes, certainly. We can take up our quarters there without fear of molestation."

"But of what service is a hiding-place," said Noakes, "if you are in earnest in what you say about leaving England?"

"Have I not told you that we cannot go without a certain sum of money?"

Noakes groaned.

"At any rate, I don't intend to leave without I am in possession of a tolerable amount. I am anxious to obtain that in the easiest and least dangerous manner."

"Well, well—why do you pause?"

"Simply to know whether you are listening heedfully to what I am saying."

"Of course I am."

"Well, then, I thought, after what we heard, that this spot would be shunned by everybody, consequently it would be the best for us not only to secrete ourselves in, but our wealth as well."

"I think I understand what you mean, and in that respect your idea was right enough; but—"

"I will listen to your objections presently," interrupted Wild; "I don't want to hear them at present."

"Well, then, make haste to get to the end of your speech."

"When we have an opportunity of making a good booty, what more easy than to sally forth from this mill? And, again, when we have succeeded in obtaining it, what more easy to retire and hide it here?"

"It's a good place. I am bound to admit that it would have answered our purpose admirably."

"It will answer it."

"I don't know that. You—you—"

"What?"

"You seem to forget the horrible sight we have just seen."

Noakes shuddered.

Wild laughed discordantly as he answered:

"You are a coward."

"And so are you," retorted Noakes, "though you try hard to pass yourself off for a bold man."

"All this talk is useless—actions should be the test of courage. I tell you again, I intend to see further into this matter."

"But how? In what way?"

"Why, I will find out who and what it is that has entered the mill before us. Don't start and turn pale, my courageous friend, I am resolved to do it, and you shall accompany me."

"What! enter the mill?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Never!"

"Very well, then, you know the consequences."

Mr. Noakes broke out into a torrent of curses.

He was beginning to see how Jonathan Wild would make use of his wish to leave England to make him subservient to all his plans, however unpleasant they might be.

"But—but, Mr. Wild——" he stammered.

"But what?"

"Tell me your opinion of what we have just seen."

"My opinion?"

"Yes. Was that some supernatural being, or was it——"

"I cannot answer that question," replied Wild, "until I have gone into the mill and ascertained. That's just what I intend to do. So no more words. Forward; leap over the fence, and for the next half-hour submit yourself to my commands."

Mr. Noakes saw that it was in vain to contest the point any longer.

Jonathan Wild had managed to obtain a complete ascendancy over him. He was never more his master than at the present time.

He trembled from head to foot, and his pallid face was covered with a profuse cold perspiration.

His teeth chattered together, and his eyes rolled wildly. Nevertheless he felt constrained to follow his companion over the fence.

The distance to the mill was trifling.

Jonathan Wild stopped in a place where the old building cast the deepest shadow.

There he felt pretty sure they would be able to remain unseen by anyone who was not very close at hand.

And what of Jonathan Wild's own feelings all this while?

Was he indeed so bold-hearted and courageous as his behaviour towards Mr. Noakes would seem to show?

Was he altogether unmoved by the strange spectacle he had witnessed?

Had he got rid all at once of those superstitious fears which had ever found a home in his breast?

Certainly not.

But Jonathan's boldness of demeanour was caused chiefly by his companion's manifest alarm.

He scorned and despised him for it, and felt that he could not be guilty of such folly himself.

Moreover, even at a personal sacrifice, it always afforded him great pleasure to exult over anyone or to inflict torture upon them. So long as he was tormenting some one else, Jonathan Wild scarcely cared what he endured himself.

And he was well aware that he was inflicting exquisite torture upon Mr. Noakes by compelling him to approach the mill.

His own experience told him what superstitious fears were like; no one knew better than himself how hard it was to struggle with them.

His courage, then, was altogether spurious and put on for the reasons we have named.

It may be, too, that Jonathan Wild had some ideas of his own respecting what he had seen.

But whether those ideas were correct or erroneous nothing but the progress of events can show.

Having reined in his horse at the spot we have mentioned, he alighted.

Among the exterior supports of the mill he had no difficulty in finding some object to which he could secure his horse and prevent him from straying away.

Almost mechanically, and without uttering a word, Mr. Noakes followed his example.

"There," said Jonathan, "the horses are all right; we shall have no occasion to trouble ourselves further about them. How do you feel now, Noakes? Are you better?"

Some muttered curses escaped from the ex-Governor's lips.

"Well, then, look to your pistols, and see that they are all right, though you tremble so violently that I'll be d—d if you won't shake the priming out of them!"

While speaking these words, Jonathan made a careful inspection of his weapons, and, selecting one pistol, he held it conveniently in his left hand ready for immediate use.

He told his companion to do the same, then, clutching him by the arm, he added :

"Now, then, tread on tiptoe; this is the way; mind, no noise, recollect—no noise!"

The horses had been tethered on that side of the mill opposite the one where the steps led up to the little door.

Therefore the two villains had to make their way round one half of it.

They trod stealthily and cautiously.

Their footsteps produced no sound, however, except a faint rustling, for the ground was covered with tall, rank grass.

In another moment, however, they came round the corner of the mill, and Jonathan, raising his arms, said :

"Look, Noakes—look, there are the steps."

"I see them."

"Well, then, no struggles, no hesitation, no foolish fears—I am going up those steps into the mill, and you must accompany me."

Mr. Noakes trembled like one in an ague fit at the very thought.

He could not speak, however, for his terror was so great that his tongue clung tightly to the roof of his mouth.

Fear also nearly deprived him of the use of his limbs.

But suddenly, when within a short distance of the steps, Jonathan Wild stopped.

His hold upon his companion's arm relaxed.

Noakes, however, with a stifled shriek of alarm, clutched Jonathan tightly, and clung to him as though that was his only chance for safety.

The faces of both were turned in the same direction, namely, towards the little flight of steps we have so frequently mentioned.

The moon had again peeped out from among the clouds, and had once more illuminated the haunted mill and its surroundings.

Everything was as distinctly visible as by daylight.

The cold, clear rays fell upon the countenances of Wild and Noakes, and showed that they were pale to ghastliness.

The lips of both moved convulsively, and their eyes were starting from their sockets.

Jonathan's alarm on this occasion was fully as great as his companion's.

Standing on the little square piece of woodwork near the door was the same white, mysterious-looking object which had before struck terror to their souls.

It presented exactly the same appearance.

Its face was turned towards the moon.

Had their lives depended upon it, neither of the two villains could have moved a single step.

They had only power to watch the movements of the spectre.

By the appearance of the mysterious figure, it would seem as though it was availing itself of the light of the moon to take a careful survey of all around.

But this might be fancy.

Certain it is that, after the lapse of a short time, the figure began to descend the steps slowly and deliberately.

Its long white garments fluttered behind it and trailed upon the moss-grown steps.

Reaching the meadow, it again set off across it, moving strangely and spasmodically, as though the joints were stiff, like those in a suit of rusty armour.

It retreated rapidly—so rapidly that Jonathan Wild felt his astonishment increase.

It was not, however, until the white figure reached the hedge surrounding the meadow that Jonathan Wild to some extent recovered his composure.

Then, with a horrible oath, he pointed the pistol in the direction of the spectre and pulled the trigger sharply.

There was a sharp clicking noise, a faint crash—a puff of white smoke, and no more.

The spark from the flint had only ignited the powder in the pan.

It was at that very instant that the figure glided through the hedgerow and entirely disappeared, leaving those who had watched it filled with a thousand vague and nameless terrors.

CHAPTER DCXII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES MAKE A THOROUGH EXAMINATION OF THE OLD MILL.

JONATHAN WILD uttered a curse when the pistol misfired.

The next moment, however, he congratulated himself, and esteemed it a fortunate accident.

The impulse to fire had come over him all at once, and, without pausing to consider, he had obeyed it.

But now he remembered that, however effective the shot might have been so far as the spectre was concerned, and however agreeable it would have been to have had that matter settled, yet, at the same time, the report of a fire-arm would be carried far on the night air, and might reach the ears of some one who would be curious enough to endeavour to discover what was meant.

Now that the ghastly-looking figure was no longer in sight, both felt considerably relieved; in fact, their feelings underwent a total alteration.

They breathed freely and easily.

"We have lost the chance for to-night," said Wild, regretfully and half angrily; "but no matter. Perhaps, now that you are satisfied that the figure is no longer there, you will no longer object to enter the mill?"

"You were as much afraid as I was," returned Noakes, fiercely. "Let me see you go into the mill, and I will follow."

"Come, then—I am ready."

Jonathan was more at ease now that he knew the spectre had departed, therefore he mounted the steps boldly.

Upon reaching the top, he found out how it was that the figure had disappeared so suddenly.

It had appeared to vanish through the door.

There was no door there.

The interior of the mill was very dark, and made it appear from the distance as though there was one.

"See," he exclaimed, "here is one thing cleared away, and the rest no doubt will be as easy."

"Be careful how you advance," said Noakes, "a mill is a curious place—there may be trap-doors and open places in the flooring, and if so we may lame ourselves."

"That's the most sensible thing you have said to-night, Noakes; but wait a moment, and I will show a light."

Noakes wondered where his companion had procured the means of obtaining one.

The fact was, Wild had stolen the tinder-box from the public-house, and had also purloined a piece of candle.

With some trouble he obtained a light, and then, holding the candle above his head, he looked around.

He could only see dimly and imperfectly, and yet he perceived that the interior of the mill was quite as dilapidated as the exterior.

Some heavier and more substantial portions of the machinery remained intact, but the large stones used for grinding the corn were covered with green moss and the iron-work encrusted with rust.

Having satisfied themselves that the flooring was secure, they commenced making an examination of the building.

They met with no particular reward, however, for their search.

It presented just such an appearance as anyone might suspect such a place would.

There was nothing mysterious or remarkable anywhere.

There was a trap-door in the flooring, which they raised.

"This is the one, no doubt," said Wild, "down which Jasper threw the bodies of the mother and her infant. Let us see what is below."

He laid flat down upon the floor of the mill as he spoke, and let his arm hang down to its full length into the abyss.

The light of the candle, however, was not strong enough to illuminate that lower chamber in the mill, but he could see rubbish and dirt of all kinds below, as though the place had been used always as a receptacle for lumber.

"There is nothing to be found down there," he said.

So, rising to his feet, he closed the trap-door again.

"You still think of taking up your quarters in the mill?"

"Certainly I do, without you can suggest some better place."

"I cannot. But what part shall you choose?"

"Not the lower, for a certainty. We will go over the whole building, examine every part of it, and then decide."

With this intent they gradually ascended, sometimes by means of rude steps and at others by climbing up the machinery.

Without meeting with any accident or making any discovery, they at length arrived at the topmost portion of the mill.

This was the part through which an iron shaft passed, connected with a wheel, by means of which the sails could be placed so as to catch the wind.

It was a place of very limited dimensions.

The roof sloped downwards to a sharp angle, and was composed of wooden planks that were now in an advanced state of decay.

There was just room for Wild and Noakes to seat themselves, and that was about all.

"I think this is the place," said Wild. "I have not seen anything suitable as yet."

Noakes looked around him with a dissatisfied air.

"It is not quite so comfortable as we should like," returned Wild; "I admit that, but then there are many advantages."

"What are they?"

"Why, the first is, from our elevated position, we shall command a view of the country for miles."

"But all is dark."

"I know that, but it will be perfectly easy to cut holes in this woodwork large enough for us to see out of easily, and yet which will be invisible to people standing below."

"Yes," returned Noakes, thoughtfully, "we should certainly perceive when any officers were approaching."

"We should; and you may, if you like, make it your duty to keep a sharp look-out."

"It's getting towards morning now, I should think."

"Yes, it will be daylight shortly."

"And the horses—what do you intend to do about them?"

"Ah, I had forgotten about them entirely! I must descend to release them. I cannot do better than turn them loose in these fields—ten to one if they excite suspicion—then we can recapture them easily."

"Is there no place here that we can put them?"

"I fear not; it would be a greater risk. Out of curiosity, people might come to the lower part of the mill and pry about. They would not discover us, but they would certainly find the horses."

"That's true enough."

"Then, if you like, I will descend, and release the horses, and leave you here?"

"Why so?"

"During my absence you can occupy yourself with cutting the holes I mentioned."

"Very good," said Noakes—"just as you like."

Jonathan rose to his feet and once more sought the lower part of the mill.

He was getting familiar with the place, and ran down the steps outside rapidly.

He untied the horses and turned them loose.

Then he made his way back again.

But Mr. Noakes, as soon as ever his companion in crime had departed, put his finger by the side of his nose, and shook his head, as though he had really thought of something clever.

"You mean something, Jonathan, by this. I will descend and watch your movements. Aha! fool as you think me, I shall be a match for you."

Accordingly, at the imminent risk of breaking his neck, Mr. Noakes descended.

For once in his life, however, he was mistaken.

Jonathan Wild had no evil or ulterior intentions.

Just as the latter was returning he encountered his ally.

"Hallo!" he exclaimed—"what are you doing here? Afraid to stay alone, I suppose?"

"You can have it that way if you like," returned Noakes.

"What do you mean, fool?"

"Perhaps I am not such a fool as you take me to be, although you are such a clever man yourself. I followed you in order to see what you meant."

"You thought I was playing you a trick, did you? Bah! I have no patience."

And, uttering these words, Jonathan climbed up to the little wooden chamber we have described.

Immediately upon his arrival here he set to work to show that he was quite in earnest when he spoke about making holes in the woodwork.

The timber being very rotten, he had but little difficulty in working at it with his knife, and just about sunrise the pair had managed to make a number of lookholes—if they may be so called—by the aid of which they could command a view of the country for many miles in every direction.

They watched the sun rise higher and higher in the sky, and, when the day had fairly begun, Jonathan Wild uttered short ejaculations of satisfaction as he looked through the loopholes one after another.

As is generally the case, a piece of rising ground had been selected for the situation of the mill.

The building itself was of tolerable height, and therefore it will be easy to understand that the prospect obtained from the very top of it was extensive indeed.

Jonathan Wild could not feel quite certain that none of his pursuers were at hand, and therefore at every loophole he paused and looked scrutinisingly across the face of the country.

But all presented a delightfully quiet and calm appearance.

The fields, and trees, and little streams of water looked beautiful as they were tinted with the golden light that beamed from the rising sun.

The contemplation of the scene would have afforded exquisite delight to almost anyone except the being who gazed upon it.

Turning to his companion, he said:

"I have good news for you. The officers are nowhere in sight."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure. I will take upon myself to say that no body of officers of any size is within a considerable distance of this spot."

Noakes gave a sigh of relief.

"I knew that would be good news for you," said Wild. "And now shall I tell you what will be your wisest course?"

"What?"

"To follow my example."

"What do you intend to do?"

"Look."

Jonathan Wild stretched himself out at full length on the floor of the little chamber, which was just long enough to allow him to do so.

"There," he said, "I am going to sleep now, and you can lie down and do the same if you think proper."

"I am not sleepy."

"Well, then, perhaps so much the better. I am, and will go to sleep soundly. You can keep watch, so as to give the alarm when any police officers are in sight. When you are tired, wake me, and I will take your place."

To this arrangement Noakes willingly enough gave his consent.

He could not make himself easy enough to go to sleep and leave no one to watch for the appearance of the officers.

And in this manner was the whole of the day passed.

Jonathan took his turn to keep watch while his companion slept, and when night again closed in both felt refreshed and much stronger for their rest.

"I am only short of one thing," said Wild, "and then I could make myself happy enough."

"And what's that?"

"Brandy. I must have brandy! It is that alone which keeps me alive and enables me to go through these adventures. Brandy—brandy! It is the elixir of life; and you will find that, should the time come when I am deprived of it and cannot obtain any, I shall die."

"Well," growled Noakes, "you may make your mind easy—there's no brandy to be had here, so I would advise you to trouble your head no more about it."

CHAPTER DCXIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES WATCH THE MOVEMENTS OF THE APPARITION.

A STRANGE expression at this moment came over Jonathan Wild's face.

And this was the only notice which he took of his companion's speech.

It was evident, however, that by degrees Mr. Noakes was plucking up a spirit, and there seemed every probability that, in the future, Jonathan would have more trouble in controlling him than he had hitherto.

The darkness continued to increase as night fairly came.

Then, in the east, could be seen a faint silvery light, proclaiming the rising of the moon.

"Shall you set out upon an expedition to-night?" asked Noakes, after a pause.

"Why?"

"I merely asked the question."

"Are you ready and willing to go?"

"Yes, quite."

"Then I am not."

"Not?"

"No. I don't intend to quit this place until——"

"Until when?"

"Until I have discovered what was the meaning of the appearance we saw last night."

"I expected that."

"And well you might. It would be absolute madness to think of taking our departure until we were acquainted with all the mysteries of this place. That is one of them—and one, too, that I am determined to clear up."

"And—and——"

"What?"

"If it should be a spectre—some supernatural being—some disembodied spirit?"

"Aha!"

"Why do you laugh?"

"At the idea of such a thing. Do you believe in them?"

"Do you disbelieve in them?"

Wild did not answer this question. He said:

"If there are such things as spectres, and this is one of them, I will face it to-night. If it harms me, well and good; if not, we shall be safe—perfectly safe."

"Why so?"

"Because, while a ghost pays visits to this mill, none of the villagers will have the courage to approach it."

This was very good reasoning on Wild's part, and so Mr. Noakes thought, though he did not admit it.

He was amazed at his companion's boldness and resolution.

When the moon rose, Wild stationed himself at one of the little loopholes, and bade his companion do the same.

"Now, then, keep watch," he said; "use your eyes well, and the moment you see the figure appear let me know."

They watched for a long time, but without any result.

At length, however, there came upon the silent air a faint, far-off sound.

Some village clock was striking, and the sounds were carried by the wind in the direction of the mill.

Jonathan counted the strokes.

"It is midnight," he said, "the church clock has just struck."

"Look—look!" cried Noakes, at the same instant. "It is there!"

Jonathan did look, and in the distance he perceived the singular white figure.

He recognised it instantly.

Over the meadows it swept, just as before, appearing to glide through the hedges as though it possessed no materiality.

But that might be only a visual delusion.

Wild thought so, when he remembered the easy manner in which the disappearance through the doorway was accounted for.

His heart beat painfully, and his breath came thick and fast—but he was more excited than terrified.

Without deviating in the least degree from a straight line, and without either accelerating or retarding its speed, the spectre approached the mill.

When at no great distance from it, Jonathan touched his companion on the arm.

"Now," he said—"now is the time! Come!"

Noakes trembled.

But some portion of Wild's boldness seemed to reflect itself—so to speak—upon him.

He experienced also a great amount of curiosity.

"Be careful to tread noiselessly!" added Wild—"make no sound if you value your life!"

With these words, he lowered himself from the upper chamber in the mill.

As before, he lowered himself by the aid of the machinery, nor did he pause until he reached a spot at some height from the floor of the mill, and yet from which he could obtain a clear and uninterrupted view of the doorway.

The moon was shining in with even more precision than on the preceding night, and over the threshold of the door was a square patch of bright light.

"Hush!" said Wild, in a faint whisper—"hush!"

"I am still!" was the whispered reply.

"You see where the moonlight falls upon the flooring, revealing it so distinctly?"

"I do."

"Then observe that spot attentively. When the figure appears we shall be able to have a good look at it."

Both judged it imprudent to say more, and therefore they remained silent.

It was well they did so, for almost immediately afterwards the spectre appeared at the doorway.

As on the previous occasion, it paused on the little square landing-place, turning its back to the mill, and looking afar over the country, as one would think, in order to ascertain whether or not it was followed.

Then, apparently satisfied with the result of this observation, the figure turned slowly round.

It then faced the two men concealed in the mill.

But as the moon shone upon the back of the figure, it cast a deep shadow on the flooring, so that they were unable to perceive its countenance with any degree of distinctness.

The figure stepped forward about half a dozen paces, and then stopped.

It was now past the limit of the bright patch of light, but, by straining their eyes to the utmost, Wild and Noakes could both distinguish it.

The figure stood still.

Then a long, deep-drawn sigh made itself heard.

Noakes gave such a sudden and violent start when he heard it that he almost betrayed their hiding-place.

Jonathan continued to rivet his eyes upon it.

Then he saw the figure stoop down, and raise what seemed to be some heavy object.

What it was, Wild could not at first make out, though he understood a moment afterwards—not because he could see it, however, but because he remembered that the figure was pausing somewhere near the trap-door.

He believed it was the trap-door that had been raised.

All doubt upon this point was quickly set at rest.

The figure, after assuming something like a listening attitude, gradually lowered itself down until it disappeared entirely.

It should be stated that all these proceedings we unaccompanied by any kind of noise—indeed, up to the present moment everything that had occurred was confirmatory of the idea that it was some supernatural visitant to the mill.

Was it the unquiet spirit of the girl who had been so barbarously murdered there?

The figure, so far as Wild could tell, came over the field from the direction of the cottage in which the murdered girl dwelt.

It had ascended the steps by means of which alone admission to the mill could be gained.

With his own eyes he had seen it stoop and raise the trap-door—that trap-door through which, according to the confession of the murderer, her body had been cast, that trap-door leading to the foundation of the mill from which her corpse had been recovered.

Certainly all these things pointed to one conclusion, and they were almost enough to convince anyone.

But Wild was not content to let the matter rest there. He had seen so much in safety, and why should he not see more?

He pulled the skirt of Noakes's coat.

"What is it?"

"Descend."

Jonathan did not wait to give his companion the opportunity of disputing this command, but immediately lowered himself by the aid of the machinery.

For an instant Noakes hesitated.

He had two evils to choose between.

It was quite in opposition to his inclinations to follow Wild; it was also quite as repugnant to his feelings to remain where he was.

There was much—very much—in having the society and companionship of a man like Wild.

Certainly up to the present moment Jonathan had behaved with great courage, and his manner was well calculated to inspire confidence.

Therefore, after a brief hesitation, Mr. Noakes gently let himself down.

When his feet touched the floor he found Wild standing close to him.

"Come," he said. "I thought you meant to be an hour! Come carefully!"

Stepping on tiptoe, Wild made his way towards the trap-door.

Noakes followed in his footsteps.

In a little while they reached it.

Wild looked down.

He then became aware of one strange and singular fact.

After having raised the trap-door and made a partial examination of the place beneath, as we have already described, Jonathan Wild closed the trap-door again, leaving the floor of the mill just in the same condition as he had found it.

It was, therefore, with a start that he discovered the trap-door was lying wide open.

From this moment his courage increased.

Gently he knelt down.

Then lowering his head down the aperture he looked around him, or rather we should say, he tried to look, for he found nothing but the darkness of the tomb surrounding him.

The silence, too, was quite unbroken.

He remained in this position for at least a minute.

Then, in a very faint whisper, he said to his companion: "Follow me."

As he spoke he changed his position slightly, and lowered himself through the trap-door.

He seized fast hold of the edge of the flooring, and lowered himself until the full extent of his arms was reached.

Then he found his feet just touched the ground beneath.

He let go then, and stepped aside.

Noakes followed with the same caution, and with the same silence.

Then they stood side by side immovable, both straining their eyes and ears.

At length, Jonathan Wild perceived in one direction the faint glimmering of a light.

Confident of making some strange discovery now, he carefully stepped forward.

From his previous inspection of the place, he knew that the flooring—if we may so call it—was very uneven, and covered with many obstacles.

The least sound in that silent place would betray their presence.

In spite of the difficulties of such an undertaking, Wild and Noakes by making use of all the caution they could, managed to push forward for a considerable distance without a sound.

As they advanced, the light they had first beheld grew stronger and stronger, though, nevertheless, it was still very dim and faint.

There could be no doubt about its presence now though, as there was at first.

Presently they came in sight of a small square opening in the flooring, such as would be produced by the removal of a trap-door.

It was from this square open space that the dim light ascended.

Redoubling their caution, the two villains crept forward.

To ensure greater silence, they stooped down and crept forward on their hands and feet.

By this mode of progression, the edge of the square opening was reached.

They glanced down it, first cautiously, for they could not tell whether they might not be immediately discovered.

But this fear soon vanished.

In a little while after, they ventured to creep still closer, and then to look down through the trap-door, by lowering their heads into the abyss beneath them.

They gave one hurried glance around, and then their gaze became riveted and concentrated upon one object.

It was indeed a singular scene which they beheld, and for several moments both remained perfectly immovable, gazing upon it.

CHAPTER DCXIV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES MAKE A STRANGE BUT PROFITABLE DISCOVERY IN THE OLD MILL.

It was a strange, irregular, cavernous-like place into which they looked.

The sides and ground were composed of clay, hammered hard and flat.

Its dimensions were limited, and the roof was rudely vaulted.

At the farther extremity was seated a man on the ground.

Beside him was burning a small piece of candle, which gave out a very feeble light.

Near him was a mass of something white.

By the aid of the candle, they saw that this man presented many appearances of extreme old age.

He was tall and very thin.

His face, upon which the light of the candle seemed to shine with greater distinctness than any other object, was perfectly white in colour—so white as to be painful and disagreeable to look upon.

But it was the manner in which this man was occupied that absorbed so much the attention of Wild and Noakes.

Well might their gaze be fixed upon him.

Well might their eyes burn brightly and avariciously.

On the ground was a pile of glittering gold coins—how many, it was hard to say.

The old man was intently occupied in counting them one by one, weighing each piece in his hand carefully, and looking at it wistfully and half affectionately.

Then he would consign it to a small bag he held in one hand.

And so he proceeded, being entirely wrapped up in his occupation.

At length the bag was full, and then, using much gentleness and care, he secured it at the mouth, tying the string tightly in a knot.

Then he placed this bag along with several others.

Oh, how delighted Noakes was when he saw this sight!

He looked upon every bit of the treasure as his own.

With so much wealth, Jonathan would no longer hesitate about leaving England; then he would be at rest.

They watched the old man for a long time, until almost all the gold had been counted over.

In perfect silence the old man continued his occupation, and but for an occasional chink of one coin against another, they might have believed that all they saw was a mere phantasm.

But slowly and silently Jonathan Wild raised himself up.

With perfect noiselessness he swung his feet over the edge of the trap-door, and lowered himself.

The distance to the ground was so short that he could touch it without letting go, and therefore he reached the vault without the old man at the further end being aware of the presence of an intruder.

The sight of the glittering gold had a marvellous effect upon Mr. Noakes's courage.

Without waiting for any signal from his companion, he followed him quickly, and stood by his side.

Wild smiled grimly, and then crept forward like a tiger.

But something or other at this moment made the old man sensible that he was not alone.

He turned round.

When he beheld two men of such a ferocious aspect as Wild and Noakes, he uttered a loud scream.

"Lost—lost!" he cried—"all is lost—lost! The gold I have so toiled for will be wrested from me! But not without a struggle—not without a struggle!"

Uttering these words, he precipitated himself upon Wild and Noakes, and a desperate encounter immediately ensued.

Mr. Noakes was quite as barbarous a villain as Jonathan Wild; the only difference was, that one had more boldness than the other.

On this occasion, however, the ex-Governor seemed quite changed.

With great ferocity he drew a clasp-knife from his pocket, and stabbed the old man repeatedly with it.

It was wonderful to see how the miser withstood so many blows.

All at once, however, his strength forsook him, and he fell down upon the floor of the vault, quite dead.

Jonathan looked at his companion in surprise.

"You have found your courage," he ejaculated. "But you have been rather too hasty."

"How so?"

"I meant to have extracted some information from him. But, however, it doesn't signify—it's of little importance."

"Is he dead?"

"Yes, quite, I think."

"Then come on—let us count this gold."

For once in his life, Mr. Noakes led the way.

"You see," cried Jonathan, "what sort of a pass things would come to if you had your own way."

"What do you mean?"

"If you had the direction of affairs."

"How so?"

"Why, last night, when we saw that ghost, as you thought it, you were anxious to be gone, and, but for my resolute manner, you would never have come near this place again."

"Well, say no more about that now; I am glad things have turned out as they have."

"But it is worth while to refer to it," continued Wild. "Bear it in mind, and on another occasion be guided by me."

"I fancy you guessed what was the meaning of this mysterious appearance."

"Perhaps I did."

As he spoke, Jonathan Wild stooped down and picked up a large white sheet.

"It is easy enough to play the ghost," he said, as he wound it round him. "A little whitening on my face, and then I should look quite like a character."

"It was a good notion, was it not?" asked Noakes, as he untied one of the bags and began to count the coin it contained.

"You mean to personate the ghost?"

"Yes."

"Well, it has ended badly for the old miser, for such he undoubtedly was."

"Well for us."

"Truly, as you say, well for us."

"Help me to count this gold."

"It's a pleasant task, and I don't mind assisting you."

Jonathan then seated himself beside his companion and for several minutes not another word was said.

Both were occupied in counting.

They found there was a hole in the flooring of the vault over which a plank fitted, and on the top of this plank the miser was in the habit of placing earth, and patting it down so that the existence of the hiding-place would never be suspected by anyone.

One by one the bags were reached out from it and counted over.

Each little bag contained fifty guineas, and there were twenty-one bags, so that by this stroke of good luck the two villains found themselves in possession of more than a thousand pounds.

"A few more such lucky strokes as this," said Wild, as he placed the board over the hiding-place—"a few more such strokes, and our purpose will be achieved."

"A few more?" said Noakes. "Is not this sufficient?"

"Can you ask such a question? A thousand pounds—why, what is it?—a mere nothing. I tell you," he added, gnashing his teeth together, "that I had nearly twenty-five thousand pounds deposited in the bank."

"But you cannot hope to obtain so much as that again."

"No, no, I am well aware of that; but still, we are here and in safety; we have made a good beginning, and to add to our store will be easy enough. I will be content when we have managed to get together something like eight or ten thousand pounds. That will keep us both comfortable in some foreign land."

Noakes shook his head and groaned.

"Go with this," he said, "and be content! I know it—I feel sure of it—you will wait until the time for going has passed by; you will wish then that you had taken my advice!"

"Stop!" said Wild—"not another word more in that strain! I will not listen!"

"But how do you intend to proceed?"

"As I told you, the gold we have just become possessed of will be safe enough in its old hiding-place. We will leave the vault, and shut down the trap-door. When we have obtained any more booty, we will add it to that which is here; and, as I have promised, when we have got a sufficient amount we will set sail."

"You will never have enough!"

"I have mentioned the amount, and what is it? If fortune favours us we may obtain what I require in a week or a fortnight at the most; then another week will see us in safety. Come, leave this place now—I cannot bear to stay in it—it sickens me—it smells of blood!"

To reach the trap-door, Jonathan had to step over the body of the miser.

He had shrunk from doing this, and only accomplished it by closing his eyes.

As soon as he had passed through the opening, however, his courage revived.

"Now, Noakes," he exclaimed, "are you coming? You had better make haste while you have the chance, or damme if I don't shut the door down and starve you to death—you will have enough of your gold then!"

Evidently Mr. Noakes thought this a threat not to be despised.

He knew the disposition of his companion well, and was fully sensible how unwise it was to aggravate him, so, with great alacrity, he scrambled out of the opening.

But Jonathan Wild paused, and exclaimed:

"Wait a moment—I must reflect!"

"About what?"

"Several things. In the first place, there's that old man."

"What of him?"

"I don't suppose it is known that he was in the habit of personating a ghost on the occasion of his visits to the mill, nor do I suppose it ever will be known; but his absence will be noticed."

Noakes started.

"True!" he said. "In my excitement I did not think of that, nor of the consequences that would probably arise from it."

"Nor I, until this moment. Who he is, of course we know not; but that he resided somewhere near at hand we may safely conclude."

"And—and—"

"What?"

"What steps do you think would be taken when his disappearance is discovered?"

"That is hard to say."

"Will you listen to my advice?"

"Certainly!"

"Well, then, let us quit this place at once. That will put an end to the difficulty."

"Not so," said Jonathan—"not so! I fully and entirely believe that this old mill will form a place of refuge for us for some time to come—that is, if we are only careful."

"I thought so too. But if they search for the old man—"

"Yes, that's just the difficulty."

"What shall you do, then?"

"I am trying to think. As soon as ever the miser's disappearance is discovered, the people will remember all about the appearance of the ghost at the mill. They will connect the two events together, and probably may come and search this place."

"As they did for the girl we heard about."

"Just so."

"The danger is great."

"I am inclined to think so, and yet it will not be so serious, after all. This old man may have lived entirely alone, and his disappearance will not be noticed for a long while."

"But suppose it should, what then?"

"I can think of nothing better than playing the ghost myself. I will undertake to scare away anyone who approaches this spot; and the more I think of it, the more I am inclined to think that this, after all, is the best thing to do."

"It is full of danger."

"Bah! You are always prating upon that one word! Let it be decided that, until we can think of something better, we will be the ghosts, and scare away intruders."

"As you will."

"Then—then—" stammered Wild.

"Then what?"

"Then you may as well descend into the vault again, and fetch the sheet that lies in yonder corner. I can't play the ghost without it."

Mr. Noakes regarded his companion doubtfully.

"Do you hear?" said Wild again. "Be quick and fetch it!"

"No—no; I'll be d—d if I do! Jonathan Wild, I know you pretty well, and I am obliged to keep a sharp eye on all your actions. No doubt it would suit you very well to get me down there on that pretext, and then you would close the trap-door and leave me to my fate! No, no, Jonathan Wild! If you want that sheet, you may fetch it yourself, for may I be d—d if I fetch it for you!"

CHAPTER DCXV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES ARE ALARMED AT HEARING AN APPROACHING FOOTSTEP.

MR. NOAKES folded his arms in a very resolute way as he spoke these words.

"You defy me, then?" said Jonathan, after a pause.

"I do defy you, if refusing to descend is defiance. I say again, if you want the sheet, fetch it!"

"And," replied Wild, with a hideous grin, "what guarantee have I that if I go down, you will not carry out that pleasant little idea of shutting down the trap-door?"

"It was you that first suggested it."

"I know I did—but I was only in jest."

"So was I."

"You shall repent this," said Wild. "I have borne with you so far; but I would advise you not to tempt me too much. I will show you how much contempt I feel for you and all you may do!"

As he spoke, Jonathan leaped down into the vault, and hastened to the corner where the sheet had been placed.

For a moment the idea that he might get rid of his hateful associate at once and for ever, by closing the trap-door, occurred to Mr. Noakes; but his previous attempts upon Wild had been failures, and the recollection of this made him tremble and hesitate, until the chance was lost.

It took Wild but a few seconds to obtain the article he required, and he soon scrambled through the trap-door again.

He had brought with him, besides the sheet, the small piece of candle.

He gave this to his companion, and then closed the trap-door.

He found it fitted perfectly into its place.

All round about was a quantity of loose rubbish.

From the appearance of this, it was evident that the miser was in the habit of covering it over the trap-door, thus making the chances of discovery less.

This Jonathan Wild proceeded to do.

Having completed all his arrangements in this respect, he returned to the other trap-door.

Having reached it, he judged it prudent to extinguish the light, and he did so.

He then drew himself up, and assisted his companion.

This trap-door was also closed silently.

"Brandy—brandy!" muttered Wild, as he rose to his full height. "I want more brandy, especially after this night's work."

"Hush!" said Noakes.

"What is it?"

"Hark! I thought I heard something."

Jonathan stopped and was on the alert instantly.

His keen ears then detected a faint creaking sound.

"It's only the wind," he whispered—"only the wind blowing against some of the loose timbers."

"No, no!" said Noakes.

Wild listened again.

He trembled a little and felt uneasy, for plainly enough he could distinguish a footstep.

It was a slow, heavy, and deliberate footstep.

Some one was ascending the wooden steps.

And this was the cause of the creaking which had first attracted Noakes's attention.

In great uncertainty and surprise, both villains waited to see what would next ensue.

But for a brief time we must leave them, and, in order that what follows may be fully understood, conduct the reader to the little public-house where Wild and Noakes had stopped.

On the preceding evening, as on that occasion, a number of people, mostly regular customers, were seated in the tap-room.

As before, the conversation turned upon the subject of ghosts.

"I tell you I've seen it!" said one—"I will swear to it upon the Bible any minute, I saw it!"

"When?"

"Why, to-night."

"But at what time?"

"About an hour ago."

"Are you sure, Stephen," asked one, "that your fancy did not deceive you?"

"My fancy? Aha! that's a good joke! The idea, now, of my fancy deceiving me!"

"But let us hear all about it!" said another. "I am getting sick and tired of this ghost talk! Nothing else is spoken of night after night; but I don't believe a single word of it!"

"Then," said the one who was called Giles, "don't you believe that I saw the ghost to-night?"

"No, I don't."

"Well, then, I tell you I have."

"Hear, hear! Order, order!" cried several voices.

"Let Giles tell what he has to say!"

"Well, I will, if you'll only listen."

"Go on, then."

"Well, when I was on the top of the hill just beyond, I happened to be thinking of Stubbs's mill, and so I turned round to have a look at it. You know you can see Stubbs's mill from the top of the hill, can you not?"

"Yes, yes!" said several voices in chorus.

"You can see it plain enough when it's a dark night; but it was not a dark night—it was a very light night: the moon was shining brighter than I ever saw it shine before—I could see everything."

"Well, well," said the one who disbelieved in ghosts, "just let us know what you did see."

"Well, then, as I tell you, I just turned my head, when, to my surprise and fear too—and I am not ashamed to say it—I saw a tall white figure go gliding over the meadow towards the mill."

"You saw that?"

"I did."

"Will you swear to it?"

"On the Bible, any minute."

"Don't interrupt," said another voice. "Go on, Giles!"

"Well, I have not got much more to say; but I saw the ghost go up the steps that lead to the door of the mill as plainly as I can see any of you now; and when it got to the top it entered, and I saw it no more."

The disbeliever looked puzzled.

"Well, Enoch," said one, addressing him, "what do you think of it now?"

"Why, I am just in the same mind as I was at first, for Giles has dreamt or fancied it, or else he has mistaken something for a ghost, which last I take it is most likely."

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD, DISGUISED, SET OUT IN QUEST OF JONATHAN WILD.]

"Well, would you like to watch for it to-morrow night and satisfy yourself?"

"I should not mind that, only I don't care about waiting so long—I am impatient. I want to settle the matter at once, so I'll tell you what I'll do."

"What—what?"

"You said you saw the ghost enter the mill, did you not?"

"Yes."

"Then probably the ghost is in there still."

"Most likely."

"Well, then, I will bet you all glasses of brandy round that I will go out, walk straight to the mill, up the steps, and into it; and to prove to you that I am as good as my word, I will bring away either a piece of wood, or a fragment of iron or stonework, which you will recognise as belonging to the machinery in the mill."

No. 134.—BLUESKIN.

"No—no, Enoch," cried several—"don't think of doing anything so foolish! You will live to repent it! It's tempting Providence!"

"Nothing of the kind!" said Enoch, boldly. "I don't believe there are any such things as ghosts, and if there are I am not afraid of them, and shouldn't be of a whole regiment. You can please yourselves whether you take my bet or not, but, if I come back without doing what I have said, I will pay for glasses round for all of you."

So saying, Enoch, who was a sturdy young ploughman, fixed his hat firmly on his head, and grasped his oaken cudgel with an air of resolution.

"And are you really going?" said several.

"I am. I don't intend to have all the village frightened by an old woman's tale."

"Well, then," cried the guests, "if you are going, we will go too."

"No you won't—at least, not along with me. I should have no chance of seeing the ghost then, for it's a very odd thing a ghost never appears to two people at once."

"But we should like to see you go, Enoch."

"Perhaps you wouldn't believe me without," was the reply, "and think this was all idle boasting? Well, to prove it is not, I'll tell you what I'll do."

"What?"

"You shall walk with me to the top of the hill, and there stop. I will then walk on by myself. You will be able to see me easy enough, for, look, the moon is shining bright enough now."

He pointed to the window as he spoke.

"Well, well—come on, then!" they all cried, as they finished their glasses.

They hurriedly left the inn, very much to the surprise of the landlord.

"Well—well," he cried, "no man ever had such a set of customers as I have! But no matter! They're gone, that's one comfort, and I'll be off to-bed. I will let them know they can't run in and out of my house when they think proper! Not a drop more does anybody get to-night!"

Accordingly, the landlord of the inn fastened the door in a somewhat ferocious manner.

He was very independent was that landlord.

But it was in consequence of a monopoly that he enjoyed.

There was not another public-house within six miles of where he dwelt, so that he was able to treat the people very much as he liked in consequence.

It is not with him, however, but with his customers that we have now to do.

With an easy, confident step, Enoch walked along the moonlit road, followed closely by an irregular throng of people, who seemed to borrow some courage from him.

Without accident, the top of the hill was reached.

Then Enoch, turning round, said:

"Stop—stop here, all of you. There lies the old mill. You can see it plainly. Stand here and watch me. You will see me go up the steps and inside. I sha'n't be a moment, then you will see how groundless all your superstitions are."

"We'll wait—we'll wait!" they cried.

And upon receiving this assurance, Enoch sprang lightly over the fence, and walked briskly towards the mill.

There was no hurry perceptible in his movements, nor was there a symptom of hanging back.

He walked on with a firm, confident air, as though he was quite at his ease.

His companions all held their breaths as they watched him cross the meadow.

He sprang over the low hedgerow dividing the fields, and was soon seen within a very short distance of the mill.

The excitement then reached its height.

So intense did it become, that the villagers, disregarding the injunctions which had been laid upon them, crept forward a few paces at a time after Enoch, and, rendered bold by their numbers, came quite close to the hedge that surrounded the field in which the mill stood.

Enoch never once looked behind him, so he was ignorant of this circumstance.

Bold as he was, he could not help feeling somewhat nervous and excited when he got near the building.

There was something strange and solemn about the old place, and the broken sails creaked dismally as they were shaken by the wind.

At no great distance on his right hand was a blackened, decayed stump.

He knew full well what it was.

It was the remains of the gibbet to which the murderer's body had been suspended.

He began to feel an oppression of his breast, and the blood seemed to circulate languidly through his veins when he placed his foot on the bottom step.

Just then he looked back, and saw that his companions were only about fifty yards behind him.

Angry that they should have disobeyed him and crept so close, he shook his stick threateningly at them.

They understood the gesture.

But he need not have troubled himself about the matter.

The villagers had already approached the mill as closely as their courage would let them.

Seeing them pause, Enoch was satisfied.

He turned round, and began to ascend the steps.

CHAPTER DCXVI.

ENOCH IS TERRIFIED BY THE APPEARANCE OF THE SPECTRE IN THE HAUNTED MILL.

BREATHLESS, the villagers watched him, marvelling how he could have the courage to venture into such a place alone.

Although there were many singular sensations in his breast—sensations which he had never before felt—Enoch, assuming all the fortitude he could, went boldly on until he stood on the little landing-place.

Just then a faint, smothered groan struck upon his ears.

It was distinctly audible, and he could not take refuge in the thought that his own fancy had deceived him.

"I am growing terrified at nothing," he muttered. "Such a thing as that could easily be produced by the wind rushing through some narrow space."

In spite of his philosophy, however, Enoch's cheeks were bloodless.

With a very slow, hesitating step, he crossed the threshold of the mill.

He glanced apprehensively from side to side.

The moon was shining in with full force.

It illuminated in a peculiar manner the rusty and dilapidated machinery.

Shaking off to some extent the kind of nightmare which weighed upon his movements, Enoch strode forward with the intention of carrying back to his companions some object which he could exhibit as a trophy of his success.

But for the second time he heard that dismal groaning sound.

He stopped.

Had his life depended upon it, he could not have moved a single limb.

His heart knocked violently against his ribs, almost suffocating him.

Then suddenly there glided out into the patch of moonlight that lay upon the floor of the mill a horrible-looking figure.

It was clothed from head to foot in some white, flowing garment, which looked like a winding-sheet.

The face was ghastly white, and streaked with blood.

On the winding sheet, also, were spots of the same sanguine hue.

Enoch felt all his joints stiffen with horror.

All his scepticism was gone.

He would have given the world and all it contained for the power to then and there turn round and fly.

But a dreadful kind of fascination compelled him to keep his eyes riveted upon the spectre.

He tried to call aloud for help.

He knew that his companions were at no great distance, and that, if he raised his voice, they would surely hear him.

But he could not move his lips in the least, nor could he give utterance to so much as a faint whisper.

How long he stood gazing on the horrible apparition before him he knew not; probably only for a few seconds, though to him it seemed an age.

Then the finishing stroke was put to his terror.

Slowly and with apparent difficulty, the spectre raised one arm, and pointed to him with threatening gesture.

At the same time the dismal, smothered groan again smote upon his ears.

Either the movement or the sound broke the spell that had frozen his faculties.

Uttering a loud yell of fear, which awakened a thousand echoes in the old mill, Enoch turned round, and rushed blindly out at the door.

In his terror he was either careless or forgetful of the fact that a steep flight of steps had to be descended.

He rushed forward, and then rolled down until he reached the ground with a crash.

Then, scrambling to his feet, and uttering cries of fear, he ran at full speed across the meadow, endeavouring to overtake his companions.

But this was quite in vain.

At the first note of alarm—at the first intimation that something was amiss—what little courage the villagers possessed evaporated.

With common consent they turned round, and ran towards the highway at a breakneck rate.

Enoch ran after them, screaming and shouting like one possessed.

Away they went up the hill, along the highway, until finally they arrived in front of the public-house.

The doors and shutters were closed, and from none of the windows beamed forth a light.

The landlord and his household had retired to rest.

They hammered loudly for admittance.

Never before in the whole course of their lives had they felt so much in need of some powerful and artificial stimulant.

While they were thus engaged, Enoch reached them.

He was gasping for breath, and seemed as though about to sink to the ground.

"What have you seen, Enoch—what have you seen?"

He made several frantic gestures.

"Tell us—tell us!" they shouted.

Their alarm increased by his mysterious behaviour.

"Do you believe in ghosts now?"

He nodded his head quickly, and then managed to gasp out:

"I have seen one!"

At this declaration, although they fully expected it, the villagers drew back.

Then the landlord, hearing the disturbance, appeared at one of the upper windows, and demanded to know what was amiss.

"Let us in," they cried—"let us in! We are terrified to death! The old mill is haunted, and Enoch has seen the ghost!"

The landlord's first impulse was to shut down the window and return to rest.

But other considerations prompted him to change his resolution.

Not the least of them was a powerful curiosity to know what had happened, and what Enoch had seen.

He knew him to be a man of greater courage than his neighbours, and one not at all likely to yield himself up to superstitious influences.

If he heard Enoch himself say that he had seen a ghost, he should no longer doubt the existence of one.

Moreover, after such terror as that, no inconsiderable quantity of strong liquors would be imbibed.

Therefore, hastily slipping on his apparel, he descended the stairs and allowed the villagers to enter.

At first he found himself entirely occupied in attending to the wants of his numerous guests; but when each had a glass of something hot and strong before him, he sat down near the fire and anxiously demanded an explanation.

By this time his customers had also to some degree recovered their composure.

But Enoch sat by himself, trembling and shaking as though suffering from an ague.

His lips moved convulsively, and his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets.

Then, in compliance with their demands, he gave them a clear though somewhat exaggerated statement of all he had seen.

He was questioned closely as to the sex of the ghostly visitant, but about this he could form no definite opinion.

"We shall hear more of this," said the landlord; "this is only the beginning. Who can tell? Perhaps some other deed of blood has been perpetrated in the mill!"

This was a supposition that found a home in the breast of every one of his auditors.

"We'll search the mill," they said—"we will certainly search it to-morrow; we will call in the aid of the magistrates, as they did when they found the body of Polly Powell!"

The discussion was continued for a considerable length of time, but without the elucidation of any fresh fact.

It was, however, finally resolved upon that the whole body there assembled, the landlord and Enoch included, should wait upon the magistrates and request a warrant to be issued, and a special force organised to search the mill thoroughly in every part.

It was nearly morning when they separated, and then in a few moments the tidings spread all over the village.

Faithful to their intention, they waited upon the magistrates.

Enoch having by this time recovered from his alarm, gave so plain and circumstantial an account of what he had beheld, that it was scarcely possible to believe that he had been deluded by his fancy.

Moreover, there was the former case, which served as a kind of precedent.

The magistrates, like the rest, thought it not unlikely that a murderous crime had been committed in the old mill, and made the inquiry whether anyone was missing.

In a small community like that the absence of one was quickly noted.

No one had disappeared, and the answer was given accordingly.

"We will wait for three days," said the magistrates. "If by the end of that time we find any person is absent, and if, in the meanwhile, the spectre is seen again, we will have the mill thoroughly searched from the roof to its foundations."

With this assurance the villagers left them.

But there was no work done by any of them, and in a little while the excitement had reached its highest possible pitch.

But for the present we will leave the villagers to talk over these mysterious events, and wait with impatience for the three days to elapse, while we return to the proceedings of Jonathan Wild and his companion.

CHAPTER DCXVII.

JONATHAN WILD, FOR ONCE IN HIS LIFE, PAYS ATTENTION TO THE ADVICE OF MR. NOAKES.

WHEN we last left those two worthies, it was, as will doubtless be remembered, when they were filled with alarm by hearing an approaching footstep.

They had stopped in doubt, and, straining their ears, had distinctly heard a heavy footstep ascending the flight of wooden steps.

This was Enoch.

Jonathan Wild, by a species of intuition, was able to give a very shrewd guess as to the actual state of affairs.

Such being the state of affairs, it did not take him a second to resolve upon a certain plan of operations.

He still held the miser's sheet in his arms, and now he wrapped it carefully around him.

It was stained with blood in many places, which had flowed from the wounds of its late owner, but this made it all the better for Jonathan's purpose.

In climbing up through the trap-door, Jonathan had scratched one of his fingers rather severely.

From this trifling wound blood flowed profusely, and he wiped his hands repeatedly over his face, thus imparting to it the terrible appearance which so alarmed the intruder.

Then, as we have already stated, Jonathan glided out into the moonlight, having first given utterance to those two dismal groans.

He was amply satisfied with the result of this experiment.

He witnessed the alarm of Enoch with great glee, and when he heard him fall with so much violence from the top of the stairs to the bottom he could have screamed aloud with laughter.

Prudence, however, restrained him, and he was silent.

He crept cautiously, however, to the door of the mill, and so did Mr. Noakes.

Then they peeped forth, taking care to do so in such a manner that there was no fear of their being seen by those without.

"Have I not managed this business well?" said Wild, in a triumphant voice, as he divested himself of the white sheet. "It will be a long while before those yokels recover from the fright which this has given them."

"I hope it will, Mr. Wild."

"There is no need to hope—it is certain to have that effect; I am confident of it."

"But I was afraid—"

"You always are afraid."

"I say," continued Mr. Noakes, "that I was afraid the result of such a course would be to raise such a general alarm as to cause the mill to be searched, then, doubtless we should be discovered, and the treasure as well."

"Always croaking evil!"

"I am, if you call that doing so."

"What do you call it?"

"Being prepared for the worst."

"Why, let the worst come!" said Wild. "I care not!"
 "But think now," continued Mr. Noakes—"have you done wisely?"

"Do you mean in frightening those fellows?"

"Yes; not only in that, but also in leaving the treasure where it is?"

"In what other place should you like it to be?"

"That I have not thought about at present. But do you remember the particulars of the story we heard at the inn?"

"Of course I do."

"Very well, then."

"To what do you refer?"

"To that part where the old man stated that, after seeing the spectre, the mill was searched."

"And you think that after what they have seen to-night the mill will be searched again?"

"It is quite possible, is it not, since it has been done before?"

"It is; but let them search—I care not!"

"But I do. Suppose we should be able to elude them, it is quite possible that they may be successful in discovering the trap-door."

"Which trap-door?"

"Not this one in the flooring—of course, the existence of that is already known."

"You mean the one below?"

"I do."

"I am not afraid that they will discover it."

"Yet they might do so."

"Well, let them."

"If they did, they would discover the body of the miser."

"Well, and what if they did?—they would not discover the treasure, would they?"

"I don't know."

"Is it not well secreted beneath those boards?"

"It is, I admit. But would not those who found the old man know his character as a miser?"

"In all probability, yes."

"Then, finding him in such a place as that, would they not be likely to search everywhere, under the belief that they should find some of his wealth hidden not far away?"

"Very true," said Wild, reflectively—"they might!"

"And if their attention was directed in that quarter," continued Noakes, "would they not be likely to discover the secret board?"

"I don't think they would."

"But let me ask you," said Noakes,—"do you consider the treasure safe? Answer me that question."

"It is, probably, as safe there as it could be anywhere."

"I do not agree with you."

"Where would you have it put?"

"I tell you I have not thought of that."

"No, you never do—you always raise up and make a host of difficulties, but never show the way out of them."

"I leave that to you."

"But if we secreted the gold anywhere else in the mill it would be just as likely to be discovered in the event of a search being made."

"Then why secrete it in the mill at all?"

"Because of the danger of going outside."

"It is trifling, I think. Why not avail yourself of the fright you have just given the villagers? Depend upon it, not one of them will think of coming within sight of this place to-night. Suppose, then, that we occupy our time in fetching the gold up and hiding it in the meadow? In the event of our wanting it at any future time, we should be able to obtain it much more easily."

"That's true again," said Wild; "and, for once in a way, I will give you credit for having thought of a good thing. Do you hear that, Noakes?"

"I do."

"Well, then, your arguments have, this time, had due weight with me. Come along—we'll fetch the treasure up and bury it in the meadow, as you suggest."

Jonathan Wild was obliged to confess that this was a very good arrangement, and he blamed himself exceedingly for not having thought of it before.

He would gladly have deprived his companion of the credit of suggesting the best course of action.

Mr. Noakes gladly enough followed Wild down into the foundations of the mill again, although he knew full well such a frightful sight awaited them in the vault.

But, as we have previously said, the desire to get out of England in the shortest possible space of time was the ruling passion at that time in Mr. Noakes's breast.

He would have shrunk at nothing, however desperate, provided he could have been sure beforehand that it would have the desired result.

Therefore, whatever fears he might have felt at venturing into the vault again where the body of his murdered victim lay, were kept in abeyance by this one powerful impulse.

They little thought when they took so many precautions to cover the trap-door over with rubbish, that they should so soon have occasion to raise it again.

But so it was.

Both of them trembled and shook, and turned pale when they entered the vault.

But it was only a momentary feeling, and quickly wore off.

They strode over the dead body, turned up the earth that covered the boards beneath where the treasure was concealed, and then loaded themselves with as many of the bags as they could conveniently carry.

These they placed for the present just outside the edge of the trap-door.

When, at length, every bag had been removed from its resting-place, they, with extreme delight, quitted the vault, and fastened down the trap-door.

Both inwardly determined that nothing should ever induce them to enter the dismal place.

The removal of the treasure to the ground floor of the mill was safely and speedily accomplished.

Then, going to the landing-place we have so frequently mentioned, they reconnoitred cautiously.

But not a single sign of any individual could they see.

Fully impressed with the belief that they had the place entirely to themselves, and that no eye could possibly observe their movements, they cautiously threw the bags out at the door one by one, causing them to fall in the deep shadow which the mill cast.

They then descended.

But out of this shadow they did not venture to go, yet they got as far away from the mill as they could.

"See here," said Wild. "In case we should ever forget, or be in doubt about the exact spot where this money is hidden, just notice this: A few moments since I heard the church clock strike two. The moon is now one day past the full at this hour. You see, she casts a shadow of the mill just as you now behold it. Just under the shadow of that singular roof we will dig a hole and bury the money."

"All right, Mr. Wild; but you need not feel afraid that I shall forget the whereabouts of this spot."

Jonathan then dug a deep hole in the ground, into which the bags were carefully placed, all but one, which they retained to serve their present necessities.

Every care was taken by Jonathan to restore the spot to its original appearance, so that no one should have the least suspicion that the ground had been disturbed.

CHAPTER DCXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES COMMIT A BURGLARY.

WHEN this task was completed to the satisfaction of both, they returned to the mill.

Here a long consultation was held.

"Brandy!" said Wild—"I must and will have brandy! I cannot live without it, and I will obtain some at all risks!"

"And food!" said Noakes. "We cannot remain here without food. It is true we had a good meal at the inn, but that's a many hours ago; and when are we to obtain another?"

"That I can't tell. Not to-night, I fear."

"But when?"

"To-morrow."

"And why not now?"

"Because the village will be thoroughly alarmed—everyone will be on the look-out. We must wait and do the best we can until to-morrow night, and then we must set out in good time, and obtain such a stock of provisions as will last us for several days."

To this Mr. Noakes was forced to consent.

If Jonathan thought it dangerous to make the attempt, it was not likely that he would have the courage to think of doing it himself, and so, discontentedly and miserably enough, the remainder of the night was passed.

During the whole of the next day, too, they were compelled to fast, and by evening were in truly a famishing condition.

The effects of long abstinence were visible in both of them.

Their courage also was wrought up to the highest pitch.

It was the courage that is felt by birds of prey when they have been deprived for a length of time of sustenance.

Jonathan had for so long been in the habit of keeping up his strength with stimulants that he suffered severely whenever he was deprived of them.

Eventually, however, to their great satisfaction, night came.

They waited until past the midnight hour, and then, taking advantage of the darkness, quitted the mill, and made their way over the fields, towards the village.

Although he had so much time to reflect, Jonathan had not decided upon any particular plan of operations, nor could he tell them exactly how the provisions he required were to be obtained.

Creeping cautiously on, they came, at length, opposite to the inn where they had previously taken up their quarters.

While they remained concealed behind the hedge looking at it they saw a throng of people emerge.

Then the doors were closed and fastened, and the lights extinguished.

According to his custom, the landlord had turned out his customers.

The subject of the ghost had been talked threadbare.

Moreover, he was anxious to make up for the rest he had lost on the preceding night.

As soon as the villagers were out of sight, Noakes said:

"What do you intend to do now?"

"I have just been thinking," was the reply.

"And what is the result?"

"I have almost made up my mind to wait here patiently a little while longer, until the inmates of the public-house have had time to get fairly to sleep."

"And then what?"

"To creep round to the back of the premises—make our way in, in the best way we can, and carry off provisions and brandy enough to last us."

"We cannot obtain brandy elsewhere."

"True enough!" growled Wild. "And as I can't do without it, that's why I have made up my mind to run the risk of entering the inn."

Mr. Noakes was rendered so desperate by the pangs of hunger that he raised not a single objection to the proposal thus made by his companion.

Indeed, he was impatient to make the attack; but Wild had the prudence to wait a reasonable time—until, in fact, all had gone to sleep.

He counted much upon the previous night's excitement, and believed that they would sleep all the more soundly in consequence.

At last, when nearly an hour had elapsed, he said:

"The time has come now, Noakes. Forward—and back me up in what I do!"

"Never fear—I will do that!"

Without another word, Jonathan jumped over the hedge, which was a very low one, and, crossing the road, speedily crept round to the back part of the inn.

Then, scaling a wall, he dropped down in a large yard.

Keeping under the shadow of the building, he crawled gently onwards.

He did not anticipate much trouble in carrying out his design.

In such a lonely place as that, burglars would not be common, and therefore he did not expect to find any of those precautions taken that would be in a town.

Coming presently to a window that was unprotected with a shutter, he paused.

Taking his knife out of his pocket, he determined to make the attempt to enter by this quarter.

The window was a small one, and of very primitive construction.

The blade of Wild's knife proved quite sufficient to undo the simple fastening, and then the window was open.

It was so small that it was not thought worth securing in any other way.

Wild crawled through the window hastily, and then, in a tone of great satisfaction, he said to his companion:

"Follow—come!"

Mr. Noakes did so, and then discovered that by great good luck they had managed to enter the place they most of all wished to reach.

This was the pantry, or larder.

On the shelves they saw plenty of provisions; but before going any farther they made a desperate onslaught upon them.

Then they packed up as much as they thought they could conveniently carry.

Only one more thing was required, and then their expedition was accomplished.

This was the brandy, and this Mr. Noakes was quite willing to forgo.

But not so Jonathan Wild.

That was to him more necessary than even food.

So, disregarding his companion's remonstrances, he forced open the pantry door.

He was then fairly inside the public-house.

A perfect silence reigned all around, showing that no alarm had as yet been given.

This inspired them with confidence, for if they only continued the same caution that they had hitherto observed, they would be able to retire without leaving a single clue behind them.

Jonathan prowled about until he discovered the door leading into the bar.

This was the place where the brandy would be found.

With great skill, considering how unprovided he was with the necessary tools, this door was forced open, scarcely any noise being made by the operation.

On a shelf they found a bottle about three-parts full of brandy.

Jonathan put it to his lips and allowed the liquid to gurgle down his throat at a terrible rate.

Then he handed it to his companion, who drank but sparingly.

Jonathan seized the bottle again, and this time did not take it from his lips until it was empty.

"Now," he said, "we must look elsewhere! Brandy I must and will have!"

There was a door in the bar, which, from its situation, Jonathan concluded led down to the cellar.

If this should prove a correct surmise, he would, doubtless, be able to find a small keg of his favourite liquor.

It was only necessary to turn the handle to open this door, and then the rush of cold air that blew upon his face sufficed to show him that his conjecture was correct.

They descended the steps, and, after what seemed to Mr. Noakes to be an unreasonably long time, a small barrel was found.

From its size and weight it evidently contained spirits, though whether it was brandy they had no means of telling.

It was something though that would do as a substitute, and therefore Jonathan was content.

By the same route as they had entered they made their way out of the building.

Jonathan carried the keg, and Mr. Noakes burdened himself with the provisions.

They had the good fortune to get back to the mill without the occurrence of any accident.

Jonathan was careful to look about him on all sides, and felt tolerably confident that he had not been seen by a single individual.

On their return, the two villains had a feast, and made up for the time they had been compelled to go without food.

The keg was rudely tapped, and, to Jonathan Wild's joy, he found that it really did contain brandy.

So assiduously did he devote himself to the spirits, that he dropped off at length in an insensible state, leaving Mr. Noakes to keep watch, which he did in fear and trembling.

He dreaded the morning to come, lest when the robbery was discovered they should be suspected.

He found it hard to resist going to sleep, and every now and then the silence would draw him off into a doze.

Then with a start he would awake, and for several minutes be a prey to such terror as was surely no inconsiderable punishment for the crimes he had committed.

Then, having assured himself that all was well, he would begin his task afresh, only for the same thing to be repeated.

And in this manner the night wore away.

Daylight came and found him exhausted.

Jonathan's drunken slumber still continued.

But when the sun fairly rose above the horizon, Mr. Noakes posted himself in such a position that he would be able to look in the direction of the inn.

There he remained fixed and immovable, dreading each moment to see something of the inhabitants of the village, for, ridiculously enough, he thought their suspicions would be directed towards the mill, and that they would come and search it.

CHAPTER DXXIX.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF THE OLD MISER IS DISCOVERED, AND THE MAGISTRATE AND PARTY RESOLVE TO EXPLORE THE OLD MILL.

GREAT indeed was the consternation when the landlord discovered that his house had been broken into and robbed.

He sent off at once for the village constable, and a series of alarming consultations were held.

For a time the excitement respecting the ghost at the mill was subdued.

But taking it altogether, the inhabitants of that village had never been so startled before as they had been during the past few days.

Everyone began to wonder what was coming next.

All the consultations, however, were quite fruitless—not a trace of the robbers could be found.

It was easy to see how they had entered, and, by going over the different articles, to ascertain what they had taken.

But beyond that, and the fact that they had got clear away, it was impossible to go.

The alarm was very great, because not even the oldest inhabitant could remember the occurrence of a similar event in the village.

Contrary to Mr. Noakes's fears, no suspicions were raised respecting the old mill.

Leaving them in their useless efforts to solve the mystery, we will return to Jonathan Wild.

It was late in the day when he awoke, and then feeling parched with thirst, he again applied himself to the brandy.

A great change in the weather had taken place.

The day was raw and chill, and in their exposed situation at the top of the mill, the cold was almost unendurable.

But Jonathan thought the brandy could defy it, so the whole of that day was spent in a drunken carouse, in which Mr. Noakes, forgetting his caution, at length joined.

They were soon overpowered by the quantity of liquor they drank, and while in this state of helplessness and heedlessness, danger was slowly but surely closing round about them.

Just on the outskirts of the little village there was a ruined, dilapidated house that was surrounded by a high brick wall.

In days gone by it had been the residence of the squire of the village, and had continued to be so until within the last thirty or forty years.

During that time the house had been shut up, the spacious grounds neglected, and the whole suffered to go to decay.

All the servants were dismissed, the shutters closed, and for why?

Because the last squire of the village, having no children, left the property to a younger brother.

This younger brother was of miserly, penurious habits, and after he had taken possession of his brother's property his parsimoniousness increased.

He could not think of supporting the expenses of such a large household as that was, and so by degrees the place degenerated into the condition it was at the time when Jonathan Wild took refuge in the mill.

For a long time this miser kept one domestic, a miserable, half-starved old man.

But at length this servitor died, and he could not think of replacing him by anyone else.

There was not much to do, and so he thought he might as well occupy himself as pay for others.

It was but rarely that the inhabitants of the village saw the old miser.

Still there was one place where he was in the habit of going to for the purpose of purchasing provisions.

It was but a little that he bought, and always the cheapest and commonest food that he could obtain.

It was his custom to visit this house daily.

There had been occasions, however, when one day had been missed.

He always came the next, and now the old woman who kept the shop noticed that for the first time for a long while the miser missed paying her his diurnal visit.

She made sure to see him the next morning.

But the day elapsed and he came not, nor did he arrive on the third morning.

The particulars respecting the ghost that had been seen by Enoch at the mill had reached the shopkeeper's ears, and so in a moment she connected the absence of the miser with it.

She hinted at this to several persons, and finally was taken before the magistrate, who judged the matter sufficiently important to demand immediate investigation.

Accordingly, about noon on the third day, instead of paying a visit to the mill, as he had intended, he went towards the miser's habitation, with the intent of searching that.

Several other officials who resided in the neighbourhood accompanied him, and so did the whole of the village as far as the old ruined gates.

These were fastened as well as they could be secured, considering their dilapidated state.

The magistrate rang several times for admission, but without any notice being taken of his appeal.

Then by his instructions the doors were forced open, and the party entered.

The scene which presented itself to their notice was truly one of the utmost desolation.

It was enough to make anyone's heart ache to see such a fair and beautiful place allowed to go to such decay.

The house was no better, and upon reaching the front door they again rang and knocked.

But nothing save the reverberation of the sound reached their ears.

Considering that their suspicions were now converted into certainties, the magistrate had the front door also broken down, and for the first time in his life he entered the miser's mansion.

Every part of it was thoroughly and carefully searched, but it was soon found that there was only one apartment which presented the least signs of having been recently inhabited.

All the others had evidently been closed for a length of time.

Scores of years must have elapsed since anyone crossed their thresholds.

The room which did appear to have been occupied was the kitchen.

In this, however, were only a few household articles, and among them was a bundle of damp, half-rotted straw which had served the miser for a bed.

The uninvited visitors found much to excite their curiosity and interest in the miser's abode.

But of the miser himself they could see nothing.

It was quite certain that he was not there.

No traces of violence could be discovered anywhere about the residence—everything seemed to be in its accustomed state.

In fine, the house looked just as though the miser had left it with the intention of returning in a short time.

The exploring party looked significantly into each other's countenances, and many whispered:

"Depend upon it, there has been some foul play here!" As there was nothing more to be found out, the magistrate and his companions left the house, securing it as well as they could, and bent their steps towards the old mill.

It was rather late in the day before they had paid their visit to the miser's house, and, as this had occupied a considerable length of time, the day was drawing to a close when they walked with rapid strides across the meadows.

We may safely say that there was not one who felt entirely at his ease when close to the ill-omened structure.

Many of the villagers seemed disposed to hang back, but, borrowing some courage from their numbers, they pressed on in the rear, so as to be in readiness to turn and fly should there be any occasion.

With a firm step, the magistrate led the way up the flight of rude steps, and when he paused upon the landing, several others placed themselves by his side, but the majority kept below.

"Now," said the magistrate, "this is a serious matter, and let us consider what we had better do."

"We will leave the direction of the whole affair to you," was the unanimous response.

The magistrate bowed, and then he said: "I fancy we cannot do better than begin at the bottom. We will completely search among the foundations of the mill, and so ascend until we reach the top."

This was immediately assented to, and so the speaker led the way into the building.

He found the interior very dark, however, and it was quite certain there was not light enough to enable them to conduct their search properly.

For the last half-hour or so, dense, heavy clouds had been spreading themselves all over the sky, so that the natural darkness was much intensified.

Just after the little party entered the mill, they were startled by a hollow, muttering, rumbling sound.

It was thunder.

Then the clouds discharged their contents, and rain poured down in a perfect deluge.

Then the lightning flashed, and the thunder increased in loudness.

"We must have lights," said the magistrate, as he walked towards the door—"we must have lights before we can conduct this investigation further. How foolish not to think of that before! Lights—lights, I say! Who will return to the village and fetch lights?"

Just then there came such a vivid flash of lightning that he was almost blinded.

It was followed by the loud crash of the thunder, which seemed to be only just above the roof of the mill.

The crowd outside the mill showed a disposition to retreat.

"Lights!" shouted the magistrate again, as he stood just within the doorway of the mill out of the rain—"lights, I say!—candles—torches—lanterns—anything! Who will fetch lights? Some of you must go at once!"

"I will go, sir!" said a voice, and a man set off at a rapid rate across the meadows.

No sooner did the others catch sight of his back than they were all impelled to show theirs also, and, crying out "Lights—lights!" they ran pell-mell across the fields in the direction of the village, leaving the magistrate and his party to await their return.

CHAPTER DCXX.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES ARE ALARMED AT THE APPROACH OF THE SEARCHING PARTY.

It was not until the return of the third day that Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes recovered from their drunken bout.

On that morning they were quite sober. Jonathan was the first to awake.

Seeing his companion lie sleeping, he dealt him a heavy kick, which caused Mr. Noakes to open his eyes at once.

"Curse you!" said Wild. "Is that the way you keep watch while I am asleep?"

Mr. Noakes rubbed his eyes, and looked puzzled.

"I hardly recollect," he said, "what happened last. I fancy we both drank just a little too much brandy."

"Pass the keg here, then," said Jonathan. "I must have a drop before I talk."

Mr. Noakes obeyed, and then anxiously reconnoitred from the holes they had made in the woodwork.

He could see no one, and therefore he became more assured.

"All is right," he said. "I can't see anyone."

"Then let us have something to eat."

The remainder of the provisions was then brought forward.

There was but a little left, and when divided into two portions, furnished but a scanty and insufficient meal for the pair of them.

When they had despatched it, Mr. Noakes said:

"Now, Mr. Wild, what do you intend to do next?"

"Don't bother!"

"But I desire to know. Do you intend to remain here?"

"I don't know."

"Because, if you do, I want to know where we are to obtain a second supply of provisions from."

"We will see about that."

"It is time now, for you have just devoured the last morsel."

Jonathan did not answer, but took another draught of brandy.

"You have not forgot what we arranged to do, have you?"

"No; to-night, Noakes, we will get our horses, and set out. We will try our luck once more on the road. The money we obtain we can place along with that we have so fortunately gained possession of."

"I shall be glad indeed to leave this place."

"Why?"

"Because we are in perpetual danger here."

"Bah!"

"I tell you we are!"

"No doubt—no doubt! You are always croaking about something!"

"But this is no croaking. Do you think the disappearance of the old miser will pass unnoticed, or that your personation of the ghost and the robbery at the inn will not create an immense excitement?"

"So much the better for us if they do."

"Not so."

"Why not?"

"Suppose——"

"Oh, d—n your suppose!"

"Suppose," continued Noakes, calmly, "that some clear-headed chap should connect the appearance at the mill with the robbery at the inn and the disappearance of the miser, how then?"

"Well, what of it?"

"Would they not be likely to come here and search this place?"

"Of course they would."

"And yet you would stay in it?"

"No longer than to-night."

"Well, then, that is all I desire to know. It is my belief it will be a very prudent step to take."

"Well, I am going to take it," said Jonathan. "What an infernal row you have made about nothing at all!"

"Don't drink so much brandy, Mr. Wild."

"You be d—d!"

"You will get yourself into the same state as you were yesterday, and then how will you leave here to-night?"

"Leave me to myself, and don't interfere."

Finding that his remarks produced more harm than good, Mr. Noakes became silent.

At intervals, however, the conversation would be resumed in a somewhat similar strain.

"Look here, Noakes," said Wild, at last; "can we not end this matter at once?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, this: as soon as ever it is dark enough to make it prudent, we will descend, mount our horses, and ride away."

"That's just what I desire."

"Then that is what I intend to do."

"My only fear is that they may take it into their heads to search the mill before we can depart."

"Bah! That is a foolish fear, like yours always are."

"Well, we shall see—we shall see."

Jonathan Wild had decided upon a serious enterprise, and he busied himself with preparing his weapons, and getting them in perfect readiness for use.

This task occupied him some time.

Mr. Noakes imitated his companion in this respect, but every now and then he would pause in his labour to take a peep out at the various loopholes.

While doing this, he noticed the angry storm-clouds when they appeared upon the edge of the distant horizon.

He watched them rising slowly and spreading over the sky.

Then an ejaculation of terror escaped his lips.

He dropped the pistol he held in his hand, and sank down into a dejected attitude.

"All is lost!" he said—"all is lost!—and it is your fault!"

"What do you mean, fool?"

"Look—look, and see!"

"Look be d—d!"

"I tell you you had better!"

"What is there to be seen?"

"A crowd of people!"

"A crowd of people?"

"Yes!"

Jonathan changed colour.

"And they are coming towards the mill!" added Mr. Noakes.

This was alarming news indeed; so Jonathan hastily scrambled to his feet and applied his eye to one of the openings.

One single glance, however, was sufficient to satisfy him that his companion had spoken the truth.

A large throng was certainly approaching.

He saw that the foremost were attired as gentlemen—that they were accompanied by the parish constable, who held his staff imposingly in his hand, and by a miscellaneous rout of villagers and children, who brought up the rear.

Jonathan Wild was greatly alarmed.

What to do he knew not.

Evidently, however, he must rely upon his own resources.

It would be quite useless to take his companion into consultation.

Mr. Noakes was completely prostrated by terror, and incapable of doing anything save obeying the orders of another.

To descend was Jonathan's first thought.

But then he reflected that he could not do this and better his condition.

To escape from the mill unseen was perfectly out of the question.

As the crowd approached, they could see plainly the only mode of egress from the building, and it would be madness to appear at that.

Jonathan began to wonder whether his capture was about to follow.

It seemed like it.

He was forced into a corner from which he could not emerge, and it was not likely that he could defend himself against such overwhelming numbers as were approaching.

But after having defeated the exertions of the most experienced police officers, was he in the end to be taken by a lot of clodhoppers?

He despised the idea.

"They shall pay for their attempt with their lives," he said. "They will not take me prisoner easily—I am sure of that. No, no—I will sell my life dearly!"

He got his pistols in readiness for instant use while he spoke, and sternly bade Mr. Noakes do the same.

Then he returned to the loophole, and saw that the throng of people had now paused within a few yards of the mill.

The magistrate and those who were with him ascended the steps.

They entered.

Jonathan observed the terrified expression that was upon the countenances of all who composed the crowd, and was aware of what a little thing would suffice to terrify and disperse them.

But what could that thing be?

Just while he was wondering, he heard the first muttering of the thunder.

Then the magistrate spoke in the manner we have recorded at the end of the preceding chapter.

Not a single word escaped Wild's ears.

He rubbed his hands with joy when he saw all the villagers scamper off.

He had now only about half a dozen men to cope with.

But these half-dozen men were more to be feared than all the others, and this Jonathan knew full well.

There was now no longer anything to be seen from the exterior of the mill.

The darkness in the air every moment increased.

The thunder rolled and the lightning flashed almost incessantly, each reverberation seeming to make the old mill toll to its foundations.

Stealthfully Jonathan crept forward to the open space which communicated with the lower part of the mill.

Here he paused and listened.

He made out that the party of gentlemen were standing half in and half out of the mill.

"I don't believe those fellows will return," he heard a voice say; "they are all scared out of their wits by this thunder-shower."

"It seems like it," said another voice.

"Then," continued the first speaker, "the question is, shall we continue our search now, or shall we postpone it until to-morrow?"

A pause ensued after this question was asked.

Can the reader imagine the amount of breathless suspense with which Jonathan Wild waited for the reply?

If it was decided to postpone the search, all his apprehensions would vanish.

As soon as they had departed, he could take his departure from the mill himself, and ride away, taking care not to return until the excitement had subsided.

What were they going to do?

He listened, and at last a voice spoke.

The words uttered sufficed to dash to the ground all the hopes in which he had indulged.

CHAPTER DCXXI.

JONATHAN WILD ESCAPES FROM THE MILL, AND HAS HIS REVENGE UPON THE SEARCHING PARTY.

"I SHOULD not hesitate for a single moment about the course to pursue," exclaimed the magistrate, "but for one circumstance."

"And what is that?"

"We are unprovided with a light. But for this, I would propose that we take advantage of such a favourable opportunity as the present to search the mill quietly and carefully. We shall not be disturbed by the crowding of the people inside, and we may take our own time over the business."

This was a view of the case which all seemed inclined to take, and then some one said:

"If you like to wait a minute or two, sir, I will run to the village—it is not far—and will bring with me everything you require in the shape of lights, so that the search can be well carried out."

"If you will do so, Mr. Donaldson," said the magistrate, "I shall consider myself much indebted to you."

"That is enough, sir. I am off."

"You will get wet."

"Oh, never mind; a shower of rain will not hurt me! In five minutes I will be back with some candles."

"And don't bring any of the villagers with you if you can help it."

"No, you may rely upon that."

"Let me see," said the magistrate, "there are just seven of us—quite enough to conduct an investigation of this sort."

"Quite."

Mr. Donaldson buttoned up his coat, and, hastening down the flight of steps, ran across the meadow at full speed towards the village.

He seemed to be absent a long time.

Jonathan breathed the most foul curses upon him.

He did not dare to give them utterance, lest he should be overheard.

While the messenger was absent the darkness increased.

The thunder rolled with tenfold loudness.

A complete silence, however, reigned on the part of the people who at that time stood beneath the roof of the old mill, which was not broken until the magistrate said:

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES MAKE A HASTY RETREAT.]

"There he comes."

This was in allusion to Mr. Donaldson, who could be seen hurrying through the rain at a rapid rate.

Directly afterwards he joined the party.

"You are soaking wet," said the magistrate.

"Yes, sir, I am; this is a regular drencher—but no matter. Here are some candles, and here's a flint and steel, so we shall soon have a light."

This was true.

When one candle was lighted, it was easy to light the remainder.

Jonathan Wild, looking down from above, could just see the lights below him like so many red specks.

"Now, gentlemen," said the magistrate, "with your permission, we will carry out my original intention No. 135.—BLUESKIN.

namely, to search among the foundations of this building."

"By all means, sir—by all means! We are quite ready and willing to allow you to take the direction of the affair, and to obey you in all respects."

"Then let us search this place thoroughly—no half measures, recollect. We will not ascend until we have satisfied ourselves that there is nothing below that should not be."

"Agreed—agreed!"

Jonathan allowed his hideous countenance to expand into a grin.

He saw at once how he might escape.

He listened, and heard the trap-door raised—that is, the trap-door in the flooring of the mill, about which no secret was made, and the existence of which was well-known.

He could not see them descend, but he knew they were about to do so, so he rose and went to his companion.

Mr. Noakes was sitting down in a stupified, dejected way.

"Get up, idiot!" said Wild, in tones of suppressed rage—"get up, will you?—dolt, fool!"

Mr. Noakes looked at him vacantly.

"Get up, I say!"

"Are they coming?"

"Coming? No. Get up, or, as sure as you refuse me, I will run you through—I will slay you on the spot! I intend to escape myself, and if you won't come with me I shall not leave you behind to peach. Do you hear that?"

A stronger fear will always overcome a weaker one, and so it was with Mr. Noakes.

The fear of present death from the hands of his ferocious companion was greater than that of capture from those below.

Therefore, trembling in every limb, he rose to his feet.

"Now then," said Wild, "the way is clear before us to escape. We can do so with perfect ease; all obstacles are removed."

Mr. Noakes looked at him incredulously, and then said:

"You are mad, or drunk."

"I am neither one nor the other. But I can't stay here chattering. While I am explaining matters to you, the chance of leaving the mill will be gone. I tell you the villagers, terrified by the storm, have run away, leaving only a small party here, who have descended into the foundations, intending to search there. They are down underneath. Do you understand? While they are there, there is nothing to prevent us leaving the mill, and the darkness will enable us to ride away unperceived."

These few rapidly-spoken words produced a wonderful change in Mr. Noakes.

He saw in an instant the chance there was of escape, and his courage revived.

"I will follow you," he said, in a calmer voice—"I will follow you—lead the way!"

"Good! Mind you do, and make no noise—the least sound will betray us."

"I will be careful enough. Now that we are so near leaving England, I don't wish to be slain or captured."

"Come, then!"

As cautiously as a snake, Jonathan Wild lowered himself through the opening in the floor; and having by this time grown tolerably familiar with the interior machinery of the mill, he was able to descend rapidly and yet noiselessly.

Mr. Noakes followed.

Gradually Jonathan made his way to the lower part of the mill, and as he got farther and farther down he redoubled his precautions.

All was profoundly dark—he could no longer see the glimmering of the candles.

He could no longer hear the murmuring of voices.

The storm, too, had reached its height, and was beginning to abate.

Directly afterwards the ground floor of the mill was reached.

Just as they were about to dart through the doorway, Wild stopped and seized his companion by the arm.

"Hush!—what's that?"

The sound of voices reached their ears, and they comprehended instantly from whence the sound came.

It was through the opening in the floor, for in descending they had not pulled the trap-door after them.

This suggested a fresh thought to Jonathan Wild.

Had his life depended upon it, he could not have restrained the wild, yelling, triumphant laugh which rose to his lips.

He did not make the attempt, however, but allowed it full vent.

It rung out with horrible distinctness and discordance in the old mill.

It awakened many an echo, and rose high above the tumult of the storm.

It was a sound that would paralyse anyone, and the party below, who were approaching the trap-door, stopped in consternation.

But while he laughed in this hideous fashion, Jonathan Wild was not idle.

Like a hungry panther he sprang forward, seized the trap-door, and shut it down.

Then, with a strength that was surely superhuman, and which was lent to him but for a moment, Jonathan Wild seized one of the millstones, dragged it violently from its place, and rolled it over the trap-door.

It fell with a crash that sounded like a death-knell to those below.

Then again, that horrible, ringing, mocking laugh echoed and re-echoed in the mill.

"Secure," said Wild—"secure! Now then, our escape is certain and easy!"

Mr. Noakes was paralysed with astonishment.

Again and again did Jonathan utter that screaming laugh.

He was delighted that at the last minute he should so unexpectedly gain such an advantage over his enemies.

"Come," said Noakes—"come, let us leave this place, now."

He took hold of Wild by the arm as he spoke.

"All right—all right," responded Jonathan; "there is no need for hurry, now they are safe; and if they don't perish of suffocation in that place before their fellows come to their aid, it will not be because I do not wish it!"

"Come," said Noakes, again—"come—be satisfied with your revenge!"

"I am—I will be."

With his heart swelling with exultation, Jonathan Wild hastily descended the steps, and sped across the meadow in search of the horses, which he hoped to find without delay.

CHAPTER DCXXII.

STEGGS ARRIVES AT THE INN JUST A LITTLE TOO LATE.

A KIND of mist floated before the eyes of Edgworth Bess when she found herself standing in the presence of the Lord Chancellor.

It did not dissipate until she heard Steggs mention her name.

"My lord," he said, "here is the lost heiress."

The Lord Chancellor looked up in surprise.

He noted the thin and wasted form, the poor apparel, the expression of woe upon his face.

"Can it be possible?"

"I am prepared to prove it, my lord!"

"Then there can be no doubt."

"None whatever!"

"I will take your word, then, for the present. Let me congratulate you," he added, rising and addressing himself to Edgworth Bess. "I heartily congratulate you, Lady Donnull, upon your accession to the property from which you have been so unjustly deprived!"

How strange it seemed to be addressed by that title.

She could not respond.

She bent her head in acquiescence.

"That will do, then, for to-night. Until further arrangements can be made, you will stay here. To-morrow, I shall inquire further into the affair."

For this kind offer of protection Edgworth Bess managed to stammer forth her thanks.

The Chancellor rang a bell, and confided Edgworth Bess to the care of the housekeeper.

"I could scarcely have believed this," said the Chancellor, as soon as the door closed behind her. "No one would take her to be an heiress."

"Very true, my lord. She has suffered much."

"She has that appearance."

"I know something of what she has gone through, but probably not one-half."

"Well, it is all over now. She may rest contented with regard to the future. To-morrow I shall want to see you, in order that the matter may be properly investigated."

"I will not fail to come, my lord."

With these words, Steggs took his departure.

On the following day, Edgworth Bess was again introduced into the presence of the Lord Chancellor.

He had before him all the necessary documents, including even the confession of Abel Donnull.

"You must understand," he said, "that there will be no opposition to your taking possession of your property. Providing you can make good your claim to it, there is no one to contend with. When your identity is once proved it will be sufficient."

He then questioned Edgworth Bess respecting her past life.

She answered him readily and truthfully, and these replies accorded perfectly with all the written memoranda he had before him.

In conclusion, he professed himself perfectly satisfied.

There was a wild, tumultuous joy in the poor girl's heart at having, she imagined, reached the end of her difficulties and troubles.

She would no longer have to fear the enmity of anyone.

But she was deeply anxious respecting her two protectors.

They had defended her when no one else would take her part, and she was conscious that but for them she must long ago have perished.

At the first opportunity, she took Steggs aside and spoke to him upon the subject that was nearest her heart.

"Tell me," she said—"tell me truly, have you heard anything of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard?"

"Nothing whatever."

"Alas—alas!"

"But, if you wish it, I will set forth at once and make inquiries for them."

"Do so—do so!"

"Can you give me any clue to them?"

"I fear not. But say, when will my power begin?"

"Your power?"

"Yes. When can I openly befriend them?"

"At present you must not think of such a thing—the greatest caution will be necessary!"

"But for what reason?"

"Wait until you are quite assured of your possession, and until I have discovered them. I will then be a means of communication between you."

"And what can I do then?"

"Ask the Chancellor to move for a free pardon."

"And could he obtain one?"

"It is very likely."

"Then there is a doubt about it?"

"No, not much of a doubt; but, for the present, let me advise you to dismiss this subject from your mind altogether."

"I cannot."

"Try to do so."

"It is impossible!"

"It would be better if you could for a little while rest content with the knowledge that you have recovered your possessions and now occupy your true station."

"I care nothing for that without I can aid those who have so long been my friends."

"At any rate, it will be best—nay, imperatively necessary, that I should find Blueskin and Jack, and learn from them what their intentions are."

"But can you find them?"

"I do not doubt it."

"Where shall you look?"

"I fear there is little but chance to guide me, yet I may succeed quickly. Don't be disappointed, however, if some time elapses."

Edgworth Bess clasped her hands over her forehead.

"Let me think," she said—"let me think! My brain is in such a whirl, and I am so excited by these events that I seem incapable of reflection! Wait a moment!"

Steggs did wait.

Then, presently removing her hands, she said:

"There is another commission I wish you to execute for me."

"Name it."

"Not long before my meeting with you I met a true, firm friend—the landlady of a public-house."

"And you wish me to go there?"

"Yes. Tell her that I am now safe and well."

"I will if you will describe the house."

Edgworth Bess did so as well as she was able.

"Do you think," asked Steggs, "that there is any probability of learning intelligence of Jack and Blueskin there?"

"None whatever, I fear."

"That's a pity; I thought this might be a connecting link."

"No—no; and yet I cannot tell."

"You think there is a possibility, then?"

"They may, in their pursuit, have tracked me to this inn; if so—"

"Why, then all will be well. This is most important! If you will allow me, I will start at once."

"Do—do, and you will increase the obligation I am already under to you. I am glad there is so good a chance of my being able to repay it."

"I will go to this inn, then, and make every inquiry. If I can learn anything of your friends I will mention the subject to the landlady, so that when they do call she will deliver a message to them."

"Yes—yes! I trust you will succeed."

"Leave it to me. Rely upon it, I will do the best I can."

"When shall I see you again?"

"If I have good news to communicate, very shortly. If some time elapses do not despair, but think that I am making every effort to pursue my inquiries."

"I will—I will!"

"Try, then, to rest content until you see me again; for the present, you will remain in this house. Several forms have to be gone through, and after that you will be placed in full and real possession of your own."

"And by that time," said Edgworth Bess, with sparkling eyes, "I hope you will be returned with good news."

"And so do I."

"It is pleasing to me to talk upon this subject, yet I wish you gone."

"I will start at once, and you may rely upon my energy and fidelity. Farewell!"

With these words Steggs took his leave, and directed his steps towards the inn.

Upon arriving, he found the landlady in her accustomed seat.

"I wish to speak with you," he said, "upon a matter of some importance."

"Come in!"

Steggs obeyed the invitation to enter the bar.

"A day or two ago," he began, "you afforded help and assistance to a young girl."

"Yes—yes, I did. What of her? She has come to no harm, I trust?"

"No, none; but to great good."

"I am glad to hear it."

"I have come here as a special messenger from her to you."

"On what account?"

"First to express her thanks for your kindness to her."

"It is not worth mentioning."

"She is of a different opinion, and one of these days intends to reward you liberally for all you have done."

"It was but a little."

"It was very much to her."

"And are you one of the friends of whom she spoke to me?"

"Very likely. I fortunately met her in the street and recognised her. I had long been looking for her, trusting to find her. Now all is well. You must know that her father was a lord, and that she is now the inheritor of all his wealth and property."

This announcement caused the landlady no little astonishment.

"Who would have thought it now?" she said—"quiet and unassuming as she was too!"

"But after having assured you of her safety," continued Steggs, "my chief object is to make some inquiries for two friends of hers."

"Two friends?"

"Yes, she thinks it not improbable that they may track her to this house, and if so, would enter to make inquiries. Should they do so, tell them all that I have said to you, and ask them to wait; I will call and satisfy them."

"Two friends, did you say?"

"Yes."

"One young and the other rather old?"

"Yes—yes! Is it possible that you have seen them—that you know them?"

"Well, I can't say for that," replied the landlady, "but a few hours ago two men came in and asked for her."

"And where are they now?"

"That is more than I can tell you."

"They have gone, then?"

"Yes; I told them the girl had left this house. The news seemed to fill them with grief and despair, then they both started off in search of her."

"Confusion!" said Steggs. "This will perhaps ruin all!"

The landlady looked at him in surprise.

"Did they not," he asked, at length, "say anything about their future movements?"

"No, I can't say that they did, though they told me they should very likely call again—if that's what you mean."

CHAPTER DCXXIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD HAVE AN IMPORTANT INTERVIEW WITH STEGGS.

"THEY told you they would call again?"

"Yes, certainly."

"But when?"

"They did not say when, sir."

"Describe them to me."

The landlady did so to the best of her ability.

What she said was quite sufficient to convince Steggs of their identity.

"And when was this?"

"Only a few hours ago."

"Then they are probably in the neighbourhood?"

"I can't say for that."

"Look you—pay attention to my instructions; you will find that it will answer your purpose well to do so."

"I will."

"I will go out myself; it is possible that I may come across them; if so, well and good. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly."

"But if, while I am away, they come again, tell them of my visit, and say it is my express desire that they wait here until I return. You will find them with an accommodation, will you not?"

"I will, sir."

"That will do, then. Upon no account suffer them to depart until I return, it will be useless for them to attempt to seek me."

Having fully impressed this upon the landlady's mind, Steggs took his departure.

He roamed listlessly through the streets for a long while, looking scrutinisingly in every direction.

But he failed to see anything of those he sought.

It is now time, however, that we reverted to the proceedings of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

We have lost sight of them for some time.

We last described them when they departed from the inn to commence their search for Edgworth Bess.

The events already related, of course, conclusively prove that this search was perfectly resultless.

They searched through every street they came to.

But without the slightest success.

Yet they did not like to confess themselves vanquished.

As they did not find Edgworth Bess, there can be little interest in relating their proceedings; let it suffice to say that it was not until they were thoroughly worn out and exhausted that they gave up the search.

A consultation was then held as to where they should go.

"I fancy we cannot do better than return to the inn," said Blueskin.

"It will be dangerous."

"Not very, I think."

"The landlady may have recognised you."

"I fancy not. Let us run the risk."

"As you will."

"Do not forget that it is probable Edgworth Bess—having failed to find us, as she must have done—has returned to the inn; if so, we shall meet her."

"That I fear is too much to hope for. No—no, I cannot buoy myself up with that hope."

"But now that I have once suggested the possibility of such a thing to you, you could not rest until you had satisfied yourself as to the truth of it."

"No, that I could not."

"Then follow me; a little sharp walking will bring us to the place. If we meet with no success, do not be downhearted."

"I will try not."

"At any rate, it is my conviction we should find there a more secure shelter than we could anywhere else in London."

This conversation took place on the night succeeding the day upon which Steggs had called at the inn.

Without being seen or noticed by anyone, the two friends arrived at their destination.

As soon as the landlady saw them, she smiled with satisfaction, and led them into the private room.

"You have come just in time," she said—"just in time, or, I should say, just too late."

"What do you mean?—has she been here?"

"No—no."

"Then why are we too late?"

"A friend of yours called not long ago."

"A friend?"

"Yes."

"How do you know he was a friend?"

"He said so."

"Well, go on—tell us more," said Blueskin.

Jack Sheppard was so excited that he could not speak. He dreaded that the poor girl had again fallen into some snare.

He could not remember that she had any other friend besides themselves.

"He was very much put about when I told him that you had been here and gone again. He wanted to see you."

"To see us?"

"Yes; I fancy he has some message for you from the young lady."

"Where is he?"

"He went out to search for you."

"To search for us?"

"Yes, and he has not yet returned."

Blueskin and Jack looked at each other with a puzzled kind of expression on their countenances.

"Describe this friend," they said.

The landlady did so.

But Steggs had so altered in his appearance, that they failed to recognise him.

They could not think who he was.

Their wonder increased.

"He particularly told me," added the landlady, "that if you called here before he returned, you were on no account to quit this house until he came again."

"Did he say that?"

"Yes, he did, and laid most particular stress upon it. He repeated the instructions over and over again."

"Well, we must think of this," said Blueskin. "Bring us some refreshment, and leave us for awhile—we must consult together."

The landlady obeyed, for her curiosity was much inflamed by the mysterious events of the last two or three days.

"What are we to think of this, Jack?" was Blueskin's first question as soon as they had the room to themselves.

"I know not what to think of it."

"Nor I."

"Do you apprehend any danger?"

"I do indeed!"

"And so do I. You have guessed my own thoughts in the matter. It is no friend of hers, poor girl! but some one who is endeavouring to pass himself off as such. Yet why should he wish to meet us?"

"That is it. I am afraid—nay, sure—that he has recognised us."

"So you fear the worst?"

"I do."

"What would be the consequences if he called the police officers about him, and surrounded the house?"

"Most serious indeed to us."

"Serious in good truth. Let us see what chance there is of escape."

They went to the window, and looked out.

They found it commanded a view of the river, which was divided from the back of the premises by a rude wooden fence.

"I think we should stand a chance of getting free," said Blueskin.

"So do I."
 "Then let us stay and see this matter out."
 "Is it wise to run the risk?"
 "I think so. It may, after all, be some one who has friendly intentions towards her and towards us; if so, it would be a pity to evade him."
 "So it would, but I am doubtful—very doubtful."
 "And well you may be."
 At this moment there came a knock at the door.
 The landlady entered.
 "He has come," she said, "and wants to see you."
 Blueskin and Jack exchanged glances.
 "Let him come in," said the former. "Tell him we are here."
 The landlady departed.
 As soon as she had gone, Blueskin said, in a whisper:
 "Now, then, if we find he meditates any treachery towards us, we will deal with him in a summary manner, and escape."
 "Right. Be careful!"
 "I will. Hush!"
 The door opened, and Steggs appeared.
 But he was not recognised by either.
 "I am glad I have succeeded in meeting with you," he ejaculated. "Believe me, all is well, and I have good news to communicate."
 The two friends regarded him distrustfully.
 "Is it possible," he said, "that you do not recognise me?"
 "Certainly not."
 "I know I have greatly altered, but I thought you might have remembered my voice."
 "It does sound familiar in my ears."
 "Perhaps the utterance of my name may refresh your recollection."
 "It may—speak!"
 "It is Steggs."
 "I recognise you now," said Blueskin. "I know you are a friend—your behaviour has proved it. Here is my hand."
 "I am glad you do not doubt me. Here, Jack," he added, "take my hand! I bear you no ill-will, although I suffered much from the hasty blow you gave me."
 Jack grasped him cordially by the hand.
 "It was a rash and foolish act," he said, "and one that I have repented of ever since."
 "Say nothing more about it—don't mention it again!"
 "And you have found Edgworth Bess?" said Blueskin, interrogatively.
 "I have."
 "And where is she?"
 "Safe and well."
 "But where?"
 "In the residence of the Lord Chancellor."
 This reply was so little anticipated by our two friends that they could not speak.
 "You seem astonished," said Steggs, "and well you may be; but it's perfectly true."
 "How came it about?"
 "Last night I accidentally met her in the street. The light of a lamp shining on her face enabled me to recognise her."
 "And did she know you?"
 "Not at first. She told me she left the inn in order to seek for you, but unluckily encountered Jonathan Wild's son, and had a narrow escape from him. She had eluded him by a hairbreadth when I met her."
 "And what did you do then?"
 "Why, as I had been on the look-out for her for a very long time, I took her direct to the residence of the Lord Chancellor."
 "And does he receive her?"
 "Oh, yes!"
 "And admit her claims?"
 "Yes. In his own mind he does not entertain the slightest doubt of her identity."
 "This is indeed glorious news," said Blueskin—"glorious news! What I have so long and so ardently desired has at length come to pass! She is in proper hands and is happy!"
 "Not very happy," said Steggs.
 "Why not? What cause has she now for grief?"
 "The uncertainty she is in with regard to your safety;

if she knew that you were out of danger she would be quite happy."

CHAPTER DCXXIV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD HOLD AN IMPORTANT INTERVIEW WITH STEGGS.

"THE one great purpose of our lives," said Blueskin, "is achieved."
 "What do you mean?"
 "The lost heiress is installed in her possessions. We had sworn to do it. let the danger be what it might. It is done, and now we are content!"
 "Well?"
 "As you say, it is well, for we can quickly put an end to the anxiety and unhappiness which Edgworth Bess may experience on our behalf."
 "Do so, then—do so, I beg! But how will it be accomplished?"
 "Why, as our presence here is unsuspected and unknown, nothing will be so easy as for us to leave England; in another land we shall be safe."
 "A wise resolution, and the best that you could take! When shall you depart?"
 "Shortly, I hope."
 "Why not at once? Now that you know that Edgworth Bess is in safety, why not fly immediately?"
 "For a particular reason."
 "What is it?"
 "I have told you that one purpose of our lives was achieved."
 "Then you have another?"
 "We have."
 "And have you sworn to that as well?"
 "Yes, and until it is accomplished we cannot leave English shores."
 "Will you tell me what it is?"
 "Certainly; and I trust you will make it known to Edgworth Bess."
 "I will, never fear."
 "I call her by that familiar title because the other seems strange."
 "No doubt; but go on. What is this purpose?"
 "It is to do that which the police officers have entirely failed to bring about."
 "Indeed!"
 "Yes—to capture Jonathan Wild!"
 Steggs started.
 "Now that this anxiety is off our minds," continued Blueskin—"I mean the anxiety we felt concerning the fortunes of Edgworth Bess—we shall turn the whole of our attention and devote all our energies to the task of hunting the villain down! We will not rest in any way until he is either dead or in the hands of justice!"
 "You have sworn to that?"
 "Yes."
 "Both of you?"
 "Yes."
 "Then give me your hands, for I have sworn the same oath!"
 "You?"
 "Yes!"
 "But for what reason?"
 "From the enmity I feel for that fiend in human shape."
 "Then he has injured you?"
 "Deeply, and in a manner in which I shall neither forget nor forgive! It is strange how we have been actuated by the same impulses. I had resolved to find Edgworth Bess first, and place her in the charge of the Lord Chancellor, which I knew was all that was necessary, and then, as soon as it was over, it was my determination to set out upon the villain's track!"
 "It is strange, as you say. I believe your words respecting Edgworth Bess; I have no doubt of the truth of what you have just stated."
 "That's right. It is true—believe me, it is quite true!"
 "I do believe you."
 "Our immediate purpose," said Jack Sheppard, "is to commence a pursuit of Jonathan Wild. We have already a clue to guide us. We have tracked him to a certain point, and beyond that we can doubtless follow him."
 "That is very important."

"And now," continued Jack, "it seems to me, that what we have to do is to consult together as to the steps that shall be taken."

"Just so."

"We are all working to one end, and therefore we ought to decide upon a common plan of operations."

"What do you propose?" asked Steggs.

"Well," said Blueskin, "as your object is the same as ours, will you join us? Shall we all three set out together to accomplish our aim?"

"I think not."

"Just as you please."

"You see," said Steggs, "that I am placed in rather a peculiar situation, and have some other things to attend to immediately. I shall set about my work in a fashion of my own; that I shall succeed I do not doubt. No—no, you two agree together very well. Work out your scheme yourselves, and leave me to myself."

"We are quite agreeable."

"Then let us look upon that point as settled. I will return to Edgworth Bess, tell her that I have seen you, and what you intend to do, and after that I will begin my search."

"And we will begin at once."

"Don't think," added Steggs, "that I wish to pry into your business; don't think either that I would be guilty of any treachery towards you. Place confidence in me."

"We will—we do!"

"Well, then, how do you intend to commence operations?"

"Luckily," said Blueskin, "we are possessed of two good horses."

"Steggs nodded."

"They are in a stable hard by. We shall mount them as soon as it is dark, and ride out of London."

"And make you way, I suppose, to the place to which you have already tracked Jonathan Wild?"

"Exactly—to a roadside public-house where he signaled his visit by some of his old barbarities."

"Yes, that's it," said Steggs. "You will get upon his track easily enough, for wherever he goes he will leave a trail of blood or violence behind—you will be sure to track him!"

"That was just my thought!"

"It would be, knowing the man so well as you do."

"Success will attend, I feel certain!" said Jack Sheppard—"I can feel a presentiment to that effect!"

"But shall you go as you now are?" asked Steggs.

"How do you mean?"

"I mean, attired as you are at present, or should you disguise yourselves?"

"That's an excellent suggestion!" said Blueskin. "I did not, in my excitement, give that a thought. It would be much better and safer to adopt some disguise."

"Unquestionably so."

"I think we are much indebted to you for the thought; it might not have occurred to us until too late."

"Don't mention it!"

"The point to be decided," said Jack, "is what disguise shall we adopt?"

"We must reflect," said Blueskin.

"Steggs," said Jack, "can you offer us another suggestion?"

"I don't know that I can. You are at liberty to choose almost any attire. One end, however, you must particularly keep in view."

"What is that?"

"In disguising yourselves, you must make yourselves look as different as you can."

"We should be sure to do that."

"But I mean, you should look out for and select two characters quite opposite to your own, and play them to the best of your ability."

"I catch your notion."

"I can tell you do."

"For instance," said Blueskin: "if I were to disguise myself as some country farmer or landholder."

"Exactly!" cried Steggs. "You could not possibly do better—you would look the character, I am sure, if you were careful!"

"I think I could sustain it."

"Well, then," said Steggs, "if you decided on that it seems to me there is only one thing that Jack can be."

"What is that?"

"You will travel together?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Well, two people can scarcely do that without suspicion, except some precaution is taken."

"I don't quite comprehend you."

"Why, if Jack disguises himself as your groom, or footman, or servant, or attendant, and rides with you, you will excite no remark."

"Excellent—excellent!" cried Jack. "I don't much fear the police officers; but even Jonathan Wild would, I fancy, fail to recognise me in such a garb as that."

"Then may we say that this is decided upon?"

"You may."

"I feel now more hopeful and confident than ever," exclaimed Blueskin, "and one thing alone remains to be done!"

"What is it?"

"Simple as it seems, it may present some difficulties."

"But what is it?"

"The obtaining of the disguises."

"Yes, it is highly important that few people should be aware of this change in your appearance."

"Exactly so."

"Then," said Jack, "when and how are these disguises to be obtained?"

"If you will leave it to me——" began Steggs.

"We will do so readily—gladly!"

"Then I will leave here and purchase them for you."

"If you will, we shall be under a deep obligation to you."

"Don't name it; the service itself is trifling enough."

"Not so—not so."

"But I say it is. I will take care that the disguises are obtained in a manner that will excite no suspicion."

"Then our task will be easy indeed."

"I will purchase them myself," continued Steggs, "and bring them here."

"By what time?"

"That I can hardly state, but certainly between now and nightfall."

"That will do, then—it will suit us admirably."

"Then we can quit this part of our discussion?"

"We can. When shall you repair to Edgworth Bess?"

"As soon as I have obtained the disguises."

"Well, then, oblige me by setting out at once, and pray return as speedily as possible."

"I will; but of course I shall be careful in all my movements."

"Certainly—certainly."

"Farewell, then, for a short time; I shall soon return."

With these words Steggs took his departure.

After the door closed behind him there followed one of those peculiar pauses which sometimes take place.

Neither Blueskin nor Jack could find a word to say.

At length the latter, starting from a kind of reverie, said:

"Blueskin, what do you think of Steggs?"

"Think of him?"

"Yes."

"In what way?"

"As to his fidelity and sincerity."

"I have every confidence in him."

"I have my doubts."

"Doubts? and for what?"

"I can't precisely tell you, but I do doubt his good faith."

"You are wrong, Jack—quite wrong. You doubted him before, if you recollect, when there was not the shadow of a cause for your doing so. You wounded him severely, and brought about a long train of sufferings; for this, you see, he has forgiven you!"

"He has professed to do so."

"I believe he was in earnest."

"Then I don't; he is not the man to forgive an injury so easily; he would rather seek for some terrible revenge."

"I think you are mistaken, Jack—indeed I do!"

"Well, I may be."

"I hope you are."

"And so do I, and yet——"

"What?"

"I wish we had not taken him so deeply into our confidence. You see now he knows all our plans—we have told him just what we intend to do, and he may have quitted the house now only as a pretext."

"A pretext?"

"Yes—he may return with the police officers."

"If he does betray us, he will do so completely—he will leave no loophole for escape; we shall be captured."

"Your fears, Jack, are unfounded."

"Well, we shall see—we shall see. If no disturbance takes place, and if presently he returns with the disguises there will be an end to your suspicions."

"There will—there will."

"Then we can only wait for the result with patience: for myself I feel content."

Although Blueskin said this, it was scarcely the truth. In spite of himself, the doubts and suspicions which Jack had spoken of impressed themselves in his mind.

As the time wore on, he grew more and more anxious for Steggs to make his appearance, and paced up and down the little room in ill-disguised impatience.

Jack noted this, but said nothing.

In this uncomfortable manner the time elapsed until night came.

When it grew dark, Jack hinted that the time had arrived for Steggs to make his attack upon them with the utmost advantage.

Growing more and more uneasy each moment, Blueskin went to the window and looked out.

He fancied he could see an easy way of making his escape, should they be attacked.

Just then there came a knock at the door, and the landlady entered.

"That friend of yours has returned," she said.

"Ask him to come in."

"Now, Jack," whispered Blueskin, "we shall quickly know the worst."

"We shall; if he is false, we cannot long remain in ignorance of it."

"No, but hush! he comes!"

CHAPTER DCCXXV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD COMMENCE THEIR PURSUIT OF JONATHAN WILD.

Just then the door opened again and Steggs entered.

In his arms he carried a large parcel.

"Here are the things," he said, calmly. "I have had a good deal of difficulty in procuring them ready made of the right size; moreover, I was careful to buy them in a quarter of London remote from this, so that there should be less chance of a discovery."

Blueskin looked at Jack while these words were spoken, and his glance conveyed the words to Jack:

"You see how groundless your suspicions were."

The parcel was opened, and the contents examined.

"You had better disguise yourselves without delay," said Steggs. "It is quite dark now, and you may ride away unseen."

"Would you keep the change a secret from the landlady here?"

"I would if possible."

"Then I'll tell you how it may be done."

"How?"

"We will go out just as we are, leaving you here; we will settle up the score with the landlady, and tell her that you are in this room and wish to remain in it undisturbed. Then we will to all appearance bid her farewell and leave the house; but instead of doing so, we will make our way round to the back and enter through the window. We will then disguise ourselves, and leave by the same means."

"Excellent!" said Steggs. "You cannot take too many precautions, and this is one that will, I am sure, be much to your advantage. I will assist you in it to the utmost. Do not lose any more time, but go at once."

"We will."

Blueskin and Jack then left the room.

Steggs closed the door and locked it, so as to be secure from interruption.

According to their intention, Blueskin and Jack went to the bar, and, after paying the reckoning, thanked the landlady over and over again for the kindness she had shown, not only to them but to Edgworth Bess.

"Our friend," they said, "wishes to remain here some time longer; we have left him in the room we have just quitted; do not disturb him, for he is engaged upon important business."

"Very good, gentlemen."

After a few more similar remarks, the two friends quitted the inn.

"Stop," said Jack, suddenly, "there's another thing we must bear in mind."

"What's that?"

"The horses."

"Oh! ah! the horses!"

"What scheme can we adopt to obtain possession of them without the keeper of the stables knowing anything about our disguises?"

This was a very difficult problem, but it was highly necessary that it should be solved.

Both set their wits to work, and in a little while Jack devised a means.

"Look you," he said: "we are now attired as we were when we left the horses; we will call now."

"Well, go on."

"We will say that in a short time we will send some one for the horses, as it will not be convenient to come ourselves. We could pay the money and describe Steggs, saying that a man of such an appearance will call."

"Excellent!" said Blueskin; "that gets over the difficulty at once. It's wonderful how simple these things are if you will only look them in the face."

Accordingly, they paid a visit to the stables, and had no difficulty whatever in making the necessary arrangements.

Then, without loss of time, they crept down to the water's edge and made their way cautiously round to the back of the inn, and over the wooden fence.

The window was then straight before them.

They reached it without hindrance or interruption, and without being observed by anybody.

Steggs was there waiting for and expecting them.

He assisted them through the window, and then, as all the clothing was in readiness, they proceeded to disguise themselves.

This occupied a considerable length of time, but it was time well spent.

By the time they had finished, such a complete metamorphosis had taken place that Jack and Blueskin could scarcely recognise each other.

"We shall do now capitally, I think," said the former.

"Yes," replied Steggs; "I never saw a more excellent or complete disguise. Rely upon it, it will deceive even Jonathan Wild himself."

"I believe it will; and now, mentioning his name makes me desirous of stealing off and commencing the pursuit at once."

"I should recommend you to do so, for fear the landlady should be inquisitive enough to come to the door."

"Well, then, Steggs, I will tell you what we want you to do. We will pass out of the window as arranged, climb over the fence, and crouch down behind it. You know just where the fence is, do you not? It is too dark to see it now."

"Oh yes, I know where it is well enough."

"Then as soon as we have taken our departure by the window, you leave by the door. On the first turning to the left you will see some livery stables. Go there and say you have called for two horses; they will know all about them, and will expect you."

"That's another excellent precaution," Steggs ejaculated.

"It is; we thought of it after we got into the street. We will wait for you near the fence. When you have obtained the horses, lead them down to the water's edge, where you will find us."

"All right. And now what do you think of doing with the clothes you have taken off?"

"My intention was to have them tied up in a bundle with a large stone in the middle, and cast them into the Thames."

"A very good mode of disposing of them, and I should recommend it, but I would not include your long riding cloaks; keep them—they may be useful and serviceable, for the weather is very unsettled."

"Very."

"You can easily carry them strapped to the pommel of your saddles; then, should circumstances require it, you could put them on and effect a considerable change in your appearance."

"So we could."

Jack was agreed to, and the cloaks were retained.

Blueskin, according to the arrangement, passed out of the window, which Steggs closed after them, and secured so that there should be no suspicion.

Then he left the inn by the front door, went to the stables, and led the horses round to the appointed spot.

In the meanwhile, the two friends, carrying the bundle of apparel, once more climbed over the fence, and, having found a large stone, placed it in the bundle.

There were some large barges moored at the water's edge, so Jack, seizing the bundle, nimbly sprang on to one of them, and ran from one end to the other.

He paused on the bow of the vessel.

Then, with all his might, he flung the bundle from him.

There was a splash, and then it disappeared.

The stone immediately dragged the clothing down to the muddy bed of the river.

Then, hastily returning, he rejoined his companion, and waited for Steggs to arrive.

Their patience was not put to a very severe trial, for soon the sound of horses' hoofs came upon their ears.

In another moment Steggs arrived.

"Here they are," he said. "Now, mount and ride away, and I trust success will soon reward your efforts."

"It will—it will! Rely upon it, it will!"

"Then now, having wished you good speed, I will say farewell to both."

"Farewell! Yet, ere we part, let me entreat you to give Edgworth Bess a full and particular account of all that has passed between us. Tell her how well we are disguised, and what a good chance we have of effecting our purpose."

"I will—I will let her know all."

"Say that we are scarcely in any danger, and that, as soon as Jonathan Wild is slain or a prisoner, we will leave England, and do the best we can for ourselves in a foreign land."

"I will tell her so, and bring you word what she says in reply."

"Once more, then, farewell!"

So saying, Blueskin and Jack touched their horses lightly with the spur, and set off at a rapid pace.

According to the determination they had expressed, they directed their course towards the inn where, the reader will remember, they obtained very particular information concerning Jonathan Wild.

From that point they would be able to extend their inquiries.

There was much truth in the remark made by Steggs to the effect that wherever he went Jonathan would leave a trail of blood behind him by which he could be followed.

In recalling to memory all the varied incidents that befel him after leaving the inn just mentioned, the reader will at once be struck with the number of acts of violence committed, by some of which surely his progress could be noted.

Blueskin and Jack scarcely exchanged a syllable with each other until they emerged into the Oxford Road.

Then they drew in deep aspirations of the cool, country air, and felt wonderfully refreshed.

"I am a new man now," said Jack, "and equal to any emergency. My heart is as light, and I feel jovial and happy as of old."

"And I too. Now that the great source of anxiety and distress is removed—now that I know Edgworth Bess is secure and in safety, I feel such an elation of spirits that I can scarcely contain myself. But you must not forget, Jack, the purpose with which we set out."

"Never fear that I shall forget that!" was the reply, given in an altered tone of voice. "I have suffered more at his hands than anyone else; so it is not likely I shall forget him!"

Jack ground his teeth savagely together while he spoke.

"Let us endeavour as well as we can to prevent our attention being diverted from the object we have in view."

"That, I fancy, is an unnecessary caution."

"Well, we shall see."

"We shall."

"Jonathan has succeeded for a long time in eluding all the officers of justice, but we have done the same thing ourselves."

"We have."

"But with us in pursuit of him, it will be quite another matter. We have a personal interest in the pursuit—a deeper, stronger interest than the mere hope of obtaining a share in a reward could possibly excite."

"Yes; that feeling is revenge, and Jonathan will not escape it. We shall hunt him down, so surely as ever anyone was hunted down; and at the last moment, I will exult over him; I have always said that I should live to see the day when he swung from Tyburn Tree, and so I shall—so I shall, for the day is not far distant!"

"Hark!" said Blueskin—"hark—did you hear that?"

"Hear what?"

"Stop—listen!"

He pulled up his horse abruptly as he spoke, and so did Jack.

"What is it?" asked the latter again.

"Hush—hush—listen! Perhaps I was mistaken. Perhaps we shall hear it again!"

CHAPTER DOXXVI.

REVERTS TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES.

JONATHAN WILD might well exult when he accomplished the feat of rolling the heavy millstone over the trap-door.

By that means he not only put an effectual stop to the interference of his enemies, but at the same time placed them in anything but an agreeable situation.

They were searching among the rubbish very near to the trap-door when Wild closed it, and the noise above filled them with the liveliest alarm.

The timbers cracked and creaked, while the dust fell down in a shower.

For one moment they feared the flooring of the mill, which was old and decayed, would give way beneath the heavy weight.

But the wood-work stood the shock bravely.

There they were, however, caged up—fast prisoners in every sense of the word.

The magistrate looked from one to another of his companions in surprise.

They were greatly alarmed; and Mr. Donaldson, in rather an anxious voice, inquired:

"What can be the meaning of this?"

"I fancy I can see it all," said the magistrate. "I may be wrong, but I have my suspicions."

"What are they?"

"Why, some atrocious villains have made this empty, disused mill their temporary hiding-place. Had we searched the upper portion first, I believe we should have found them—as we did not, they have stolen a march upon us."

All shuddered when they heard Jonathan's exulting laughter.

The opinion enunciated by the magistrate was of a character that carried conviction with it, and all his hearers at once concluded that he had arrived at the true state of affairs.

That, however, was scarcely the moment for them to deliberate much upon such a point.

They were made prisoners—that was a most obvious fact, and the next thing to do was to make their escape.

Whether the inhabitants would return was doubtful.

And if they did, it would be difficult to make them understand how the party was situated.

The magistrate took this view of the case:

"We must rely entirely upon our own exertions," he said. "It's no good depending upon the villagers."

To this all assented.

"Therefore, gentlemen, we will look round and examine this place thoroughly; we shall then discover which is the weakest point, and then make a resolute attempt to escape."

This was a very judicious proposition.

The foundations of the mill were not of any great extent, and so the examination was quickly made.

"I fancy this will be the place," said the magistrate.

"There's a good deal of rubbish to remove; but we must set to it with a will. Then a little strength will enable us to make an opening through the old timbers."

[THE ROBBERY BY THE FOOTPAD IN THE LANE.]

Convenient places were selected for placing the caudles so as to light them in their work.

Then the whole party commenced operations most vigorously.

It was a long and fatiguing labour to remove the quantity of miscellaneous rubbish with which the place was literally choked up.

At length they succeeded, and nothing intervened between them and freedom except the wooden framework of the mill.

They were very ill provided with tools for making an opening through the boards.

A long iron bar, or something of that kind, was needed, but they had nothing that would serve as a substitute.

Among the rubbish, however, they found several good-sized stones.

No. 136.—BLUESKIN.

These they picked up and flung with all their might against the boarding.

Sometimes the blow would be followed by a cracking sound.

Whenever they saw the wood split in this manner, they redoubled their efforts.

At length, after much labour, very much to their surprise, a large piece of the woodwork flew out bodily, leaving an opening large enough for them to emerge at once.

It was well that everyone obeyed the impulse to dart forward.

They were anxious to escape from the close, damp atmosphere.

To that anxiety they unquestionably owed their lives.

The ruined mill was in a very frail and tottering condition, and the removal of that portion of the woodwork near the foundations served to derange the whole structure.

A heavy gust of wind, too, rose with great suddenness, and blew with full force against it.

It bent slowly before the blast.

There was a creaking and groaning of timbers swaying to and fro.

A cry of horror from the party who had just escaped, and then the mill fell with a terrific crash to the ground.

Fortunately the magistrate and his companions were made aware of their danger in time to get out of the reach of the falling materials.

It was but the work of a moment.

At the end of that time there was nothing left of the ruined mill but a confused mass of fragments of timber, iron, and stone.

The space it occupied was inconceivably small, and no one would have believed that so many objects could have been crushed into so small a compass.

Several seconds elapsed before the magistrate and his friends could recover sufficiently from the shock to congratulate themselves upon the narrow escape they had had.

"There's an end of the old ruined mill!" said the magistrate—"we shall be troubled no more with stories of apparitions and the like;—it's all over now, and I suppose the mystery will never be fully explained. I question whether we shall ever know much more about it than we do now; but time will show."

The storm had not yet abated, nor had the rain ceased.

The latter poured down in one ceaseless torrent.

In less than two minutes, the magistrate and his party were wet through to the skin.

"I suppose we can do no more good," said one.

The magistrate hesitated.

"It's very wet," he replied; "and as the mill has fallen into a mass of ruin, I fancy we shall be of little service if we remain."

"That's just what I think," returned Mr. Donaldson.

"Then, gentlemen," added the magistrate, "if you are of the same opinion—as doubtless you are—you will follow me."

"We will—we will!"

"In the morning, however, I will have strict measures taken, and this mystery shall be probed to the very bottom. It shall not be my fault if it remain unsolved."

With these words, the magistrate, having buttoned up his coat and placed his hat firmly on his head, ran hastily across the fields in the direction of his dwelling.

He was followed by the rest of his party, who were thoroughly tired of the night's adventures.

There was not one of them who could think of the fall of the mill without a shudder of horror.

Had they been a moment later, they must have been buried beneath the fragments.

The lightning still flashed and the thunder roared.

Then presently there came one flash more vivid and more enduring than any that had preceded it.

For an infinitesimal portion of time the whole landscape for miles and miles around was illuminated with the blue, sulphurous glare.

With startling relief every object was brought out—trees, meadows, fences—everything.

Instinctively the magistrate and his party closed their eyes, but not until they had all seen, at some distance off, the figures of two men seated on two steeds.

It was but a transient glimpse that they obtained of them, and then they disappeared.

After that flash the darkness seemed doubly dense.

"Did you see those men?" the magistrate asked as soon as the crash of the thunder that followed the flash of lightning was over.

"We did—we did!"

"Then they are the rascals, depend upon it, who have been creating so much disturbance. And now I come to think of it, I feel pretty sure I know who they are."

In spite of their uncomfortable situation, everyone present was anxious to hear more from the magistrate's lips.

"I have received intelligence," he said, "that the notorious Jonathan Wild and his villainous companion Mr. Noakes have penetrated some distance into the country. I have not heard of them being within miles and miles of this place; but all trace has been lost of them up to the present moment. Now I feel convinced that they are found."

"Then," said one, "if it was Jonathan Wild, I should fancy the fall of the mill was no accident, but that he had contrived to bring down the fabric with the intention of burying us beneath it."

"It is quite possible," said the magistrate, "though I do not think so. But come, my friends, forward—forward! I shall lose no time in transmitting the intelligence of what I have seen. The police officers shall know without delay; and depend upon it, ere long these miscreants will be captured."

After speaking these words, the magistrate redoubled his speed, and in a short time reached his dwelling.

He was as good as his word, for, despite the unfavourable state of the weather, he communicated with the authorities in the proper quarter, informing them that Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes had been seen near the haunted mill, and that he had every reason to believe that they had been guilty of a fresh series of crimes.

Little did Jonathan and his associate imagine that danger was closing so closely around them.

On the contrary, as we shall see, they were congratulating themselves upon their comparative safety.

Even timid Mr. Noakes believed that for a time they might consider themselves out of danger.

But he was never before in so perilous a condition and so near losing his liberty as he was then.

But it is always so.

When we imagine ourselves most secure, we frequently find ourselves in the utmost peril.

CHAPTER DCXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES UNBURY THE TREASURE AND ARE PUZZLED HOW TO DISPOSE OF IT.

DESPITE the dread Jonathan Wild always felt during a violent storm, he nevertheless welcomed the bright flashes of lightning which ran across the meadow in the way we have already mentioned.

By the aid of these flashes of lightning he hoped to be able to see just whereabouts the horses were, and to mount them and ride off.

He scrambled through the hedge, followed by his companion, and then pausing beneath a tree, looked anxiously around him.

A bright flash of lightning showed him the two horses standing close together some distance off.

They had placed themselves side by side, as though for mutual protection and defence.

They were greatly alarmed at the conflict of the elements.

"Come, Noakes," said Wild, "there they are. Forward!"

"All right."

"Approach them with caution, however, or they will start away, and we shall have no end of trouble in capturing them."

"I know, but be quick."

"I am. Curse this rain—how it comes down, to be sure! I am wet through to the skin."

"So am I."

Upon nearing the spot where the horses stood, Wild and his companion moderated their speed.

Extending their hands, they walked forward gently, and the horses, entirely overcome with terror, suffered themselves to be captured without making a shadow of a resistance.

The two villains mounted immediately, and Jonathan was just about to ride away, when, struck by a sudden thought, he paused.

He was desirous of ascertaining whether the magistrate and his party had escaped from the mill.

"I hope they may lie there and rot!" said Wild, between his clenched teeth. "I should feel more satisfied than I do now. Curse them—curse them!"

"I think you ought to be satisfied," said Noakes.

"Are you?"

"Yes, quite."

"Then I am not."

"Do you think they will escape?"

"I can't tell; but look—look!"

The violent gust of wind already spoken of at this moment came rushing over the meadow.

When Jonathan spoke he pointed to the old mill, and his companion saw it was rocking to and fro at its foundations.

"It will fall," cried Jonathan, with a scream of exultation—"it will fall!"

"And they will escape," said Noakes.

"No, no—not so—at least, I trust not. The fragments will fall upon them and crush them!"

The mill leaned over to one side.

Breathlessly, Wild and Noakes watched it.

Then it fell bodily to the earth.

A wild, screaming laugh broke from Jonathan Wild's lips.

"It is done," he said—"it is done! I am revenged!"

"No, no!"

"I tell you I am! They must be every one dead or else writhing in agony!"

"No, no," said Noakes again. "Wait for the next flash of lightning, and you will see them."

Jonathan did wait.

But only for about a moment.

Then a flash came, and showed him that his companion had spoken the truth.

Grashing his teeth together in impotent rage, he exclaimed:

"Yes, they by some miracle have escaped me this time! But I should like to have the heart's blood of all of them!"

"What do you intend to do now?" said Noakes.

"Wait a moment—wait a moment. I should like to observe their motions."

"But they may see us."

"Never mind if they do. They will not know us."

"They might do so."

"I am not afraid. Keep an eye upon them. Let us see where they go."

Disregarding the rain, they remained in just the same positions, watching the figures of the magistrate and his party as they fled rapidly over the meadows.

"They have seen us," said Noakes, at length—"I am sure they have seen us!"

"Never mind if they have!" was Wild's reply. "Let us watch them out of sight."

They did so.

Then Noakes cried:

"Come, Mr. Wild, let us quit this neighbourhood—let us be off. It's unsafe to stay here any longer."

"But the treasure?"

"What treasure?"

"That we have buried."

"What of that?"

"Is it possible you do not comprehend?"

"I do not. Is it not safe?"

"I doubt it."

"Why?"

"Has not the mill fallen? And you remember that the shadow of one of the sails pointed to the spot where the treasure lay."

"Of course it did."

"Well, now the mill has gone, we can make use of the mark no longer."

"But we might remember the place."

"Possibly we might; but now, I fancy, the people about here will not rest until they have dug up every portion of the mill. In doing this, they might discover the treasure."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes; or they might take it into their heads to cultivate this field. If so, it would be discovered then."

"Mr. Wild."

"What?"

"We must remove it."

"I have come to the same conclusion myself."

"Yes, we must remove it, and to-night, too."

"I can't think," said Jonathan, "how it was that I consented to bury the money in so insecure a place. It was your impatience, Noakes."

"You consented."

"I know I did; but now we will unearth it."

"At once?"

"Yes, at once."

"But the rain?"

"D—n the rain! It will give over in awhile."

"And there is no one about, think you?"

"I am tolerably sure of it; but there may in a couple of hours or so."

"Then," said Noakes, "let us get the treasure up by all means."

They moved forward as he spoke, and entered the adjoining field.

Although such a short time had elapsed since the treasure had been buried, they experienced much difficulty in finding out the precise spot.

Now that the mill had fallen into an undistinguishable heap, the whole appearance of the place seemed changed.

They could scarcely take upon themselves to say where the place had been and in what direction the sails were spread.

Jonathan wished that he had not taken quite so much pains to make the spot where he had buried the treasure look so much like the remainder of the meadow; indeed, he feared that for once in his life he had been too clever.

At last, however, after taking up the earth in many wrong places, they chanced upon the right.

The money was divided equally between them, and then they went towards their steeds.

"What are we to do with it?" asked Noakes.

"That's a matter for further consideration," returned Wild. "We cannot carry it about with us, that is clear."

To this Noakes assented.

"We need be in no particular hurry," continued Wild; "we are as safe here as we can hope to be."

"But you will not linger in this neighbourhood?"

"No; I intend to add to our store of wealth to-night, if I possibly can."

"But you will run no great risk?"

"No more than is necessary to obtain what I require. Let us talk first of concealing the treasure."

"I am quite willing."

"Can you think of any suitable place?"

"No, Mr. Wild, I leave it to you."

"Of course you do—I know that; and then, if anything goes wrong, you will say it has been all my fault."

"I could suggest nothing but burying it somewhere."

"No," returned Jonathan, "it is in the earth that we must hide it—nowhere else."

"Then it seems to me we have only to decide upon the spot."

"That's it; but the point is most important."

"Certainly; I know all depends upon it."

"All, for if we were to lose this treasure we should have great difficulty in making up the amount."

Mr. Noakes was even more anxious than Wild himself that the treasure should be safely deposited somewhere, therefore he racked his brains endeavouring to decide upon some secure place.

This was no easy matter, however, and Jonathan Wild was equally at fault.

At length, after a long pause, during which they had gone several miles, Noakes said:

"Mr. Wild."

"What?"

"You have buried money before?"

"I have. I told you so."

"Yes; and you also stated that you had unburied it."

Well, now, was all the money that you buried quite safe?"

"Yes, in every instance."

"And what kind of places did you select?"

"Generally beneath the roots of some tree."

"Then had we not better repeat what has been successful before?"

"I have been thinking of it myself."

"Suppose we divide it into four portions, and bury it beneath four trees in different places."

"That would be making doubly sure," said Jonathan; "and if, by the time we have gone a mile further, we can neither of us think of any better plan, why, we will adopt that."

Noakes again relapsed into silence.

Although they did not make a headlong speed, yet they got over the ground in capital style.

Their horses were well rested and refreshed, and required no urging forward; they simply allowed the reins to be loosed, and let the animals go at their own rate.

At length, however, when about twenty miles distant from the inn, Jonathan Wild somewhat abruptly reined-in his horse.

CHAPTER DCXXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD COMMITS A ROBBERY ON THE HIGHWAY.

"WHAT NOW?" asked Noakes, as he followed Wild's example.

"Have you thought of anything better?"

"No."

"Nor I."

"Then what do you intend to do?"

"Why, as we seem to have reached a lonely part of the country, and a part where we have never been before—"

"And nearer to the sea-coast?" interjected Noakes.

"Yes, as you say, nearer to the sea-shore."

"Well?"

"It is well, for we will divide the treasure into four parts, and bury them somewhere here."

By this time the storm had died away, and the moon was struggling with the clouds that obscured her lustre.

A dim, hazy light was diffused over the landscape, being, in fact, just sufficient for Jonathan's purpose—it suited him much better than the full moonlight would have done.

He sat for several moments attentively observing the appearance of the spot.

At no great distance was a knoll, upon the top of which a large oak tree was growing.

Round about it, and distant perhaps about twenty yards, were four other trees.

"There they are," said Jonathan—"those are the trees. We cannot fail to know this spot again, and beyond a doubt the money will be quite secure."

"I think so too."

"Then let us set about burying it at once. You can work as well as I, and we shall perform the labour in half the time."

Both alighted, and the plan they had agreed upon was carried out.

As they were so ill provided with tools, a considerable length of time was occupied by the operation.

At last it was finished, the turf carefully patted down, and then, with a feeling of satisfaction at their hearts, they mounted their horses once more.

Another gallop across the open country brought them to the high-road, and, after a brief deliberation, Jonathan Wild resolved to take his way along it.

At first, Noakes was terrified at the idea.

But he was reconciled to it eventually, by being told that it led directly to the coast.

He was exceedingly anxious to get near to the sea, for he fancied if they were hard pressed by their foes they should at least stand a better chance of escape.

If they got on board some little vessel and crossed over either to Germany or France, they would be safe, and after awhile might return and obtain whatever money they had buried.

Something like the same idea appeared to fill Wild's mind.

It was possible that he was beginning to think that his wisest course was to consult his own safety entirely, and to abandon all those schemes of revenge he had so long cherished.

But this, judging from his previous character, seemed improbable, if not impossible.

He was a man who had lived but with one idea.

That idea was—revenge.

He had kept it constantly before him, and under its influence had performed almost incredible deeds.

If he had no revenge to seek, what had he to live for?

The aim and end of life would be gone.

This is a point that will be settled shortly.

All we have to do is to follow Jonathan Wild and chronicle his proceedings.

It is by acts alone that such a man can be judged.

With some terror, Mr. Noakes perceived that upon gaining the high-road, Jonathan Wild carefully examined the primings of his pistols.

He then consigned the weapons to his belt with an air of satisfaction.

In fact, he gave utterance to a low chuckle.

Noakes feared to ask any question.

He knew full well the answer would be disagreeable enough to him.

But Jonathan Wild was inclined to be communicative.

"Noakes," he said.

"Well, what is it?"

"Are your pistols in good order?"

"I think so."

"Well, look and see."

"For what purpose will they be required?"

"Who can tell? Take care that your firearms are always in readiness. Examine them now."

Not daring to refuse, Noakes obeyed.

He found that the primings had been shaken out of both.

He re-primed them, and then Wild exclaimed

"Forward! To-night I will show you what I intend to do."

"You will not rob anyone on the highway?"

"Why not?"

"Because—"

"Because what? Speak out; let me know your objections at once."

"Because it would have the effect of attracting attention to our proceedings."

"Bah!"

"We have shaken off the officers, that I firmly believe, and I don't wish again to have them at our heels."

"Neither do I; but at the same time I am resolved that that treasure shall be increased, and I will tell you how I intend to do it."

"I can guess."

"Very well. I ask you to take no active part in whatever I may do. Remain behind and in readiness to afford me assistance if I require it."

"Remember your last adventure. Remember—"

"I shall never forget it—curse you! You had better not serve me that trick again! I tell you at once to beware!"

"I could not help it; it was your fault, and entirely your fault—you know that perfectly well!"

"Listen—listen!"

"To what?"

"I can hear a traveller approaching. It's a strange hour of the night to be abroad. He has money, depend upon it. At any rate, we'll see."

"Is it of any use for me to ask you to forego your intention?"

"None whatever."

"You would be deaf to every remonstrance—every appeal of common sense?"

"Yes. Back your horse beneath the shadow of the hedgerow, as I do, and remain silent until I call upon you for assistance."

Noakes obeyed, though he trembled in every limb.

The sounds of some horse coming along the road at rather a rapid rate became extremely distinct.

Jonathan Wild grasped a pistol.

Then suddenly a horseman appeared in sight.

Wild rode at once into the centre of the roadway.

"Hold!" he cried in a loud voice—"hold!"

The traveller was somewhat alarmed by Jonathan's sudden appearance, so was his steed, for it swerved, and would have galloped off at a breakneck pace had not Jonathan Wild caught hold of the bridle and restrained it.

"Now, then," he cried, roughly, with an oath, "give me all that you carry about you, or, as sure as you now live, I'll blow your brains out!"

Finding himself thus assailed and thus addressed, the traveller, by a sudden movement, drew a pistol from one of the holsters.

He levelled it, and fired almost immediately.

Had it not been for the sudden blow by which Jonathan knocked the barrel of the pistol upwards, he must have received a serious wound.

"Curse you!" he said, wrathfully—"take that!"

He fired as he spoke.

The traveller crouched down in the saddle, and strove to avoid the bullet.

But in vain.

With a wild, gasping cry, he fell backwards on to the horse, and then slipped into the roadway.

Jonathan released his hold upon the bridle of the now thoroughly terrified creature.

With a snort of terror it bounded forward, and was quickly lost to sight in the darkness.

Jonathan dismounted, leaving Noakes to attend to his steed.

Going up to the prostrate form, he saluted it with a heavy kick, as he said:

"Get up, will you? Don't lie shamming there! Give me your gold!"

A groan was the only reply he received.

He dealt another kick, and repeated his demand.

This time he received no reply whatever.

"I suppose you would put me to the trouble of taking it myself?" he growled.

He stooped down while speaking, and rifled the traveller's pockets with great dexterity and speed.

There was but little to repay him for his trouble.

He glanced into the traveller's face, and he knew in a moment by its expression that the man was dead.

"Obstinate fool!" said Jonathan, "to part with your life sooner than the trifling sum you carried about with you! Well, you had your choice!"

He was about to return to his companion, when he was struck with a fresh thought.

He turned back, and, going up to the dead body, rolled it over and over with his foot until it reached the edge of a ditch that ran by the roadside.

When it was in this position, one more kick was sufficient to cause it to roll over.

With a splash, it sank into the stagnant waters, and the rank weeds that grew there in great luxuriance again raised themselves, and, beyond a slight agitation of the water, no traces of the violent deed remained.

Then he strode across the road, and remounted his steed.

Mr. Noakes did not speak, or make any inquiry about the amount of the booty.

"Come," said Wild, "there is no need for us to linger about this spot. Quick—onward!"

Noakes obeyed, still without speaking.

"What are you so infernally silent about?" asked Wild at length, in an angry voice. "Why don't you speak?"

"Because I am tired of doing so," was the reply. "You are mad—you must be mad, or you would not be so deaf to reason and blind to prudence as you are!"

CHAPTER DCXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD RESOLVES UPON A BOLD STROKE TO OBTAIN MORE BOOTY.

"WHAT do you mean?"

"What I say."

"That I am mad?"

"Yes."

"Why, what makes you think so?"

"I think it is quite clear by your acts."

"My acts?"

"Yes. Who but a madman would have acted in the way you have done now?"

"In stopping the traveller?"

"Not particularly in stopping him, but murdering him."

"It was his own fault."

"There may have been provocation, but you should think of the consequences to yourself."

"Still harping on the same string."

"You need not call me a coward, because there is no boldness in setting prudence at defiance in the way you have."

"But I tell you I could not help it."

"You fired."

"I know I did, but it was only shot for shot."

"Very well; but have we not with great difficulty shaken off the police officers who for so long stuck close to our heels?"

"It seems like it."

"It is so, and, instead of taking advantage of this circumstance as you ought, you are committing just such acts as will bring them on your track again."

Jonathan Wild was well aware of this himself.

He had yielded to an ungovernable impulse when he fired at the traveller.

When the deed was done, however—when he saw the dead body on the roadway—he cursed his precipitation.

But although he was inclined to admit this to himself, he would not openly confess it to Mr. Noakes.

"Do you think," continued the latter, "that what you have just done can pass without comment?"

"Be silent—I wish to hear no more!"

"You asked me to speak, and now that I have begun I will not cease."

"Beware!"

"I am no longer afraid of you, Jonathan Wild; I am growing more and more desperate every hour. The worst you could do to me would be to kill me, and my life lately has been such a curse to me that death would be a welcome relief."

"Then, if that is the case, how is it that you are so anxious to take care of yourself?"

"Because I can see the possibility—the certainty—of leaving England. When I am once out upon the ocean—when I see the shores receding—then I shall feel safer."

"But for the present you are in my power," said Wild, "and I don't intend to release you. I tell you I am sick of this life, and as soon as I can get together enough money for my purpose, I will forego my long-cherished revenge and leave England."

"But if you act as you have done, can't you see that you will bring such a number of police officers at your heels that escape will be impossible?"

"No, I don't see that. We have thwarted them before, and shall again."

"But because we have succeeded, that is no reason why we should not fail."

"You would rather look forward to failure than success."

"I would be cautious in my movements—nothing more."

"Well, the job has been neatly managed," added Wild; "scarcely a trace of the traveller could be found—he is out of sight."

"Yes, but what a narrow escape we had at the mill—how near we were to being discovered!"

"But we were not discovered—we escaped; and with that knowledge I am satisfied to remain content."

"But I am not."

"What would you have, then?"

"It is useless for me to speak."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, I have felt that for some time—quite useless. I have given up all hopes of bringing you to reason."

Wild laughed scornfully.

"This is rich," he said—"it amuses me much."

"Will you answer me one question?"

"What is it?"

"About how many miles are we from the coast?"

"You want to know that?"

"Yes."

"Particularly?"

"Most particularly."

"Well, then, I should say about——"

"About how far?"

"Forty——"

"Forty miles?"

"Yes."

"No more?"

"I can't say for a mile, more or less."

"Well, then, I breathe again."

"You feel safer?"

"I do."

"Well, Noakes, this wrangling is amusing; but the worst of it is, it does no good."

"I hope so."

"But it does not. Now, if you like, I will tell you what I intend to do."

"I am bound to listen."

"Very well, then—to-night I intend to make a bold effort to obtain a large booty."

Noakes groaned.

"What are you groaning at?"

"The danger."

"Is anything to be done without it?"

"Well, well—go on with your plan! What is it you have to propose?"

"Nothing more than that."

"You have made no arrangements, then?"

"No, none whatever; I shall allow myself to be guided entirely by circumstances."

"Then you have not made up your mind in the least degree?"

"Certainly not; but I can give you one word of consolation."

"What is that?"

"If I can obtain such a booty as I hope for to-night, we will go direct to the sea-shore, and in twenty-four hours shall be out of danger."

"I dare not suffer myself to look upon such a prospect as that," said Noakes.

"You may as well. But stay—do you see that building over there?"

"Which one?"

"That church."

"I do; what of it?"

"Well, then, it is quite possible I shall find there just such a booty as I seek."

"In that church?"

"Yes."

"Would you rob a church?"

"Yes,—why not? It is but a building erected by human hands, is it?"

"No, no—nothing else!" said Noakes, stammeringly.

He had a superstitious dread of places of worship at night, and the idea of committing sacrilege was one from which he instinctively shrank.

"I will warrant there are rare articles of silver to be found. I never knew a church yet that was not furnished with plenty of plate. I hope that church will be no exception."

"Then you are quite in earnest?"

"Quite—never more so in my life."

"But how shall you proceed? If you do obtain this plate, what good would the communion service be to you under your present circumstances?"

"Wait until I have got it," said Wild—"it will be time enough to settle that question then."

The church to which Jonathan Wild alluded was situated at no great distance.

It was a massive, ancient-looking edifice, such as can be seen in many parts of England at the present day.

There was a village at some distance, and situated in a commanding position was a mansion, probably belonging to some nobleman.

As the night had grown much lighter, Jonathan Wild was able to see all this, and he immediately drew his own conclusions from it.

Such a church as that he fancied would be just the one wherein to find a more than ordinary display of communion-plate.

The lord of the manor would beyond a doubt take a great interest in church affairs, and would at his own expense provide a quantity of silver plate.

At any rate, Jonathan determined to enter the church and ascertain what could be had.

The nearer he came the more he liked the appearance of things.

"Yes, Noakes," he said, at length—"nerve yourself for one effort, and that's all I shall require of you. I am sure there is a little fortune to be picked up inside that building. Why should we not have it? As soon as it is in our possession, we will place it in a convenient spot, return for the other treasure, and embark for Holland."

"Such a prospect as that would tempt me to do much," said Noakes, with an air of resolution. "But I am sick of these promises—they have been made so often, and have produced no result."

"Well, I speak now plainly and clearly. All is contingent upon the booty. If we obtain it, then there will be an end to this roving, dangerous life."

"Then, Mr. Wild, I will accompany you—I will join with you in this enterprise."

"That's right."

"I will assist you to the very best of my abilities—I will render you what help I can."

"That's the way!" said Wild. "If you would but co-operate with me, we should not have half so much trouble—besides, in this case, there is but a trifling amount of danger."

"How is that?"

"Why, no one will live in the church. The only difficulty will be to effect an entrance. When we have done that, we shall have the place entirely to ourselves to do just as we like. We can take our time, and, when we leave, it will be our own fault if we do not take every valuable with us."

"The night is far advanced."

"I know that; but still there is plenty of time left for us to carry out this undertaking. Come, spur your horse—let us make a little better speed!"

Noakes obeyed, and at a much more rapid rate than they had been travelling at, the two villains made their way towards the church about which they had been speaking.

It really seemed as though, by some strong effort, Mr. Noakes had determined to throw off all those terrors which usually oppressed him.

He appeared to be endowed with the courage of desperation.

On this occasion he would do all and dare all he could under the impression that there would be no other time when he would be called upon to assist in a similar scheme.

CHAPTER CXXX.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES SUCCEEDED IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE CHURCH.

A FEW minutes' ride brought Wild and Noakes to the stone wall which bounded the churchyard.

This was much too high for the horses to be able to overleap it.

Such a thing was quite out of the question, so they looked about them for some convenient and retired spot where they could place them in safety while they carried on their operations inside the building.

At length they decided upon a spot which they imagined would answer the end they had in view, and having settled matters so far, they looked around for some means of gaining the enclosure.

The walls were of smooth stone, so that without a ladder, or some other scaling apparatus, they could not be surmounted.

"The gate," said Wild—"there must be a gate. Come round; we will climb over that."

They skirted the boundary wall of the churchyard hastily, and presently came to some large iron gates.

These were of an elaborate pattern, and although the top was formed of numerous iron spikes about a foot in length, both believed it would be easy to climb over them.

Jonathan Wild set the example.

There were many places to place the feet, and the iron bars themselves were sufficient to grasp hold of.

In a very brief space of time indeed Jonathan climbed over this obstacle, and stood in safety on the other side.

With more care and caution, Mr. Noakes followed his example.

"Crouch down," said Wild. "Don't stand upright—run in that position—there will not be so much danger of being seen then."

Anything in the shape of precaution Mr. Noakes was glad to take, therefore he obeyed Jonathan willingly enough, and doubling himself up into a strange attitude, he ran hastily towards the church.

The door was furnished with a large old-fashioned porch, and as soon as this was gained the two villains felt that they were secure from observation.

It was quite dark underneath this porch, and from the distance they must have been invisible.

Although they fully and entirely believed that they had the place entirely to themselves, yet both Wild and Noakes instinctively sank their voices to a whisper.

Why they should do this was hard indeed to say, and yet both were unconscious of it.

There was certainly no one anywhere near to overhear their voices had they raised them.

But a feeling of awe, which they experienced as soon as ever they got beneath the shadow of the sacred building, compelled them to be silent.

"We will just try the door," said Wild, in a whisper. "Not that I expect we shall be able to gain admission by it, for I am ill provided with tools. I expect we shall have to get through a window."

To this Noakes made no reply, and Jonathan, stepping forward, soon reached the door.

He stooped down to examine the keyhole.

In doing so he placed his hand against the door, and pressed lightly upon it. To his surprise, he found it yield to his touch.

He started to his feet.

In a voice of subdued exultation, he said:

"Why, Noakes, fortune favours us indeed!"

"How so? What have you discovered?"

"Why, the sexton has neglected to lock the church door. We have only to push it open, and enter."

Noakes felt uneasy, though without knowing why.

He had all along made up his mind that they would have considerable resistance to overcome.

Now, upon finding that there was no obstruction to his progress, he experienced a feeling of doubt and hesitation.

"That is very strange," he said, at length.

"Very—but most fortunate for us," was Wild's reply.

"Follow me—we shall have much to do, depend upon it, before we obtain the communion-plate."

He pushed open the church door as he spoke.

The hinges creaked dismally, and the sound echoed and re-echoed through the vast building.

"Hush!" he said.

And then he stopped.

Reassured by the silence which prevailed, he beckoned his companion to follow him.

The door was not pushed wide open, and yet wide enough to allow them to enter.

Therefore, without venturing to raise the creaking noise again, he slipped inside.

Mr. Noakes followed him quickly.

He was terrified to remain alone.

At first the interior of the church seemed profoundly dark.

After waiting a second or two, however, Wild fancied, as he looked towards the chancel, that he could see a faint reflected light.

He grasped his companion somewhat tightly by the arm.

"Noakes—Noakes!" he said.

"What is it?"

"Look there—straight before you!"

"Yes, yes—I am."

"What do you see?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing?—are you sure? Look again!"

"What can you see, Mr. Wild?" asked Noakes, already terrified.

"Something like a faint gleam of light."

"Yes, yes—I can see it now."

"You have no doubt about it?"

"None whatever."

"What can it mean, then?"

"I can only think it means that there are others in the church besides ourselves."

"Yes—but who?"

"That I know no better than yourself."

"The door being unlocked is now accounted for."

"Yes, certainly, if anyone is here. But who could be at such an hour as this?"

"As I said before, I know no better than yourself."

"Then we must find out."

"No, no!"

"No, say you?"

"Yes—I think if there is anyone here, we had better forego our plan."

"Forego it?"

"Well, for this night at least."

"No, no—I am determined to find out who is here! Follow me silently on tiptoe—don't make a sound!"

"I dare not."

"Dare not?"

"No, I am terrified!"

"Then remain where you are."

Jonathan glided forward like some evil spirit up the aisle.

To remain there standing alone was, however, in Mr. Noakes's estimation, a thousand times more dreadful than to accompany his bold associate.

Therefore, after a momentary pause, he summoned up courage sufficient to follow in his steps.

As he proceeded further and further along the aisle, the faint gleam of light which had at first attracted Wild's attention grew stronger and brighter.

Where it came from was yet a mystery he could not solve.

His curiosity was greatly excited by what he saw.

Onward—onward he went, until within a short distance of the communion railings.

Then he discovered the source from which the light emanated.

One of the large stones with which the middle aisle of the church was paved had been raised from its setting.

It was now fixed in a slanting position.

It had been raised to an angle of about forty-five degrees, and then propped up by some strong object, probably the crowbar which had been used in raising it.

It was from beneath this stone that the light came.

Jonathan upon making this discovery advanced with renewed caution.

Then on reaching the edge of the abyss he peeped down.

By the faint, dim, reflected light, he saw that there were some steep stone steps covered with sawdust, evidently leading to a vault.

And now even Jonathan Wild hesitated whether he should go any further—whether he should interfere with this affair.

A little reflection, however, brought him to the conclusion that whoever was in the vault had some sinister object in being there.

While he waited in doubt as to what he should do next, Wild listened.

A faint grating noise reached his ears.

Some one was at work, and making no more noise over what he was about than he could possibly help.

At length Wild determined to descend.

He touched Noakes, so as to convey to him an idea of his intention.

Then, with the greatest cautiousness, he insinuated his body between the flooring and the stone slab that had been raised.

His feet sank deeply into the sawdust upon the steps.

It was so deep that he felt sure he should be able to descend without making even the faintest sound.

Again Noakes felt in doubt as to what he should do.

The idea of remaining where he was, in the aisle of the church, while his companion entered the vault, presented to him a thousand terrors.

But he had two evils to choose between, and for the life of him he could not make up his mind which to adopt.

In this state of uncertainty, he watched Wild slowly and silently descend the steps.

"No, no!" murmured Noakes. "I must—I will wait here and watch the result. I dare not descend."

He laid himself down at full length on the stone pavement, and looked down, being anxious in the extreme to know what would be the result of Jonathan's temerity.

CHAPTER DCXXXI.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES HAVE SOME STRANGE ADVENTURES IN THE CHURCH.

JONATHAN WILD managed to reach the bottom of the steps without, as he believed, having made noise enough to attract the attention of whoever might be in the vault.

Then he leaned forward, in order to obtain, if possible, a view of the interior.

He fancied that if he advanced further he should be seen.

He was able to assume such a position that he commanded a view of the whole of the vault, while at the same time he exposed only the upper part of his head.

The first thing that attracted his attention was the light.

This was a lantern—the door of which had been opened so that the light might be more diffused—which had been placed by the side of a coffin on a shelf.

The vault was lined all round with these ghastly objects, which were ranged with methodical regularity upon shelves just wide enough to admit them.

It was only a passing glance, however, that Jonathan Wild gave to these objects.

His attention was directly enchained by something else.

On the floor of the vault, and nearly in the centre of it, was a large-sized coffin.

The outer case had been made of lead, and this had been carefully soldered.

Now, however, it had been rudely cut and twisted.

Kneeling down by the side of this coffin, and working busily at the lid, was a man whose countenance Wild could not distinguish, for it was turned so that the light did not fall upon it.

Jonathan must have made some slight noise, for the man suddenly ceased his work and assumed a listening attitude.

Wild shrank back.

But yet he contrived to peep into the vault.

He saw the man's face.

It was sinister-looking in the extreme.

There was something familiar in the features, Jonathan thought.

In fact, he was certain he had seen the man before.

Where, he could not for the life of him remember.

"What was that?" said the man, in a suppressed voice.

It was strange he should ask such a question, for there was no living person except himself and Jonathan Wild who could reply to it.

But the fact is, this man yielded to the impulse to speak half aloud which so often comes over us when we are alone and in some strange, terrifying place.

He had heard some triling noise, and it had disturbed him.

The silence of the tomb now prevailed.

Jonathan could hear his own heart beat.

"It's nothing!" the man said, at length, in a voice little above a whisper, yet it could be heard with the greatest distinctness in that silent vault. "It's nothing. This old church is full of odd noises. Why should I be afraid? Dead bodies can't hurt me, can they? Certainly not! Then here goes again. Confound it all! I wonder what they want to screw coffin-lids down so tight for?"

This last sentence let Wild into two important secrets.

In the first place, it proclaimed the identity of the speaker.

Wild remembered him now.

His features baffled remembrance, but not the voice.

"That's Long Joe," said Wild, mentally, "and he wants something out of that coffin."

Long Joe was one of the most noted thieves in London.

Wild was surprised to find him so far from the metropolis.

He had either been out of luck, or else business of very great importance had brought him here.

Which of the two it might be, Jonathan neither knew nor cared.

But he thought something would happen well worth his while to stay and see.

Having got over his temperary alarm, Long Joe renewed his attack upon the lid of the coffin.

He worked with a will; but it was a rich man's coffin, and composed of the strongest materials.

At length, however, Long Joe's labours were rewarded.

There was a cracking, splitting sound, and then off flew the lid of the coffin.

Long Joe rose to his feet.

"That's over so far," he said. "Now for the light."

He advanced to the shelf on which he had placed his lantern, and removed it.

Returning to the coffin, he held the lantern up above his head, so that the beams were well diffused.

But he directed the principal rays downward.

"Yes," said Long Joe, "there he lies, sure enough! Well, well—we must all come to it some day or other. But what a fool he must be to have all these things buried with him—as though he could take them away with him! Ah, well! I suppose he thought, if he could not enjoy the wealth himself, no one else should. But he's mistaken! Here am I, Long Joe, and I mean to have all! I never did rob a dead body before in my life; but, however, why should it matter? Here goes!"

Wild saw Long Joe put his hand inside the coffin.

He tugged away at something for a moment—then produced it.

"Number one!" he said. "A capital ring that! A diamond too, and of the first water, I'll be bound! Now to see what else the old fellow has!"

Long Joe placed the ring on his finger.

Then again he put his hand inside the coffin.

Some half-dozen more rings were then produced and transferred to the robber's fingers.

Jonathan watched every movement as a cat might watch a mouse.

"Let him go on until he has done," he thought; "he is only saving me trouble. I don't want to do the disagreeable work."

Wild was very well content to remain a spectator.

Long Joe went on with his task.

Valuable after valuable was torn from the rigid body of the dead man, and placed on his own.

"Now for that gold chain," he said. "That's the only thing left, I do believe! I'll just take that, and be off."

Taking off the gold chain did not seem to be a very easy task.

But he tugged away, and at last it was in his possession.

"Now, Sir George Adley," he said, addressing the dead man, "you can rest in peace so far as I am concerned. I am done with you, and I'll warrant the loss of these jewels won't affect you now. Good-bye, Sir George! Your silly whim has made me rich. My fortune is made now. Good-bye!"

There was something grim and odd in the idea of thus holding a conversation with a corpse.

Long Joe turned round and prepared to leave the vault.

Little did he dream of the surprise that was in store for him.

Little did he think that he had been taking all this trouble to enrich another.

He did not trouble himself about the coffin.

He did not even lift the lid off the floor of the vault and replace it in its proper position.

He left everything just as it was, so that whoever came down into the vault would make an alarming discovery.

"Now I am off," he said, as he took up the lamp. "I rather think I have managed this bit of business very well. It's capital! I might say very capital—"

Long Joe suddenly stopped in the middle of a word.

He stopped in his advance towards the steps leading out of the vault.

At first he stood perfectly still.

Then he staggered back several paces, the lantern seeming as though it would fall from his grasp.

His eyes glared wildly about him.

He was a prey to the utmost alarm.

Jonathan Wild had stepped from his hiding-place full into the light of the lantern.

"Long Joe!" he said.

"That's me. Who are you?"

He was beginning to recover his courage.

The first shock which the sudden appearance of some one had given him was passing away.

Jonathan scowled fearfully when he found that this man did not recognise him.

His appearance must indeed have greatly altered, for in days not long past this very man—Long Joe—used frequently to come to him.

"I'll trouble you," exclaimed Jonathan, levelling a pistol at the man's breast—"I'll trouble you to hand over all those things you have taken from that dead body."

"Oh, will you?"

"Yes; don't trifle with me, you will find the consequences serious to yourself if you do. Beware! Give me all, I say, and I will spare your life."

"How generous you are. But stand off, I have got a pistol as well as yourself, and I know how to use it!"

"Very likely," said Wild, calmly; "but if I see you attempt to draw any weapon forth, that very instant I will fire!"

Long Joe shook a little.

He did not like the idea of coming to this end in the vault, and he was overawed by Jonathan's resolute manner.

"Who are you?" he said. "You've got an odd voice, and somehow I seem to recognise it. If it wasn't impossible, I should say you were—"

"Who?"

"Oh, it's impossible."

"Shall I tell you?"

"Yes."

"Then my name is Jonathan Wild."

"D—n me if I didn't think so!" exclaimed Long Joe—"though I could hardly believe it. Take that, you tyrannical villain—take that! I will have the reward that's offered for you!"

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES SEEK SHELTER WITH THE CHARCOAL-BURNER.]

As he spoke, he first of all flung the lamp with great violence at Jonathan.

It missed its mark, for Wild moved just at that moment.

Heedless of this, Long Joe rushed forward.

In another second he was grappling and wrestling with Jonathan Wild.

It was an awful fight in the dark, and its horrors were aggravated by the nature of the place they were in.

The lantern struck with great violence against the wall, and was smashed to atoms.

The light was extinguished, and the darkness in the vault something terrible to think of.

It was a struggle for life or death, and both men knew it.

Jonathan was aware what would be the consequences if Long Joe got the better of the struggle, and that indicated No. 137.—BLUESKIN.

vidual felt quite certain that if Wild was the victor he could expect no mercy.

And so, with the fury of two wild beasts, they struggled, and fought, and wrestled in the vault.

Their uncertain steps brought them to the coffin that was lying on the floor.

They fell over it, making a tremendous crash.

But Long Joe was undermost.

He uttered a yell of fright upon finding that he had fallen over the corpse.

"Mercy—mercy!" he gasped.

Jonathan only clutched him by the throat.

Then, by that means, he raised Long Joe's head, and banged it down with tremendous force upon the sharp edge of the coffin.

"Murder!" said Joe, in as loud a tone of voice as he could. "Murder—murder!"

Jonathan raised his head a second time, and again brought it down with frightful force upon the corner of the coffin.

Joe's voice grew fainter.

The fury of a demon then took possession of Jonathan Wild.

With a wonderful amount of strength and energy, he banged the back of Joe's head upon the sharp wood-work, until the sound produced by the concussion was no longer clear and sharp, as at first, but dull and soft.

CHAPTER DCXXXII.

JONATHAN WILD TRANSFERS THE BOOTY FROM LONG JOE'S POCKETS TO HIS OWN.

LONG JOE was dead.

The back of his skull was beaten into a soft, spongy mass.

But heedless of this, and quite carried away by a demoniac fury, Jonathan Wild continued to strike his head upon the corner of the coffin until he was compelled to pause from sheer exhaustion.

Then he heard a voice.

At first he did not recognise it.

"Mr. Wild—Mr. Wild!"

It was Noakes who spoke.

"Well, what now—what is it?"

"Oh, you are there, Mr. Wild. Do I indeed hear your voice? I am frightened to death!"

Wild growled out something by way of a reply, and dashed the drops of perspiration from his face.

"Confound this fool," he said; "he may be the means of getting me into no end of trouble; but I will see—I will see!"

In the heated state of his blood, Jonathan Wild was free from all superstitious terrors and fancies.

Without the least hesitation he stooped down over the body of the dead man, and began to feel in his pockets.

"I must have a light," he said—"a light to see what I am about, and if I know Long Joe, as I think I do, he is sure to carry the means of procuring a light about with him.

An ejaculation of satisfaction at this moment escaped Wild's lips.

In the pockets of the sacrilegious burglar he found a small package of what were then known as thieves' matches.

Although it was dark, Jonathan managed by the aid of the bottle of phosphorus to obtain a light.

The match sputtered for a while until the wood-work fairly caught light, and then it sent forth a dim radiance in the vault.

Jonathan went towards the spot where the lantern had struck against the wall.

Nothing but fragments remained of it.

But he searched among them, and was rewarded for his trouble by the discovery of a small piece of candle.

It was somewhat bruised and broken, but the wick was intact, and readily caught light.

He lifted it up, searching for some place where he could fix it, so as to have his hands at liberty.

It was necessary to find a place where the light would be equally diffused.

Mr. Noakes again called out.

"Hold your row," said Wild, angrily; "if you want anything, come down!"

"I—I dare not!"

"Then remain where you are!"

"But I am terrified!"

"Peace—trouble me no more."

"But what has happened?" asked Mr. Noakes. "Tell me what has happened?"

"Do you want to know?"

"Yes."

"Particularly?"

"Yes."

"Then come down the steps and see!"

Wild laughed a short, disagreeable laugh, and then advanced towards the body of Long Joe.

"Ah!" he said, "you're dead enough now—as dead as a nut, and I have cheated the hangman. Well, no matter, I may perhaps turn things to my advantage after all."

By the aid of the little piece of candle, which shed a dim a sickly light around the vault, Jonathan Wild searched the pockets of Long Joe.

He took from them every article of value they contained, as well as a bunch of skeleton keys, and a few other useful house-breaking tools.

With the latter Jonathan was exceedingly pleased.

"Now," he said, "all will be well, and I shall fear nothing."

He was not forgetful of the rings which he had seen Long Joe put upon his fingers, and now, with rude violence, he pulled them off, in some cases taking the skin as well.

When he had made sure that he had possessed himself of every article Long Joe had about him that could be of the least utility, Jonathan Wild rose to his feet.

Just then his eyes fell upon the corpse of the baronet, Sir George Adley.

"What a strange whim," he said, "for a man to be buried with so much wealth about him. Surely he did not desire to rest content in his grave; he might have been sure that some one would be tempted to plunder him. Perhaps he has got something more about him or in the coffin which may have escaped Long Joe's notice. I will see."

Jonathan Wild trembled a little, and rather shrank from handling the rigid corpse.

But he made up his mind to it as a disagreeable duty that had to be performed.

All his trouble, however, went for nothing.

Long Joe had been careful to possess himself of every article of value.

Then once again Wild rose to his feet, and, placing his hand by the side of his face, began to think.

"I have not forgotten the communion-plate," he murmured to himself. "I will have that, I am determined. When they discover the loss of this, the church may be searched. This vault may be entered in a day or two, and if they find it in its present state what a hue and cry will be raised. No, no—it will not do to leave things thus. I must take some precautions—it is highly necessary."

Wild reflected deeply for a few moments.

And then suddenly starting into action, he exclaimed:

"I have it. I know how to do it now!"

He turned towards the door of the vault.

"Noakes," he cried—"Noakes—where are you?"

"Here, Mr. Wild."

"Where?"

"Here."

Jonathan darted forward.

As he had guessed from the sound of his voice, Mr. Noakes was standing at the bottom of the flight of steps.

Although so terrified that he could scarcely move, curiosity had triumphed over every other consideration.

Therefore he had descended the sawdusted steps, and was about to peep into the vault when Wild called him.

Before he was aware of what he was about, Jonathan Wild had seized him by the throat, and dragged him into the vault.

He released him, and then Mr. Noakes sank down on the ground.

"Get up, fool!" said Wild, saluting him with a kick. "I have work to do."

Mr. Noakes cast a terrified glance around him.

The very place was calculated to strike a thousand terrors into his superstitious soul.

Who, then, can say what his feelings were when his eyes rested on the horrible spectacle the vault contained.

He crouched down still lower on the ground, and covered his face with his hands.

Jonathan dealt him another savage kick.

"Get up, will you," he said—"get up, I tell you—there's work for you to do!"

"Work—work? What have you been about?"

"Why, by rare accident, I have stumbled upon a treasure of considerable value, and if we can only carry off the communion-plate in safety we shall have enough to commence our voyage."

These words revived Noakes a little.

Jonathan knew they would, and that was why he uttered them."

"What treasure is it?" he asked.

"Why, that rich man chose to be buried with much of his wealth in his coffin with him. It tempted that man to break into the vault and open the coffin, as you see. I waited until he had stripped the corpse, and then I took the treasure from him."

"And you have killed him?"

"Yes, I could not help it. Self-defence compelled the act."

"That was the meaning of the struggle, then?"

"It was, cowardly wretch that you are! Had you been my true companion, you would have descended into the vault and lent me your assistance. One stroke of your arm would have put an end to the contest and saved me a world of trouble; but, as it was, you remained there and would have allowed me to perish."

"I was terrified, Mr. Wild—I was terrified!"

"Bah! you always are when there's any bold deed to be done. But I don't intend that you should escape altogether so easily."

"What's that, then, you want me to do?"

"It will not do to leave this vault in its present state. I must leave no trace behind of the deed that I have done. You must assist me to conceal it."

"But how—how?"

"Wait a little while, I will show you. I have no time for wordy argument; if we are not quick we shall have the dawn upon us before we have completed our operations."

CHAPTER DCXXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD HITS UPON AN INGENIOUS EXPEDIENT FOR DISPOSING OF THE BODY OF LONG JOE.

MR. NOAKES still crouched upon the floor, so Jonathan favoured him with another kick.

"Get up!" he said. "D—n you, get up!"

In order to escape ill-usage, Mr. Noakes unwillingly rose to his feet.

"Now," said Wild, "the first thing I want done is for the body to be pulled out of the coffin. Out with it!"

"But I dare not."

"But I say you shall! Do you think I would take all this trouble to allow you to have half a share in the benefits if you failed to do your part?"

"But, Mr. Wild—"

"No excuses—none! I will not listen to any!"

"But, Mr. Wild, I say—"

"Peace, peace—be silent. I will not listen to a word! Obey my commands, or it will be the worse for you!"

A more terrible idea than to drag a dead man out of his coffin could not possibly have been presented to the mind of Mr. Noakes.

He trembled and shook like one in an ague.

But he was overawed and intimidated by Jonathan's violent manner.

Falteringly, half-hesitatingly he approached the coffin.

"Obey!" thundered Wild—"obey! I will teach you that you have something to do! You shall not for ever take refuge in your cowardice!"

Mr. Noakes stooped down, and, conquering his repugnance as best he could, took hold of the dead body by the feet.

"Now I will help you," said Wild.

And as he spoke he raised the head.

"Now then," he continued, "up with it—out with him!"

Mr. Noakes obeyed.

But the corpse was heavy.

Straining their muscles, however, they lifted the body out.

And then Mr. Noakes wondered greatly what Wild was about to do.

"Now then," he cried, "lay hold of Long Joe. Up with him!"

"Are you going to put him into the coffin?"

"Yes."

"And what shall you do with that?"

Noakes pointed to the rigid corpse in its white wind-sheet.

"Wait a moment, and you will see," was Jonathan's reply.

Between them, then, they raised the body of Long Joe and placed him in the coffin.

He was a trifle taller or longer than the deceased baronet, and the coffin was too short for him.

But they wedged him in with angry violence.

"Now then, up with the other," Wild cried—"up with the other!"

"Up with the other?"

"Yes. Obey, and ask no questions."

Once more the corpse of Sir George Adley was lifted, and it was placed in the coffin again on the top of Long Joe.

"The lid," said Wild—"quick, the lid!"

"But—but—"

"What's the objection now?"

"You can't put it on."

"Why not?"

"Can't you see the coffin was made to hold one body only? The lid would not fit on."

"Wait a moment," said Wild, grimly—"you will see about that. Here—pick up the lid!"

Noakes complied.

It was a heavy piece of wood, and Long Joe had only slightly injured it in prizing it off.

It was placed down on the top of the coffin.

That is, it was placed as well as it would fit.

It did not rest upon the edges of the coffin, but rather upon the most prominent parts of the corpse.

"There—I told you!" said Noakes. "I knew it would not fit."

"We'll see about that. Now, then, do as I do, and you will find the lid will accommodate itself very well."

While speaking, Jonathan stepped up on to the lid of the coffin.

The mere weight of his body forced it down about an inch.

Not daring to refuse, and yet shuddering with leathing, Mr. Noakes stepped upon the other end.

"Now, then," Wild cried, "quick—jump into the air, and come down as heavily as you can. Rely upon it, it will make the lid fit somehow."

He suited the action to the word.

He jumped up, and came down with all his force upon the lid of the coffin.

There was a sickening, crushing noise, and then, upon stooping to make examination, Wild found that the lid almost fitted.

"Once more, Noakes," he said—"once more!"

Sir George Adley little thought he would be forced into such close quarters with a London thief.

"Now, then, once more!"

Again the miscreants sprang into the air, and again they came down; and although the lid did not fit exactly as it ought, yet it was almost pressed into its proper place.

Nothing now remained but to fold back the leaden case, one side of which had been cut open by Long Joe.

With a great deal of trouble, Wild flattened it out. On one side, the coffin showed scarcely any signs of having been disturbed.

"So far very good!" exclaimed Wild, with satisfaction. "I rather think I have managed that neatly. Ten to one if this is found out for years and years—if, indeed, it ever is! How people will wonder when they find two skeletons in one coffin! Ha, ha!—it is a good joke!"

Noakes shuddered.

Then Jonathan glanced around him, in order to ascertain if he could find the shelf from which the coffin had been dragged.

It was easy to decide upon this point.

Then he said to his companion:

"We have the hardest bit of work before us; but we must get it over. The coffin must be lifted on to the shelf."

"Impossible!"

"I will not admit any such word—I will not listen to it! It must be done, possible or impossible!"

His determined way lent some sort of resolution even to Mr. Noakes.

He imitated the actions of Jonathan, and stooped down.

But the coffin was as much as over their united strengths could raise.

They carried it a foot or two, and were compelled to put it down and rest.

Then again and again, until eventually, after incredible labour, they succeeded in placing it upon the shelf.

They pushed it back until it was in its proper position.

Then Wild contemplated his work with grim satisfaction.

It would indeed require something like a close scrutiny to see that that coffin had been meddled with.

He had only to restore the vault to its original condition, so that no suspicion should be excited by the appearance of anything unusual, and then all would be well—his purpose would be attained.

In the first place there was one difficulty to get over which he had not yet contemplated.

Having seen the coffin properly in its place, and the body of Long Joe comfortably disposed of, both then observed for the first time that a portion of the sawdust was soaked in the blood.

This had flowed from Long Joe's head when it had been battered against the corner of the coffin.

But there was plenty of sawdust in the vault, so Jonathan picked it up by handfuls and placed it over the stain.

The dark, ruddy patch was soon obliterated, and then, when he had raked the sawdust carefully level, and buried the fragments of the lantern in it, he believed that it would present to the casual eye no appearance of having been disturbed.

"Now," he said, "I don't care how soon I am out of this place."

"Nor I either," said Noakes.

"Come along, then. Here, wait a moment—I will take the candle. Now, follow me up the steps."

Mr. Noakes kept close indeed at the heels of his companion, for the idea seized upon him that Jonathan might attempt to shut him down in the vault and leave him there.

He took care to emerge almost at the same time as his rascally associate.

The large slab of stone which fitted over the entrance to the vault had been propped up by Long Joe with a crowbar.

This Jonathan carefully removed, and lowered the stone into its setting.

Traces of the stone having been lifted were, however, quite visible.

By accident, Noakes stumbled against several small objects on the floor.

"What's this," he said—"what's this?"

He picked them up.

Jonathan looked at them eagerly.

He saw a small quantity of mortar in a box.

It was mortar of a peculiar colour.

In fact, it matched exactly with that which was between the flagstones in the aisle of the church.

"All right," said Jonathan—"I see how it is now. We shall be able to manage now first-rate—it's capital! See, this is the way to do it! Fortune favours us indeed!"

CHAPTER DCXXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES GET POSSESSION OF THE COMMUNION-PLATE.

BESIDES the little box of dark-coloured mortar, there was also a small trowel and a bottle of some transparent liquid.

With the trowel Jonathan pressed the mortar carefully between the edges of the stone, and smoothed it over, closely imitating the other stones that were around.

"What's this bottle for?" said Noakes.

"Oh, I know all about it," returned Wild. "I have been on a little expedition of this sort before, and so has Long Joe, I'll warrant!"

"What is it, then?"

"Why, it has the effect of hardening the mortar instantly. You will see I have done now, and when I pour this liquid on, the mortar will become as hard as the stone itself."

Jonathan carefully poured a little of this liquid all round the setting of the stone, and, by the time he had finished, Noakes found that the mortar was indeed as hard as stone, and no one could have told by observation that the vault had ever been opened.

He brushed away all the little fragments of mortar and dust, and then said:

"Come, Noakes, the vestry must be next!"

"Is it not too late already—?"

"No, never too late! Now that I am here, do you think I would quit the church without effecting my object? Bah, Noakes, you are a fool!"

Jonathan, carrying the little piece of candle in his hand, strode hastily down the aisle of the church.

His heavy, thick-soled boots raised many strange, reverberating echoes in the sacred edifice.

The sound alarmed Noakes, who crept along on tiptoe after his accomplice.

The door of the vestry was soon reached.

As Jonathan expected, it was locked.

But he did not care for that in the least, now that he was provided with Long Joe's burglarious implements.

He tried the skeleton keys first, and at length found one that fitted the lock of the vestry door exactly.

It creaked a little, and then opened.

"Here we are!" said Wild. "Now, Noakes, come in and shut the door. You hold the light, and I will soon get all the silver service."

Noakes, whose terror increased every moment, listened anxiously, as though he expected to hear some alarming sound.

But the silence of the very tomb itself reigned in and around the lonely country church, which surely, never since it had been built, had been so desecrated as on that eventful night.

With keen eyes, Jonathan glanced round the vestry, wondering where the plate would be most likely kept.

There were several cupboard doors in the walls.

But they were all fast.

Under the window was a large, strong wooden box of antique manufacture.

It was banded in many places with broad strips of iron, and altogether it presented the appearance of possessing great strength.

"That's it!" he said. "I would wager my life that the plate is in that box!"

"But how shall you get it open?"

"Oh! I shall do it, never fear!"

Again he made use of the skeleton keys, as they had been so serviceable to him on the former occasion.

But this time they were quite useless.

He tried one after the other, until at length, finding not a single one would suit, he flung the bunch down with an angry exclamation.

He carried the crowbar with which the slab had been propped up.

With this he thought he might be able to force the lid of the box open.

But it fitted too accurately.

There was no little crevice wherein he could insert the point of the instrument.

"What shall you do now?" asked Noakes.

"Why, not give up, of course. I have one resource left, and I know that will not fail. You will see."

Jonathan took a powder-flask from his pocket, and shook several grains into his hand.

Then, with great patience, he pressed the gunpowder into the keyhole of the chest until it was completely full.

He pressed it in tightly with one of the skeleton keys, ramming it as hard as he could.

When it was no longer possible to force in another grain, he took the candle from the hand of Mr. Noakes.

He applied the flame to the keyhole.

In a moment there was a puff of blue smoke and an explosion—not a loud one, and yet it sounded so in that silent place.

Involuntarily, Mr. Noakes stepped back several paces.

"Now hold the light again," said Wild. "Trust me, the box will open now!"

Noakes took the candle with a trembling hand.

The vestry was full of wreaths of fine blue smoke.

Jonathan eagerly made his way towards the box.

As he fully expected, the lock had been completely shattered.

One blow with his crowbar, followed by a crashing sound, and then the lid of the box fell back, revealing a treasure within that made Jonathan's eyes sparkle and glisten with avidity.

Even Mr. Noakes stepped forward, full of curiosity to look at the glittering plate.

"We'll try if we can carry all of it," said Wild—"we won't leave any behind! Wait a bit, you will see how I will manage it."

With great dexterity, Jonathan took out the pieces of plate one after the other.

He struck each one several heavy blows with the crowbar, so as to flatten it, and make it lie in the smallest possible compass.

It was previous to see such articles so ruthlessly treated. Soon the box was emptied of its valuable contents.

The cups, the salvers, the collecting plates—all, everything were beaten up into an indistinguishable mass.

The weight of the whole was something considerable, and therefore Jonathan proposed that the booty should be divided between them, that each should carry his share.

"But what are we to put it in?" said Noakes. "How are we to carry it? We want a sack, do we not?"

"We do; but it is out of the question to expect to find one here, I suppose?"

"Do you think so?"

"Yes—but I will find a substitute. Look here."

Grasping the crowbar once more, Jonathan struck one of the cupboard doors we have alluded to a heavy blow.

It was a blow the frail wood-work could not withstand.

The door swung open.

Inside several surplises were hanging.

"These are the things," said Wild. "Take one down for yourself, and tie up your share of the plate in it; make it as compact a bundle as you can, and leave a knot that you can grasp easily to carry it by, then we will reject our horses with all speed."

Mr. Noakes was highly delighted at the prospect of getting out of the church pretty soon.

The plate was tied up in the manner Jonathan Wild had directed.

Then each carrying a bundle passed out of the vestry into the church, and stole along the aisle until they came to the door by which they had entered.

It was still unfastened.

Hastily opening it, they ran out.

"Stoop down as you run," said Wild, in a suppressed voice, "and make haste!"

"What's the matter?"

"Nothing very serious, but I can tell by the look of the sky that the dawn is close at hand."

Mr. Noakes now made more exertion than he had done during the whole of the night.

He ran with might and main, and in a very brief space of time the iron gates were reached.

The bundles of plate were with some trouble thrown over on to the other side.

When, climbing up the iron-work as before, the two miscreants followed.

They reached the ground in safety, picked up the plate, and ran with redoubled speed towards the angle in the wall where they had left their horses.

Jonathan Wild was exceedingly anxious to be gone before daylight.

The horses were there in safety.

They had not been disturbed.

This was not wonderful, in such a quiet country place as that was.

Getting into the saddles, they placed the bundles of plate before them.

Then, spurring their horses violently, they set off across country at the top of their speed.

He almost fell from his horse from fright.

"Look—look," he said—"look behind you!"

Jonathan turned like lightning.

He uttered a curse.

Coming along at a furious pace, he could see a formidable-looking troop of police officers.

"Do you see them," asked Noakes—"do you see them?"

"Of course I do."

"We are lost—lost!"

"More likely found," said Jonathan, with a growl.

"But how can they again have got upon our track?"

"I am not sure that they have done so."

"Look back again."

"I have. They are at a great distance, and I question whether they can see us."

"What makes you think that?"

"Because we are down in this hollow and they are on the top of yonder hill. We must push on quickly—we shall elude them yet!"

Noakes groaned.

"Remember," added Wild, wishing to inspire his companion with courage—"remember that we are not more than forty miles from the sea-shore, and we have with us sufficient money, or money's worth."

"But what shall you do with the plate?"

"We must take it with us. Over in Holland, it will be the easiest matter in the world to get it sold for a good price. I know an agent there," continued Jonathan, gnashing his teeth, as though some disagreeable recollection had suddenly come across his mind.

The manner in which Jonathan spoke of the police officers in the rear, and the prospect of being so near to the coast, made a great difference in Mr. Noakes's feelings.

He did not believe that he was now in so much danger. In this, however, both himself and Wild were grievously in error.

As the reader will no doubt suspect, those police officers of whom they caught sight in the distance had been specially commissioned by the magistrate.

We may as well state here that, by the orders of this gentleman, the ruins of the mill had been thoroughly sifted and investigated.

The result of the search was the discovery of the body of the old miser.

How it was he came to be there, no one could tell.

But that he had met his death by violence—that, in fact, he had been murdered, there was ample evidence to be seen.

Then, making further inquiries, the magistrate soon became convinced that it was, indeed, no other than the two notorious villains, Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes, who had been lurking about in the vicinity, and who had committed the burglary at the inn.

He had communicated with the magistrate in the next town, and the result of the communication was the arming and the setting out of this very troop of police officers that Wild and Noakes beheld.

They held a special warrant to capture either of the miscreants dead or alive, the latter if possible, but if they resisted, and there seemed a probability that they would elude the hands of justice, they were to shoot them down without mercy.

The police officers had indeed kept very closely and accurately upon the two villains' track.

Whether Jonathan was right when he said he believed he was not seen, is more than we can say at present.

It made a considerable difference to his proceedings, however, now that he knew his pursuers were in the rear.

"I am confident we have not been observed at present," he said to Mr. Noakes, in an emphatic tone, "and if we are only careful we shall be safe enough."

"But what are we to do?"

"Why, we must avoid all open, rising ground. Keep close beneath the shadow of the trees and hedgerows, and if possible gain the cover of some wood or plantation. We must be on the look-out for something of the kind!"

Just then, as they continued their headlong flight, both noticed that they passed the entrance to a lane.

It was narrow, dark, and shady.

Tall trees grew on either side of it, planted closely to each other, and having long, outspreading boughs, which

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES ELUDE THE POLICE OFFICERS, AND FIND REFUGE IN A FOREST.

NOT until they had gone some distance did Mr. Noakes turn round to look behind him.

At length he did so.

interlaced and formed a kind of leafy canopy overhead.

"Hold!" cried Wild. "Pull up—that's the place."

The officers were now out of sight; they were hidden from view by the intervening vegetation.

The entrance to the dark lane was soon reached again, and Wild and Noakes plunged down it without the least hesitation.

Like all other country lanes, this one was tortuous and winding.

But Wild found no fault with it on that account, because it afforded him a better chance of getting free from his pursuers.

As they proceeded, the face of the country grew more and more woody.

Clumps of trees abounded everywhere, and in the distance there seemed a huge mass of dark boughs, which looked as though there was a forest not many miles away.

If he could only gain this place, Jonathan Wild felt that he should be secure.

Whether he should be able to do so unseen by the police officers was the difficulty.

At present he had succeeded well.

On, on they went, until the termination of this narrow lane was reached.

At the extremity they found a moss-grown gate, over which they made their horses leap.

They were then upon rather uneven ground, upon which the trees—most of them of giant size—grew thickly.

"Hurrah!" said Jonathan, beneath his voice. "We are out of sight here."

"But dawn is close at hand."

"Very true."

"We must not continue our flight by daylight."

"Certainly not," cried Wild. "I want to gain the cover of the forest. We can remain there during the day, and at nightfall can set out."

"And the plate—what shall we do with it?"

"That's a point we must consider about. Forward—forward! Let us gain the wood."

"This looks like the borders of it," said Noakes, glancing around.

"It does, and doubtless it is."

"I breathe now quite freely."

"And so do I."

Not relaxing their speed any more than the rough nature of the ground compelled them to, Wild and Noakes continued their course, until soon afterwards they found themselves fairly beneath the trees of a large forest, the name of which was unknown to them.

Suddenly they came upon a huge heap of stones, and when he saw them they suggested an idea to Wild's prolific brain.

"We will conceal our bundles beneath these stones," he said—"now, while we have the opportunity."

"For what reason? Why not keep them with us?"

"Because the officers may yet put us to some little trouble. We might escape if we were free and unencumbered. At any rate, no harm can come of placing the treasure here, because it is a place we can so easily find again."

To this Noakes assented.

It was easy enough to remove a quantity of stones and make a cavity large enough to allow the two bundles to be placed in it.

Then the stones were filled in on the top, so that the heap presented its ordinary appearance.

"Mark the spot well," said Jonathan.

"I don't think I shall mistake now."

"Forward, then! The deeper we can penetrate into the recesses of this wood the better. Our horses can rest during the day, and so can we, provided we go far enough. Then, before daybreak to-morrow morning, we shall be on board."

This was indeed good news for Mr. Noakes—too good, he feared, to be true.

He could scarcely believe that, after all their trouble and danger, he was so near reaching the end.

He was determined, however, when once he landed in another country, he would part company with Jonathan Wild.

It was only continual torment to remain with him.

He resolved, come what would, that their paths should in the future lie in opposite directions.

While these thoughts were passing through his mind, Jonathan's brain was also busy.

What were the dark thoughts that were passing through his mind we cannot now relate.

He roused himself from a kind of reverie, and spoke sharply to his companion to mend his pace.

Deeper and deeper they plunged into the recesses of the forest, and as they approached the centre so did their progress become more and more difficult.

At length they were compelled to alight and lead their horses by the bridle.

In this manner they went on for a considerable distance, until at length, breaking through some dense underwood, they came upon a strange spectacle, which had the effect of riveting them to the spot.

CHAPTER DCXXXVI.

RETURNS TO BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD.

At this time, both Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes jointly and severally believed that they were gradually freeing themselves from the danger with which they had been surrounded.

Escape they both believed was within their reach.

But in this they were most grievously mistaken.

Those who were upon their track were not like ordinary police officers.

Revenge and hatred were spurring them on, and surely beneath these two passions both Wild and Noakes must fall.

Steggs was taking careful measures to bring about the result upon which he had set his mind.

At the present moment, however, it is not with Steggs that we have to do, but with Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

It will be remembered that we left them last journeying towards the roadside inn at which they had before obtained such valuable information.

They were arrested in their progress by hearing a sound which at once attracted all their sympathies.

They had firmly resolved not to engage in any other enterprise whatever, nor to be led astray into the following out of any adventure, but to fix their minds constantly and entirely upon the one object they had in view.

But this sound that they heard caused them to hesitate.

It was a scream.

A scream evidently that came from female lips.

A scream that nothing besides great danger and terror, or perhaps bodily injury, could have elicited.

"You hear that, Jack?" said Blueskin.

"I do."

"And where is your resolution?"

"We must give way for once. Follow me. We could not leave any female in distress and ride calmly on without attempting to render her assistance."

"You are right—such a thing is not in your nature nor in mine. Forward, then!"

Guided by the screams, which were now frequent, our two friends pushed forward as rapidly as they could.

A few paces farther on along the highway they came to a lane that intersected it.

It was down this turning, on the left-hand side, that the cries proceeded.

As they rode on, the moon, which had been peeping forth occasionally from between the clouds, now poured down a full flood of radiance.

By the aid of this light, our friends saw a sight which made the blood boil in their veins.

A rufianly-looking fellow had hold of a female by the arm.

She was struggling desperately, but, in comparison with his, her strength was nothing.

With great violence he forced her to her knees.

Shriek after shriek escaped her lips.

"Silence!" he said. "I swear again that if you utter another cry like that, I will be as good as my word—you shall die! I would have put a bullet through you before, only I knew your screams would be of no avail—they could reach the ears of no one!"

He presented a pistol to the woman's head as he spoke.

At sight of the weapon held so close to her, and at the sinister countenance of the man, she clasped her hands together and seemed about to faint with fright.

More than this, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard did not wait to see.

They bounded forward, and came upon the footpad at unawares.

Before he knew of their approach—before he could escape, Blueskin had seized him by the throat.

With a sudden movement he twisted the pistol from the fellow's grasp.

But Blueskin was under no necessity of taking these strict measures.

No sooner did he find himself caught, than the man, who was a rank coward, trembled and shook like a leaf, and but for Blueskin's grasp would have sunk quite down upon the ground.

"Mercy—mercy, good sir!" he said,—"mercy—mercy! I meant no harm!"

"Meant no harm?"

"No—no, on my word, no harm! It was only—only a jest!"

"Then it is a jest you shall pay dearly for! Remain still, or your life will be the forfeit!"

In the meanwhile, Jack had alighted from his steed and gone towards the lady.

Now that deliverance had come she had fallen down in the road quite insensible.

But she quickly recovered herself, and Jack asked:

"Are you hurt—are you hurt?"

"No—no! Pray help me to rise! I cannot thank you as I ought—I have no time."

"Have you been robbed of anything?" asked Jack.

"Nothing whatever, because I carry nothing that he could take."

"Then why did he attack you?"

"I suppose he thought I must have valuables of some kind with me. But I can't stay—indeed I can't! I am bound upon an errand of life and death, and every second is of the greatest importance, and that wretch has already hindered me several minutes!"

"We will settle with him," said Jack. "Don't fear that he will trouble you again. I trust you will meet with no further interruptions."

"No, no—I don't fear it. Farewell! Accept my deepest thanks for the service you have rendered me."

It was quite a young girl who spoke, and there was an expression of extreme pain and woe upon her countenance.

From some cause or other, she was evidently suffering deeply.

As soon as she had spoken these words, accompanying them by a glance which said more than her lips possibly could have said, she darted off along the road, and was in a moment out of sight.

"Now, rascal," said Blueskin, as he shook the footpad to and fro, "what reason have you to urge why I should not at once put an end to your miserable existence?"

"Mercy—mercy!"

"Cowardly wretch! have you no spark of manly feeling in you? Would you be so base—so contemptible—as to lie in wait, and then spring out upon a helpless, defenceless woman, and threaten her as you did?"

The man was silent.

"Come," said Jack, "don't stay talking with him, Blueskin. We will not let him go, however—he deserves something for his conduct. Alight a moment, and I will show you the way to treat him."

The man glared apprehensively about him, and renewed his supplications for mercy.

But Blueskin and Jack Sheppard disregarded them quite as much as he did the appeals of the lady.

Between them they could hold the rascal tight.

Jack had observed close by the side of the lane a small pool of stagnant water, the odour from which was most offensive.

The surface was thickly overgrown with slime and that disagreeable kind of vegetation which always flourishes in such places.

Blueskin understood in a second what Jack intended to do, and how the footpad was to be punished.

Between them they seized hold of him, neck and heels, and swung him backwards and forwards until they had obtained the necessary impetus.

The footpad, too, knew what fate was in store for him, and struggled and kicked.

But all in vain.

"Now!" said Jack, suddenly.

As he spoke the word, he let go his hold.

So did Blueskin.

There was a loud splash, after which Blueskin and Jack were glad enough to retreat.

That pool must have been a spot where all the refuse of the country round was collected.

While the waters were quiescent the stench was insufferable.

But when stirred up by the man falling in, they were compelled to beat a hasty retreat.

The sound of splashing reached their ears for some moments.

The man was making the most frantic efforts to escape from his unsavoury bath.

But seemingly in vain.

"Let him be," said Blueskin, as he mounted his steed. "That fellow was never born to be drowned, and this, I hope, will be a caution to him."

"He will not forget it," said Jack, "depend upon that! But now, Blueskin, let us once more get upon the high-road. We are losing valuable time. Come, forward—quick!"

Blueskin scarcely required urging.

As soon as he was fairly in the saddle, he turned his horse's head round in the direction they ought to take.

Altogether, the interruption had not occupied very many minutes.

Still, however, they were at a considerable distance from the inn they wished to reach.

This was the point at which their inquiries had to commence, and they would have to patiently track Jonathan step by step from there, until eventually they came up with him.

They had every incentive to make good speed.

But, in spite of their impatience, they recollected their steeds.

They knew how much depended upon them, and how serious the consequences would be if either happened to be knocked up or otherwise disabled.

At length, about two hours afterwards, Blueskin raised his arm, and said:

"There, Jack—there is the public-house!"

CHAPTER DCXXXVII.

JOE THE OSTLER FURNISHES BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD WITH HIGHLY IMPORTANT INFORMATION.

"Will you stop there again?" asked Jack.

"I think we had better."

"As you will. I am indifferent, and yet some little refreshment would be welcome enough."

"Yes, and to our horses as well."

"We cannot hear intelligence of this kind too often, and we may extract something that escaped us on the former occasion."

This settled the point, and they halted near the gates at the side of the inn.

The ostler, with his face still presenting a most remarkable appearance in consequence of the quantity of sticking-plaster that crossed and recrossed it in every direction, came lounging forward.

"Going to bait, gentlemen?" he said.

"No—you can just give the horses a mouthful of hay, and let them have a drop of water, that's all."

"Going to ride far to-night, gentlemen?" said the ostler, looking up to the sky.

"Yes—most probably."

"Then, if your journey is not very urgent, I should recommend you to put it off."

"Why?"

"It will be an uncommon rough night—that it will."

"How can you tell?"

"By the look of the sky, and by the way the wind whistles round the corner of the stable. I always know when there is a storm brewing. Take my word, in less than half an hour the rain will come down in a perfect flood."

Blueskin looked inquiringly at Jack.

But the latter only said:

"Our business is urgent, and you would say so if you knew what it is."

"Well, what might it be, sir?"

"We are going after Jonathan Wild."

The ostler uttered a yell.

"Jonathan Wild?" he uttered, in a tone of the greatest passion.

"Yes—we are determined to capture him. We know he was here."

"Yes, d—n him," interrupted the ostler, "and so do I. Look at my face."

"We heard all about that when we were here last," said Jack. "You have a score to settle with him?"

"I have; but I shall be content to see him swinging some morning from the gallows at Tyburn—that'll content me. I shall live to see it too, I know I shall!"

"Very likely," continued Jack; "that is if our exertions can go for anything. Will you tell us all you can about him?"

"But I don't know much."

"Very likely, yet the little you are acquainted with may be of more service to us than you may imagine."

"Well, then, gentlemen what is it you want to know?"

"Why, will you tell us, if possible, which way he went when he left the inn?"

"Oh, yes, I can do that."

"And if you can give us any clue to his proceedings afterwards we shall be infinitely obliged."

"I can do that too," said the ostler, with gleaming eyes.

"Very well, speak out—speak freely."

With a great deal of circumstantial detail, the ostler then informed Jack how in the first place he had recognised Jonathan Wild—how that worthy had become aware of the fact, and how he flung the mug into the unfortunate man's face.

He related, too, how he had sprung, bare-backed, upon one of the horses with nothing but the halter to guide him, and how he had pursued Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes for some distance, keeping in advance of the officers.

These facts are well known to the reader.

But it is necessary to mention just what information Blueskin and Jack received.

Joe the ostler related how he had been wounded, and how his horse had entangled his feet in the rope of the halter and thrown him to the ground.

"That's as far as I can speak myself," he added. "I pursued them straight along the road that leads past this inn, I suppose for a matter of two miles or more."

"And after that you know nothing?"

"Nothing, positively, that I saw myself."

"But you do know something?"

"Oh yes!"

"What is it? Speak out—all this is most important to us!"

"Well, then, the officers, after my downfall, continued their pursuit. I should tell you that I fired and wounded one of the wretches."

"Which was it?—Jonathan Wild?"

"No—I wish it was."

"Mr. Noakes, then?"

"Yes, and by the track of blood he left behind him the officers were able to track the villains very well. I found out these particulars by degrees, you understand."

"Yes, yes."

"Well, then, after a good deal of trouble, they traced Jonathan and Mr. Noakes to a wood, and then to a hut in that wood, where some coiners had taken up their quarters, and from there to an old barn, where they lay for some time concealed."

"And did they make their escape from the barn?"

"They were altogether too clever for the officers. They seem to me to have had pretty much their own way."

"But this," said Blueskin, "is much more than I could have hoped to learn to-night. Can you describe the position of this barn?"

"Oh, yes, quite well; but I can direct you beyond that."

"Can you, indeed?"

"Yes. While along with the coiners, Jonathan and Mr. Noakes escaped, but they left their horses behind them and they fell into the hands of the police; so when they got out of the barn, they ran on foot a considerable distance until they came to a public-house. Dear me, what was the sign of that public-house?"

"Can't you recollect it?"

"Not at this moment—but I shall directly. I know, however, that it was kept by a man named Timothy Goodridge?"

"Did the officers follow them to this place?"

"Yes, and obtained certain intelligence of them. The landlord had been kind enough to show them some hospitality, believing them to be men in distress, so they took advantage of it to steal two of his best horses out of the stable."

"This is excellent," said Jack. "Why, we shall be close up to him in a little while?"

"But I can tell you more," said the ostler, who was delighted at the opportunity of imparting all the information he possessed.

"What do you know? What became of them after they left this public-house?"

"Well, I only know they rode on for some distance until they met with a traveller, whom they robbed and shot. There the trace ends, however, and I can tell you no more."

"It is quite sufficient," said Blueskin—"a thousand times more than we had dared to anticipate."

"I wish I knew where he was now," said Joe, gnashing his teeth savagely, "I would pretty soon put you on the scent."

"You have done quite enough, and our thanks are your due. Here, take this as a reward for all you have told us."

"No, no, gentlemen—I don't want money for a case like this. I didn't tell for money, but in order that that villain might be nabbed. I have had serious thoughts of setting out after him myself."

"You had better leave it to us," said Blueskin. "We have a long score to settle with him, but the day is close at hand."

"But I should not recommend you to begin your journey to-night, for all that."

"What, in consequence of the weather?"

"Yes—it will be a rough night, and no mistake. There—did you feel that? I know what that means."

The ostler alluded to a sudden gust of wind, upon which was borne a number of rain drops that sprinkled everything.

Then the moisture was gone.

"That's the forerunner of the storm," he said. "It will be a regular drencher. It is no interest of mine, but take my advice—go into the house and stay there till the storm is over."

"Well, we'll think of it. Lead our horses into the stable, and attend to them well."

"You may rely upon that."

"We shall depend upon you," said Blueskin, "for in this matter our horses will be of the utmost importance to us."

"I know that," said the ostler.

And as he spoke, he led the two horses away.

Blueskin and Jack watched him until he disappeared. They saw him once or twice look up to the sky and shake his head.

The heavens did indeed present a threatening aspect.

Huge, dense, leaden-coloured clouds were covering up the sky in every direction, and there was that peculiar feel in the air which is always noticed before a storm.

"I think the ostler is right," said Jack, as they reached the threshold of the inn. "However, we'll get something to drink. It will be a storm of no ordinary kind that will keep me back to-night."

"I may say the same," said Blueskin, "and yet, considering the amount of information we have so unexpectedly gained, we can well afford to stay for a few hours if we find it necessary."

"Just so, and when we reach this other inn, the sign of which, by the way, we must make ourselves acquainted with, I hope we shall obtain as much intelligence respecting Jonathan's movements as we have obtained here."

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES TAKE VIOLENT POSSESSION OF A BOAT.]

CHAPTER DCXXXVIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD HOPE TO HEAR STILL FURTHER INTELLIGENCE RESPECTING JONATHAN WILD.

"I HOPE so," replied Jack, "and yet I scarcely expect it. But come on—we will sit down and make ourselves comfortable for a few minutes, at any rate."

"Will you take a private room if there is one to be had, or will you join those who are in that room yonder? Look, it seems to be almost full."

Blueskin and Jack were in the passage of the inn, and, as the former spoke, he pointed to an open door.

Beyond this, a partial view of a room could be obtained, in which a number of men were sitting round a huge, roaring fire.

"I hardly know how to answer that question," said No. 138.—BLUESKIN.

Jack. "If we consult our own safety only, we must take a private room!"

"It is necessary that we should do that."

"Look to our own safety?"

"Yes."

"I know it; but, at the same time, I think, if the risk is not too great, that it will be better for us to enter the room yonder."

"So do I," replied Blueskin; "for, in the casual conversation, something may be dropped respecting our hated foe which will be important to us."

"It is more than likely," said Jack, "considering that he paid a visit to this very place."

"Don't let us stand here deliberating any longer, then."

"Have you made up your mind to run the risk?"

"I have."

"Then come."

So saying, Blueskin and Jack entered the tap-room, or, rather, front kitchen of the inn, taking care to do so quietly and unobtrusively, so as not to bring any more notice down upon them than they could possibly help.

They chose a retired corner and sat down.

The eyes of all present were turned upon them when they entered; but the only light in the kitchen came from the huge fire.

This light, then, was flickering and inconstant, and a very difficult one to recognise people by, in consequence of the ever-flitting shadows which it cast.

Blueskin called for refreshments, which were quickly laid before them.

For some time after their arrival, a profound silence reigned.

The conversation that had been going on among the regular frequenters of the place suddenly ceased.

Not one of them now seemed able to articulate a word.

By degrees the darkness much increased.

Then, suddenly, the room was lighted up by a bright and vivid flash of lightning.

"We're going to have a rough night of it," said one in the company. "I thought, before now, that we should have it. Hark!"

The voice of the speaker was drowned in a loud and deafening peal of thunder, which seemed to shake the old inn to its very foundations.

Then followed the rain.

It came down in a perfect torrent, striking with full force against the window-panes.

The rushing noise it made by its descent could be distinctly heard by all.

"The ostler was quite right," whispered Jack, "when he prophesied what sort of a night we should have."

"He was quite right. We cannot do better now than take his advice—such a storm as this is sufficient to quell even my impatience."

"Yes, and mine; and I am inclined to think that the time we shall spend here will be by no means thrown away, and that we shall learn, perhaps, some important information."

"Well, we shall see. But how the rain does come down!"

"It is terrific!"

In good truth, a long time had elapsed since there had been a storm so fierce as that was.

The thunder crashed, and the lightning blazed almost incessantly.

By degrees, however, its violence abated.

That is to say, longer pauses took place between the peals of thunder, though the rain still poured down with undiminished vigour.

The remark that had been made about the roughness of the night served to unlock the tongues of all the rest, and now the conversation went on rapidly and as well as the peals of thunder would permit.

Every now and then the voices would be drowned by the crashing din.

At present, however, nothing had been said sufficiently interesting to deserve recording.

Blueskin and Jack both hoped that the conversation would quickly work round to the subject of Jonathan Wild.

But for the fear of attracting too much attention to themselves, they would have started the topic.

Prudence, however, bade them be silent and wait their time.

At present, it was quite out of the question for them to leave the inn, so they leaned back in their seats, pretending not to take any notice of anything that was going forward.

Suddenly one man, addressing another who sat near to him, said:

"What was that you were going to say about Jonathan Wild a little while ago? You never finished."

"I don't know that I had anything to say about him particularly," was the reply. "I was only going to ask whether they had nabbed him yet."

"I have not heard of it—have you?"

"No."

"Nor any of you?"

"No."

"Then I suppose the villain is at large. It's a sin and a shame that he should be. Such a man is neither fit to live nor die; yet, for the sake of others, he is better out of this world than in it!"

There was a tinge of bitterness in the man's voice as he thus spoke, and Blueskin and Jack both immediately jumped to the conclusion that he had more than a passing interest in Jonathan Wild's fate, and that, for some reason or other, he had especial cause to hate him.

"He is a great rascal!" exclaimed another, "if all that we have heard of him is true; but, then, that is questionable, so many stories are set abroad by one and another."

"Very true," added another; "and we must remember the old proverb."

"What old proverb?"

"None in particular. I might say no grounds at all; only I never believe quite all I hear."

"And you think Jonathan Wild may not be so bad after all?"

"I do."

"What grounds have you for thinking so?"

"None in particular. I might say no grounds at all; only I never believe quite all I hear."

"But Jonathan Wild, as is well known, has excelled in every kind of atrocity. There is no crime—no barbarity which he has not committed. He is ruthless, vindictive, and a fiend rather than a man!"

"You are no friend of his, Mr. Thorpe."

"I am not," was the reply; "and I trust that not in all the world could such a man find a friend."

"Well, there's one comfort," cried another, "he will be scragged one of these days, and there will be an end of him—we shall be troubled no longer."

"He ought to have been executed long ago," said Mr. Thorpe; "it puzzles me to understand why such demons are allowed to live and wreak the havoc that they do."

"I suppose there's a purpose in it," was the reply.

"Perhaps so; but I find it hard to think so; I cannot believe that things are ordered for the best."

Mr. Thorpe's listener looked at him in surprise.

Such words as he had just uttered had never before reached their ears.

Not one of them had ever ventured to dispute the divine fitness of things as he did then.

But he was well known to all of them as a well-to-do, respectable man, generally gloomy and reserved, though at times he spoke somewhat freely, as he seemed inclined then.

The general impression was that he had a heavy secret weighing upon his mind—that something had occurred to him in his early youth that had blighted all his hopes and destroyed his happiness.

He was ever anxious upon the subject of Jonathan Wild's capture.

His visits to the public-house where he now sat were few and far between.

The approaching storm had caused him to take shelter there on that occasion.

Although so far as his social position and education went he was far superior to any there, yet, being naturally affable and pleasant, he sat down, treating all with condescension and consideration.

He was a great favourite with all who knew him, and the guests in the public-house paid him every imaginable respect.

CHAPTER DCXXXIX.

SOME PARTICULARS CONNECTED WITH JONATHAN WILD ARE BROUGHT TO LIGHT.

MR. THORPE had noticed the surprise that his words had caused, so he remarked:

"You seem astonished, my friend, to hear me make such an assertion; but, strange as it may be, it is nevertheless perfectly true. I have been betrayed into saying more than I intended, but yet I repeat I find myself unable to reconcile myself to what are called the decrees of providence, and believe that things are ordered for the best."

"But why not, sir—why not?" asked several.

"Now that I have spoken so far," replied Mr. Thorpe, "you have a perfect right to ask that question—it is no more than natural."

"Well, sir, will you tell us why not?"

"It would take a long time."

"But we will listen, sir; and, as for this storm, although the thunder does seem to be going off a bit, yet the rain comes down as fast as ever, so if you would not mind."

A shade came over Mr. Thorpe's face.

"It will reap up the past," he said, "and yet I am always thinking about it—it is never absent from my mind."

There was a silence after this speech, for it was one very difficult to reply to.

Mr. Thorpe sat with his arms folded, and his eyes fixed upon the fire.

For several minutes he remained thus.

Then he broke the silence that prevailed by saying:

"My friends, I will tell you something about Jonathan Wild."

Blueskin and Jack started.

"Jonathan Wild?" exclaimed several.

"Yes. I will tell you one incident in his career—one episode out of many—one dark, revolting crime that he committed—a crime for which, in my opinion, he deserves to die a thousand deaths, each one more painful than the first."

He ground his teeth as he spoke.

"Then, did you ever have any dealings with him?" asked some one.

"Yes, but many years ago—so many that, although a villain of the blackest die, he was not then so guilty—so diabolical as he is now."

All bent forward eagerly, anxious to catch every word that Mr. Thorpe should utter.

"When I have told you this little anecdote," he said, at length, "I fancy that there will not be one among you who will fancy that Jonathan Wild is not so bad as he is represented—on the contrary, unless I am greatly mistaken, your hearts will all burn with the desire that he may meet with that punishment which the law of this land awards to those who have been guilty of only one crime out of thousands he has committed."

"We will be all attention, Mr. Thorpe," said a voice. "You have made us very curious to hear what you will say."

"Well, then, I must tell you that many years ago there lived in a village not many miles from London, a fair young girl, who was universally admired, not only for her beauty, which was matchless, but for all those graces which make women dear and lovely."

"She won the respect of all who knew her by her unimpeachable conduct, and for miles round there was not one young man who would not have given all that he possessed for one smile from her lips."

Mr. Thorpe spoke with some emotion, as though this mention of the young girl called up memories of the past that awakened in his breast emotions which had long been dormant.

"This is a point upon which I could dwell at some length, but I shall not. I will only tell you that Jonathan Wild, then carrying on the business of a constable or thief-taker, happened one day to pass the cottage in which she dwelt. Ellen—for that was her name—was in the little bit of carefully-cultivated garden in front of the cottage, and which was separated from the road by some low, white palisades."

"She was engaged in some gardening operations when Jonathan, riding by, perceived her. His heart—if such a one as he is can possess one—was touched immediately by her beauty, and he resolved that he would make her his wife. I say wife, though I have no actual means of knowing that his intentions were good—so far as that I would not speak without proof."

"At that time, Jonathan Wild's power was immense. All knew it, and all dreaded him. Jonathan himself was aware of this, and it galled him deeply, so that he made it an excuse for perpetrating so many cruelties as he did."

"Having conceived this determination, he said nothing to the girl, nor did he act in a way that would lead her to suspect that any such thoughts had found a place in his mind."

"But he went direct to the girl's parents, and made his overtures to them. They were good, simple people, and had heard much of the great power that Jonathan Wild possessed. It is probable that they exaggerated it, and, therefore, they did not as they should have done—at once have rejected his proposal, and abided by the consequences; they adopted a medium course, for they told him that it was not their intention to control their daughter's inclinations in any way. So far as they were concerned, she was at liberty to wed just whoever she thought proper."

"You have a fair, open field before you, Mr. Wild," said Ellen's father. "Make your suit, and, if you can induce my daughter to look favourably upon you, why, well and good. If she consents, mine shall not be wanting. I can say no fairer than that."

"This was not what the thief-taker wanted, but he made it appear as though he was quite delighted with the answer he had received."

"He tried as well as he could to make himself amiable. Whether he succeeded or failed is more than I can tell just at present."

"But not to linger too long, I will just add that he lost no time in making his advances to Ellen."

"As might be expected, the young and lovely girl looked upon Jonathan Wild with complete disdain."

"She did not attempt to conceal her sentiments, but let her suitor know exactly what she thought of him. It was nothing favourable, you may depend; and, with rage in his heart, Jonathan departed."

"For the time he was baffled, but not conquered."

"Ere long he returned to the charge again."

"Have you thought well upon my proposal?" he asked—have you considered it?"

"No," was the reply; "I have never deemed it worthy a moment's thought," replied Ellen. "You are already acquainted with my sentiments. I will never be your wife!"

"We shall see," said Jonathan, frowning darkly—"we shall see!"

"See what?"

"Look here, girl," added the thief-taker. "You may know my name—you may have heard of me—you may have been told—you may have guessed of the power I possess; but, rest assured, you can form no idea of its extent!"

"Nor do I wish to do so!" was the reply. "I do not desire to learn anything respecting you! Begone!—leave me!"

"I will not! I once again ask you whether you will say yes to my proposition?"

"No—no!" she answered—"no—ten thousand times no!"

"Well, then," answered Jonathan Wild, "if you persist in this refusal, you yourself shall be covered with disgrace and shame! Through you your parents shall live a miserable life, with a load of care weighing upon them—pressing them down—yes, pressing them into the grave! They will die with deep sorrow in their hearts, and you will be the cause!"

"Such ambiguous, threatening words as these, as you may easily expect, produced upon the mind of a girl like Ellen a deep and terrible impression."

"She loved her parents dearly, and above all earthly things desired they should be happy."

"Dark tales had from time to time reached her ears of what Jonathan Wild had done."

"She was alarmed and terrified, and the villainous thief-taker was not slow to perceive the great effect his words had already caused."

CHAPTER DCXL.

JONATHAN WILD GLUTS HIS REVENGE.

"BEWARE!" he said. "I tell you to beware, and not to tempt me too far! I say, beware of the consequences of your refusal!"

"Ellen tried to summon up some degree of resolution, and with more spirit than Jonathan expected, she replied:

"Begone! I have not another word to say to you! I will not speak!"

"This enraged the thief-taker exceedingly, so, clenching his fists, he said:

"But I say you shall—you shall! You will repent, and when it is too late! Remember, too, that the consequences will fall heavily, not only on the heads of your parents, but on your own! You shall perish—yes, surely perish by a painful, lingering death, and by a death which must of all others be most hateful to one of your sex!"

"But again Ellen refused him, and muttering indistinct threats of vengeance, he departed.

"I must now tell you that Ellen used frequently to go up to the manor-house where the squire resided. She was employed by the squire's wife to do a great deal of needlework, and when she had performed it, she used to take it home.

"She was a great favourite with everyone at the manor-house, the squire himself included. She was permitted to go into the lady's own room.

"One morning, when, according to custom, she went, she found the squire's wife in a great state of pleasurable excitement. She was so overjoyed that she could not contain herself, and so turning to Ellen, she said:

"See—see, my girl, what a handsome present I have received this morning—my husband gave it me! It is our wedding-day. Look—look!—is it not beautiful?"

"While speaking, she held out a small box. Pressing a spring, the lid flew open and disclosed a beautiful gold watch, thickly encrusted with precious stones. It was of the very best manufacture, and worth a fabulous amount. It was made to be as expensive as possible. Attached to it was a slender gold chain of exquisite workmanship.

"Upon this object Ellen gazed with clasped hands and dilated eyes. Never before had she seen anything so beautiful, and she was loud in her praises and exclamations of delight.

"The good lady was well enough pleased to find that Ellen so appreciated her gift.

"At length, and with reluctance, the lid was shut down and the box put aside; Ellen then delivered the package she had brought, and in reply, the squire's wife said:

"Wait a moment, my good girl—wait a moment! Sit down, and I will go and fetch you a dress for my little girl, which I want you to embroider in the very best way you are able. Sit down while I fetch it—I will soon return."

"She passed out of the room as she spoke, leaving Ellen seated at no great distance from the table on which the little velvet box containing the watch had been placed.

"A few minutes elapsed, and then a servant appeared at the door.

"If you please," she said, addressing Ellen, "my mistress wishes to see you downstairs."

"She rose in a moment and followed the servant. The packet of work was duly handed over to her, and after a few commonplace words, Ellen set out on her journey home.

"Not to linger, after her departure a friend arrived, to whom the squire's wife was anxious to display the gift she had that morning received.

"She went to the table upon which she had placed it, but to her horror and consternation it was gone.

"In vain she searched hurriedly all over the apartment, wondering where she could have placed it.

"A dreadful fear took possession of her mind. Her excitement was something dreadful to witness. By degrees, however, she calmed herself, and then renewed the search.

"She did not cease until she had examined the room carefully in every part.

"When she had done so, she was forced to come to the conclusion that the watch was gone.

"Who has been in the room?" asked her friend, sympathising deeply with her distress. "In my opinion, it has been taken. Who has been in the room?"

"Ellen!" was the reply.

"And who is she?"

"A poor girl living in the village, to whom I give employment in needlework. I left her here for a few moments about half an hour ago."

"And did she know you had the watch?"

"Yes, I showed it to her."

"And did she see you put it down again?"

"Yes. I remember now distinctly, I placed it just here upon the table."

"Then the matter is quite clear—she must have taken it."

"I will not believe it!" said the squire's wife. "I have known the girl from childhood, and cannot credit that she would be guilty of such an act!"

"She may have succumbed in a moment of temptation."

"The lady could not tell, but hastened downstairs to her husband.

"His rage was very great when he learned that his handsome gift had been mislaid or stolen.

"For some moments he was frantic.

"Then he said:

"Mind no one leaves this house—take care of that! The watch has evidently been stolen, and I will discover by whom!"

"How?" inquired his terrified wife. "What steps shall you take?"

"I will ride off to London immediately!" he said. "I will go to the famous Jonathan Wild—I will warrant he will find out who is the thief!"

"At that time," said Mr. Thorpe, interrupting himself in his narrative, "you must remember that although some ugly whispers had been circulated concerning Jonathan Wild, yet he was looked upon as a very effective police officer indeed, and one who was quite invaluable in the recovery of stolen property.

"It was in this character that the worthy squire had heard of the villain.

"A friend had told him how, in a seemingly miraculous manner, Jonathan Wild had restored to him a quantity of valuables of which he had been robbed.

"It was, therefore, no more than natural that he should set out for the residence of the thief-taker.

"The distance to London was little more than ten miles, and as the squire was mounted on an excellent horse it did not take him long to reach Wild's residence.

"He knocked at the door of his house and was admitted.

"He was requested to state his business, but would only say that he desired to see Jonathan Wild.

"He is not at home at present," said the man who had charge of the front door, "nor can I tell you when he may return. He generally makes his appearance when least expected."

"This was vexatious to the squire, for he was all impatience.

"While he was in conversation with the man in the passage, however, there came a sharp rattling sound at the front door, and then it opened.

"Jonathan Wild entered, and the squire instinctively shrank back from so repulsive-looking a scoundrel.

"Well, he stated the whole of the circumstances to Jonathan Wild, that worthy taking down nearly every word upon a sheet of paper.

"Then he said:

"I will not tell you in what directions my suspicions lie, because I may be in error. In as short a time as I possibly can I will wait upon you at your residence, and let you know the result."

"And do you think you shall succeed, Mr. Wild? It is not so much the punishment of the offender that I desire as the recovery of the watch, which cost me a very large sum indeed."

"You must leave the matter entirely in my hands," rejoined Wild. "I will do my best for you, depend upon it. In matters like this it is very rarely indeed that I fail, and I feel tolerably sure of the result in this instance."

CHAPTER DCXLI.

JONATHAN WILD PLAYS HIS VILLANOUS PART TO ADMIRATION.

"In the course of a day or two, Jonathan Wild paid a visit to the squire's house.

"He pretended to make a careful examination of it, and asked numberless questions of the squire's wife, and indeed of all the inhabitants of the place.

"Then, going to the squire, he said:

"All that I have yet learned only serves to convince me that my original suspicion was correct. In these matters I am seldom wrong—I seem to arrive at the right conclusion by a kind of instinct."

"Then you believe it has been stolen?"

"Yes, unquestionably."

"And the culprit—who may that be?"

"The girl Ellen."

"Impossible—I will not believe it! I would as soon believe my own wife was guilty!"

"It is no rash statement I have made," added Wild—"I can assure you I have good grounds for speaking! She is the guilty person!"

"How do you know it?"

"Why, it seems to me perfectly clear that your wife's incautious act of showing it to her raised in her heart a feeling of cupidity. She was left alone in the room with this valuable ornament—the temptation was before her, and she could not resist it. She secreted the little velvet box about her person and carried it away."

"You speak positively, Mr. Wild."

"I do. I feel almost as certain as I should do if I had seen her."

"And what has she done with the watch?"

"That's a question I am at present unable to answer, but doubtless I shall be able to give you a reply ere long."

"Has it been disposed of?"

"No—I can answer that question positively. My own belief is, that she was overcome with terror and remorse after committing the theft, and in order to conceal the crime, has hidden the watch somewhere, thinking, perhaps, that the inquiry will die out in time, and then she will be able to possess herself of it."

"And supposing she has hidden the watch in the way you say, do you believe you shall be able to find out where?"

"I think so—at any rate, I will try."

"With these words Jonathan Wild took his leave, and did not make his appearance for several days."

"But during that time he was noticed lurking about the village."

"There was perhaps nothing extraordinary in this, considering the task he had undertaken to perform, however."

"He at length went to the squire, and said:

"I feel certain that the watch is concealed somewhere in or about the cottage. You have sufficient grounds to demand a search—will you, then, accompany one of my men to the place, and watch the result?"

"The squire consented, and the whole party made their way to the cottage in which Ellen dwelt."

"She viewed their approach with astonishment, and when she saw that Jonathan Wild was among them, she started violently."

"The squire perceived it, and drew from it his own conclusions."

"Ellen had been made aware of the loss of the watch, but she had not been told that the principal suspicion was directed towards herself."

"But when the squire saw her lovely countenance, and reflected what would be the consequences to her if this case were brought against her, his heart was touched with pity."

"Making a sign with his hand to Jonathan Wild and his men, he advanced, saying:

"I have come upon a very sad errand here, Ellen—a very sad one indeed. You must be aware that that beautiful watch has been stolen from my house. Inquiry has been made, and I grieve to say it for your own and your parents' sake, the suspicion rests on you."

"Ellen turned very pale, and seemed about to faint."

"The blow was as unexpected as it was terrible."

"I am very sorry for you, Ellen," continued the squire, "and, if I can, will shield you from the consequences of the act you have committed. Tell me where the watch is—surrender it to me, and I will give you my word that you shall be troubled no more in this affair. I will find the means to close Jonathan Wild's lips, and you will escape the consequences of your guilty act."

"Indeed—indeed, sir," sobbed Ellen, "do you really think that I could be so base—so guilty?"

"The squire frowned."

"The words displeased him."

"After such a conciliating speech, he imagined Ellen would immediately admit her crime."

"I am not guilty!" she cried, vehemently. "I did not take the watch! I know nothing about it! Your suspicions are ill-directed!"

"Then you refuse to do as I desire—to partake of the mercy which I was willing to show?"

"Yes, sir, I am, for I am innocent—quite innocent!"

"Then the only course left is to search this cottage thoroughly. I have every reason to believe that the watch will be discovered. Recollect, Ellen, I give you one more opportunity. Tell me where the watch is, or give it to me, and you shall meet with no further trouble."

"I can't, sir—I can't! I know nothing about it! The last time I saw it, it was upon the dressing-table near the window."

"The squire turned round angrily at this refusal."

"His voice was loud—angry—as he said to Wild:

"Search this place—search it thoroughly, and if you find the watch, as I hope you will, take the girl into custody. She deserves it for her obstinacy."

"She does indeed!" returned Wild, with a bow. "She must have great confidence in the excellence of the hiding-place she has found. That's the reason why she denies her manifest guilt."

"Indignant words rose up to Ellen's lips, but she repressed them."

"The consternation of her parents was very great."

"Not for a single moment did they believe their beloved daughter guilty."

"But the mere fact of her having been suspected, and the house searched, was almost more than they could bear."

"All through their lives they had preserved an excellent character for justness and integrity."

"Therefore they felt this suspicion all the more keenly."

"Jonathan Wild was occupied a long time in searching about the premises."

"But he met with no result."

"The squire stood by, watching all anxiously and eagerly."

"At last he began to think that Jonathan Wild was mistaken, and that Ellen was innocent."

"I have searched the house thoroughly, said the thief-taker, coming towards him."

"And have you found nothing?"

"Nothing at present."

"Jonathan laid a peculiar emphasis on the last two words."

"Where shall you search now?"

"Only the garden is left. I should have begun with it at the first, since it offers such a ready means of concealment; but I judged it better to examine the house first. I am satisfied the watch is not there. Now I will try the garden."

"Jonathan and his men poked about among the garden-beds for the space of a couple of hours at least."

"Nothing was found, however, and again the squire felt inclined to think that his suspicions were unfounded."

"He had almost arrived at this conclusion, indeed, when he was startled by a shout, and, looking up, saw that an unusual commotion was going on with Wild's men in one portion of the garden."

"Guessing what had happened, he hastened in that direction."

"Here, sir—come, look—tell me whether I am right?" said Wild. "Look at this!"

"He pointed down to the ground, and then the squire saw in a little hole, half buried by the earth, the velvet case that formed a covering of the watch."

"I have not touched it yet," said Wild—"Dicks found it. Now, however, as you have seen it here, I will pick it up."

"He suited the action to the word."

"Is that the case?" he asked.

"I believe it is," answered the squire. "Open it—let me look inside."

"Jonathan touched a spring."

"The lid flew open."

"Lying there, in the little padded recess that had been provided for it, was the watch, with the slender gold chain encircling it."

"Yes," cried the squire, "that's it—I'll swear to it from a thousand. She is guilty—guilty—there can be no doubt about it! But I am very sorry for the poor girl—very sorry indeed!"

CHAPTER DCXLII.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS THAT THINGS DO NOT GO ON QUITE AS HE EXPECTED.

"No one was more startled and astonished upon learning that the watch had been found in the garden than was poor Ellen herself.

"She sank down at once upon the ground in a swoon.

"It was not without great difficulty that she was restored to consciousness.

"The squire was very sorry for her; and, had it been in his power, I do believe that he would have forgiven her for the crime of which he believed her guilty.

"He even called Jonathan Wild aside and said something to that effect.

"But the thief-taker shook his head, and replied:

"No, sir—it is more than my life is worth to compromise a felony. You know as well as I do what is the penalty attached to the act; and although I feel strongly tempted to forget my duty on this occasion, yet I must remember myself. Justice to the world at large demands that the crime of theft should be severely punished."

"Then what shall you do?"

"I must take her into custody, and lodge her in the nearest prison until the morning; then she will be brought before a magistrate, and, of course, committed to Newgate to take her trial."

"It's a dreadful thing," said the squire—"and could I but have foreseen it, I would have put up with the loss of the watch and said nothing about it."

"Then, excuse me for saying so, you would have done very wrong."

"I know it—I know it. But to think that one so young and beautiful as she is should have such a dreadful fate hanging over her!"

"You must not look upon it in that point of view," said Wild.

"Despite, then, her tears, and entreaties, and agonizing supplications—and despite, too, all that was said by her aged parents, Ellen was ruthlessly torn away from her home, and hurried off to prison by Jonathan Wild's associates.

"I am not guilty!" she screamed, as they forced her through the gate—"I am innocent! It is you—you, Jonathan Wild, who have brought all this trouble upon me—it is you who have caused me to appear guilty of this charge in order to be revenged upon me because I would not listen to your addresses!"

"The squire looked to see what effect these words would have upon the thief-taker.

"That individual was quite unmoved.

"He turned to the squire and said, in a calm voice:

"I am often accused in this fashion by persons in her difficulty. They are so angry and exasperated at being found out in their wickedness, that they know not hardly what they say, but are only governed by a desire to do all the mischief that lies in their power."

"It may be so," said the squire, thoughtfully. "You know much more about these matters than I do."

"Yes—I have had more experience."

"And on the following morning Ellen was brought up before the magistrate.

"The case was stated clearly enough against her, and she pleaded not guilty to the charge.

"But the evidence was so clear and so circumstantial that the magistrate would pay no attention to her plea.

"The only course that lay open to him was to commit her to take her trial at the next Old Bailey sessions, and accordingly he did so.

"It was dreadful to think a young and innocent girl like Ellen should be made the inmate of a Newgate cell, for," added Mr. Thorpe, impressively, "she was innocent, I am sure of it—as innocent of the crime as any of you are that are present now.

"She was right in the accusation she had made.

"Jonathan Wild had done it all to be revenged.

"I learned a great deal about it, but not till after—not till after!"

Mr. Thorpe shuddered.

"I have not much more to tell," he said; "but yet the most important part of my story remains to be told.

"Ellen at first was inconsolably distraught at finding herself in such a terrible position.

"A day or two elapsed, and then Jonathan Wild paid a visit to her cell.

"Ellen," he said, "do you know that you are now in the clutch of the law, and that one thing alone can save you?"

"She disdained to answer.

"The case," he said, "is one of the clearest that could possibly be brought into a court of justice. The evidence is complete in every particular—it is as good as if some one actually saw you in the very act of purloining the watch."

"Ellen uttered a moan of anguish.

"You cannot, of course, be ignorant," continued Wild, "of the penalty which the law awards for the crime with which you are charged. It is death—death by the hands of the hangman at Tyburn in the presence of a horrible, jeering crowd."

"Yes," said Ellen, springing to her feet, "I remember your threats now—remember them too late! You told me to beware how I refused your suit, and said that you would cause my parents to linger out a life of agony and shame, and that I should die the most repulsive death that could be imagined. So far you have accomplished your purpose."

"Jonathan smiled mockingly.

"I will be generous," he said. "I can't help being fond of you, and if you will only smile upon me I will free you from your present terrible position."

"Never—never!"

"Reflect. I am the only man in the world who can and will stretch forth a helping hand to save you. I can save you, I assure you of it. I can so arrange matters that when you are brought up for trial a verdict of not guilty will be returned against you."

"Then do so—do so," said Ellen—"in pity do so, for you know that I am innocent!"

"To this last assertion, Jonathan paid no attention.

"I will do it," he said—"I will undertake to do it; but only upon one condition—that is, that you first of all become my wife!"

"Never—never!" said Ellen, shuddering.

"There is a priest outside," said Wild. "He is waiting in the corridor. He is armed with all the necessary forms and documents for the performance of the ceremony. Give your consent, and I will have him brought in. Then, when you are my wife, you shall be set at liberty."

"Never—never!" said Ellen. "Death—death a thousand times before such a terrible existence as that would be! Jonathan Wild, you have shown yourself in your true colours. I shall state all this on the day when I am brought up for trial, and it will be strange indeed if your villany is not made apparent."

"Wild laughed a horrible, mocking laugh, and withdrew.

"But he renewed his solicitations from day to day.

"His patience seemed unwearying.

"He believed in his own mind that he should at last succeed, and that Ellen, rather than perish on the scaffold, would become his wife.

"But each time she repulsed him, and always with additional disgust and contempt.

"Then the day of trial arrived.

"Jonathan Wild was beginning to think that Ellen would remain firm and obstinate.

"At the last hour he renewed his entreaties, declaring even then that it was not too late, and that he could cause a verdict of not guilty to be returned, but if she refused that she would most certainly be sentenced.

"Again came an indignant refusal from her lips.

"Accordingly she was brought up for trial.

"The case was stated in the clearest possible manner, and, despite her beauty and innocent look, every one in the court came to the conclusion that she was guilty before she was allowed the opportunity of saying one word in her own defence.

"Then she had nothing to say but to utter a somewhat disjointed string of accusations against Jonathan Wild.

"They were listened to impatiently.

"She was cut short in her declamation, for Jonathan Wild at that time had only to appear as chief witness against a prisoner and conviction was certain.

CHAPTER DCXLIII.

MR. THORPE BRINGS THE STORY TO A CONCLUSION, AND RELATES HOW THE INNOCENCE OF ELLEN WAS MADE APPARENT.

"The counsel for the prosecution exercised his right of reply, and dwelt at great length upon the enormity of the offence with which Ellen was charged, and the manner in which she had aggravated it by attempting to asperse the character of the indefatigable and excellent police officer, Jonathan Wild.

"As you may easily expect, the result was a verdict of guilty.

"In summing up, the judge stated that he perfectly agreed with the finding of the jury—that there had never been a case before him in which he had been so certain of the guilt of the accused; and therefore it was that he was able, without compunction, to pass upon her the sentence of death, for he considered that she richly deserved it.

"Sobbing and weeping, and indeed half frantic, Ellen was led back to her cell.

"This was Friday, and the Monday following was the day appointed for her execution.

"Will you believe it that, even after this, Jonathan Wild continued to make his odious proposals to his victim?

"But she scorned them as before.

"In vain he assured her that it was in his power to obtain for her a full and free pardon if she consented to his wishes.

"Over and over again she refused.

"What with Jonathan Wild's importunities, and the terrible nature of her position, her mind was in a terrible condition.

"She wasted away almost to a shadow, and the beauty which everyone had praised so much faded rapidly away.

"At last the fatal Monday came.

"She was led through the gloomy corridors of the prison, and placed in the cart that was to convey her to Tyburn.

"According to a common custom with him, Jonathan Wild took his seat in the hangman's cart, along with the chaplain and the condemned prisoner.

"Even during the awful ride, and with death staring her in the face, he renewed his propositions, declaring that even then it was not too late—that a word from him would stay these proceedings, and that she would be pardoned.

"It was plain, however, that Ellen had resigned herself to her fate.

"To some extent she was cheered up and supported by the consciousness of her own innocence, and she preferred death in that ignominious fashion to life associated with such a miscreant as Jonathan Wild.

"The cart was drawn beneath the fatal beam.

"The hangman's fingers busied themselves around her neck.

"The cap was drawn down over her countenance; and even at this awful moment Jonathan Wild stood up beside her in the cart, and asked her again to consider the decision.

"She made no reply.

"Poor girl, she was almost dead with terror.

"Then the signal was given.

"The cart was drawn away, and in another moment all that remained of the beautiful but hapless girl was an inert mass of clay.

"Jonathan Wild had been baulked in his desires.

"But yet he glutted his revenge."

"And was she really hanged?" asked one in the company.

"She was; and after her death her remains were treated as though they had been those of a common felon."

It is impossible to describe the deep interest with which this narrative was listened to, and, when Mr. Thorpe had concluded, there was in the breasts of all his hearers such a feeling of resentment against Jonathan Wild as they had never before experienced.

Even the one who seemed inclined to take a lenient view of the thief-taker's enormities declared that such a man was equally unfit to live or to die.

"And you are quite sure that she was innocent?" said one.

"Quite sure—as certain as I am that I am innocent myself. She was quite guiltless, and afterwards I found out who it was that was the real culprit, and how the girl's apparent guilt had been brought about."

"How was it?" asked all, eagerly.

"I one day entered a rude, miserable hut in a lonely portion of the country, not far from the village in which Ellen had lived.

"This was some years after her death, when the circumstances were almost forgotten.

"I entered this hut because, while passing by it, I heard cries of distress from within.

"I entered, and saw, lying on a heap of rotten straw in one corner of it, the cadaverous figure of a man.

"I walked up to him, and asked him what I could do for his assistance.

"He told me nothing—that he was dying, and that no earthly power could save him—that he had in him at the most only a few minutes' life.

"Something in the tones of his voice sounded familiarly in my ears.

"I looked at him attentively, and then I said:

"'Why, surely I am not mistaken? Is not your name Hutton?'

"'It is,' he said, with a start. 'It doesn't matter now that you have recognised me, for I am out of the power of my fellow-creatures.'

"This was a strange speech, but I perfectly understood it.

"He had been found guilty many years ago of having some share in a robbery, and had been sentenced to transportation for life.

"But he had escaped, and made his way back to his own village.

"Ah!" he said, 'your name is Thorpe. I know you now. I am dying, but yet I have something to say to you, if you will only listen. It's about poor Ellen and Jonathan Wild.'

"What is it?" I said—"what is it?—speak!"

"Well, at the time when she was charged with the robbery I had only just returned from abroad.

"I was lurking about at the back of the squire's house among the underwood, and while I was there, I was almost frightened to death by the appearance of the man I most dreaded on earth, namely, Jonathan Wild.

"He, too, had been lurking in the shrubbery—though for what purpose I knew not.

"I saw him creep stealthily towards the house. I saw him ascend some steps that were placed against a wall, and by means of them gained the roof of the out-buildings.

"He made his way to a particular window which was open, and, leaning forward, almost got through it.

"He was very speedy in all his movements, and soon returned, and I saw that in his hand he had a little velvet box.

"Why did you not raise an alarm?" I said. 'Why did you not bring all the household about you, so that the villain might have been detected in his rascality?'

"The convict shook his head.

"I dared not do anything of the kind," he replied. 'It was necessary for my own life that I should remain concealed—I did not dare disclose myself.'

"And what else did you see?"

"Nothing. Jonathan Wild departed, though where he went I knew not.

"Finding he was in that part of the country, I knew it would not be safe for me to remain there any longer; so, with what speed I could, I hastened away and crossed over into Ireland.

"There I led a wandering, restless life for a length of time, until eventually I returned home.

"I learned then what had followed the simple robbery I saw Jonathan Wild perform.

"When I found that in consequence of it poor Ellen had lost her life, I bitterly regretted my own selfishness.

"I did indeed deserve my fate. It was no more than just that I should be transported, and I would willingly have returned and endured all the horrors of penal servitude, could I only have been successful in proving her innocence."

"Some more words passed between us, but he had nothing further of any importance to communicate."

"I set out myself for the village doctor, but by the time we returned the convict was dead, and so, my friends, ends this little episode in Jonathan Wild's career."

"There are many more such if they could only be told."

"You know now, why I am sad and melancholy—you know much, but not all."

CHAPTER DCXLIV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN RENEW THEIR SEARCH
AFTER JONATHAN WILD.

MR. THORPE rose abruptly to his feet as he concluded.

By this time the storm was over.

The rain no longer fell, and the clouds were rapidly scudding over the sky, allowing the clear blue firmament to be seen, and the thousands of twinkling stars.

He fixed his hat upon his head, and then, like one who feels that he must give way to some powerful emotion, he turned round and left the inn.

After his departure a silence of several minutes reigned, which neither Blueskin nor Jack Sheppard ventured to break.

Everyone present was busy with his own thoughts.

Believing, however, that they had heard all of any importance, Blueskin and Jack resolved to continue their journey.

The state of the weather was now quite favourable.

Accordingly, they emptied their drinking-cups, and made their way towards the stables.

"You see, gentlemen," said Joe, coming forward, "that I was quite right when I said we should have a rough night."

"You were."

"However, the violence of the storm is past; I think we shall have fine weather for some time to come."

"Then bring out the horses," said Jack Sheppard. "Be as quick as you like—we are anxious to start."

"And," said Blueskin, "can you tell us the sign of that public-house you were telling me of where Wild and Noakes stole the two horses?"

"Yes, sir, I can. I recollect it now, though I could not at first; it's the Ring of Bells."

"I shall not forget it."

"But that reminds me I made a mistake. Did I not tell you the landlord's name was Goodridge?"

"Yes."

"Well, I was wrong. Timothy Goodridge used to live there, but he has left many years."

"And who keeps the inn, now?"

"A man named Muggleton. He is a stupid, thick-headed fellow; but yet you may be able to learn something from him."

Having again inquired the best way to this inn, Blueskin and Jack gave the ostler a liberal sum, and, mounting their horses, rode off.

"Now," said Blueskin, "what do you think we had better do?"

"Why, ride straight on to this public-house."

"I think so, too; it is useless for us to follow in his footsteps so exactly as that. We know now the last place where he was seen, and we must go there and recommence our inquiries."

"Just so; we will proceed gently though, so as not to distress our horses."

"Yes, it will be best to husband their strength, for we cannot tell at what moment it may be necessary to put them to the top of their speed."

"That was a strange story," said Jack, "that we heard a little while ago."

"Very strange; and, as I happen to know, very true."

"Indeed! Do you remember the girl?"

"Yes, quite well; though never until to-night did I learn the whole of the particulars of the affair. It was a villainous deed, yet just such a one as Jonathan Wild would be capable of."

"You are right. Who should say how many such cases there are if they could only be brought to light?"

"No one can estimate them," was the answer. "But do you observe what a general feeling of hatred and detestation is growing up against the man in every breast?"

"I do."

"Well, then, the result of that must be certain; he cannot long continue his present course; he must infallibly be captured."

"So I think, and it will be strange indeed if we are not active instruments in his arrest."

"Did it strike you that Mr. Thorpe had a keen interest in the story that he told—I mean that it was in some way connected with his own life?"

"Yes, I drew my conclusions from it at once. The meaning of his reserve and melancholy is quite explained; it is this which preys upon his spirits and makes him ever gloomy; he cannot forget the past."

"You think, then, that this Ellen, who fell a victim to Jonathan's machinations, was very near and dear to him?"

"I do—I feel certain of it. He must have loved her, or he would not have spoken of her in the way he did."

"I noticed his voice fail him several times."

"So did I; and he is not the man to give way lightly to emotions, I am sure of it. It will be a serious thing for Jonathan if he once finds himself face to face with Mr. Thorpe."

"It will. But don't talk any longer upon this subject—I cannot bear to dwell upon it. When I remember all his villainous acts, I seem to become so impatient that I lose all control over myself."

"And no wonder."

It was in similar conversation to this that the time was whiled away during which the two friends journeyed to the Ring of Bells.

The distance was considerable, yet, by keeping their horses to one steady pace, they managed to arrive at the public-house soon after sunrise.

The place presented much the appearance that it did when Wild and Noakes had arrived there almost at the same hour many days before.

The red rays of the sun were then shining upon the ancient, picturesque-looking dwelling, and the landlord himself was engaged in removing the shutters from the front windows.

He made quite a respectful bow to the two friends, and asked them if they intended to take refreshment.

Blueskin answered in the affirmative.

The horses were then placed in the stable, and Jack and Blueskin seated themselves in a private room.

They called the landlord to them and asked him many questions concerning Jonathan Wild.

The landlord had not yet got over his loss, and the very mention of Wild's name put him into a furious passion.

But upon Jack explaining what their intentions were, he very gladly gave them all the information in his power.

Unluckily this was not much.

He could only tell them that after stealing those two valuable horses out of his stable, the two villains had galloped off at such a furious speed that the officers were unable to overtake them.

Beyond this, the only information they obtained was that a traveller had been robbed and seriously injured by Jonathan Wild, not many miles from that spot.

What had been their movements after that time, the landlord could give them no idea.

This was somewhat of a disappointment, for they had hoped to learn as much here as at their last resting-place.

They made the landlord describe as well as he could the exact spot where the robbery had taken place.

They then took their departure, and, mounting their steeds, rode off along the highway.

Ere long they reached the spot that had been described to them.

All traces of the struggle that had taken place here had gone.

[JONATHAN WILD'S HORSE FALLS DEAD ON THE HIGHWAY.]

They paused and looked at each other doubtfully and irresolutely.

"What are we to do now?" asked Jack.

"The trace seems to end here," replied Blueskin; "but do not let us be too hasty—surely something will turn up to guide us."

"I hope so, but can't think what."

"Nor I; but we do know that he came as far as here. Let us make this a kind of starting point, and ride out in different directions from it. We shall doubtless meet with many disappointments, but at length we must hit upon the right track."

This was about the best mode of proceeding that could be adopted under the circumstances.

In carrying out their intention, they perceived the pool of water in which it will be remembered Jonathan Wild bathed his wound.

Then afterwards, as they extended their search still No. 139.—BLUESKIN.

further and further from the spot where the robbery had taken place, they perceived the strange, old, mysterious building in which Wild and Noakes had taken refuge, and which had been the scene of such a dreadful tragedy.

Blueskin and Jack paused upon a piece of rising ground at some distance, and surveyed it attentively.

"What do you think of that?" asked Jack. "Shall we get any information there?"

"It is just possible," was the reply. "It is a strange, deserted-looking place—in fact, just the building in which Wild would be likely to take refuge from his foes."

CHAPTER DCXLV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES DEMAND SHELTER OF THE CHARCOAL-BURNER.

THE scene that was presented to the view of Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes upon reaching that small open space in the forest was indeed a strange one, and well calculated to transfix them to the spot.

The clearing was only a few square yards in extent, and on the opposite side of it was burning a huge fire.

Not much flame came from it, but only smoke, which rose up in great quantities, growing denser and denser each moment.

A great number of logs of green wood had been placed upon the fire, which at first had the effect of almost extinguishing it.

Then the smoke began to rise.

It was a huge heap that was smoking and smouldering, and neither Wild nor Noakes could tell at first what was the meaning of so strange a sight.

Seated on the stump of an old tree was a dirt-begrimed man, who held in his hands a long pole, or piece of iron, with which he continually stirred the fire.

At first he did not perceive the approach of Wild and Noakes, he was so intently occupied with what he was about, and they, as we have already said, paused at the boundary of the clearing.

Behind this man there was a rude wooden structure—a hut, in fact, the exterior of which had been plastered in many places with clay in order to keep out the wet and cold.

Behind this hut the ground rose suddenly into a hill.

Doubtless that situation had been chosen for the hut because the hill at the back would protect it from the violence of many a storm.

After a momentary hesitation as to what he should do, Jonathan Wild resolved to step forward and endeavour to obtain shelter of this man.

Accordingly, making a sign to his companion to follow his example, he led his horse forward by the bridle.

The sound of approaching footsteps attracted the man's attention, and he stood up, regarding them curiously, and, as Wild thought, with some degree of alarm.

"What do you want with me, gentlemen?" asked this man, with an air of abject humility—"what is it you require? I am only a poor charcoal-burner in this wood. What do you want with me?"

"Shelter," said Wild—"nothing but shelter, for ourselves and our horses, for a few hours. We will pay you liberally if you consent. Here—look, here is a guinea."

The man shook his head.

"I have no shelter to give you," he replied—"I cannot do it."

"But that hut is yours, is it not?"

"Yes," replied the charcoal-burner, though not without some hesitation.

"Well, then, that hut, rude as it is, will furnish us with all the shelter we require."

"But why do you want shelter?"

"That's a strange question, truly, but it strikes me I know your face."

"Know my face?" said the charcoal-burner, with a start.

"Yes, and, if I am right, you are not following your regular trade."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, simply this: The grabs are after us both,—we have had a hard run for it, and now want to get somewhere out of sight."

The charcoal-burner whistled.

"Is that it?" he said.

"Yes, that's exactly it; and so if you have any good hiding-place, let us know of it—you can guess that we shall pay you well."

"I don't doubt it—I don't doubt it."

"Well, do you consent?"

"I can't on my own responsibility. Wait here a moment, and I will tell you."

"Be quick, for I expect that we shall hear something of the police officers every moment."

With another hard stare at the two strangers, the charcoal-burner entered the hut and disappeared.

"What has he gone for?" asked Mr. Noakes.

"To consult some of his comrades, probably."

"Comrades?"

"Yes—don't be alarmed. But I know that man's face, and I will warrant he is only here along with a gang more."

Mr. Noakes seemed rather alarmed.

"Follow me," said Wild—"I will just take a peep inside, and see what he is doing."

He advanced towards the door of the hut as he spoke. He pushed against it.

But it was fast.

"He is a cunning fox," he said. "I doubt now whether I shall be able to obtain a glimpse of the interior."

Nevertheless, Jonathan was inspired by great curiosity, so he prowled about, round and round the building, endeavouring to find some little hole through which to peep.

But he tried in vain.

Suddenly the door of the hut opened, and the charcoal-burner appeared.

"Well," said Wild, "what's your answer? Quick!—let me know it without delay!"

"You shall have shelter," was the reply—"that is, provided you pay well for it, and that the officers have not tracked you exactly to this spot."

"Agreed!" said Wild, eagerly—"agreed!"

"Follow me, then."

"And the horses—what shall we do with them?"

"Bring them in too."

Wild did not hesitate, but obeyed.

The charcoal-burner closed the door, and then the interior of the hut was in profound darkness.

"Walk boldly onwards!" he said. "There is no obstruction in your path—step fearlessly!"

"Cannot we have a light?"

"No—it is impossible! Be silent, and follow me!"

The charcoal-burner was just then in a position to dictate his own terms.

Noakes and Wild were compelled to obey him implicitly.

They walked on for some distance—certainly much further than the mere diameter of the hut.

About this, however, there was no certainty, for the darkness was most profound.

Suddenly the charcoal-burner said:

"Stop!"

A knocking sound followed.

Then a door was opened, and a gleam of light shone into the passage, for such it was.

Through this door Wild and Noakes could see something that looked like a large cavern.

"Forward!" said the charcoal-burner—"forward!"

Jonathan assumed an air of boldness and recklessness.

Passing through the doorway, which was immediately closed behind them, Wild and Noakes found themselves—as they expected they should—in a large, vaulted cavern.

In various parts of it lights were burning, not in sufficient quantity or brightness to dispel the darkness in this place, but yet to render most objects to a certain extent visible.

Seated round various rude tables, and in some cases squatting on the floor, were several men—a dozen at least.

All rose up tumultuously upon the entrance of the two strangers.

"Here, comrades," said the charcoal-burner—"here are the men I spoke of that wanted shelter. They are willing to pay well."

"Who are you?" said several, pressing forward and endeavouring to obtain a good view of the countenances of Wild and Noakes—"who are you?"

"Members of the family in London," returned Wild, boldly. "We have been hard pushed by the grabs, but managed to get here all right. When they find we have disappeared, and that they have no trace left of us, they will give up the chase."

"How long do you want to stay?"

"Not more than twenty-four hours."

"You will have to pay liberally."

"I am quite willing to do that," was Wild's reply.

"The fact is, we are running no small amount of risk," said one of the men. "Our leader is absent. We don't know exactly when he may return. He might be anything but pleased if he found a stranger had been admitted to this place in his absence, so we should be glad for you to go before he comes back, then it will be entirely a private affair of our own, you understand."

"I am quite willing to fall in with any reasonable views of yours," said Wild. "You will have no cause to grumble at the payment; it will be larger than you imagine. With much difficulty we have got thus far. We are anxious to reach the sea-coast and leave England."

"Very good; promise to go in twenty-four hours, and all will be well. I feel almost certain that our leader will not return before that time has elapsed."

CHAPTER DCXLVI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS KEEP VERY CLOSE UPON THE TRACK OF JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES.

THERE could be but little doubt about the nature of the occupation that these men pursued.

They evidently lived in defiance of the laws.

They were certainly poachers, if nothing worse.

Several of them, however, Jonathan Wild found he recognised.

In his time he had had a large acquaintance with all those predatory wretches, and as he had an excellent memory, he was able to say to himself, with certainty:

"I have seen you before; but I can't recollect who you are, nor where it was I saw you."

On the other hand, many curious glances were bent upon Jonathan Wild and his companion.

But they had been so changed, by the number of adventures they had lately passed through, and by the difference in their apparel and general appearance, that it would have been next to an impossibility for anyone having a casual knowledge of either to have recognised them.

Jonathan Wild, for his part, felt as easy and confident as he would had he been carefully and cleverly disguised—perhaps more so.

Many questions were asked them by these men in the cavern.

But Jonathan returned guarded answers to all of them.

"Why should you seek to know my business?" he asked of one more inquisitive than the rest. "I have come, and seen certain things, but I do not keep perpetually demanding why this is so, and what the regular routine of your life may be."

This was felt to be a just and reasonable remark, so that no more was said upon the subject.

The hours gradually succeeded each other without any signal of alarm having been given.

Some eatables and drinkables had been placed before Wild and Noakes, of which they had gladly partaken.

Then they had laid themselves down by the fire to sleep.

The men in the cavern were for the most part very silent.

When they spoke to each other, it was in low whispers, so faint that not a single word could by any possibility reach the ears of anyone but the person for whom the communication was intended.

And in this manner the time passed by, until almost twenty-four hours had elapsed.

Mr. Noakes was quite anxious to leave, for during the whole of the time they had been in this strange place they had heard nothing whatever of their enemies.

The cavern was, as the reader must already have suspected, neither more nor less than a place hollowed out under the hill we have mentioned as being situated at the back of the hut.

From the rude wooden building there was a means of communication with the passage that led direct to the cavernous apartment, if such it may be called.

Suddenly one of the men started to his feet, and assumed a listening attitude.

Then, with an air of vexation, he exclaimed:

"It is as I feared, the captain has returned! A thousand to one we shall get into trouble for this disregard of orders!"

All seemed anxious, and scarcely any were less so than Wild and Noakes.

They would gladly have made their escape there and then, had such a thing been possible.

But it was quite out of the question, and they knew it.

The sound of rapid footsteps now came upon their ears, and directly afterwards the door was flung open and a tall, stout-built man strode into the cavern.

His brows were contracted into an angry frown, and he glanced around him quickly and suspiciously.

"I am told that strangers have been admitted to the cave in my absence! Mark this, whoever has done so shall be well punished!"

"Surely, captain," said one, "it can't much matter."

"Matter!" he interrupted, furiously—"it does matter, and perhaps you will think so when I tell you that the whole forest is swarming with police officers, who are peeping and prying into every part of it, making a thorough search. It is scarcely possible that this hut will escape them, and then you know our fate!"

He made an expressive gesture while he spoke.

"We knew the officers were abroad," they said, "but they were two members of the family who were in trouble, and we thought it little harm to give them shelter; they will depart in an hour or so."

"Let me see them," cried the captain—"bring them before me. I have a suspicion in my mind, which, if it is valid—but no matter now—bring them forward."

At the first sight of the leader of this gang, Jonathan Wild had started back several paces.

He clenched his teeth together in the bitterness of his rage.

He recognised him, or believed he had done so, which was about the same thing.

He was confirmed as soon as the captain spoke, for he knew the tones of his voice quite well.

He was a man who had at one time been entirely in Wild's power, as many others had been in days past.

But he had contrived to shake himself free from his trammels, and was now acting in an independent position.

If he could but once glance into his countenance, Wild felt sure it would be sufficient for recognition.

They had known each other too well in times past for there to be any doubt or hesitation.

What would follow that recognition Jonathan knew full well.

He could look for no pity from this man.

He would be even more relentless than any of the police officers.

What was he to do?

While the brief conversation we have recorded was going forward, he had gradually retreated to the opposite side of the cavern, dragging his companion with him.

"What is it?" said Noakes, in a whisper. "What's the danger?"

"No matter! Leave it to me—it is greater than you imagine; but we shall escape yet, I am sure of it."

Just then there came a heavy sound from above.

It was a sound evidently that was recognised by all the inmates of the cavern.

The captain uttered a fearful oath, and the men gathered around him.

"The officers are in the hut!" he said. "Now each one must look to his own safety. We must fly. This will be a bad day's work for us. Rely upon it, all will be discovered."

The hubbub in the distance increased, and so did the alarm of the banditti.

Jonathan Wild had taken the utmost advantage of this diversion.

He had reached the opposite side of the cavern.

And then he made a discovery which could hardly be said to take him by surprise.

He noticed that close to the ground were a great number of rudely-formed arches, evidently the commencement of passages.

These he rightly conjectured had been constructed in anticipation of some such danger as the present.

The hill was in fact tunnelled in every direction, so that in a few minutes the banditti could disperse, and, by hastening along these passages, emerge into the wood.

Jonathan Wild did not hesitate to plunge into the darkness immediately, and Mr. Noakes was too terrified to do anything else but follow his example.

The narrow passage curved and wound about in a very tiresome manner; but at length, in the distance, Jonathan perceived the faint glimmering of light.

Several hours had elapsed during their stay in the cavern, and now night was about to descend upon the earth.

Without any accident, or any loss of time, Jonathan reached the mouth of this passage, which, as he fully expected, was situated in the side of the hill.

After a cautious glance around him, he crept out.

At present, nothing of his foes could be seen.

"Come, Noakes," he said—"forward—forward! Everything now depends upon speed, and the probability is, we shall elude them after all!"

"I doubt it."

"I don't see what cause you have to do so; the officers will discover something strange about the charcoal-burner's hut, and they will devote all their attention to exploring it—it will take them some little time, and while they are doing so, can't you see that it allows us the chance of getting away?"

"Yes. But suppose they should have left several on the watch?"

"That risk must be run."

"And our horses," said Noakes—"what are we to do without them?"

"That is the most difficult point. I am trying to think by what means we can manage to regain possession of them."

"I fear it will be impossible."

"Well, better lose our horses than become prisoners ourselves—don't you think so?"

"I do, and yet it is vexatious to think we should get so near to the coast and then be troubled by the officers after all."

"It is nothing!" said Wild—"you magnify the danger! Come forward, quickly! Follow me!"

Jonathan pushed rapidly through the trees.

"Don't forget the treasure!" said Noakes, in a low voice.

"Don't be afraid of that!" returned Wild. "But hush! Advance with caution—I fancy some of our enemies are close at hand! Come on, I say; but be cautious and silent—an alarm will be fatal!"

CHAPTER DCXLVII.

JONATHAN WILD LOSES HIS HORSE.

THESE words put Mr. Noakes into a state of great consternation.

But not so Jonathan Wild.

He crept forward with a cautiousness that would have done credit to an Indian on the war-trail.

Then suddenly he paused.

Darkness was coming on very rapidly, but yet it was not already so dark but that he could see objects at no great distance off.

He perceived, then, a police officer leaning against a tree.

It may seem strange that he should be in such a position; but the fact is, he had been left there by his comrades to take care of the horses, which were ranged round about him.

Wild pressed his hand heavily on Noakes's shoulder, but said nothing.

Mr. Noakes took it as a signal to remain where he was—to neither move nor speak.

Jonathan crept on towards the officer, making a considerable detour in order to do so.

His heart was full of exultation, for he saw before him the means by which he should be able to make his escape from the forest.

He would seize two horses, mount, and ride off.

Doubtless, if the officers were in the cavern, he should be able to get a good start before they found out what was amiss.

The chief thing was to silence the officer who had been left there on the watch, and this was the task that Jonathan Wild set about accomplishing.

How he was to do this, Wild scarcely knew.

It must not be thought that he would have shrunk at putting this officer to death, if by doing so he could have ensured his own safety.

On the contrary, he would have felt a great amount of triumph at having made his enemies one less.

It would satisfy, to some extent, the craving for revenge which he still felt.

The death of the officer must be accomplished without a sound.

But how could this be done?

While meditating, Jonathan was creeping slowly but surely towards his victim.

In his progress, his foot caught against something.

The feeling almost told him what it was.

He stooped, and found that it was a piece of strong rope, several feet in length.

"The very thing," he said, under his breath—"the very thing!"

He crept forward now with renewed confidence, until he actually succeeded in gaining the tree against which the officer was leaning, without being perceived—that is to say, he gained the opposite side of it.

It was quite a slender tree, comparatively speaking, for Jonathan was able to encircle it with his arms.

In one hand he held one end of the rope.

With a rapidity of motion which can scarcely be conceived, he slipped this rope round the tree, taking care that it should catch just underneath the officer's neck.

Before the unfortunate man could understand what was going on, or form a guess as to what it meant, Jonathan Wild had, with incredible quickness, tied a knot in the rope, and he was striving with might and main to draw it tight.

The pressure upon the officer's throat became fearful.

At first an odd gurgling sound had issued from his lips.

But now this died away entirely.

Jonathan tied the rope into several knots, and then glided round the tree.

The officer was struggling furiously to release himself.

But in vain.

The more he tugged and struggled, the more he increased the tightness of the rope round his neck.

Wild laughed a hideous laugh of triumph, and but for the necessity of making an immediate retreat he would have stood for some time gazing upon the struggles of his victim.

He called out to Noakes, who speedily made his appearance.

"Now, then," cried Jonathan, "mount one of these horses—whichever you think is the best. Be quick, and we are safe!"

Noakes chose as good a horse as his hurry would permit, and sprang upon his back.

Wild did the same.

The officer by this time had turned quite black in the face, and it was only occasionally that his arms moved slightly.

"You have killed him," said Noakes.

"If I have, so much the better!" was the brutal reply.

"He is one police officer less! At any rate, I have stopped him from giving an alarm."

Noakes could not avoid shuddering at his companion's atrocity.

But the feeling was soon over, and he said:

"The treasure, Mr. Wild—don't forget that."

"I have not forgotten. This is the way to the spot where we left it, unless I am out of my reckoning. Quick—the sooner we are out of this forest now the better."

"Very true," said Noakes, "for who can say how soon the officers will make their way out of the cavern by the same means that we did?"

"I expect to hear something of them every moment," returned Wild. "But stop, here is the heap of stones."

"Will you alight, or shall I?"

"I will," said Wild. "I shall be quicker than you."

And as he spoke he flung himself hastily from his horse, and began dashing the stones aside with which he had covered the booty.

He seized hold of the first package, and handed it to Noakes.

Then, taking the second, he mounted.

Loud cries from behind them smote upon his ears.

But he did not falter, or lose his presence of mind.

"Now, then, Noakes," he said, "gallop on for your life! Don't stick at a little danger! Forward—forward, I say—follow me!"

Jonathan goaded the horse he rode fiercely, and the creature, maddened by pain, galloped on at a more rapid rate than it had probably ever before accomplished.

Going at such a breakneck pace as they did it required only a few moments to take them clear of the forest.

Mr. Noakes kept behind Jonathan like a shadow.

The latter directed his course across the open country, and, from the direction he was taking, it seemed as though he was really and truly making his way to the sea-shore.

Mr. Noakes thought so too, and this inspired him with greater courage and energy to follow his companion.

The police officers, however, had discovered their escape, and were now pressing forward with great speed.

The loud cries to which they frequently gave utterance came with alarming plainness upon the ears of the fugitives.

But fortune had certainly favoured the two villains on this occasion.

The horses they had stolen were superior in fleetness to any of the others that remained.

Away, then, they went over the broken, uneven country at a speed that would have dismayed an ordinary rider on account of the many dangers that attended it.

But somehow they kept in their seats quite safely.

The horses stumbled once or twice, but did not fall.

They recovered their feet, and darted onwards with renewed speed.

And during the whole of that night did that terrific chase continue.

From time to time both felt their horses stagger underneath them as though they would fall to the ground and expire.

One by one the police officers dropped off as their horses from fatigue became unable to proceed further.

They were in a part of the country where it was impossible to obtain fresh steeds.

And so, towards daybreak, Jonathan found, upon turning his head, that he had only one pursuer left, and that he was a long way behind them.

But his own horse continued to show the most unequivocal symptoms of total exhaustion.

"Don't flag!" he said, addressing Noakes. "Spur him on with all your might! If you once suffer him to relax his speed he will never attain it again! Keep him on—do as I do! You will find they will run till they drop!"

Jonathan Wild's words turned out to be perfectly correct.

The exhausted animals, smarting with the pain which continual plunges with the spur occasioned them, galloped forward at a furious rate.

But every now and then their limbs would tremble.

They were covered all over with foam, and their hot, swollen tongues hung out at their open mouths.

Suddenly, with a crash, Jonathan's horse fell to the ground.

Its legs gave way beneath it all at once, and when it fell, it was as though it had been struck down by some mighty and invisible power.

CHAPTER DCXLVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES SEEK SHELTER AT THE FARM-HOUSE.

ALTHOUGH prepared for this event, the horse fell down so suddenly that before he could save himself Jonathan Wild was thrown over his head.

Luckily, he alighted in a ditch.

It was by no means a pleasant bath.

Yet it was much better than falling with full force on the hard high-road.

In the latter case he must have been killed, or, at any rate, severely injured.

As it was, the only inconvenience he experienced was a thorough wetting from head to foot.

Mr. Noakes observed the fate of his companion with dismay.

Fearful that he, too, might have a fall, he stopped his horse and alighted.

The animal trembled in every limb, and panted fearfully, as though it had reached the very last stage of exhaustion.

He then hastened to the side of the ditch, and assisted his companion out of it.

"Are you hurt, Mr. Wild?" he said.

Jonathan did not reply.

He was half stunned and half blinded.

"Curse the brute!" he said at length, as soon as he could recover his voice. "Who would have thought of his going down so suddenly as that?"

"I feared it."

"So did I."

"And what are we to do now, Mr. Wild?"

"Do?"

"Yes. How far is it to the sea-shore, and how shall we reach it?"

Jonathan paused.

He was recovering himself.

He rose to his feet, and shook the moisture from his apparel.

"There are some things we must think about before that," he answered. "In the first place, where are our foes?"

They listened.

But all was still.

Unsatisfied as yet, however, Jonathan laid himself down at full length in the road, and pressed his ear against the ground.

Even then he failed to hear any sound that would indicate their approach.

"They are not within some miles of this place," he said, "so at least we shall be allowed time to complete our operations."

"What operations?"

"Why, do you see that dead brute lying there?"

"Your horse?"

"Yes."

"What of him?"

"It will not do to allow him to remain there, will it?"

"Why not?"

"Why, will not the officers, should they find him here, at once know that we are on foot, and redouble their exertions to capture us?"

"Yes, yes—of course they would."

"Well, then, you must assist me by some means or other to drag the brute into a field, and leave him there—the officers will then ride by without being any the wiser."

"I am glad you thought of that, Mr. Wild. And what am I to do with my own horse?"

"It is well you asked that question. Look at him! He is trembling in every limb, and seems as though he was about to fall. Quick—quick! We will lead him into the field. His eyes are glazing! There is not ten minutes' life left in him!"

Mr. Noakes's horse presented every appearance of the approach of death.

Beyond doubt, had he been ridden hard much longer, he would have dropped down suddenly like Wild's did.

But coming to a stop just at that time lengthened his life to the extent of a few minutes.

That he would fall down presently and expire was certain, and Jonathan was anxious to spare himself the trouble, if he could, of having to drag the carcass into the field.

Close by was a gate, which, by the aid of a heavy stone, he broke open.

Then, calling out to Mr. Noakes, he bade him lead his horse by the bridle.

At first the animal refused to stir.

All use and strength seemed to have departed from its limbs.

But a sharp blow caused it to move forward at a slow, shuffling pace.

Noakes half dragged it through the gate, and scarcely had it gone a dozen yards into the field before it fell down as though shot.

It was a large corn-field into which they had intruded, and the tall ears completely hid the fallen horse from view.

"He is settled!" said Wild. "It's lucky mine fell so near such a convenient place as this is. Now, then, our heaviest task is before us."

They returned again to the road, and, seizing hold of the horse, attempted to drag it.

At first they feared the task was one altogether beyond their power, and that they should never have strength to accomplish it.

But, little by little, inch by inch, they dragged it along, gradually getting it nearer to the gate.

At length they managed, after more than half an hour's incredible labour, to get it just inside the field.

And here they left it.

It was not so well concealed from view as the other one, but yet Jonathan thought sufficiently well to answer their purpose.

"Now, Noakes," he said, "pick up your bundle and carry it—I will do the like."

"May I ask where you are going now, Mr. Wild?"

"I can scarcely tell you at present, except that I am going to quit the high-road. I see there is a footpath along one side of this field. We will make our way along it."

Noakes saw at once that this at least presented some prospect of eluding their foes, so he acquiesced willingly.

They followed the footpath for a considerable distance, crossing several stiles, until at length they found themselves at no great distance from a large farm-house.

Wild looked at the building for some moments in silence, and then he said, abruptly:

"I think we will stay there, Noakes."

"Stay there?" ejaculated his companion, in surprise.

"Yes; could you not understand what I said?"

"But I could scarcely believe it. Why do you wish to stay?"

"Because it will be best to do so; if we make a halt there for a time, our foes will probably pass us, and it will be much better to have them before than behind us."

To this Noakes assented.

And yet he did not like the idea of stopping.

"We shall never reach the sea-shore," he thought.

Aware, from former experience, that when Jonathan Wild had decided upon any course, it was quite useless to attempt to persuade him to do otherwise, Mr. Noakes resigned himself to his fate, and followed.

Jonathan walked straight to the farm-house, nor did he pause until they reached a large open shed.

"What are you staying for?" asked Mr. Noakes.

"We will hide our bundles here," was the reply.

"And what shall you do then?"

"Why, walk up to the farm-house, and ask for shelter; the chances are a thousand to one that we shall get it. If so, why, all will be well. In the morning we can start for the sea."

"I think it would be best to keep right on now."

"No doubt you do, but I am of a different opinion, and you must allow me to decide; so say no more about that—it will be useless."

Noakes knew that, and therefore was silent.

They secreted the two bundles in the shed, and then continued their way towards the homestead.

"You ask for admission," said Wild. "Tell them we are poor folks on our way to the sea-coast. I will keep in the background,—you are not so likely to be recognised as I am."

This arrangement made, the pair proceeded.

Halting at last before the front door, Noakes knocked loudly for admission.

The loud baying of a dog followed.

Then the door opened, and a rough but good-tempered voice said:

"Who are you? What in the world do you want?"

"Two poor travellers," was Noakes's reply. "We want to ask you for a few hours' lodging. We are poor, and on our way to the sea-coast."

"Let them in," said a cheerful voice from within—"let them come in—it would be a sin not to be hospitable."

Thus invited, Noakes and Wild entered.

They shrank back rather from the light that proceeded from the fire burning on the hearth.

They were well aware that the inhabitants of the farm-house would not be prepossessed by their appearance.

"We are poor, humble men," said Noakes, in a cringing tone of voice, "and have met with nothing but misfortunes. Many thanks to you all for your kindness in giving us admission. We have applied at many places, but always in vain."

The farmer seated in the chimney corner did not wonder at it, and from the bottom of his heart wished he had not so readily invited them to enter.

Had he seen them, he would certainly have sent them off about their business.

Now, he considered, it was too late; and as he had always from his infancy been impressed with the virtue of hospitality, he ordered preparations to be made for a substantial meal.

Of this Wild and Noakes were invited to partake, and they ate eagerly.

Then lights were called for, and they were shown into a small room at the top of the house—a garret, in fact, situated just underneath the thatch, and reached from the floor below it by means of a ladder and a trap-door.

In one corner was a rude bed, and on this they were told they could repose themselves.

CHAPTER DCXLIX.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES AN UNGRATEFUL RETURN FOR THE HOSPITALITY THAT HAS BEEN SHOWN HIM.

JONATHAN WILD made no attempt to retire to rest.

He seated himself down upon the edge of the bed.

"Curse these people!" he said—"how I hate them!"

"Hate them?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"For the manner in which they treated us. Had they been kind and hospitable, I would have done them no harm. Now——"

"Now what?" said Noakes, in terror.

"Oh, I don't mean them any harm now!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, this: These farmers are never without a large sum of ready money in their houses. We are inside the building, Noakes, and it will go hard with me but I will find out where he keeps his store."

"And is this the return you would make to them for having listened to your application for shelter?"

"Bah! Be quiet! Can you not see that my sole desire is to obtain as much wealth as I can before we leave England? You will be contented enough when all is done, I'll warrant."

Mr. Noakes felt doubtful.

"You can lie down outside the bed, and take a rest for a short time, if you like. I sha'n't commence my operations at present—I shall wait until all have retired to slumber; then I will arouse you."

Noakes was weary and sick of life altogether, so he flung himself with a sigh upon the bed.

Jonathan remained sitting still, listening patiently to every sound.

By degrees, however, complete silence reigned.

Yet he waited and waited until the very dead of night, when he imagined all the inmates of the place would be sound asleep.

Then he touched Noakes upon the shoulder.

"Come," he said, "get up quietly, and make no noise—the time has come."

"Mr. Wild, you are mad—I am sure of it—quite insane, or you would not think of committing such an act as you now contemplate."

"Bah! Be quiet!"

"Instead of taking every precaution," continued Noakes, unheedingly, "and keeping as quiet as you can, you will raise a regular hue and cry after us!"

"Be quiet, I tell you! I will not hear you speak. Come on!"

Jonathan crept on tip-toe towards the top of the ladder.

He listened.

But all was perfectly silent below.

Then gently he lowered himself through the aperture, bidding Noakes in a low whisper to follow him, and to make no noise in doing so.

The bottom of the ladder was reached without any alarm having been given.

The place was rather dark, but not very, and Jonathan had been long enough in the attic for his eyes to grow accustomed to the obscurity.

He was able to see with sufficient distinctness to answer his purpose.

In which room the farmer himself might be sleeping he did not know.

This, however, must be found out, for in this room it was most probable the money would be found.

Jonathan hesitated for several moments before he ventured to open any one of the doors that were on both sides of him.

At length, feeling certain that hesitation was useless, he advanced to one, raised the latch quietly, and pushed it back a little way upon its hinges, just far enough, however, to allow him to glide in.

It was a bed-chamber that he had entered.

But whether the right one or not he could not tell.

The sound of some one breathing heavily came distinctly upon his ears.

He motioned for Noakes to remain standing on the threshold.

Then, like some evil spirit, he glided into the room.

He went first to the bedside and endeavoured to ascertain whether it was really the farmer who was lying there.

Of this he could not be certain.

So he resolved to search the room, and pocket whatever valuables he was able to find.

Nothing was lying about, however, that he considered worth his while to carry away.

Against one wall, however, was an old-fashioned piece of furniture, containing several drawers.

It looked, he thought, a likely place for him to find what he was in search of.

One after another he opened the drawers, and found that only one was fast.

Those that opened to his hand he did not trouble to peep into.

The one that resisted him he felt certain contained the wealth that he coveted.

Taking a large clasp-knife from his pocket, he went to work at the bolt of the lock.

He introduced the point of the blade between the top of the drawer and the case into which it fitted.

There were a few ineffectual efforts, but the only sound was a faint scratching one, certainly not sufficient to wake even a light sleeper.

At last, however, the lock, which was a common one, yielded.

With a snap, the bolt sank into its place.

He drew open the drawer, and placed his hand inside it.

He clutched immediately a bag of gold.

He could tell it was gold by its great weight and the smallness of the coins that it contained.

There were two other bags.

These, also, he appropriated.

For a wonder, Wild was satisfied, and he resolved to retreat, if he possibly could, without making an alarm.

With that view, he did not attempt to search further.

He glided to the door of the room.

As he passed it, he fancied he heard a noise.

But he did not stay to listen.

"Come, Noakes," he said, "follow me quickly and silently."

"Have you succeeded?"

"Yes; I have taken a couple of hundred pounds at least. Come on! Now, then, what do you think of your foolish fears? How easily it has been obtained! It was only to stretch forth my hand and take!"

At this moment a loud noise attracted their attention.

"The farmer has discovered his loss," said Wild, quickly. "We must retreat with all speed!"

He hastened down the rude staircase as he spoke, across the kitchen to the front door, where he paused.

But he heard hasty footsteps behind him, and loud shouts and cries, showing that a general alarm had taken place.

The fire was still burning on the hearth in the kitchen, though only feebly.

"Let us give them something to amuse themselves with before we start," said Wild. "They will be too busy, I'll warrant, to think of pursuing us now!"

While speaking, Jonathan Wild had seized a number of light, inflammable articles that happened to be in the kitchen, and threw them on the fire.

They blazed up immediately, and while still burning, he scattered them about in various directions.

"Now, Noakes," he said, "follow me!"

He darted out of the door, which was already open, just as several persons, with a terrified expression of countenance, came rushing down the staircase.

Their first impulse was to pursue the robbers.

But when they saw how fearfully the place was menaced by fire they changed their determination.

The uproar increased, for the flames spread with a rapidity that was truly incredible.

Everything about the building was of a highly combustible nature, so that the fire, so to speak, found food everywhere it went.

All idea of pursuing the robbers was abandoned, and the terrified inmates set themselves to work to extinguish the flames.

Wild and Noakes ran towards the shed where they had hidden their bundles, and possessing themselves of them, with all speed ran hastily away.

From time to time they glanced back, and saw through the windows of the farm-house the fierce gleam of the flames.

"I told you I would find them employment," Jonathan said, "and I have kept my word. What do you think of to-night's proceedings now?"

"Why, the result has been better than I anticipated."

"Is it not always so? Had I allowed myself on any occasion to be influenced by your advice, what would have been the end? Bah! Noakes, I am disgusted with you. I feel almost inclined to knock you on the head and put an end to your miserable existence at once; it would be quite a charity to do it, only I enjoy your society. You amuse—that's why I permit you to live."

Noakes ground his teeth bitterly.

It was the first time he had heard Wild speak so plainly.

But about the truth of his words he could have no doubt.

He had known all along why it was that Jonathan permitted him to live, and allowed him to speak so freely to him.

"But come on," said Wild—"I don't want to bear any malice now! We have got through all these troubles much better than I expected. We are rich—we have plenty of money; and now I'll put your mind at rest by crossing over to Holland without delay."

CHAPTER DCL.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES AT LAST COME IN SIGHT OF THE SEA.

FINDING themselves in no danger of pursuit, Wild and Noakes went on their way at an easy rate.

At length, however, they paused before a hedge, which separated them from the high-road.

"That's our direction," said Wild, "and if I felt sure that the officers were before us I would keep along it."

"But how shall we obtain that knowledge?"

"We must be perpetually on the look-out. Hark! I fancy I can hear something now! Listen!"

"I can hear nothing."

"Listen, I tell you!"

Both were silent for several minutes, and at length Noakes cried:

"I can hear the tramp of horses' feet—I am sure of it."

"And so am I. We will wait here, and watch them go by."

"Which way are they coming?"

"From the direction I want to take, so that if we start now we shall meet them."

Noakes was by no means willing to do this.

He laid himself down at full length on the grass by the side of the hedge.

The tramping of horses' feet became plainer each moment, and it was evident that horsemen in considerable numbers were approaching.

Time passed, and then, peering through the hedge, Jonathan observed a large troop of police officers.

They were coming along at a gentle rate, and he could hear the murmur of voices in conversation.

Some words he overheard.

"Depend upon it they have gone no further along the road," said one—"they cannot have done so."

"I am inclined to be of the same opinion. They have doubled upon us somewhere, but where I have no idea."

"Nor I. We will find out, though, if it is at all within possibility."

"We will—we will! It was a pity we rode on at such a rapid speed, making so sure they were on the road before us. We ought to have looked out on each side for anything suspicious."

"It's no use grieving about that now."

"Not a bit."

The voices died away.

Wild could hear no more.

The officers gradually passed by, and continued their course along the road.

"Now," said Jonathan Wild, gleefully, "we're safe—quite safe!"

"How do you make that out?" asked Noakes, who was in an agony of fright.

"Easily enough!"

"Explain."

"I will, if you wish it. While the officers are going in that direction, we must be safe if we keep along the highway. Every step we take we shall be going two steps further away from them."

"Yes—yes—I can see. But how if they discover our horses, as probably they will?"

"Why, then they will recommence the pursuit," said Jonathan Wild. "But before then it's very odd to me if I am not at the sea-shore."

"Are you really in earnest about the sea-shore?"

"Certainly I am."

"I can hardly believe it, Mr. Wild, you have talked of it so much!"

"Well, there will not be time to talk of it much longer, for at a moderate calculation, if we keep along this road, we must come within sight of the sea by daylight."

This was indeed most welcome news to Noakes, and he remained silent for some time gloating over it.

At a steady rate they continued to trudge along the high-road, not meeting with any accident or adventure by the way.

Then, after a long pause, Wild spoke.

He pointed straight before him.

"Look, Noakes," he said—"look! There is that long streak of light in advance, close down to the horizon, that shows how close the new day is."

"But the sea—where is that?"

"Just beyond. You will see it presently, when it grows lighter."

Wild's words were shortly after verified.

From a piece of rising ground they obtained, just about sunrise, a magnificent view of the wide expanse of water.

"There you are," said Wild. "Now are you content?"

"I am content—quite content."

"That is well, then."

"Shall you attempt to embark at once?"

"No, no—it will not be safe till night. We must look out for some place where we can remain until darkness comes."

"But why not start now?"

"Because our boat must inevitably be seen; but if we wait till night we shall be able to push off, and by the time we are half a mile from shore we shall be completely out of sight."

Great as was his impatience to get upon the water, Noakes could not but be conscious that in this respect Wild was right.

"Where are we to stay?" he asked.

"That I know not at present. But come on—the sea is in reality further off than it looks to be, and we have some distance yet to walk. On the shore, however, I have no doubt we shall find some cavity or indentation in the rocks into which we can crawl and remain until night-fall."

"That will suit us well," said Noakes, "and while we are here we can make ourselves familiar with the appearance of the place, and arrange our plan of operations."

"Very true!" said Wild. "Don't flag now—it's a hard walk that we have before us; but it will be best to undertake it. If you are ever so tired, don't stop to rest, for at this hour in the morning there is little likelihood that we shall meet with anyone."

Mr. Noakes was very weary already, but as he could see the ocean he believed they could not have far to go.

He found out his mistake, however, when he had been walking for nearly a couple of hours without ceasing.

The water then seemed as far off as ever.

It was not, in fact, until the sun had gained a considerable altitude that they paused on the beach.

They had been careful to choose a part where there were no habitations visible, and where they believed they should be quite out of sight.

There were some tall cliffs close to the water's edge, and up these, with great difficulty, the tired villains climbed.

Presently they came to a natural fissure in the rock, and into this they crept, and sank down completely footsore and exhausted.

A more lonely spot than this, Wild fancied he had never seen.

Although, however, there was so little fear that they should be seen by any of their pursuers, he determined to take every precaution in his power.

For this reason it was arranged that one should watch while the other slept.

And so the time gradually and gradually wore away.

They watched the sun set far away over the waters, and noted with pleasure the huge black clouds that began to pile themselves up in the sky.

Had they been better acquainted with the tokens of the weather they would certainly have postponed their intended voyage.

An old sailor, looking up at the aspect of the sky, could have prophesied with certainty that the night would be a rough one.

Of this neither Wild nor Noakes for a moment thought.

All they were aware of amounted to the fact that if the night was dark there would be less likelihood they should be seen by anyone.

After some deliberation, it had been agreed upon between them that they would seize upon some small vessel lying at anchor or drawn up upon the beach, and, no one on board it but themselves, take their course across the German Ocean.

It seemed a perilous venture for them.

But Jonathan relied greatly on his own powers.

In former times he had made many and many a voyage to Holland, and to a certain extent was familiar with the method of managing a small craft.

He knew how to set the sails, and was aware of the direction he wished to take.

It was not as though he had any particular port to gain.

Anywhere on the coast of Holland or Germany would suit his purpose.

He imagined that to keep the boat's head turned in the required direction would be an easy enough matter.

The greatest difficulty he saw as yet was getting possession of a boat.

No such article could be seen anywhere along the coast from his elevated situation on the cliff, and how far he might have to go before he found what he required was hard to say.

So soon as ever it was dusk they began to descend.

"We will keep along the shore to the right," said Wild. "Before long we must perceive a boat—there are always plenty everywhere on the beach."

They found it very rough, hard, disagreeable walking over the loose shingle.

But this was a trifle they wholly disregarded in the strong desire they felt to achieve their purpose.

CHAPTER CCLII.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES TAKE VIOLENT POSSESSION OF A BOAT.

HALF an hour afterwards, Jonathan Wild cried:

"Stop—look there!"

Mr. Noakes strained his eyes, and endeavoured to pierce the darkness.

"I can see nothing!" he said. "What is it?"

"Look a little way off the land—can you see that boat there?"

"I can see a mass of something black upon the water."

"Then that's a boat; I can see it plainly."

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES AT SEA IN THE FISHING BOAT.]

"I will take your word for it, Mr. Wild. Do you think that will suit us?"

"I have no doubt of it."

"And how shall we obtain it?"

"By main force if necessary. But come, don't flag now, our walk will soon be over."

"I am glad to hear it, for I am wearied to death."

"I am tired, too. Curse those horses; it would have made all the difference had they brought us a few miles further!"

"Perhaps it is all for the best, Mr. Wild."

"Perhaps so; at any rate, we shall have to make ourselves content as best we can."

"I can see the boat now."

"Can you?"

"Yes. It seems a small one."

"Yes; but yet it's plenty large enough to carry both of us."

No. 140.—BLUESKIN.

"But is it large enough to cross the ocean?"

"Oh, plenty—plenty! I will warrant that it does the voyage more safely and with greater speed than a larger vessel."

"That is good news indeed; it looks at last as though fortune meant to favour us."

"It does. I have no doubt now we shall succeed."

"Are you sorry to leave England behind you?"

"No, glad—heartily glad."

"I hope nothing will occur to interfere with our intention."

"Oh! don't be afraid—it's all right, depend upon it."

"I think we may safely reckon upon having baffled our pursuers."

"Yes, it will be strange indeed if we are troubled with them again before we start."

They continued walking on some time in silence.

The vessel which Jonathan Wild's keen eye had dis-tected was a small one, looking not unlike a fishing smack.

It was furnished with a rude sail.

"There it is," said Wild, at length. "Now, all we have to do is to take possession of it."

"But how are we to manage that?"

"Easily enough."

"But the boat is so far out at sea."

"No, only a few yards. It appears so because it is now high tide—at least, the water is going down now, I think."

"And is it not deep?"

"No, not at all. We should get wet up to our knees perhaps in wading through, but nothing worse than that. Come on!"

Having satisfied himself by a stealthy glance that there was no one at hand to observe their movements, Jonathan Wild walked into the water.

He was followed by Mr. Noakes, who could not help feeling some degree of alarm.

As Jonathan had told him, however, the water was very shallow.

But it gradually increased in depth as they proceeded.

"Don't make such a splashing as that," said Wild, in a low voice; "be as quiet as you can!"

"What for? who can hear us?"

"There may be some one in the boat."

"Oh ah! yes, so there may—I didn't think of that."

"Then you ought."

"But, Mr. Wild."

"What?"

"If there is some one in the boat?"

"Well?"

"How should you manage then?"

"Manage? why, easily enough. You will soon see how I shall overcome any little difficulty of that sort."

While speaking, Jonathan Wild thrust his hand into his pocket and produced a pistol.

He examined it carefully to ascertain whether the priming had been wetted.

But finding all was right, he continued his course with confidence.

If there was anyone on board the boat, they were evidently unaware of their approach.

Not the least notice was taken, and at length the two villains paused close to it.

"Now then," said Wild, "we've got it all to ourselves. Fling in your bundle and then climb in afterwards."

Wild tossed his own bundle into the boat as he spoke.

The jingling noise produced awoke a man who had been left in charge of the boat.

"Hallo!" he said, in a gruff voice. "What the devil's that?"

"In with your bundle," said Wild—"be quick, and have your sword ready in case you should require it."

"Thieves! pirates!" cried the man, with a shout of astonishment, as he sprang up in the boat. "There—stand off, will you, or it will be the worse for you!"

Jonathan Wild coolly began to climb into the boat.

"Stand off, I tell you!" said the man. "Oh! you won't? then take that!"

With great suddenness he picked up an oar and raised it in the air with the intention of striking his assailants a heavy blow.

"Down with him, Noakes!" said Wild. "Slash him with your sword! I don't want to fire my pistol if I can help it, because it will raise an alarm!"

Noakes made a sudden cut at the man in the boat with his sword.

But the blow was dexterously avoided.

The next moment the oar descended with full force, and Noakes narrowly escaped receiving it upon his head.

There was now no time for hesitation.

Before the man could recover the oar again, Jonathan had raised his pistol and pulled the trigger.

There was a flash, and a report that sounded very loud upon the silent water.

It mingled with the death-scream of the man, who, staggering back, fell head-foremost into the sea.

"He is settled," said Wild, coolly. "Now, then, in with you! It's odd to me now if we are not pursued."

This was enough to recall all Mr. Noakes's energies.

But not without some difficulty he climbed into the boat after his companion, almost capsizing it as he did so.

"Pull up the anchor," cried Wild, as he busied himself with the sail, "and then we will be off."

But Noakes knew nothing about nautical matters, and Wild uttered a string of curses at his ignorance.

With the speed of desperation he pulled up the anchor, for he could see lights moving about upon the shore.

The discharge of the pistol had evidently raised an alarm, as he feared it would.

The moment the anchor was released the boat sped over the waves.

Both wind and tide were in their favour, and Wild returned to the sail again.

He fixed it in a proper position, and then they scudded over the waves at a speed that was really terrifying.

"Now we're right," said Wild, with a sigh of satisfaction, as he sank down in the bow of the boat. "Noakes, you villain, what do you think of matters now?"

"They certainly bear a brighter aspect than they did," was the reply. "I scarcely believe, however, that we have really set sail from English shores."

"You will realise it after awhile," said Wild. "And now, if the police do not set off in pursuit of us, all will be well."

"Do you think there is any fear of that, Mr. Wild?" asked Noakes, already terrified.

"Yes, it is quite possible; however, there is one comfort—we have got the start, and it will take them some time to overtake us."

Mr. Noakes did not speak, but sank down in the boat quite exhausted, and feeling not half so content and secure as he did a few minutes previously.

He fixed his eyes upon the coast, which was fast becoming lost to sight in the darkness.

He could see nothing alarming, however, and after a time his courage rose again.

As they got farther and farther out to sea the violence of the wind much increased, consequently the speed of the little vessel was much accelerated.

The mast bent forward through the strain, and every now and then the prow of the boat would be almost under water.

"I won't take the sail down yet," Wild said—"I will risk it a little while longer. There are few who would venture to fly before the wind at this pace, but it is a capital little boat, and will carry us bravely."

Mr. Noakes said nothing, for he began to feel very uncomfortable indeed.

He could not tell at first what it was that ailed him.

"Why, Noakes," said his companion, suddenly, "what ails you? Are you frightened?"

"No—no, Mr. Wild."

"What then?"

"I—I—"

"What?"

"I feel very ill."

"Bah! I know what's the matter with you—you are sea-sick, that's all. You'll soon get over it, though I should scarcely have thought you'd been on the water long enough to feel any effects at present."

CHAPTER DCCLII.

THE POSITION OF JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES IN THE LITTLE BOAT IS ANYTHING BUT PLEASANT.

MR. NOAKES GROANED.

"Are you so very bad?"

"I am, Mr. Wild—I am. I feel as though I should die."

"I suppose you will some day, but not just at present, I rather think."

"Oh! I don't know. I got worse every moment. I never felt like this in all my life before."

"What an unreasonable fellow you are," said Wild. "Now you have left England behind you, you are not satisfied."

"I am—I am—only I can't help this dreadful sickness."

Mr. Noakes laid himself down in the boat, and really looked very bad indeed.

It has often been said that as nothing is like sea-sickness but death, so death can be the only thing that is like sea-sickness.

Mr. Noakes had never been on the ocean before.

As for Jonathan, he was a tolerable sailor, and laughed at the other's indisposition.

"Get up," he cried, at length, saluting Noakes with a heavy kick—"get up, d—n you! Do you think I am going to attend to the boat all myself? Will you lie groaning there, doing nothing?"

"Don't kick me, Mr. Wild."

"But I shall if you don't get up!"

"I can't get up."

"Then take that and that!"

Jonathan had some very heavy boots on, and so Noakes felt the pain of the kicks from them very severely.

With much difficulty he managed to raise himself partially up.

It seemed as though all the strength had deserted his body.

His face was as white as death.

"There," said Wild, "I am the doctor you require—you look better already! Now, then, just sit there and keep a look-out, will you?"

It was more than Mr. Noakes could accomplish.

He sat for a time where Wild had directed him, and then suddenly slipped down, as though half lifeless.

Jonathan's attention just then was directed to the rear.

Looking back over the angry, foaming waters, he fancied he could perceive in the distance the outline of some large vessel, manned by many rowers, who were making all speed towards him.

He strained his eyes in a vain endeavour to ascertain whether this was really the case, or whether his fancy had deceived him.

So intently was he occupied in this that he knew nothing about his companion having again sunk to the bottom of the boat.

He believed him to be keeping a look-out ahead.

Wild was steering; that is to say, he was using the rudder in such a manner as to keep the vessel all the time before the wind.

Whiter and whiter grew the waves, and they rose up and down in large tumultuous billows.

The wind came shrieking and roaring over the water.

But Jonathan scarcely heeded it.

All his senses were bent up in watching the pursuing boat.

Yes, it was a boat, and it was pursuing him.

Reluctantly he had been forced to the conclusion that his fancy had not deceived him—that it was really his enemies, straining every nerve to overtake him.

The solitary mast creaked and groaned beneath the immense pressure of the wind, and had not the sail been composed of very strong material it must have been split to ribbons long since.

No one, without in similar circumstances of desperation, would have run the risk of carrying a sail in such an angry sea.

On all sides there were indications that this was but the slight forerunner of a storm, only the presage of something more terrible and dangerous to come.

Of all this Noakes was also unconscious.

He lay on his back in the boat, with his eyes closed, heartily wishing that his miserable existence was at an end.

He was almost ready to regret having felt so much anxiety to dare the dangers of the deep, and certainly just then, had he been allowed his choice, he would have preferred being on the shore.

Denser and denser grew the air, until all objects became lost to view—until it was no longer possible to see more than a few yards from the boat.

Whether the pursuing boat had given up the chase, and, viewing the aspect of the weather, thought it advisable to return, or whether they were then continuing their strenuous efforts, Jonathan could not possibly tell.

His own terrors made him picture the latter as being the more likely state of affairs.

At length, finding that it was perfectly useless to continue at his present post, Jonathan quitted it, having made the rudder secure by a rope.

Then he perceived not only the situation of his comrade, but also that the little boat was continually shipping heavy seas.

Already it was nearly a third part full of water, and the quantity momentarily increased.

"Get up, Noakes!" he roared, making his voice heard above the howling of the wind—"get up, curse you! Or will you lie there and let us be drowned?"

Mr. Noakes neither stirred nor spoke.

Jonathan saw that he was helpless and incapable, and that it would be useless to depend upon him in any way.

The task of baling out the water was a terrible one to undertake by himself.

If Mr. Noakes had assisted him the vessel might quickly have been lightened.

There was nothing else, either, by which he could bale out the water, except his hat, and this answered the purpose very insufficiently.

Still, he worked with a will—worked unceasingly, indeed, until at length he was compelled to give up from sheer exhaustion.

Then he found that if he had not lowered the water he had prevented it from increasing.

There was now about the same quantity in as at first.

If he rested longer, however, the boat would get half full.

Mr. Noakes rolled about occasionally, and groaned.

But these were the only signs of life that he exhibited.

Muttering the most awful curses upon himself and everybody and everything else in the world, Jonathan again renewed his labours.

But now the storm was beginning in good earnest.

There came one tremendous gust of wind, the like of which Jonathan Wild had never before felt.

It seemed as though it would force the boat head-for-most into the ocean.

Doubtless it would have overturned it had not the mast given way.

There was a tremendous crash, a splitting noise, and then, with a rush, the broken sail and everything connected with it fell over the side.

Some of the ropes still held, and this weight being all on one side of the boat, almost brought it on its beam-ends.

Quickened by terror at his dangerous position, Jonathan instantly took his knife out of his pocket, and, with a few smart strokes, severed all the ropes.

The mast and sail released, then floated far away over the waters, becoming lost to sight in a second.

The boat righted itself with great suddenness, and then went over the waters at a speed and in a manner that was frightful to behold.

The rudder was broken, and so the little bark was hurried before the gale just as some log of wood might have been, now going in one direction, now in another.

All reckoning was lost.

In the intense darkness, Jonathan had no idea whether he was persevering in the right course or not.

Yet as he seemed to have flown before the wind all the time, he imagined he could not be far out.

The task of baling out the water grew more and more difficult.

By his greatest exertions, he could scarcely prevent it from rising.

And then, at that truly awful time, surely anyone but Jonathan Wild would have resigned himself to that fate which seemed inevitable.

But, with that dogged spirit of resistance and perseverance against all obstacles which formed such a characteristic of his nature, he continued to struggle hard against his destiny.

He may have derived some consolation from the recollection of an old proverb; but certain it is, from whatever cause it might be, Jonathan did not believe that his life was actually in much danger.

During the whole of the night the wind continued to blow as before, and the waves to roll literally mountains high.

The perspiration streamed from every pore in Wild's body as he continued to work incessantly.

Slowly and slowly the hours dragged by, and he began to look anxiously for some signs of the approach of morning.

All around continued to be as dark as before.

In no direction could he perceive a single gleam of light.

CHAPTER DCLIII.

JONATHAN WILD THINKS THE PROSPECT OF HIS GAINING THE SHORE RATHER DOUBTFUL.

ALL this while Mr. Noakes had remained with the greater part of his body immersed in the water.

Now, however, the death-like feeling which he had experienced so intensely began to wear away.

By slow degrees—for his strength was much exhausted—he dragged himself out of his uncomfortable posture.

In a huddled-up heap, he sat on one of the seats, looking about him with such a woe-begone air as provoked a roar of laughter from his companion.

"Why, Noakes," he said, "how dismal you look! One would think that nothing was further from your desires than to leave England!"

"It is well for you to jest and jeer at me," replied Noakes; "I wish, however, that you felt as I do!"

"Then I'm d—d if it would not be all up with us both, for if I had been as helpless as you have we should have been at the bottom long since!"

"And a good job too!" moaned Noakes.

"What's that?"

"I say it would be nothing to regret. What in the world is the use of living such a miserable existence as this is? No death could be equal to it!"

"Indeed! Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it!"

"And you would prefer to give up quietly and go out of existence?"

"Yes, I would."

"Then I will take you at your word!" said Wild. "Come on—I'll pitch you overboard at once, and put you out of your misery! You know I was always ready to do you any little favour, Noakes, and you would be obliging me as well, for, lightened of your weight, the boat would go along ever so much better!"

In spite of what he had just said, Mr. Noakes seemed to cling with his whole body tighter to the seat, and he clutched the edges of the boat convulsively.

"Now, then," said Wild, advancing towards him, "are you ready? If so, say the word!"

"No, no—not yet, Mr. Wild!"

"Why not yet? I thought you said you were quite ready?"

"I thought I was, but now——"

Wild interrupted him by laughing hideously.

"You are coming to your senses now, I perceive; but, mark my words, if you continue to sit there idly as you have done, I will, so surely as you now live, throw you overboard, for I will not perform all the labour myself!"

"I am strengthless!" said Noakes.

"No matter; you have heard what I have said, and, never fear, I shall be quite as good as my word! Without you begin to work at once, over you go!"

Noakes knew that this was no idle threat, and it may be imagined that an entire revulsion of his feelings had taken place, for now he set himself to work at baling out the water with some degree of vigour.

The exercise seemed to improve him.

He was evidently getting a little the better of his sickness.

By the exertions of both, the water was, after a length of time, considerably diminished.

Suddenly Wild stopped.

"What is it?" asked Noakes, feebly. "Why do you stay?"

"For nothing—to rest only. I can now see what I have been looking for a length of time."

"And what is that?"

"The dawn. Look over there, and you will see a little lightness in the sky. It will soon be daylight now, and then this will not seem half so disagreeable as it does now."

In the east there was certainly a little light to be seen.

But the storm showed no signs of abatement.

The wind still blew with terrific force.

And the waves continued to roll in a manner such as Wild had never witnessed before.

But the morning was coming, and with it he thought surely would come a cessation of the violence of the tempest.

It was a thousand wonders that so small a vessel should be able to withstand the violence of such a gale.

But it was an excellent boat, and rode upon the waters when perhaps many a larger one would have foundered.

When the grey, cold light of early dawn diffused itself entirely over the surface of the waters, Jonathan beheld nothing that was cheering or encouraging.

The sky was covered with huge masses of clouds, and, when they rose up to the summit of a wave and he looked around him, he could see nothing but the boisterous ocean on all sides.

Miserable as the prospect was, yet he had the philosophy to draw some consolation from it.

"You may think this storm a very bad thing, Noakes, but I don't."

"Why not?"

"Because, had it been calmer weather, we should certainly have been overtaken by those who commenced a pursuit after us. They would have made every exertion—have signalled different vessels, and in the end we must have been captured."

"And is there no one in sight now?"

"No one. When we rise again on the summit of this wave, look all around you, and you will find that there is not a single soul in sight. This was why I was wishing for morning to come, in order that I might satisfy myself that we were free from the danger of pursuit. Now I feel better, and am conscious that all will turn out well."

His confident manner of speaking produced a considerable effect upon Mr. Noakes, although he was in such a miserable condition of body and mind.

"Oh, if this voyage was but over!" he said—"if I could but once more put my foot upon dry land!"

"You would be glad, doubtless," said Wild, "and so should I, I confess, for I feel that I want rest."

"How long do you think the journey will take us?" was Noakes's next question.

"That's a question impossible to answer."

"Why so?"

"At present I cannot tell how far the wind and waves may have carried us out of our course. We may not, for aught I can say at the present moment, be going in the direction of the land at all."

"Do you mean that we are being carried out to the open sea?"

"Yes."

"Then," said Noakes, emphatically, "we are lost, for we have no sail!"

"I don't agree with you. I don't believe we are lost. Let us wait. The violence of this storm must abate; and yet, if it gets no worse than it has been, I should not care, because we shall be all the safer from pursuit."

It will be seen, from this conversation, that Wild experienced but little terror in consequence of his situation.

And yet there were many bold-hearted sailors who would have shrunk back at the very idea of encountering such a fearful danger.

And so, without any accident of importance occurring to diversify it, the whole of that day passed by.

It is possible that the storm was not so terrible as it had been, yet the wind blew with tremendous force.

Bravely did the little boat hold upon her course.

There were times when even Jonathan Wild thought that she would sink to the bottom.

A heavy wave would sometimes break and nearly fill her with water.

Then he would go himself actively to work, and in the space of a short time the vessel would be lightened.

Yet when a wave broke in the manner we have described, if it had been followed immediately by another, nothing could have saved them.

The boat must have been swamped.

This was what Jonathan was most in dread of.

But the day passed, and that accident did not happen.

During this day and night they had neither slept nor partaken of food.

Therefore both were terribly exhausted.

Jonathan, too, was tired out by his terrific labour, the extent of which can scarcely be imagined from a bare description of it.

But Jonathan's courage began to fail him as night came on.

He watched misgivingly the darkening of the sky, and he fancied, as the obscurity grew greater and greater, so did the storm become more violent.

He could do nothing more than he had done, however.

But whether during the night that was just beginning he should be able to keep up the exertion he had already made was a doubtful point.

That Mr. Noakes was suffering severely—that, indeed, he was very ill—there could be no doubt.

But when he reflected that they had been twenty-four hours upon the water, scudding forward with unabated velocity, he began to think that it was worth while to make a hard struggle, as he imagined the distance they had to go was almost accomplished.

All the time he wished for morning to come, being fully impressed with the belief that, if they survived that night, the earliest rays of morning would show them land in the distance.

CHAPTER DCLIV.

A TERRIBLE SCENE TAKES PLACE ON BOARD THE LITTLE BOAT.

This expectation was not realised.

Tediously—most tediously—did the night drag itself away.

And when once more the daylight shone upon the ocean, they were unable to perceive the slightest indications of land.

"Look—look!" Noakes had said. "You can see better than I can, Mr. Wild. I would sooner trust to your judgment than my own. Tell me whether you can see anything of the shore!"

Then Jonathan, not without manifest danger to himself, stood up in the boat just as it was balanced on the crest of an enormous wave.

He had one momentary glimpse around him.

But, as on the preceding morning, nothing but the ocean itself met his view.

But they had this consolation remaining to them—the wind had now decreased to a moderate breeze, and, though the waves were very rough—alarmingly so for a boat in the condition theirs was—yet, by comparison, the water seemed nearly smooth.

Little exertion was now required to keep out the water.

They had to apply themselves to this task occasionally, but it by no means required the incessant toil it did at first.

Jonathan was now completely overcome.

He could do nothing towards directing the course of the vessel, nor could he in any way accelerate its speed.

Therefore it was with a somewhat dejected air that he sat himself down at one end of the boat, and left the wind and the waves to carry him where they chose.

He felt giddy and faint for want of food, and the salt water had splashed upon his face, and the atmosphere he had breathed was so impregnated with saline particles that he suffered from an almost ungovernable thirst.

His tongue and lips were parched and swollen.

But there was not a drop of water to be had wherewith he could moisten them.

He looked longingly upon the clear blue waves, that were so transparent he fancied he could see down for miles and miles.

He was aware that one draught of the salt water, so far from assuaging his sufferings, would only increase them a thousand times.

Mr. Noakes was thirsty too, and, but for Jonathan Wild's vigorous interposition, would certainly have drunk deeply of the sea water.

But Jonathan pictured to him the consequences that must infallibly result from such a course.

This was partly from a consideration of his own safety.

He had been told how men, drinking of salt water, had been driven mad, and how in that condition they had made attacks upon the remainder of the crew.

It would be, he felt, no pleasant thing for a sudden access of madness to come over Noakes.

He somehow seemed to feel the first thing his companion would do would be to attack him, and if so, in his own weak state, he would stand but little chance against a madman.

Scarcely would it have been possible to find in the whole of the wide world two more miserable, wretched beings than were Wild and Noakes that day.

Every hour seemed to increase their sufferings.

They were cold, wet, weary, hungry, thirsty, and with scarcely a ray of hope to cheer them on.

And when at length the sun went down without their being able even at the last moment to see anything of the wished-for land, their courage failed them altogether, and both resigned themselves to despair.

In a sleepy, half-conscious condition, the night was passed away.

Neither spoke.

But the minds of both were filled with dark and evil thoughts.

Each hour only served to increase the pangs of hunger.

Every moment they threatened to become unendurable.

When starting upon their voyage, it will be recollected that they altogether forgot it would be necessary to provide themselves with food and drink.

They had searched carefully the boat in every part, thinking perhaps some fragments might have been left on board.

But their search was unrewarded.

They found nothing.

When again daylight came, it showed them gazing upon each other with hungry-looking, bloodshot eyes.

They looked, in fact, more like wild beasts than human beings, for there was an air of ferociousness visible that could scarcely be reconciled with humanity.

As on the previous morning, Noakes was the first to break the silence.

"Can you see anything?" he said, hoarsely, his parched lips cracked and bleeding—"can you see anything of the shore?"

Slowly, Jonathan endeavoured to raise himself up, and then was surprised to find how soon he had grown weak.

He had scarcely more strength in his limbs than a child.

His brain spun round and round, and a kind of mist floated before his eyes.

Quite a minute elapsed before he overcame these disagreeable sensations.

Then, standing up with difficulty in the boat, he looked across the water.

But no—nothing whatever met his view.

As before, the ocean looked like a desert.

There was not a single thing to break the monotony of its glistening surface.

He sank back dejectedly into his seat.

"We must have patience, Noakes," he said—"as much patience as we can."

"Are you sure there is no land?"

"Quite certain. There are no signs of it. If the shore was within a distance of several miles of this place, I could not fail to note it. It looks to me as though we had been carried away far into the ocean."

"Then how long will this voyage last?"

"What an absurd question for you to put! How could anyone possibly reply to it?"

"Is it to end by a slow, miserable, lingering death of starvation?"

"It looks like it."

Noakes groaned.

"Well," he said, "if death came suddenly upon me and took me before I was aware of it, it would indeed be a happy release from this life."

Jonathan said no more, but fixed his eyes intently upon his companion.

It is wonderful what a change hunger will effect in human beings.

It makes the most gentle and inoffensive ferocious to a degree.

What, then, must be its effects upon those who are naturally feral?

A horrible idea was developing itself at the same time in the minds of both these men.

Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes both felt that their hunger must be appeased.

One way, and one way only, presented itself by which this might be done—a most horrible—most revolting way.

And yet, when the idea first entered their minds, it kept firm possession of them and grew continually in strength. That way of satisfying their hunger was cannibalism. The most repugnant thing that can be by any possibility imagined.

Will it be believed that Jonathan Wild thought with a sigh of regret of the man they had thrown overboard? He wished they had not been so hasty in parting with him.

Certain it is that if at that moment the dead body had been in the boat he would have made a voracious attack upon it.

But that man was down at the bottom of the sea miles and miles away, so it was useless to think about him.

But, with all the brutality and unscrupulousness of his nature, Jonathan Wild could not make up his mind to rush across the boat and by a sudden blow put an end to his companion's life.

Noakes, on the other hand, watched every movement that Jonathan Wild made most stealthily.

His courage was increasing—a courage that was born of starvation and despair; and as they had all along been both thinking at the same time of the same thing, so, strangely enough, without being aware of it, both made up their minds at the same instant for an attack.

More like tigers than human beings, both rose up in the boat.

Something in the manner of each furnished a clue to their thoughts.

Jonathan knew instantly that Noakes intended to make an attack upon him, and Noakes acquired the same knowledge.

It would, then, be a desperate struggle for the mastery. A struggle of life and death.

A struggle as to which should be the survivor left in the boat to tell the horrible fate of the other.

Cautiously, like tigers preparing for a spring, they drew closer and closer together, each striving to make a sudden bound upon his adversary and take him at unawares.

This lasted for several minutes.

Then, rendered furious by the gnawing of their hunger, they darted forward and grappled each other furiously.

CHAPTER DCLV.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES MAKE AN APPALLING AND DISHEARTENING DISCOVERY.

THE very commencement of the struggle almost put an end to the lives of both of them.

The sudden movement caused the frail vessel to lurch over to one side.

Wild and Noakes both lost their footing.

They were injured severely by their fall, and some time elapsed before either attempted to rise.

Both were extremely weak—weak to the last degree.

But as their horrible purpose strengthened and strengthened, so did they by slow degrees gain their feet.

Once more they were locked in a deadly embrace, when Jonathan, in a hoarse, hissing, almost inaudible voice, cried:

"Hold—hold—there is no need for this! Land—land—I can see land!"

These words at once brought about a complete change in Mr. Noakes's feelings.

He let go his hold instantly, and sat down.

Then, covering his face with his hands, wept bitterly.

Wild himself was almost overcome by the abruptness with which this discovery had been made.

He could scarcely maintain his feet, but he tried hard to do so.

His heart beat violently.

All his pulses throbbed, and his eyes grew dim with weakness and excitement.

Then he placed his trembling hands over his eyes, so as to shade them from the light.

Then, as the boat mounted upon a wave, he took another look before him.

Yes, he had made no mistake.

There was the land—yes, certainly, the land.

He could see green fields.

He could see waving trees covered with foliage, and little specks upon the coast that he fancied were habitations.

He could not wait to see any more, but fell down completely exhausted.

"Is it true?" said Noakes, huskily—"is it true? or did your fancy mislead you?"

"No, I was right."

"And you can see the land?"

"Yes, certainly—it is there."

Jonathan pointed.

"And how far are we from it?"

"A very short distance indeed. At the rate we are now going at, we shall soon touch the coast."

"Not a moment too soon, though," said Noakes—"not a moment too soon! We have been so long performing our journey that I can scarcely bring myself to believe now that it is at an end."

"Stand up in the boat, then, and look—one glance will satisfy you. Stand up—it will be worth your while."

After several ineffectual attempts, Mr. Noakes struggled to his feet.

Then a wild cry thrilled from his lips.

He caught a glimpse of the trees—of the land, and he thought never before had the earth looked so beautiful as then.

The cry of exultation was, however, suddenly cut short.

The boat sank down again into the trough of the sea, and the sudden movement taking Noakes unawares, he fell heavily.

But for a few bruises more or less he cared little now—he was oblivious of everything now that the land was in sight, and that there was a reasonable prospect of gaining it in a short time.

The wind continued to blow steadily towards the coast.

There was no doubt of it, every rolling wave took them several yards nearer.

Then, as they sat in the boat and looked about them, they were able to catch occasional glimpses of the shore, and these grew longer and longer.

"What place do you think it can be?" asked Noakes, presently. "Do you recognise any features in the landscape?"

"No, not yet—do you?"

"No,—my eyes are so dim, and weak, and watery, that, beyond the fact that I can see something that looks like land, I can behold nothing."

"My eyes are the same," Noakes. "It is from want of food, and sleep, and drink. We could not have existed much longer without either."

A meaning glance passed between them.

But nothing was said.

Jonathan rubbed his eyes continually, in the hope of improving his vision.

He wiped them with the sleeve of his coat.

He pressed his eyeballs with his fingers, and then, removing them, raised his eyelids suddenly.

But all in vain.

He beheld everything through a mist.

"It is strange," he said; "the place bears no resemblance to the coast of Holland, and that's where I thought we had reached. It seems very strange!"

"What seems strange?" asked Noakes, surprised at his companion's manner.

"I don't know. Of course it is impossible—quite impossible! Oh yes, now I think of it, it must be impossible—totally impossible, and yet—"

"Yet what?"

"The shore I can see there looks more like England than any other place that I can call to mind."

"England?" said Noakes, with a shriek, and almost starting to his feet while he spoke.

"Yes, England."

"But it is impossible!" he cried, in the same anxious, shrieking tones.

"I know that—I say it is impossible. Here we have been driving all these days and nights before a constant wind, and going in one direction, so it is not possible that that can be England."

"No, certainly not! What a ridiculous idea it was to enter your mind!"

"Very ridiculous," said Wild. "I won't look again till I am nearer."

He turned his back to the land sullenly, and a pause of several moments' duration ensued.

Then Noakes, as he strove to clear his eyes and satisfy himself by a glance as to the correctness or incorrectness of his companion's notion, said, at length:

"I can't see, Mr. Wild—my eyes are so very, very dim. You look again—we are much nearer now. Tell me what you think."

It was a long and earnest gaze that Wild bestowed upon the shore this time, and when he turned his face towards his companion's it wore a strange expression.

"If—if—" he said, stammeringly and doubtfully.

"If what, Mr. Wild?" asked Noakes, imploring and impatient.

"If, as I said before, I did not know that it was a total impossibility, I should say that it was England I can see."

"But you must be mistaken, Mr. Wild."

"I am mistaken; it may be France or some place with which I am unacquainted, and that bears a certain degree of resemblance to England."

"Yes—yes," said Noakes, eagerly grasping at this idea,—"that must be it—that must be it!"

Again there was a silence, during which the boat continued to make the same steady progress.

Closer and closer to the shore they went, and even Jonathan's half-observed vision enabled him to perceive that the features of the scenery were eminently English.

It is well known that the shores of no other land present a similar aspect.

The coast of the continent was tolerably well known to Jonathan Wild, and so was the coast of his native land.

And when he perceived not only the hedges and the fields, but the little white cottages on the beach, he knew not what to think.

Still the boat drove onward.

Had he been really sure that in some mysterious manner the boat had doubled upon her course, and that it was indeed the English coast he saw, he could not have arrested the progress of the boat in the least.

He could not have changed its direction, no, not if a large body of police officers had been waiting his arrival and expressly looking for him.

Under these circumstances, then, it was best to indulge in the belief that they were deceived by some accidental resemblance.

After all the trouble and difficulty they had gone through, it would indeed be disheartening in the extreme to find that it had all gone for nothing—that they had achieved no good whatever, and only reduced their strength to such a degree that they would scarcely be able to cope with a single adversary.

And still the boat drove on and on, until the shore could be distinctly seen, and every object that was upon it.

And the closer he came, and the more he saw, the more Wild became convinced that he had been driven back to the place from which he started.

He could see the tall cliffs rising out of the water.

And yes, surely that one standing higher than the rest was where himself and his companion had found temporary shelter while waiting for night to come.

Those were the little cottages that were on the beach. Yes, they were certainly driven back almost to the very spot from which they had set out.

CHAPTER DCLVI.

JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES MEET WITH A SURPRISE. YES, Jonathan Wild was not deceived.

There could be no mistake or doubt whatever about the fact that the little boat, as though instinct with life, was making its way back to what might be termed its home.

It actually looked like the interposition of fate.

How strange that these two men should be absent for so long, should go through so many perils and dangers, and at last suddenly discover they had only reached the point from which they had set out!

It was very easy indeed for such a thing as this to happen, and for both the inmates of the boat to be unaware and unsuspecting of it.

The wind, which they thought was so steady and blew so continuously from one point, had in reality shifted about several times.

But, of course, the boat on each occasion had gone before it, so that they had fallen into the error of supposing they were taking their right course all the time.

Not, however, that they could have avoided it had they been aware of it.

From the first they were utterly powerless.

They could not stretch forth their hands to arrest their progress in any way.

Deprived of a sail and of all means of propelling the vessel, they could do nothing more than go just wherever the winds and waves might carry them.

In its strange erratic course the little boat had described almost a circle.

It had started from the shore in a north-easterly direction, and returned from the south-east.

As long as ever he could, Jonathan strove resolutely to disbelieve that he had been so exceedingly unfortunate.

But eventually there was no room left for doubt.

And then the curses that broke from his lips were truly awful.

Mr. Noakes exclaimed:

"It is all up with us now—the game is over—fate is against us; it is useless to strive more!"

In his weak state of body, Jonathan Wild almost thought the same.

Yet his indomitable spirit was far from crushed.

"If it should be England," he said, at last, supposing there to be a doubt upon the point, when in reality he knew there was not—"if it should be England, we must take care to land unseen, and to creep away somewhere, and," he added, as a fresh gleam of hope shot across his mind, "very likely our purpose will be as well achieved as if we had actually reached Holland."

"How so?"

"Why, don't our pursuers know that we set out for sea in that frail little vessel? Then there would be that frightful tempest, and would they not come to the conclusion that we had gone down in it and perished?"

"They would, perhaps."

"I am sure they would, and when they saw us they would scarcely credit the evidence of their own senses—they would think they were deceived by some chance or accidental resemblance. I am confident a long time would elapse before they guessed the truth."

There was something rather cheering in this prospect, but not much.

Yet it served to keep Jonathan Wild in a more confident frame of mind than might have been expected under the circumstances.

As the boat drew nearer to the shore its speed very much diminished.

The water was much smother, and the wind had almost entirely gone down.

It was by the action of the tide only that they were drifted towards the beach.

To Jonathan's joy, no human beings could be seen.

The cottages they had first noticed were at some distance from the point at which they might be expected to land.

Nothing but the rugged, rocky cliffs could be seen, and Jonathan hastened to make his companion aware of this fact.

"Come," he said, "all will be well yet, I am sure of it; no one is here to see us—we shall land without being seen."

"Do you think there is a possibility of it?"

"I do—nay, a certainty, and therefore we will arrange what we shall do as soon as we land, that no time may then be lost in discussion."

"I am willing to leave all to you, Mr. Wild."

"You could scarcely do better. However, when we land we will look along the beach for any little shell-fish that may have been cast up by the tide; a mouthful of food will do for us now—we must not eat too much. Then we will crawl into the cliffs, and wait there until we get stronger. In the cliffs I know there will be thousands and thousands of birds' eggs. Upon these we can not only support existence but recover our strength. Then some dark night, watching our opportunity, we will steal forth from our hiding-place, but not until we are strong and well."

"And what shall we do then?" asked Noakes, pointedly.

"I hardly think it worth while to consider the subject now," said Wild; "we are looking far enough into the future, and who can say what may arise that will have the effect of altering our plans, even slightly as we have formed them?"

CHAPTER DCLVII.

BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.

Mr. Noakes sighed.

"I wish this life was over," he said. "If our enemies were to make their appearance when we land, I should fall into their hands unresistingly and easily—I should not have the heart to raise a finger in my own behalf."

"More fool you, then!" growled Wild. "But there is no need for you to frighten yourself with any thought of that kind—the coast is quite clear. I am sure no human beings are anywhere near at hand, and there is nothing to prevent us creeping on shore unseen."

Slowly and lazily the boat drifted through the water, Jonathan all the while cursing its tardiness.

But he could not accelerate its speed, and so he remained restlessly watching the distance to the shore gradually diminish.

He leant over the side, looking down through the water, so as to ascertain when it would be shallow enough to allow him to get out of the boat and wade to shore.

But at present it was much too deep.

An hour passed—a whole hour—and yet during that time their progress seemed almost inappreciable.

At the end of that time, however, Jonathan believed that the water was now shallow enough for his purpose.

He explained his intention to Mr. Noakes, and gradually lowered himself over the side.

"We cannot do better," he said. "Summon up your strength, and follow me. Ah! this is glorious! The cold water is indeed refreshing!"

Jonathan was nearly up to his breast in water.

But the coolness was, as he said, refreshing.

All signs of weariness, and hunger, and thirst passed away.

There was such an improvement in his manner that Noakes willingly followed his example.

"The bundles!" cried Wild, as he was about to lower himself over the side—"the bundles! Don't forget them! Give them both to me—I will hold them for a moment!"

In his anxiety, Noakes had forgotten the booty.

But Wild recollected it.

The bundles were handed out, but it was almost more than his strength would allow him to do to hold them another moment.

"Before you get out," said Wild, "we must destroy all trace. In the bottom of the boat you will find a plug—pull it out."

Noakes saw the plug of which his companion spoke, and hastened to remove it.

The water bubbled in at a wonderfully rapid rate.

"Now, then, lower yourself over the side," he exclaimed. "There, that will do. Is it not better?"

Mr. Noakes drew a long breath.

"Much better," he said; "and yet I am almost ready to faint."

"That feeling will soon pass away."

"But how fast the boat is sinking!"

Gradually the little bark settled down in the water.

"It will sink in a few moments at the most," said Wild. "Now come with me. We must wade to the beach. Let us congratulate ourselves upon having managed matters so well."

Heavily and wearily they waded through the water, though at each step they found it grow shallower and shallower.

They reached the firm land at last.

Before them, to their surprise, they saw a narrow road winding between the cliffs.

Before they had time to notice more than this, there came the sound of horses' feet upon their ears.

Stupified and bewildered, Wild and Noakes looked along the road.

Round the corner, at a rapid pace, swept a party of several mounted police officers.

From the lips of one of them came an exclamation.

"As I live," he cried, "there they are—Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes! Now, my lads, seize them and bind them! Hurrah! They are caught at last!"

The police officers were not at all slow in obeying these words of their chief.

They slipped off their horses in an instant, and ran at the top of their speed towards the spot where Wild and Noakes were standing.

So completely stunned and overwhelmed were they by the sudden appearance of the officers, that they were unable to offer any resistance.

Moreover, they had been reduced to the last stage of weakness and exhaustion by their long fast on board the boat.

Mr. Noakes stood perfectly passive, and allowed the officers to seize and bind him securely.

He did not so much as raise a finger in his own defence.

At the same time, several officers rushed at Wild.

Weak and astonished as he was, he nevertheless roused himself at the last moment, and made a feeble, ineffectual attempt to fly.

He failed, however, for his legs gave way beneath him.

He half sank down upon the ground, and the officers threw themselves with great violence upon him.

It was not likely that they would feel at all inclined to treat either him or his companion with any particular amount of gentleness.

On the contrary, they might expect to receive the roughest usage.

There was not one of these officers who did not feel a grudge against Jonathan, and on this occasion he was so completely in their power that they would not fail to avail themselves of the opportunity of gratifying it.

"Bring them along," cried the chief officer—"bring them this way, and let us have a look at them!"

Wild and Noakes were dragged forward.

Then the officer said:

"What miserable objects they are! Where on earth can they have been?"

To this no reply was vouchsafed.

Mr. Noakes trembled like one in an ague fit, and his face turned ghastly white—in fact, the poor wretch was almost fainting from exhaustion, and could scarcely prevent himself from lapsing into unconsciousness.

"Well, now you've caught us, why ain't you satisfied?" growled Wild. "What do you want to haul us about in this way for?"

"You will see all about that!" replied the chief officer. "You have a nice little journey before you, as I mean taking you to London."

"We shall die on the road."

"Bah!—gammon!"

"I tell you we shall!"

"And I tell you," repeated the officer, "that there is only one means by which you will come to your end, and that's by a rope! And a very good job it will be when that day comes!"

Wild gnashed his teeth.

But hunger and perhaps some other feelings made him humble.

"We have not tasted food for several days and nights," he said. "Had we not been so utterly worn out, you would not have captured us, you may depend upon it!"

"I don't want to trouble myself about any concern of that kind," said the chief officer—"it has nothing to do with me."

"If we die on the high-road while in your charge," retorted Wild, "you will find that it has everything to do with you. If you don't believe my words, look at my companion."

At this moment Mr. Noakes's strength quite gave way.

His eyes closed, and he fell back quite insensible and apparently dead.

"Do you believe me now?" asked Wild. "Now, then, let me know how you intend to act."

The chief officer looked from one to the other of his prisoners, for a single glance would have been sufficient to convince even the most sceptical that for once in his life Jonathan Wild spoke the truth.

That they were absolutely starving—that, in fact, a few hours' more deprivation of food would put an end to their existence—was quite certain.

[JONATHAN WILD AND MR. NOAKES CAPTURED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.]

The chief officer knew as well as Wild himself that the consequences would be serious if through any neglect of his he allowed two criminals to perish.

But he was rather in a doubtful frame of mind, so he called his men around him.

They held a low, whispered consultation with each other.

Jonathan strained his ears to the utmost, but could not make out a single word.

"You see," exclaimed the chief officer, "that while I shall get into a fix if they die on the road, yet it will be much against my inclination to give them anything to eat."

"And mine," said another officer.

"They are certainly in a very weak state now, and we must take care to keep them so," added a third.

No. 141.—BLUESKIN.

"Right," said the chief officer. "They are no ordinary offenders. When once they regain their strength, we should have no end of trouble with them. Perhaps they would slip through our fingers altogether, and we should be overwhelmed with ridicule and disgrace."

"But," chimed in another, "it is a long journey from here to London, and it will not be possible to perform it without various stoppages on the road. They must be allowed something to eat and drink."

"That's true."

"And then, think of ourselves," said this officer, who happened to be blessed with an excellent appetite. "We must pause now and then for something to eat. A great many hours have elapsed since we had a meal last, and I am sure I feel as though I wanted another."

"Well, the question is this," said the chief officer: "Do you think we can undertake to keep such a good watch and ward over them that during our stay at an inn or any other place they will have no opportunity of escaping?"

"What's your opinion on the subject, sir?"

"I think we might arrange to do it somehow—in fact, we must, for our horses will require rest as well as ourselves."

"And," said the officers, "although we may allow them to have something to eat and drink, it need not be much—only just sufficient to keep body and soul together, and nothing stronger than water for them to drink. They won't get their strength up very well in that case."

"That must be it," said the chief officer. "We will push on for awhile longer, and when we come to an inn we will stop and take some refreshment."

"But which will be the best way of transporting the prisoners?" asked one. "They have no horses. What are we to do with them?"

"It seems to me there is only one thing," returned the chief, "and that is, for your horses to take it in turns to ride double."

"As how?"

"I mean, for instance, when we are starting now, two of you must take Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes on your horses behind you. They must be well and carefully secured. Then, when we have gone a certain distance, we will make an exchange, and so not tire one horse more than another, and give each officer a share of removing the prisoners."

This proposition was unanimously consented to.

The officers immediately set about carrying their instructions into effect.

Having decided among themselves which should carry the prisoners first, they went up to both, and made some alterations in the bonds by which they were secured.

Mr. Noakes still continued in the same deathlike condition, and after a little deliberation, a small quantity of brandy, taken from a flask, was poured down his throat.

It revived him to a considerable extent.

In the first place, Jonathan Wild's hands were placed behind his back, and handcuffed there.

Then he was lifted by main force and put on a horse behind one of the police officers.

A long piece of strong rope was then produced, which was first of all secured to one ankle, then passed underneath the horse's belly, and then tied securely to the other.

This would prevent him from getting his legs at liberty.

The next thing was to secure him to the officer behind whom he rode, so that he could not possibly give him the slip.

In order to do this, a couple of belts the officers wore were produced, and by the buckles joined into one.

The double belt was then placed round Wild and the officer, and buckled tight.

Perhaps a more ingenious or more effectual mode of taking a prisoner from one place to another on horseback could scarcely be devised.

Jonathan knew it, and gnashed his teeth with rage.

It was no original idea of the police officers, but one which they had borrowed from him.

He was the first who had invented this neat little arrangement, in doing which he had all unconsciously prepared a rod for his own back.

CHAPTER DCLVIII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS COMMENCE THEIR JOURNEY TO LONDON WITH THEIR PRISONERS.

ALL his curses were, however, productive of not the slightest good to himself.

The officers heard him muttering in a low tone to himself, and managed to catch a few of the words.

All they did was to laugh at him for his impotent rage—for impotent it was, to all intents and purposes.

As if he had been a sack of grain, or any other object equally inanimate, Mr. Noakes allowed his foes to bind him just as they thought proper, and place him on a horse in the same manner as his companion, Jonathan Wild.

The two bundles of booty, which in their alarm they had dropped on the beach, were picked up by the police officers, and secured.

The production of these things would, at any rate, form one case against them—certainly enough to get them committed to prison.

The chief officer and his men were in the highest possible spirits at the success they had met with.

They were overjoyed to think that it had been reserved for them to achieve what all the others had failed to do.

And to them alone would belong the honour of having captured such a notorious and daring offender as Jonathan Wild.

It was, then, in the highest possible spirits that they mounted their horses, and rode along the lonely lane leading from the sea-shore into the interior of the country.

We feel that some explanation is due as to the presence of the officers upon this spot at that particular time.

Strange as it may seem, it was nevertheless the simplest thing in the world.

By dint of hard riding and many inquiries, the police officers Wild had so often baffled managed to trace him to the spot where he stole the boat.

They were not in time to prevent him from setting out to sea.

But they perceived the boat flying over the waves, and without delay got into another, and gave chase.

But, as Jonathan had fully expected, the police officers, perceiving the unfavourable nature of the weather, and knowing the great risk of their lives that they ran, had determined to put back to the shore, and await the issue of events.

All were much chagrined at this disappointment.

It was hard indeed to think that their prey should have slipped through their fingers in such an easy manner.

And at the very last moment a kind of consultation was held, and they endeavoured to come to some conclusion as to the course Jonathan Wild would be most likely to adopt.

"Rely upon it," said one, "as soon as he finds we have given up the pursuit—and he won't be long in making that discovery—he will turn the head of his vessel towards the sea-shore, and land again at some unexpected point—somewhere out of sight of people."

"Very likely," said the officer to whom these words were addressed; "but I don't see how that benefits us in the least. We have lost him, and we must resign ourselves to that loss."

"Well, perhaps so—perhaps not."

"I think it quite certain!" was the gruff reply.

"I don't. Let us keep a good look-out along the coast for as many miles as we possibly can; let us also communicate with the other police officers, so that they may be engaged in a similar manner. It's no good being selfish and allowing the rascals to escape just because we are unable to capture them ourselves."

This was a very reasonable and common-sense view of the question to take, and it was rather surprising that a police officer should speak in such a way.

For a wonder, this good advice was acted upon.

A message was conveyed to the police officers, informing them that Wild and Noakes had seized a boat and put out to sea with it, and that in all probability their intentions were to put back to the shore, and land at some unfrequented point.

This, then, was how it was that the police officers made their appearance so opportunely.

In pursuance of the orders they had received, they had started off from the coast, and were just about commencing to look around them, when, to their equal astonishment and delight, who should they behold but the very two persons of whom they were in search.

Mr. Noakes, secured upon the horse's back, and attached to the police officer before him by a belt, became fully conscious that it was quite in vain for him to indulge in any hope of making his escape.

His doom was sealed at last.

He had been captured and he could no longer avoid his fate.

All those gloomy anticipations in which from time to time he had indulged were now fully realised.

One object, and one object alone, was ever before his mental vision.

That was, the triple tree at Tyburn, where he had stood so often as a spectator of the execution of others.

Now his own turn had come.

He was also in a kind of delirium, produced not only by the want of food but by the little drop of brandy that the officers had forced between his lips.

Wearry and worn as he was, Jonathan Wild's energies were by no means so much impaired.

He was by no means inclined to resign himself to his fate—to believe that his course was run.

It was never too late to attempt to make an escape—that he knew full well.

Had he not always proved himself to be a cleverer man than any of his foes, and yet had not some prisoners contrived to avoid him?

Why, then, should not he escape, having only ordinary police officers to deal with?

It was but dimly and vaguely that these thoughts passed through his mind as the officers trotted along the road, very much to his discomfort.

But at last both they and their horses grew tired and hungry, and they began to look out for some place where they could halt for a time and partake of some refreshment.

In England one has not to go far without finding a convenient inn, where something like comfort can be obtained.

And it was soon after this that the officers pulled up in front of a low, straggling building, in the front of which a wooden sign was swinging.

Here they resolved to stop.

The greatest care was taken when dismounting to form a circle round their prisoners, and some doubt was expressed as to whether Jonathan Wild should be removed at all.

At last it was determined to manage matters in the following manner:

The belt was unbuckled, and the rope removed from his ankles; then, as before, they lifted him bodily from his horse.

Jonathan was as patient and resigned as a man could be.

This, however, only made his captors more suspicious, and caused them to redouble their precautions.

Jonathan had an object in view.

While in his present sinking, exhausted state, it was the height of folly for him to think of being able to escape.

No, he must first of all recover some portion of his lost strength, and the only means by which he could do that was to appear humble and cast down before the officers, in order to obtain as much food and drink as he possibly could.

As soon as his feet touched the ground he was seized by many hands, so that had he been in full possession of his strength he could not have broken loose from such a firm detaining hold.

Mr. Noakes was treated in a similar fashion.

And in this manner the triumphant police officers led their prisoners into the inn.

The landlord and all his family came forward, full of surprise at such an unusual spectacle.

Such a thing as a body of police officers halting with a couple of prisoners at their house had never been known before, and their curiosity was accordingly stimulated by it.

"We must have a room—a large room—all to ourselves," said the chief officer.

"Very good," replied the landlord. "I am happy to say that I can accommodate you."

"It is not accommodating me," was the police officer's rejoinder; "I demand this of you in the name of his most gracious Majesty the King!"

CHAPTER DCLIX.

THE POLICE OFFICERS FIND JONATHAN WILD A VERY TROUBLESOME CUSTOMER.

"I AM as well pleased to oblige his Majesty as to oblige yourself," returned the landlord, who thought it best to be civil to his unusual visitors.

The fact was, he was one of those men who always thought it best to curry favour with the authorities, and so far as he himself was concerned he was quite ready to allow the police officers to do just exactly as they liked.

With a profusion of bows, he led the way along the passage, and then flung open a door, saying:

"Walk in, gentlemen—pry walk in; and I hope you will find that room will answer your purpose."

The police officers stalked in.

It was their determination to keep their prisoners constantly before them—not to allow them to be out of their sight for a single moment.

While they adhered to this determination, one would think that there could not be any possible fears of an escape.

A substantial meal was called for.

"I am sorry to say I have nothing in the house ready for you, gentlemen," replied the landlord, "but I shall be happy to prepare a meal that will please you—I will promise not to be long about it!"

"Mind you are not!" said the chief officer.

The landlord withdrew, and, in order to pass away the time pleasantly, the officers took a little of something to create an appetite, and smoked the pipes of peace.

And all the time they had the inexpressible gratification of feasting their eyes with the sight of their prisoners.

Four men only had captured them, and therefore, when they had added up the amount of the joint reward, there was not much difficulty in separating the total into quarters.

Then each man found that he had something considerable for his share—something that would enable him to go on all right and comfortable for a twelvemonth at least.

It was quite a windfall for them, and one and all considered the reward was just as much theirs as though it had been in their pockets at that precise moment of time.

There were the two men, undoubtedly.

They were entirely secure.

A conviction would follow as a matter of course.

As for an escape, they trusted to their cleverness to prevent any misfortune of that kind.

Like some evil spirit, Jonathan Wild sat glowering at his foes.

Two large oaken chairs had been placed back to back in the centre of the room.

In these Noakes and Wild had been seated, and around them the officers were grouped, so that all could satisfy themselves by having a most excellent view.

At last a large joint of beef and plenty of vegetables, with a host of other things, were brought in and placed upon the table.

Jonathan looked at the viands with hungry, eager eyes.

The officers sat down to take their feed first, and the manner in which they despatched the provisions was something alarming to witness.

Most of all was it aggravating to the two famishing men, who felt almost as though they would risk their lives in order to obtain a morsel.

But when the officers were done, a small quantity was placed upon two plates, and these two plates given to Wild and Noakes.

In order that they might eat, the handcuffs were removed.

But they took care, before doing so, to bind their bodies securely to the heavy chairs in which they sat.

It was a tonishing to see how Wild devoured the miserable morsel of food that was put for him.

It vanished in a trice.

"More," he said—"more! My bitterest curses on you if you refuse!"

"Don't you wish you may get it, Jonny!" said the chief officer, who, having had a good dinner himself, felt in a particularly good humour. "Not if I know it, Jonny! You shall have just enough to keep body and soul together while you are under my charge, but not a tenth part of an ounce more! I don't mean to let you get your strength up, in order that you may try on some desperate manoeuvre!"

"Drink, then!" said Wild—"give me drink!"

"Oh, yes; I don't mind accommodating you with that! Give him some water—he can't have anything better; that is neither fattening nor strengthening!"

As meekly as a lamb, Jonathan took hold of the jug of cold water that was presented to him, and raised it tremblingly to his lips.

He drank deeply of the contents, and felt much refreshed after having done so.

In fact, he drained the vessel to the bottom.

Then, before anyone could prevent or guess what were his intentions, he flung it with full force at the head of the chief police officer.

He laughed exultingly.

"Take that," he said, "curse you! I wish I could dash your brains out!"

Luckily the police officer saw the missile coming, and, to avoid it, flung himself backwards in his chair with so much violence that he reached the floor with a crash.

The jug struck against the opposite wall, and was smashed into a thousand pieces.

Frantic with rage, the chief officer rose to his feet.

"You villain!" he cried, addressing Wild—"you villain! I will make it hot for you for this! You shall have it! I'll be revenged upon you, never fear!"

Wild was deeply disappointed at this failure, and relapsed into a gloomy silence.

He felt wonderfully better, although he had partaken of such a little food.

It was indeed, so far as the preservation of his life was concerned, quite fortunate that he was not allowed to eat his fill, as doubtless he would have done had he not been controlled.

He looked with wishful eyes towards the glasses of hot rum and water with which the police officers were regaling themselves, and wished—oh, so devoutly!—that he might have the opportunity of draining one of them to the dregs.

That, he felt, would infuse fresh strength into his wearied frame—would enable him to cope successfully with his enemies.

He perceived by their movements and conversation, that they were about to depart.

"I will make an effort!" he muttered. "I can but fail at the most, and if I can only drink a mouthful, my purpose will be gained!"

Jonathan Wild fixed his eyes upon one particular glass of rum and water.

It had just been brought in by the landlord, and was so hot and so strong that the man before whom it was placed could only just sip it with the spoon, waiting for the mixture to get a little cooler.

It was close to Wild—almost within arm's-length of him, and if his strength would only serve him sufficiently to enable him to spring up and drag the chair after him a few paces, he was sure that he could reach it.

At any rate, he felt it was worth making an effort.

Not by any expression of his countenance or any movement of his body did he show what thoughts were passing through his mind, or what were his intentions.

Suddenly, however, he gave utterance to a wild and fearful cry—a cry, coming unexpectedly upon the ears of anyone, sufficient to paralyze them for a moment, and make them wonder what was amiss.

That was the case with the police officers.

They were astounded at hearing such an unearthly sound.

Before they could recover from the temporary state of confusion into which this had thrown them, Jonathan Wild sprang up, dragged the chair after him, and seized the glass.

"Murder!" cried the officer. "Seize him—seize him—he's going to make his escape!"

But Jonathan placed the glass of nearly boiling liquid to his lips, and, tilting it up, allowed the whole to run down his throat in a second.

Before the officers could grasp him—before they could tear the glass from his lips, it was empty.

Then, uttering a cry of exultation, he poised the glass in his hand, and again took aim at the chief officer.

This time with better result, for the heavy goblet caught him on the side of the head, and smashed to pieces.

The police officer was stunned, and fell down in a heap on to the floor.

The greatest confusion then prevailed, and but for the fact that all his movements were hampered by the chains, it is very likely that Jonathan Wild would have succeeded in making his escape.

CHAPTER DCLX.

JONATHAN WILD INDULGES IN SOME HOPES OF MAKING HIS ESCAPE.

As it was, he made not the least effort.

He was contented with what he had already achieved.

He sank back in the chair, laughing loudly and hideously.

"Keep close watch over him," said one of the officers to his companions. "Shoot him if he attempts to escape; and I will attend to him."

He pointed to the chief officer as he spoke.

Blood was flowing from the side of his face, and he was to all appearances quite bereft of life.

A little cold water and some brandy afterwards, however, served to recover him.

He sat up in a chair, looking very faint and pale.

"You are not much hurt, sir," said the man attending upon him, in a soothing voice. "It is not half as bad as you might expect."

"And Jonathan Wild?"

"He is there safe enough. Don't be alarmed on that account."

The chief officer turned his eyes towards his prisoner, and saw that he was indeed seated in the chair, and that his men were standing around him with their pistols pointed.

"Shoot him if he moves!" he shrieked—"shoot him if he moves!"

"I don't intend to move," said Wild, defiantly; "but if you think you are going to take me up to London without having any trouble or bother, you are very much mistaken! This is only the commencement; you don't know what you will have to go through yet."

"Hark you, Jonathan Wild," said the chief officer. "I intend to stand no nonsense of this sort. If you attempt to escape, I will certainly have you pistolled on the spot. My orders are to capture you alive or dead!"

"I don't care a d—n for you or your orders either!" returned Wild, upon whom the hot rum and water produced a great effect.

"You are very foolish," said another officer. "You might be sure you are only making things worse for yourself—you can't make them any better."

"What do you know about it, stupid! Hold your row!"

Jonathan Wild meanwhile enjoyed the consternation he had produced amongst his enemies.

He resolved inwardly that he would embrace the very next opportunity that presented itself of increasing the effect.

The chief officer had his face bathed, and washed, and bound up with a handkerchief.

"I'd scorn to touch you now," he said, addressing Jonathan; "but I shall be quite satisfied when I see you tucked up at Tyburn. It will be revenge enough for me when I see you dangling at the end of the rope, as I shall do before long. You may depend upon it, when once you get to London, they will make short work of you!"

Jonathan turned a little pale at these words, in spite of himself.

To him, Tyburn Tree always possessed a thousand terrors, and never did it seem more dreadful than at that particular moment.

"Come on," said the chief officer, addressing his men. "Secure them tightly; we will renew our journey, and, depend upon it, we won't stop again until we are actually compelled to it. Never mind a little inconvenience at sticking in the saddle for several hours together—the sooner we get him off our hands the better!"

The whole of the police officers were entirely of this opinion, especially after what they had seen of Jonathan Wild's powers of mischief.

The horses were led round to the front of the inn, and the journey was resumed in just the same fashion as before, except that Wild and Noakes were placed on two different horses, and were secured behind two different police officers.

We have said but little about the latter, and it was because there was, in reality, nothing to say.

Like some one only half animate, he had sat all the time in the chair, neither attempting to move hand nor foot.

When the plate of food was placed before him, it is true, he hastily devoured every fragment.

But he surrendered the plate quietly, and then fell back into the same mood of listless apathy.

She sun was now declining in the sky.

Ere long he would set, and there were indications that the night would be a dark and blustering one.

It was in the darkness that Jonathan Wild hoped to do some good for himself.

His behaviour will show that he had by no means abandoned the hope of being able to make his escape.

On the contrary, now that he felt fresh life coursing through his veins, he dwelt upon it more and more, and the result was a confidence in his ability to succeed.

Gradually the daylight gave place to darkness.

Confusing shadows crept over the landscape, deepening and deepening every moment, until at last all became wrapt in obscurity.

The officers were obliged to keep close together in order not to lose sight of one another.

More than one of them thought that perhaps it would have been the wisest plan to have remained all night at the inn, instead of setting out upon their journey, for they were conscious that the darkness would afford their prisoners a better opportunity of getting away.

A complete change, however, had to all appearance come over Jonathan Wild.

He was perfectly still behind the officer, never attempting to move hand nor foot.

But all the while that his body was so passive his mind was very actively employed.

He was scheming and wondering by what possible means he could succeed in separating himself from the man to whom he was bound.

Surely no one, except a desperate man like Wild, who had made up his mind that he could only lose his life once, would have ever thought of attempting to escape under such circumstances.

Even if he performed the apparently impossible feat of slipping off the horse without the knowledge of the man to whom he was attached, what chance then would he have of getting clear away?

He was on foot, and weary, and tired.

There was a certain amount of strength in his body now, but it was of a transient nature, and the least active exertion would serve to deprive him of it.

On the other hand, the police officers were all mounted on good horses, which had just been baited, and were in capital condition for the road.

Moreover, it was not necessary for them that they should carry him to London alive.

Their instructions were to capture him at all hazards, living or dead.

Supposing, then, that he might run for a few paces, he would be fired at, and no one could believe that all the shots so fired would be ineffectual.

It must not be thought that Jonathan Wild did not weigh over all these disadvantages in his mind.

He was fully conscious of every one of them.

But his active brain was at work, and he was wondering how he could make things favourable.

It seemed an impossible task.

When he noticed, however, how much darker the night grew, his courage grew stronger and stronger.

At last he imagined the time had come for him to commence his operations.

The first thing he had to do was to free his wrists from the handcuffs by which they were bound.

Even to start with, this seemed a total impossibility.

Yet Jonathan Wild did not so consider it.

He tried first of all to clasp his hands together behind his back and force his wrists outwards in the hope that he might succeed in breaking the connecting link.

He soon found out, however, that the handcuffs were too strongly made for that to be possible.

But yet he by no means despaired of accomplishing his purpose.

Squeezing up his left hand, which he knew was smaller than his right, into the smallest possible compass, he gradually tugged away at the handcuff, and tried to draw the rim over the back of his hand.

He pulled and tugged with all his might, causing himself exquisite pain, and yet bearing it with the stoicism of a martyr.

And although he pulled and tugged so violently, yet it was done steadily, and the man behind whom he was riding never for a moment guessed what he was about.

Tighter and tighter became the rim of the handcuff across the back of his hand.

Deeper and deeper it seemed to sink into the flesh, and then when he pulled it again the skin moved with it.

The pain was excruciating, and Jonathan had to clench his teeth hard to prevent a cry of pain escaping from his lips.

CHAPTER DCLXI.

JONATHAN WILD SUCCEEDS IN GIVING THE OFFICERS A BITTER DISAPPOINTMENT.

But he did suppress it, and tugged away manfully again.

Harder and harder he pulled with a continuous strain, and all the time he was encouraged to continue his exertions, for the handcuff was slowly but surely being drawn over the back of his hand.

The knuckles had to be passed, and after that it would be easy enough to slip them off altogether.

Of course, at present it would be quite sufficient for him to have one hand at liberty.

He did not care about the manacle dangling from his wrist—that was an inconvenience he could get rid of at some future time.

Jonathan could almost have shrieked with exultation when he found that his hand was free.

At present, however, he made no demonstration of the power he had gained, but kept his hands in precisely the same position as they had before occupied, so that the officers never for one moment suspected that his hands were at liberty.

Then he began to wonder how he should overcome the other obstacles.

Having so far succeeded, it was a great encouragement to him to persevere.

He felt that the great difficulty was concerning the rope by which his ankles were tied together under the horse's belly.

He came to the conclusion that it would be quite out of his power for him to attempt to loosen the rope.

But an idea entered into his head by which the necessity for doing so might be avoided.

It was a thought that surely could have occurred only to a desperate man in a desperate situation, like he was.

It was risking his life to make the attempt.

But yet, if he succeeded, all would be well.

And this was the view Jonathan took of it.

If he was killed, why then he was no worse off, for if he allowed himself to remain passive in the hands of his captors he would, before many days were over, be swinging at Tyburn.

His idea was to suddenly unbuckle the belt by which he was secured to the police officer, and then to throw himself violently backwards.

He considered if he was speedy in his movements he should fall to the ground over the horse's hind quarters, the rope being slack enough to allow him to do so.

He would reach the ground with great force beyond doubt.

He might be trodden upon by the horse's heels, but he would be free.

And then all he would have to do would be to struggle to his feet and hasten off.

A most desperate feat to attempt to execute—one that, in truth, seemed little short of suicide.

After some more deliberation, Jonathan resolved to attempt to carry out his plan.

Looking around him, he fancied he recognised some of the scenery—in fact, he was sure he did.

And then he suddenly recollected that some short distance in advance there was a wide, swift-flowing river, which was spanned by a stone bridge.

Here he determined should be the spot fixed upon for his attempt.

As he drew nearer and nearer to it, he noticed that there was a thick, white mist, which probably ascended from the river.

This white mist or fog would be of immense benefit to him, since it would cover his escape.

A dozen steps would take him out of sight of his foes.

He looked keenly at each side of him in order to catch a sight of the stream.

As soon as he saw it he began to unbuckle the belt.

This he could do with perfect ease, for the buckle happened to be just behind his back.

Holding his hands in the same position as before, or apparently doing so, he quietly undid the buckle.

Then, according to his preconcerted arrangement, just as the officers were galloping over the bridge, he flung himself backwards, and in a second fell upon the roadway with terrific force—so much force indeed, as to deprive him of all the breath there was in his body.

"Murder—murder!" cried the officer, whose surprise at the sudden and mysterious disappearance of the prisoner may perhaps be imagined—"murder—murder!"

"What's the matter?"

"An escape—an escape!" he cried—"Jonathan Wild has escaped!"

The horses were going at a good speed, and a moment or so elapsed before they could bring the animals to a standstill.

They had then completely crossed the bridge.

"How has it happened?" cried the chief officer—"how has it happened? It must be impossible!"

"He is gone," was the response, "and must have the devil to aid him! He dropped from behind as suddenly as lightning!"

"Where were we then?"

"Just on the bridge."

"Forward, then!" said the officer. "Don't despair, my men—we shall have him yet. This mist is awkward; but, however, if you catch a glimpse of him, fire—bring him down! Surely we should not have so much trouble to carry his dead body!"

They hastened back to the bridge, and just as they reached it they heard a loud, heavy splash.

"That's him," cried the chief officer—"that's him! He has jumped into the river. Now, then, we have him as sure as fate!"

At a breakneck speed the officer and his followers hastened down to the bank of the river.

The surface of the water was completely shrouded in the mist that hovered over it.

They strained their eyes greatly, and endeavoured to pierce it, but no trace of Jonathan Wild could they see.

"There he is," cried a voice, suddenly—"there he is—I see him—look, that's his head!"

"Fire—fire!" yelled the chief officer—"down with him!"

There was a rattling volley, and then some dark object, looking very much like a man's head, that had been floating on the surface of the river sank down at once.

"Come on," said the chief officer—"come on—we must have him either alive or dead! Curse this mist, it gets thicker and thicker!"

And now, if Mr. Noakes had only one-tenth part of the courage and daring that Wild possessed, he would certainly have succeeded in making his escape, for he had been left upon the bridge, guarded only by the man to whom he was bound.

It is difficult almost to imagine what Jonathan Wild himself would have done had he found himself in such a situation.

But Mr. Noakes, entirely crushed and humbled, and buried in a state of sullen apathy, made not the least movement to free himself.

The officers, frantic with rage, and beginning to believe that Jonathan Wild had escaped after all, searched vigorously up and down both sides of the river, without being able to find anything of their prisoner.

"Curse him!" said the chief officer. "He must have escaped, and there's three-quarters of the reward gone at once! Don't despair, my men! We must not give up! At all hazards we will capture him!"

But, although they continued watching and searching during the remainder of the night, they could see nothing of Jonathan Wild.

He had vanished entirely and completely.

At last daylight came, and when the rising sun dispersed the mist, it showed the four remaining police officers with their one remaining prisoner, still standing by the river's bank.

But now that it was daylight their search met with no better reward than at first.

Not with all their cleverness and skill could they find a single trace of where Wild had gone.

An anxious deliberation was then held.

The chief officer was in such a state of frantic rage and excitement that he scarcely knew what he was saying.

So his men had it nearly all their own way.

After much discussion and dispute, it was eventually decided that it would be better to make sure of the one prisoner they had caught.

While hampered with him, they could not properly commence another fresh chase after Jonathan Wild, as they evidently would have to do in order to capture him.

It was resolved unanimously, therefore, that they should proceed to London with Mr. Noakes, taking care that he did not slip through their fingers, and then, so soon as they had securely lodged him in Newgate, to return to that particular spot, and renew their search until it was successful.

Perhaps, after all, this was the best determination they could come to, though it was terribly galling to them to know that they had actually had the great Jonathan Wild safe in their clutches, and that they had suffered him to escape.

They would be laughed at and mocked by the rest.

Yet they comforted themselves with thinking that, after all, things were not so very bad, and that, as soon as Mr. Noakes was safely inside Newgate, they would make up for the accident that had befallen them.

CHAPTER DCLXII.

RELATES WHAT HAPPENED TO JONATHAN WILD AFTER HIS FALL UPON THE BRIDGE.

In this place, we may as well give some solution to the mystery of Jonathan Wild's sudden and remarkable disappearance.

When he fell back in the road in the manner we have related, he remained insensible for the space of a few seconds, and then rolled over.

He struggled to his feet.

He found that he was bruised and badly hurt.

The back of his head had come with terrific violence upon the hard high-road.

Yet, beyond a racking pain, he felt very little the worse.

Convinced now that rapidity of movement combined with stratagem alone could save him, Jonathan darted suddenly to the side of the bridge.

By the time he had done this, the officers had pulled up their horses and were returning.

A dim idea of how he should next proceed had already formed itself in Jonathan's mind.

It was, therefore, with a feeling of inexpressible thankfulness that he noticed one of the large coping-stones on the bridge was loose.

It moved easily under his hand.

Summoning all his strength, he gave this stone a vigorous push.

It rolled over at once.

Then followed a tremendous splash—the splash that reached the ears of the officers so plainly, and which misled them just as Jonathan fully intended it should.

At that very instant when they rushed across the bridge, being fully impressed with the belief that he was struggling in the water, Jonathan Wild was concealed only by crouching down in the shadow that was cast by the parapet of the bridge.

Of course the mist of which we have spoken favoured his movements greatly.

Without it, in fact, it is questionable whether he would have succeeded in making his escape.

No sooner had the officers passed him than he hurried forward.

He knew that every second thus gained would be of incalculable importance.

"Escaped!" he said—"I have escaped! Glorious news! I am free and alone! I believe my race is nearly run, but yet before I die I will wreak so much misery and mischief that my name shall never be forgotten!"

He stooped down as he spoke, and, with a knife that he took from his pocket, cut the cords by which his ankles had been tied together.

He could now run with a certain amount of ease—not very rapidly, however, for, besides being in a dreadful state of weakness, he was cramped by having remained so long in one position upon the back of the horse.

One would have thought he would have retraced his steps towards the sea-shore, in the hope of getting away from his foes.

But, so far from doing this, he positively took his way towards London.

Not by the high-road, for he forced his way through a hedge, and, having gone for some distance, laid himself down beneath the shadow of it to rest, and prepare himself for fresh exertions.

"How easily they are deceived!" he said, chuckling to himself with satisfaction. "I could scarcely have hoped that they would have fallen into the snare so blindly! It seems to me as though they are going to watch for me all night, in the hope of finding me in the morning. I hope they will—I shall then have all the better chance of getting entirely free from them."

Jonathan Wild entirely disencumbered his ankles of the rope, and then resolved to push forward once more.

Wisely he started at a walking pace, and determined not to exceed it.

He was sure that eventually he would get over a much greater space of ground at this rate than he would if he started off at a run, which would only have the effect of completely exhausting him.

But before he had gone far he found how terribly worn out he was.

All his energies flagged, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he could drag one leg after the other.

But he still struggled on painfully and slowly.

He had to rest at frequent intervals.

But he kept on until within a short time before day-break.

He was then at a considerable distance from the bridge, where he had made such a frightfully perilous escape.

Before him were some outbuildings belonging to a farm, and towards these he crept wearily, thinking he should be able to conceal himself and obtain rest during the day.

He entered the first shed he came to, and found that it was nearly full of straw.

Not without a very great deal of trouble, and after failing once or twice, he succeeded in climbing up to the top of it.

Then, pushing the straw aside, he lowered himself into it, getting deeper and deeper down, so that, if anyone came suddenly into the place, they would be unable to see anything of him, or suspect that the shed was tenanted by anyone.

Panting and weary, here he remained, listening in terror to every slight sound, and fearing all the time that the officers would track his footsteps, find out his place of concealment, and drag him forth.

But time passed on without the occurrence of any such event.

All around him continued still and peaceful. The whole day rolled by, and during the whole of the time not a single person entered the shed.

By this time he knew the officers must have got a considerable distance on their road to London, for that they would linger all day about the spot, or retrace their steps, he scarcely thought possible.

In fact, he reasoned correctly enough like the officers themselves, that it would be much better policy to secure the one prisoner they had got and put him into safe keeping, than to incur the risk of losing him as well.

What should be his future plan of operations?

How he should act—in what manner he should gratify his revenge, Wild did not know.

He felt at first that he must get up his strength.

He had subdued his hunger partially during the day by chewing up the straw around him, in some of which, as the wheat had been insufficiently threshed, he found a few grains of corn.

But at nightfall he ventured to creep out.

He went to the door of the shed, and reconnoitred well before he attempted to emerge.

But all around him was solitude.

Not a single living thing could be seen.

He crept across the field in which the shed stood, until he came to another.

This one was cultivated, and though he had not passed much of his time in the country, yet he guessed what was growing there.

They were turnips, and he pulled one up and ate it voraciously.

Poor and unnutritious as the food was, yet it served to deaden the pangs of hunger.

Moreover, it was cold, and moist, and assuaged his thirst at the same time.

But he felt that he must have something more substantial than that.

In rather better spirits than before, he continued to creep across the fields towards the homestead, which was visible at no great distance.

It was his intention to ask for charity—for something to eat.

But suddenly he stopped.

All at once he recollected the manacle that was dangling from his wrist.

While that was there it was quite out of the question to think of making any such application.

It would not be entertained for a moment.

How, then, was he to rid himself of this disagreeable ornament?

He looked all around in search of some object that would answer his purpose.

But he saw nothing.

He was obliged at last to pause at a large block of stone that was lying in his path.

On this he laid his hand, and, with a smaller piece of stone, struck the iron band several heavy blows.

He bruised and hurt himself sadly; but, unmindful of trifling inconveniences, he persevered until at length the iron was broken and his hand free.

"There," he said, "now I am rid of it, and am most thankful."

As he spoke, he picked up the broken handcuff and threw it over the fields as far as ever he could.

Then once more he resumed his way towards the farmhouse.

Early as it was in the evening, its inhabitants seemed already preparing to go to rest.

But Jonathan knocked boldly at the front door.

"Charity—charity!" he exclaimed, in an indistinct and husky voice. "Have pity upon me—I am hungry—nearly starving! I have not tasted food for very many hours. In mercy find me a little—only a little, or I shall die at your threshold!"

CHAPTER DCLXIII.

RELATES HOW MR. NOAKES WAS BROUGHT TO LONDON AND PLACED UPON HIS TRIAL.

LET us take a glance at the proceedings of Mr. Noakes and those officers by whom he was held captive.

With regard to the journey to London, there is little to be said.

He continued helpless and dejected—almost motionless during the whole of the time.

So wretched and so woebegone was he—so entirely dispirited, that he won even the compassion of the police officers.

They were by no means so strict with him as they were at first, for they saw he had not the courage to make a single movement.

From time to time they looked out during their journey, hoping to see something of Jonathan Wild, yet not succeeding in so doing.

Whenever it was practicable, they also made inquiries concerning him.

They described his personal appearance with great accuracy.

But no one had seen any such person.

A caution, however, was left with all if such a man presented himself they were to use every means in their power to make him prisoner, telling them of the large reward they would obtain for such a service.

It was rather early in the morning when Mr. Noakes and his captors rode into London.

The poor wretch looked shiveringly all about him, and contrasted his present position with that which he had formerly occupied as Governor of Newgate.

It was all through Jonathan Wild.

It was upon the ex-thief-taker that he laid the whole of the blame.

But for him he might have remained in his original situation.

Now he was led through the streets a common, proscribed felon, and he knew there were charges enough hanging over him to secure his condemnation to death.

What vexed and galled him most, however, was the thought that, while he had been captured, Jonathan Wild should have made his escape.

Death, he felt, would have had one pang less had Jonathan Wild stood beside him on the scaffold to share it.

But that was not to be.

The police court was open by the time they reached Bow Street, so, without delay, Mr. Noakes was led before the magistrate in order to obtain his committal to Newgate.

It soon got noised abroad that the old Governor of Newgate, who had perpetrated, in conjunction with Jonathan Wild, so many atrocious crimes, was in custody, and the court-room was quickly choked to suffocation.

The object of the police officers was to bring something forward sufficient to warrant the magistrate in making out the committal.

The bundles of booty were accordingly produced.

"Your worship," said the chief officer, "when I captured him, he had one of these bundles with him, but in his alarm he dropped it on the ground. You will see now what it contains."

From out of the bundle was produced one after the other the various articles belonging to the communion service that had been stolen by Wild and Noakes.

Every heart was grieved to see such fair, and noble, and sacred ornaments battered and spoiled as they were.

Nothing could be done to them but put into the melting pot, and that was exactly what Wild had designed to be their fate.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the magistrate, "have you anything to say on your behalf?"

"Nothing—nothing," moaned Mr. Noakes. "I am a wretched, miserable man, and tired of life! I confess all—all—everything I confess, for I am guilty."

"That will do," said the magistrate. "Remove him."

Mr. Noakes accordingly was removed to Newgate.

Although it is not possible to feel any pity for such a man, yet it must not be forgotten that he was human and had feelings.

What a terrible lesson must it have been to him then when, after so long an absence, he at length found himself before the gloomy, frowning walls of the prison of which he had been so long the Governor.

Bitter, humiliating thoughts passed through his mind.

It is certain that at that moment he bitterly and deeply regretted all that he had done in the past; but his repentance, like repentance generally, came too late.

He cast one glance up at the black stone building—one glance, that seemed to take in every portion of it from the ground to the parapet, and then he fixed his eyes upon the ground, nor did he venture to raise them.

There was no need for him to look which way he was going.

Every inch of the ground upon which he was now treading was as familiar to him as ground can possibly be.

Then the police officers stopped, and although he did not look up, he knew that it was before that little door in Newgate through which prisoners are led.

Heavy blows were given upon the knocker.

The ponderous door rolled back upon its hinges.

He was hurried up the steps, and then he found himself standing in the vestibule.

How well he recollected the last time when he had stood there.

It was on the occasion of Jonathan Wild being brought a prisoner to Newgate.

Now he was there a prisoner himself.

Looking around him, he saw many old faces among the turnkeys and other officials of the prison.

But not one bent upon him a sympathising glance.

He remembered then, with some regret, that he had taken no pains whatever to make a friend of one of them.

He had treated all uniformly with cruelty and indifference.

Now the time had come for them to show the hatred that they bore him.

The new Governor of the prison was summoned, and he stared coolly at his predecessor.

"All right!" he said. "Number thirty-four is vacant, is it not?"

"It is, sir," said one of the turnkeys.

"Very good. Let him be placed there, and keep double watch at the door of his cell. We must mind that he does not make his escape."

There was little fear of that, however.

The miserable object was resigned to his fate.

Surely the time was now past for him to make any manifestation.

"Had we not better put a little jewellery upon him, sir?" asked one of the turnkeys.

He spoke maliciously.

He recollected, and so did Mr. Noakes, an occasion when he had been brutally kicked by the Governor of the prison.

"No—no!" said the new Governor. "No fetters have been ordered, so I shall not presume to put any on; but keep watch over his cell—keep watch over him."

"Will you allow me to undertake that duty, sir?" said the turnkey who had before spoken.

"Yes, if you wish it."

The man's eyes gleamed with satisfaction, and certainly while he was outside the prison door Mr. Noakes would have no chance of obtaining his liberty.

Through the well-remembered and familiar passages Mr. Noakes was led.

He knew as well as any of them which was number thirty-four.

He could have found his way there blindfold.

At length they paused.

The door was unlocked and unbarred, and he was thrust rudely in.

But no indignities seemed to have the least effect upon him.

So great had his apathy become, that it appeared nothing in this world could ever rouse him from it.

And so several days passed away, Mr. Noakes gradually becoming better, for the peace and quietude of his cell had a favourable effect upon him.

Yet he was a miserable, careworn wretch, and when, at length, on the day of his trial, he was placed in the dock, all who saw him mentally remarked:

"What a miserable object he seems! Surely it would be a mercy and a charity to hang him."

During his imprisonment, the officers of police had not been idle.

They had carefully collected a lot of details concerning the murder of the old miser in the rail, and it was upon this charge that they first of all determined to try Mr. Noakes.

A long account of the murder, and the manner in which it was discovered, was read over from the indictment by the Clerk of the Arraignment.

Mr. Noakes only partially comprehended its purport, yet he knew it was something in connection with the murder at the mill.

He remembered that awful scene in the dark, underground passage, when he had rushed forward upon the defenceless old man and stabbed him until he died.

He shuddered perceptibly as the recollection crossed him.

Then, in his usual monotonous, unemotional voice, the Clerk of the Arraignment said:

"Prisoner at the bar, do you plead guilty or not guilty to the charge now brought against you?"

There was on the instant a deep and impressive silence. The fall of a pin might have been heard in that crowded court.

Mr. Noakes made several attempts to speak, and then at last he managed to gasp out, half articulately:

"Guilty, my lord—guilty!"

[MR. NOAKES AWAITING THE ORDER FOR HIS EXECUTION.]

CHAPTER DCLXIV.

SENTENCE OF DEATH IS PASSED UPON MR. NOAKES.

OF course this admission of guilt on the part of the prisoner at the bar at once put an end to the case.

The matter was taken entirely out of the hands of both jurymen and counsel, and it rested only with the judge to pronounce sentence.

Those police officers who had made themselves so particularly active in raking together all the facts they possibly could connected with the prisoner looked woefully disappointed.

They would have been much better pleased if they had had the opportunity of standing up in the witness-box and giving an account of the whole of their proceedings, that they might show how very energetic they were.

But Noakes deprived them of the opportunity, and they hated him bitterly in consequence.

No. 142.—BLUESKIN.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the clerk of the arraigns, "you have pleaded guilty to an indictment charging you with wilful murder; what have you to say why the court should not proceed to pass judgment upon you?"

Mr. Noakes made no reply, and, with scarcely a perceptible pause, the judge said:

"By your own confession you stand convicted of the crime of murder. I am glad to see that there are some signs of contrition visible in you. By adopting this course you have saved much valuable time and trouble, and all that remains for me to do is to pass sentence of death upon you in the usual form. Before doing so, however, I cannot help expressing my surprise and regret that a man occupying the position you have should be standing there on such a charge. The greatest trust was placed in you, and you have wantonly abused it. The mere catalogue of the crimes you have committed would make anyone shudder, but you can receive no greater penalty than death for all that you have done; therefore, the sentence of the court upon you is, that you be taken from hence to the prison from which you came, and from there to the place of common execution, and that you be there hanged by the neck until you are dead."

The judge ceased, and Mr. Noakes, looking whiter than ever, stood clutching the front of the dock in order to prevent himself from falling to the ground.

There was no sympathy whatever, either in the tones of the judge's voice or in the hearts of any of the people who on that morning crowded the court.

They all felt that the prisoner most righteously deserved the doom which had been pronounced upon him.

Mr. Noakes's lips were observed to be moving slightly, but no one could tell what he said.

One of the turnkeys touched him on the shoulder and motioned him away.

The miserable wretch gave one glance all around him, and then descended the flight of winding steps that led from the floor of the dock to the cells beneath.

He was then taken to one of the condemned cells and locked in.

At the door was the man who had shown himself so anxious to undertake the duty of keeping guard.

He scarcely left his post from the time of Mr. Noakes's first appearance in the prison, and there was little likelihood that he would do so until the hour for his execution arrived.

Mr. Noakes shuddered when he saw this man's eyes bent upon him with so ferocious an expression.

When at last seated in his cell, a sensation of great relief came over him.

Dreadful as was the prospect he had in view, yet he was now certain that he knew the worst.

Fate could do no more, and he had only to resign himself.

At the first this appeared easy and simple enough.

The remainder of the day wore away and night came.

It was during the darkness that a change began to take place in Mr. Noakes's feelings.

Every time that he heard the clock at St. Paul's peal forth the hour, it suggested to him the thought that he was so much nearer death, and when he once began to think of it in this light, the striking of the clock seemed to be almost incessant.

Morning came and found him haggard and miserable.

The man on guard looked into the cell as soon as ever it was daylight, and gave a grin of exultation when he saw that the prisoner was all safe.

He was well pleased also to observe the look of utter wretchedness and misery on his features.

"You don't seem at all comfortable, Mr. Noakes," he said—"not half so comfortable as you ought to be. All your little worldly affairs are now settled; what need have you to work yourself up into such a nervous condition?"

Mr. Noakes averted his head and made no reply.

That day was Saturday.

On the Monday morning following it had been arranged that his execution should take place.

How that day passed he scarcely knew.

He was in a state of the most dreadful terror that can possibly be conceived, and the nearer that death approached him, the more alarmed and terrified did he become.

Yet he made no attempt at escape.

Perhaps he knew that any effort would be futile.

No one understood better than himself the power of hate, and the man who was on guard at the door of his cell would take—he felt convinced—every precaution to prevent him from getting away.

In reality, however, he had neither the courage nor the strength of mind to make the least attempt towards his liberation.

But he sat there restlessly rocking himself backwards and forwards on his stone seat, wishing his miserable life was at an end, and at the same time, by a strange contradiction, lamenting the rapid flight of every hour.

On Sunday morning he was led into the chapel.

The other prisoners were there—others who, like himself, were condemned to be executed on the following morning.

It was the duty of the Ordinary on these occasions to preach a funeral sermon.

A hideous mockery it seemed to all of them.

The news of Mr. Noakes's capture quickly spread itself all over London, and the interest that was felt in his fate was second only to that which would have been taken in that of Jonathan Wild.

His capture they hoped and trusted would follow next.

In the meantime they were all anxious to obtain a sight of the ex-Governor of Newgate, and those authorities who had power to issue orders of admission to the chapel on Sunday morning were literally besieged by importunate applicants.

But the accommodation for spectators was very limited.

There was only one small gallery in which they could sit.

Long before the hour for the commencement of the service they had taken their seats in this gallery, so closely packed together that they could scarcely move or breathe.

Mr. Noakes only looked up once at the crowd of eager faces.

He knew there would be no one there who would bend a pitying glance upon him.

Moreover, the appearance of the multitude reminded him of a sight which he had often seen, and which he was destined to see once more in his life.

This was the mass of upturned faces standing around Tyburn Tree.

How glad he was when the service was concluded, and he was led back to his cell!

But his state of agitation continued to increase every moment.

The death which, when contemplated from a distance, seemed such a happy release and termination to all his troubles, now presented itself in the most hideous colours to his imagination.

It possessed a thousand terrors, and the longer he contemplated and the closer he drew to it, the more numerous did those terrors become.

He felt, indeed, that he should never live to stand beneath the gallows and have the rope placed round his neck—fright would kill him before then.

Could it have been known how much he suffered before the time of his execution, people would have said that it was no inadequate punishment for all that he had done.

Hour after hour was struck by the church clock—closer and closer came the fatal Monday morning.

The daylight gradually waned away and faded out of his cell.

As he watched the darkness gradually deepening, he remembered, with a shudder of the utmost dread, that never again in life would he be able to observe it.

He would see the morning break—he would see the sun rise, but never see it set again.

CHAPTER DCLXV.

MR. NOAKES BELIEVES THAT HE SHALL BE ABLE TO EFFECT HIS ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.

At last, Mr. Noakes's feelings became worked up to such a pitch that he felt he could no longer sit still and stare death calmly in the face as he had done.

Courage was rising in his breast to attempt to make some effort to release himself.

Not that he could indulge in any sanguine hopes of achieving his purpose.

Yet there was a chance that he might succeed.

Others had broken out of prison before, and why should not he?

Hope began to rise up in his breast.

Perhaps, after all, his span of life was not so short as he had imagined it.

At any rate, he resolved to try to make it longer.

He looked back with a sigh to those times when upon highway and byway he ran so much risk and danger in company with Jonathan Wild.

How gladly would he have exchanged his present position for that which had formerly been his, and with which he was so discontented!

He groaned, and reproached himself over and over again for the dissatisfaction that he had shown, and wished that he had left matters more to Jonathan Wild's direction than he had done.

Then he began to wonder what had become of his companion.

To him his escape seemed nothing short of miraculous.

"Surely," he murmured to himself, "if Jonathan could make his escape under such circumstances as those, why should not I from this place? In comparison, mine seems an easy task to his."

He rose to his feet and looked carefully all around the cell, debating within himself as to which point he should commence his operations at.

No portion of the cell was unfamiliar to him; he knew just where the window looked, and was well acquainted with the strength of the iron bars with which it was protected.

For some moments he stood looking up at this small aperture, and then he shook his head and turned away.

He had come to the conclusion that it would not be possible for him to escape in that direction.

Some other means must be tried.

Naturally his attention was directed to the door.

But this seemed strong, firm, and massive, and as though it would resist all the efforts he might make to burst it open.

Besides, not only was it well and carefully secured by bolts, and bars, and locks, but on the other side a man was sitting—a man who had the most implacable hatred against him, and who would watch with the vigilance of a beast of prey to prevent him making his escape.

As these considerations forced themselves upon his notice, Mr. Noakes was almost ready to sink down again in despair.

But after gazing for awhile upon the door, something in its appearance seemed to strike him as unusual.

His heart beat so fast as to threaten to suffocate him, as he found, upon a more continued observation, that his fancy had not misled him.

Yet he could scarcely credit the evidence of his senses.

He took a few steps forward, then paused and listened.

Again he advanced, and this time he touched the door.

He seized hold of it with both hands, and pulled it towards him.

To his astonishment, it yielded.

How or why this could be he was at a loss to imagine.

Clearly his hated foe had remained there so long without sleep that he had lost the proper use of his faculties, and had forgotten to fasten the door after closing it for the last time.

Where was he now?

Mr. Noakes pulled the door a little further open and peeped out into the corridor.

All was in intense darkness.

There was not even a distant oil-lamp glimmering and making the darkness visible.

He could hear nothing—see nothing.

Trembling between hope and fear, scarcely daring to believe that what he beheld was true, fancying that he must be a victim to some vision, Mr. Noakes stepped out into the corridor.

He drew a long breath and extended his arms.

Already, as it seemed to him, he was free—that is to say, in comparison to what he had been.

And now it must be borne in mind that, being in such a position as this, Mr. Noakes had a much better chance of making his escape than perhaps any other person possibly could.

He had been connected with the prison of Newgate for very many years, and in the mere exercise of his duty had become thoroughly familiar with every part of it.

He knew precisely where this passage led—he knew precisely which was the nearest way to the street, and not only that—he could tell which one would offer the fewest obstructions to his progress.

After awhile he calmed himself, and as the conviction gradually settled in his mind that there was no mistake about the matter—that by some extraordinary negligence his gaoler had omitted to secure the door—Mr. Noakes grew calmer and calmer, and recovered much of his self-possession.

"I will make one desperate effort for freedom!" he said, in a faint whisper. "If I fail, the worst consequences that can meet me is death, and that will be my fate if I remain sitting quietly in my dungeon until to-morrow morning."

It will be seen that Mr. Noakes had everything to hope and nothing to lose by this attempt.

Having made up his mind in which direction he should go, he crept as silently as a shadow along the corridor.

Before going far, he paused before a door.

He knew that it was there, and he wondered whether it would be secured in such a way that he could not force it open.

He was half afraid to make the trial, but he was agreeably surprised to discover that it was only secured by means of an iron bar and a couple of bolts shot into their sockets.

These fastenings he quickly undid, and again he glided through the portal.

As a matter of course, the more success he met with the greater did his elation become.

His step lost much of its shrinking timidity.

He strode through the passages swiftly and boldly.

All the doors he came to he was able to open with little trouble.

"Things were different," he thought, "when I was governor here. Then it would not have been possible for a prisoner to have taken the route that I have taken to-night. But they have made fresh regulations, and they turn out to be most advantageous to myself."

This time Mr. Noakes really and truly indulged in the belief that he should be able to emerge into the street unobserved, and certainly the success that he had already met with was sufficient to induce some such belief in his mind.

Presently he paused before a door that he knew communicated with the lobby or vestibule of Newgate.

This door had a grating in it near its upper portion, and Mr. Noakes peeped through the iron bars to reconnoitre before he attempted to undo any fastenings.

Profound darkness was beyond.

He strained his eyes in a vain endeavour to pierce the obscurity.

He listened with an intentness that cannot be conceived, but he failed to hear even the slightest sound.

Not even a deep or long-drawn breath reached him.

"This is most singular and unusual," he thought. "Fortune is indeed in my favour! Surely upon no other night than this could such a condition of things as this have existed."

It was clear the men were not doing their duty.

By right they should have been seated in that very lobby which he saw to be vacant, or, at any rate, in the keeper's room adjoining it.

This keeper's room, however, was, like the vestibule, plunged in perfect darkness.

At the outer door, too, which was just opposite to him, the man on the lock ought to have been stationed.

But Mr. Noakes did not believe he was there.

While he stood gazing through the grating, the cool night air made its way from the street, and blew upon his face.

The coolness was refreshing and grateful to him.

It revived his courage and his spirits wonderfully.

One bold effort only had to be made.

A trifle he would have considered it when he first sat in his cell thinking of making an escape.

He had but to unfasten the door, cross the lobby, open the outer door, and rush down the steps into the street.

With trembling, nervous fingers, he set about his task.

One by one the bolts were withdrawn, the chains released, the bars put down.

He was careful not to make a sound in all this, for he could not tell whether any unusual noise might not attract attention.

At length the door was open.

He passed through, and found himself standing in the lobby.

He shivered.

A strange, shuddering sensation came over him—a sensation that he had never before experienced, but one that seemed to tell him plainly enough that he was not alone.

It was not likely, however, that he would hold back for such a fancy as this.

One door, and one door only, intervened between himself and freedom.

That door he knew full well was fastened on the inner side, and he did not doubt that with very little trouble he should be enabled to remove them one by one, as he had all the others.

He hurried forward, and shivered again, for the conviction once more crossed him that some one else was near.

He tried to think the notion was absurd, and certainly the feeling vanished from his mind when he placed his hand upon one of the bolts of the outer door.

Nervously and timidly he drew it back.

Then the other followed.

There was an iron bar, and that, too, he lifted down with ease and silence, for he was well acquainted with the manner in which it was lodged in the two staples at each side of the door-post.

Only the lock remained.

He passed his hand over it, and this time his heart sank, for he fancied—nay, felt quite sure—that this lock would be a most serious obstacle.

It was strong and well made—how could he hope to force back the bolt?

But a shriek of pleasure almost escaped his lips—he could scarcely avoid giving vent to his exultation, for, wonderful and extraordinary fact, the key was sticking in the lock!

He seized it, grasped it tightly, and the revulsion of feeling that this sudden discovery caused made him unable for a few seconds to exert his strength sufficiently to turn it round.

At last the key began to move.

Another second, and the door would be open, and he should be in the street.

But just then a low and triumphant laugh reached his ears.

At the same instant he felt himself seized by some one, and a voice that he knew too well said:

"Aha, Mr. Noakes! Did you really think that we should let you go? I have had some rare sport with you! How do you find yourself now?"

CHAPTER DCLXVI.

MR. NOAKES COMMENCES HIS JOURNEY TO TYBURN.

SUDDENLY the dark vestibule was illuminated.

Where the light came from Mr. Noakes could hardly tell, his intellects were in so confused a condition.

Certain it is, however, that many lights were there, and all the turnkeys and warders of the prison clustered round him.

The man who had spoken was the one who had solicited the duty of keeping watch at the door of his cell.

All were standing laughing and enjoying to the utmost the consternation and despair that were visible upon the prisoner's countenance.

The whole thing had been planned by the men as being a means by which they could revenge themselves upon their former master.

Of course any act of open violence would have brought with it a severe punishment; but in this case nothing could be said, for all that they had done was their duty—they had intercepted the prisoner in his efforts to escape.

According to a plan which these very men had devised, the door of the cell was left unfastened.

They guessed which would be the route the Governor would take, and were careful that all the doors should be left so that he could open them without much trouble.

They waited for him in darkness in the little room adjoining the vestibule—that is to say, all but the man who owed Noakes such a grudge, and he was standing in the corridor at the time when the prisoner first emerged from the cell.

He was careful not to make any movement to disclose himself, and followed noiselessly in Noakes's steps.

His heart thrilled with joy and exultation when he thought what must be the feelings of his foe.

Hope was continually rising in his mind, and when, at the last moment, he believed his escape was accomplished, the disappointment he would experience upon being recaptured was almost enough to satisfy this man's craving for revenge.

"No, Mr. Noakes," he said, "we don't let you go quite so easy! I ask you again, how do you feel now? Not very comfortable, I should think—not half so comfortable as you were a few minutes ago! What a fool you must have been to have allowed yourself to be taken in in such a manner—you might have known that there was some trick in it!"

But Mr. Noakes was too crushed and too humbled to make any reply.

The full apprehension of all that had been done burst upon him at once.

The shock was terrible.

He groaned aloud in the bitterness of his anguish, and looked beseechingly and imploringly into the countenances of the turnkeys.

"Let me go," he said—"oh, pray let me go! You see what a poor miserable wretch I am, and yet I wish to live! My death can do none of you any good! Let me go—let me escape!"

"Don't you wish you may get it?" said the man who held him firm in his clutch. "You don't leave this place until to-morrow morning, and then we are all so very considerate that it has been arranged you shall ride in a handsome vehicle instead of being troubled to walk. There, now, what do you think of that?"

The man's manner, more than the words he uttered, angered Mr. Noakes, and with a sudden yell of fury, he shook off the feeling of despondency that weighed him down—he became, in fact, more like a maniac that ought else, and struggled furiously to get free.

But he might as well have tried to make a breach through the walls of Newgate by dashing his body against them.

The man's grasp could not be shaken off.

"Come on," he said—"none of your nonsense! Back to the cell you go, and there stop until the morning; then you shall take your departure for good!"

In spite of the frantic resistance that he made, Mr. Noakes was dragged along the corridors of the prison by the turnkeys—along those corridors that he a short time back had traversed so anxiously, and with the belief strong in his mind that he was making his escape.

With extreme violence he was flung into his cell and the door closed.

He was then beside himself with rage and disappointment.

He gnashed his teeth, and tore his hair, and struck his head furiously against the stone walls in the bitterness of his mortification.

And so, in the most miserable manner that could possibly be conceived, the whole of that night passed away, and morning came.

Breakfast was brought in by one of the turnkeys.

What a mockery it seemed to offer him food at such a time as that!

The prisoner turned aside in unutterable loathing.

He could not eat—he could not do anything but bewail and bemoan his lamentable fate.

All that violence of manner that had characterised him during part of the preceding night entirely vanished, and left behind a dull, apathetic condition.

He seemed only to be half conscious of what was taking place around him.

When the sheriffs paid their customary visit to the cell, he stared at them as though he did not understand the meaning of the ceremony.

But he was observed to shudder from head to foot, and this was because he had caught sight of the hangman.

That dread functionary had accompanied the sheriffs to the cell, and stood with them outside the door.

In his hand he carried a quantity of rope.

After the first shudder, Mr. Noakes kept his eyes constantly riveted upon him.

It was as though there was a kind of fascination in his every movement.

All the formalities that had to be gone through were disagreeably familiar to the condemned man.

The prisoner was handed over to the sheriffs by the Governor of the prison, and then the whole party were conducted to the yard, where the ceremony of binding the prisoner was gone through.

His arms were here securely pinioned behind his back.

Resistance now was out of the question.

But Mr. Noakes had not the heart to attempt to make it.

The cart was waiting in the court-yard, with the coffin lying in it into which his body would be put when it had hung the appointed time from the gallows.

The sight of this object tried Mr. Noakes's nerves perhaps more than anything else.

He could not bear to look upon the dull, black, rudely-made coffin, with its white, ghastly-looking nails.

He was assisted into the cart, and as there was no other seat, he was compelled to sit down upon the coffin.

The Ordinary, with an open prayer-book in his hand, placed himself by his side.

The hangman mounted to the front of the cart, and took hold of the reins.

All was ready for the start.

The large folding doors were flung open, and then a terrific roaring sound made Mr. Noakes glance hurriedly in the direction from which it came.

He was able to see out into the Old Bailey, and as far as ever his eye could reach nothing but human faces met his view.

They were roaring and shouting simply because they knew the much-hated prisoner was about to be brought forth.

A close guard was kept round the vehicle, for such was the state of the public mind that the authorities fancied that they would be inclined to take the law into their own hands and inflict summary justice upon the prisoner.

Slowly the procession moved forward.

They passed through the gates, and the officers who rode in front were compelled to force a way through the crowd with their cutlasses.

And every step of the way the street was thronged with spectators, who, as soon as they caught sight of the prisoner, set up loud yells of derision.

But by this time Mr. Noakes was completely overcome.

In a dull, stupefied, abject manner he sat upon the coffin, taking no notice of the shoutings of the crowd, and paying no attention to the droning, humming noise that was produced by the Ordinary reading the service for the burial of the dead.

CHAPTER DCLXVII.

M^R. NOAKES SUFFERS THE EXTREME PENALTY OF THE LAW AT TYBURN.

As the procession moved slowly on its way, its progress became more and more difficult.

The nearer they got to Tyburn, the closer they found the people packed together, so that it was almost an impossibility for them to force a passage at all.

Every now and then a complete stoppage would take place.

At these times the groans and yells of the populace would be something dreadful to listen to.

Nor did they confine themselves to vocal manifestations of their abhorrence.

Various missiles were thrown from all parts of the throng, and some of them were exceedingly dangerous, so that not only Mr. Noakes, but the Ordinary and the hangman had some very narrow escapes of their lives.

A large piece of brick came down with great force upon the Ordinary's prayer-book, and knocked it from his hands.

He stooped, as Noakes thought, to pick it up again.

But instead of doing so he crouched down in the cart as low as he could get, so as to be out of the reach of any other missile.

Mr. Noakes's apathy increased.

When the various fragments of all kinds of material were being hurled about him he did not flinch in the least.

Although the distance could not have exceeded three miles at the most, yet it positively took the cart three hours to perform the journey.

By the time they arrived in sight of the triple tree the hour of noon was almost at hand.

Noakes knew that the gallows was visible, not because he raised his head and saw it himself, but because of the shouts and yells of the crowd.

It was a glorious day.

The sun was within a short distance of the meridian, and pouring down his rays with full force and power.

In the sky there was not a single cloud.

To look upwards or anywhere above the mass of seething people round the cart, all was beautiful and summer-like.

At last the cart stopped.

The shadow of the old timbers fell upon Mr. Noakes, and he knew at once where he was.

The police, with their drawn cutlasses, formed a firm barrier all around, and managed to keep off the people tolerably well.

No more stones were thrown now.

There was scarcely any shouting.

But all were pressing forward to one point, all being anxious to obtain to best view that they possibly could.

They looked with straining eyes upon the figures in the cart.

They would have considered themselves cheated had they failed to notice one single movement that was made.

Finding the storm of missiles was over, the Ordinary ventured to rise up from his undignified position.

But he had by no means recovered his agitation.

He picked up the prayer-book, and, all unconscious that he was holding it upside-down, commenced to mumble the prayers that by continual reading he had got off by rote.

Then the sheriffs gave the body of the prisoner into the charge of the hangman.

He stood up in the cart, with a piece of rope in his hand, and with some degree of skill threw it over one of the cross-beams above.

Then, drawing down the end, he tied a running knot, and finally drew the rope tight.

He tested its strength by hanging upon it with both hands for several moments, and while he did this, another terrific yell burst from the crowd.

It subsided, however, as soon as they saw the hangman and the Ordinary lead the wretched-looking culprit beneath the beam.

The white cap was next drawn down so as to cover his features.

The rope was tied in a noose round his neck, and then the preparations were complete.

A deep, hushed silence now fell upon the whole multitude.

Had they been suddenly transformed into stone they could not have been more silent or more immovable.

It was strange to see so many thousand eyes all directed to one point, and one alone, bending upon it a fixed, unwinking gaze.

Clumsily and heavily the hangman descended from the cart.

The Ordinary got down too.

Flourishing his whip, the hangman walked up to the horse's head, and took hold of the bridle.

He gave him several sharp cuts that caused the animal to move forward rapidly.

Mr. Noakes could feel the bottom of the cart slipping from beneath his feet—the only thing that intervened between himself and death.

At that last awful moment, the desire to prolong his life came over him more strongly and more forcibly than it had ever done before.

But he was perfectly helpless.

The rope was round his neck.

His arms were so tightly pinioned with cord that the pain was almost unendurable.

He struggled frantically, and made many vain and desperate attempts to seize hold of the bottom of the cart with his feet, and prevent the rough planking from being drawn underneath him.

But all in vain.

The people observed his struggles.

They knew what he was trying to do, and they cheered.

Mr. Noakes, although so near to death, heard that cheer, and wondered what it meant.

The wild hope darted into his mind that it must be the token of a reprieve having arrived, and therefore his struggles to maintain his footing became a thousand times more violent than before.

Then suddenly his feet encountered vacancy.

He dropped down.

He stopped with a sudden jerk, and that jerk was echoed by a strange sound from the mob—a sound produced by some thousands of breaths being drawn in at the same instant.

That was the end—all was over.

For several minutes longer did the wretched prisoner's useless struggles continue.

The mode of execution was very different then to what it is at the present time.

Mr. Noakes had to die by the slow process of strangulation.

Intently the crowd watched him.

But by degrees his convulsive movements subsided.

He would be calm for a second, then there would be the spasmodic movement of a limb, until finally all was still.

The body hung there, suspended by the rope, an inert mass, and possessing no movement except a slight rotatory one that was probably communicated to it by the wind.

To and fro it swung, like accursed fruit on a hideous tree.

Long did the people continue to gaze upon all that there was left of Mr. Noakes.

Some after a time moved away and turned their steps homeward.

But the majority waited to see the body cut down.

This ceremony did not take place for an hour, and during that hour the scene that took place round the gallows baffles all description.

Punctually to the moment the hangman again appeared upon the cart.

He was now inclined to take matters perfectly easy.

He had a short pipe in his mouth that he was smoking energetically.

He backed his horse so that the cart was once more under the body.

He climbed up with an open knife in his hand, and by several strokes cut through the rope.

He was quite inclined to save himself all the trouble he could, was that hangman, and so he had taken the precaution to place the coffin in the cart in such a position that as soon as the rope was severed the dead body would fall into it.

It did so, and although it did not fall quite into its proper position, that was after all, to his thinking, quite an indifferent matter.

It was not likely that they could expect him to be very particular with such a dead body, so he stuffed in the limbs as well as he could, placed the lid upon the top, and drove leisurely back to London with his hideous load.

And so that was the end of Mr. Noakes.

He was buried—not in the prison, as malefactors usually are at the present day, but cast into a roughly-dug hole in one of the London churchyards.

CHAPTER DCLXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD BELIEVES THAT HE SEES AN APPARITION. WE return now to Jonathan Wild, whose position was scarcely less critical and miserable than that of his companion, Mr. Noakes.

The man who came to the door of the farm-house in answer to his appeals for food looked at the applicant with a distrustful eye.

There was everything in his appearance that was repulsive, and he made up his mind that no such man should stand beneath his roof.

But he could relieve his present necessities.

He did not wish any man, no matter how bad, to die upon his threshold, so some food and drink were placed before Jonathan.

He ate ravenously, and when he had concluded his meal he rose up with the intention of continuing his journey.

But so far from feeling thankful to the people at the farm-house for what they had given him, he only shook his fist in impotent rage, and breathed out horrible curses upon them for not having treated him in a better manner.

"I should like to slay them all!" he growled between his teeth. "If I could see them weltering in their blood I should be more content!"

He walked hastily over the dark fields; he knew that it would be unwise for him to remain long in one place, for he doubted not that the police would make close search after him.

He felt wonderfully refreshed and strengthened by the meal he had partaken of, and determined if possible to push on with all speed during the night, and then secrete himself while daylight lasted.

Why it was he could not tell, but certain it is some inward impulse urged him to turn his face in the direction of London.

Accordingly he did so, though at the rate he was travelling it would take him a long time to reach the metropolis.

Whether he had any deeply-laid scheme in his mind we shall shortly see.

It is more than probable, however, that he had some object in view, and that he did not take this course without some good reason.

The clouds that had covered the sky gradually rolled away, and the moon shone down with great brightness and power—too much brightness to please Wild.

He wished to have the deepest darkness as his companion.

In order to guard against being seen, he took care to keep himself concealed behind the shadow of the hedge-rows.

And in this manner he proceeded for a long time, for the most part skirting the highway as he went.

All around him was very still and very silent.

He was in a lonely part of the country.

There were few travellers to be seen, even in the day-time, and very rarely one at night, so Jonathan need not have been so much alarmed as he was about being seen—though it is scarcely possible for anyone in his position to be too careful and cautious in his movements.

He walked on until his strength would carry him no further without a rest, and so he flung himself down at full length upon the grass.

There he lay meditating for a long time, turning over in his mind all manner of schemes.

"I will live!" he muttered, at last—"I will live with one object and one object only—and that object shall be revenge! After I have glutted that, I care not what becomes of me! Revenge I must and will have; and until I have fully satisfied this passion I cannot, must not die! But when all is done, if they seize me in the very hour of triumph, I shall not care! Yes—I will live for revenge only!"

The mere thought that he might be able to wreak some personal injury upon those he looked upon as his enemies had a wonderful effect upon Jonathan's bodily powers.

He rose up to his feet, and stood as though undecided as to the direction in which he should turn his steps.

"I must not forget," he said, "money will be requisite to me. I must have money to carry out my plan. When I have got that, I shall be able to overcome many difficulties that would be insuperable without it—besides, at the present moment I have not a fraction, and I must not expect to live upon charity."

He paused again, and then he spoke with resolution.

"I will make my way direct to the spot where the miser's gold was buried. I will unearth as much of it as I think my wants will require. Yes, that will be the easiest, the quickest, the best, and the safest plan for obtaining what I need. Now that my mind is made up, all will be easy enough."

It required some amount of skill to be able to decide which way to go in order to reach the spot where the gold had been buried.

After a time, however, Jonathan felt confident that he knew his way, and struck boldly across the fields in a north-westerly direction.

He did not pause again until he reached a very high and thickly-planted hedge.

To have surmounted it would have been totally impossible, and before taking any further proceedings, he climbed up the bank on which it was planted, and endeavoured to ascertain what was beyond.

To his surprise he found it to be a broad high-road, and this discovery set him thinking.

He was at a loss to know what road it could possibly be.

While meditating upon this point, he suddenly heard the sound of a horse's feet in the distance.

"Some one approaches," he said—"I will wait till they go by. Whoever it is, it matters not to me in the least—not in the least!"

Jonathan was much exhausted, and so, instead of waiting at the hedge to watch for the approaching travellers, he once more flung himself down on the grass to rest.

So great was his weariness that he must have fallen off into a kind of slumber, for he no longer heard the sound of the horses' feet, and he forgot all about the travellers that he heard coming.

Suddenly, however, he started up.

He listened, and he fancied he could detect a murmuring of voices.

The sound appeared to grow louder and louder—not that it did so in reality, but the effect was produced by Jonathan Wild recovering better possession of his senses.

The voices came from the road, and so, stealthily as a snake, he climbed up the bank again, and peeped between the stems of the hedgerow.

The high-road before him was plainly visible.

The moon shone so brightly that it rivalled the daylight.

Jonathan's face assumed a strange, hideous, convulsed appearance.

His eyes almost started from their sockets—so astonished was he at what he beheld that he could not move hand or foot.

Seated on the back of a magnificent horse, and at no great distance from him, was a face and form he knew full well.

He could not doubt it—it was impossible to be mistaken.

It was one of his foes—a foe that he fully and entirely believed had been long ago disposed of—a foe whose remains had almost resolved themselves into the elements of which they had been composed.

The person he saw sitting on the back of the horse, and revealed by the light of the moon shining with full force upon him, was no other than Jack Sheppard.

It was impossible to mistake the peculiar features—Jonathan knew him too well.

In that silvery light Jack had a strange, ghastly-looking aspect.

To Jonathan Wild the impression was firm in his mind that what he beheld was nothing more than a spectre.

What could Jack Sheppard's presence mean?

More and more did he strain his eyes, being impelled to do so by a horrible fascination.

And then he felt quite sure that he could see round the spectre's neck a dark-blue, livid mark, such as would be left by the pressure of the hangman's rope.

The spectre, too, was evidently gazing full upon the spot where Jonathan Wild was concealed.

How gladly would he have fled from that spot there and then!

But the power of motion was denied to him.

Then he saw the figure slowly raise its arm and point at the hedge.

More he did not see, for at that moment his senses forsook him utterly.

The grasp which he had taken of the long tufts of grass at the top of the embankment relaxed, and he slipped gently down into the field, where he lay as immovable as though dead.

CHAPTER DCLXIX.

JONATHAN WILD RECOVERS FROM HIS SWOON, AND RESOLVES TO TAKE POSSESSION OF A HORSE.

How long Jonathan remained lying there upon the grass he had no idea.

It was only by very slow degrees that he recovered his consciousness, and when at length he was sensible enough to sit upright and look about him, he saw that the moon, which when he saw it last was high in the heavens, was now almost on the point of setting behind a distant hill.

His insensibility must, then, have endured for a considerable period.

As recollection slowly came back to him, Jonathan shuddered and trembled from head to foot.

Cold drops of perspiration, wrung from him by intense fear, started out upon his forehead.

He moved his lips uneasily, and tried to gain his feet.

"It was a spectre!" he said—"yes, surely a spectre—a visitant from another world! And yet, how like—how like! I could have sworn Jack Sheppard, alive and in the flesh, stood before me; but it cannot be—it is impossible—he is dead! Did I not see him myself suspended from Tyburn Tree? Did he not hang the allotted time? and was he not then cut down? Yes, yes—I know all about that—he is dead!"

More alarmed than ever, Jonathan continued his efforts to assume a standing posture.

At length he succeeded.

"What can it mean?" he said. "Why am I troubled with this express visitation from the grave? What can the spirit of Jack Sheppard portend to me? No good, surely, for in life he was ever my bane and my curse!"

Just then the impulse irresistibly came over him to climb up the little embankment once more, and again take a peep through the hedge.

He did so, although his trembling limbs almost failed him.

He peered into the roadway.

No longer was it brilliantly illuminated, as it had been on the previous occasion.

Yet, although dim and obscure, he could see about him tolerably well.

Of the spectre—for such he considered it—not a trace was to be seen.

It had vanished wholly—entirely vanished—vanished as completely as though it had never been there.

Then Jonathan began to ask himself whether he had not allowed his fancy to mislead him—whether he had not been deluded by a freak of the imagination.

But he could not take upon himself to say that this was actually the case.

He was tormented by horrible doubts and fears.

"Does it show that my end is near?" he exclaimed—"is it some foretoken of my fate—some warning to show me that ere long I shall share his fate? I cannot think that—I will not think that! I will go on as before—bravely and defiantly!"

These words will show that there was still left in the breast of Jonathan Wild some portion of his former fears and turbulent spirit.

But in spite of his bravado, and the manner in which he attempted to carry off this affair, it nevertheless gave him a severe shock, and it was long before he could recover from the effects of it.

But, as the reader knows full well, he was terrifying himself quite unnecessarily.

It was no spectre that he had seen, although his own guilty fears made him imagine that it was.

It was Jack Sheppard himself that he had seen—Jack Sheppard in company with Blueskin, who, happening to be some little distance in the rear, was not perceived.

In the prosecution of their enterprise against their joint enemy, they had managed to reach so far.

Little by little—step by step—they had followed him up, becoming acquainted one after the other with all the deeds of crime and violence which marked almost every step of his career.

Of the capture of Wild and Noakes by the police officers they knew nothing.

The last information they received was that the two villains were proceeding in the direction of the sea-coast.

And this was the destination Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had in view.

The pausing of Jack at that identical spot was purely a matter of accident.

His horse was much fleetier than that bestrode by Blueskin, and he had pulled up in order to wait for his friend to place himself by his side.

Could but some invisible being have whispered in his ear the astounding intelligence that his arch enemy was within a few feet of him at that very moment—that, in fact, he was lying helpless and insensible upon the grass on the other side of the hedge—how welcome that intelligence would have been received!

But it was not to be.

There was no invisible power to furnish this information, and by his own faculties there was no possibility of Jack Sheppard discovering it.

Accordingly, when his companion placed himself by his side, they resumed their journey at a steady pace, leaving the object of their pursuit behind them.

And there, as we have seen, Jonathan Wild remained until of his own self he recovered his senses.

All around continued as profoundly silent as before, and therefore he summoned up his courage to quit his hiding-place and emerge into the high-road.

His resolution remained unchanged, and, having satisfied himself as to his position, he continued his course in the direction that he believed would bring him to the spot where the miser's money had been concealed.

With this amount of wealth in his possession, he would no doubt be able to accomplish much.

Whether he would succeed in obtaining it or not remains to be seen.

But before he could cross the high-road another sound broke upon his ears—a sound similar to that which he had heard some time before.

A traveller was approaching along the high-road, and approaching at a rapid rate.

With an effort, Wild shook off all his superstitious fears. He was excessively tired and weary.

The distance he had to go was great, and he immediately bethought himself of what a difference it would make to him in every respect if he could but obtain possession of a horse.

The man who was coming, whoever he might be, certainly possessed one, and Jonathan Wild was not the man to make any scruple about possessing himself of it.

Unfortunately he possessed no weapon.

The police officers had been careful to deprive him of both arms and ammunition.

But in a matter of this kind Jonathan Wild was not likely to remain long at fault.

Close to his feet was a large round stone.

He seized it with a cry of delight, for he believed that he should be able to throw it with sufficient accuracy of aim to disable the traveller, and compel him to come to a standstill.

Concealed in the shadow of the hedge, he stood quite still awaiting him.

The stone was poised in his hand ready to be thrown at a moment's notice.

Unsuspectingly the traveller came on.

His horse was going at an easy pace, and this fact made it all the more probable that Jonathan Wild would succeed in his intention.

Another moment and the dark figure of a man seated upon a steed came in sight.

Jonathan was ready.

With a howl that was enough to terrify anyone, no matter how stout their nerves might be, he flung the stone with the full force of his arm.

There was a dull thud, followed by a loud cry of pain.

The stone had done its work successfully.

The traveller fell sideways off his horse on to the high-road.

No sooner had he cast the stone than, anticipating that the aim would be successful, he darted forward with great suddenness, in order to prevent the horse from galloping away.

He was successful, for he seized him by the bridle and hung on tightly.

The terrified steed plunged and kicked in a furious manner, but all to no purpose.

Jonathan had him secure.

The traveller groaned faintly.

One foot was entangled in the stirrup, so that had the horse galloped away, his fate would have been a fearful one.

Having succeeded to some extent in quieting the horse, Jonathan slipped the rein over his arm, and then removed the traveller's foot from the stirrup.

Such a favourable opportunity of possessing himself of a little booty, perhaps, in the shape of fire-arms and ammunition, could not be resisted.

So, in spite of the feeble opposition made by the traveller, Jonathan quickly rifled his pockets.

By the time he had succeeded in this operation, the traveller swooned.

The stone had struck him upon the head, and it was something to be wondered at that immediate death was not produced.

"I had better dispose of him," Wild muttered; "it's no good leaving him here on the highway to be discovered by the next traveller; I'll put him out of sight."

About doing this there was no great difficulty.

There was one plan that Jonathan had adopted more than once, and he always found it answered his purpose most admirably.

This was to roll the body over into one of the ditches by the roadside, and there allow it to remain.

Generally these ditches were overgrown with long, rank grass, so that it was impossible to see whether they contained water or not.

In such a place as this a body might remain for a great length of time undiscovered.

In a brutal and ferocious manner he kicked and rolled the traveller over the road, until finally, with a loud splash, he fell into the water.

"Lie there and rot!" said Wild—"lie there and rot!"

By this adventure Jonathan had gained not only a steed of average quality, but also a couple of pistols and a small supply of ammunition.

The next thing he did was to mount the horse; and as he seated himself in the saddle, Jonathan felt such an amount of triumph and exultation, that he could scarcely resist breathing aloud a defiance to his foes, although there were none of them near to hear him.

But his thoughts suddenly took a fresh turn, for, to his surprise, he heard the sound of another traveller approaching.

He listened for a moment or so in indecision.

The success he had hitherto met with made him bold.

As he had succeeded with this first traveller, why not lay wait for the second, and treat him in a similar fashion.

Circumstances might arise to make it difficult or impossible to reach the spot where the gold was buried, and there was just the chance as well that the secret hoard had been discovered, or that Mr. Noakes had confessed it to some of his foes.

Surely it would be better to make sure of money now, and as he made this reflection Jonathan backed his horse into the shadow of the hedge, and resolved to wait for the traveller to make his appearance.

On he came at a rather rapid rate.

Just when he was about a couple of hundred yards from where Jonathan was in ambush, this traveller touched the horse with the spurs, and increased the rate considerably.

He shot past Jonathan Wild almost before he was aware of it, and certainly before he could carry out his intention of stopping him.

Something else astonished Jonathan too, and this was the transient glimpse he caught of the traveller's countenance.

He uttered a loud cry—an angry shout.

CHAPTER DCLXX.

JONATHAN WILD MEETS UNEXPECTEDLY WITH AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

JONATHAN WILD had fully prepared himself for all he had to do.

[JONATHAN WILD IN PURSUIT OF HIS SON GEORGE.]

It echoed far and wide over the silent fields, and caused the horseman to look back in great surprise.

The horse on which he was riding, terrified by the sound, broke into a mad gallop.

"By all that's damnable," Jonathan cried, "that's George! How fortunate! I will have the villain's life! But how comes it that he is here? I should have thought that he would not have ventured back to England with his money!"

He struck his horse violently in the flanks with his heels while he spoke, and immediately set off in pursuit of the horseman who had passed by.

It was indeed no other than his son George.

The meaning of his presence there was simple enough. In carrying out his plans, Steggs had laid information against Wild junior for the share he had in persecuting Edgworth Bess, and every effort was made to capture him.

No. 143.—BLUESKIN.

George was not long in discovering that the police officers were at his back.

For what precise purpose he could not tell; it was sufficient for him to know that they were endeavouring to capture him.

He deemed it expedient to leave London without delay; and so, mounting his horse and separating himself from Nicholson, who would be of no further service to him, he made his way into the heart of the country.

There was in his mind a dim kind of idea of doing some terrible and startling deed, and then gaining some quiet seaport and taking leave of England.

Upon thus unexpectedly catching sight of the being who had caused him so much loss and inconvenience during the whole course of his life, well might Jonathan Wild become suddenly a prey to all those violent and angry passions that were so easily roused up in his breast.

Entirely carried away by these feelings, he urged his horse forward at the very top of its speed.

But it was long indeed before he was successful in gaining in the least upon the object of his pursuit.

George Wild had heard the shout, and naturally guessed that it came from the throat of some police officer who had recognised him.

Therefore, when his horse broke out into that furious gallop he made no effort to restrain him, but, on the contrary, touched him occasionally with the spurs, lest he should flag.

It was likely to be a long race, for George had got a good start.

But Jonathan's whole mind was bent upon overtaking his ungrateful son.

Was it not most important that he should do so? Would there not be an opportunity of recovering at least some portion of the large fortune he had accumulated by many years of successful villany, and which had been wrested from him at the last moment?

In fact, it was not so much his son George that Jonathan saw before him as it was the glorious sum of twenty-five thousand pounds.

In his present mood he felt that he would gladly expend every fraction of that large sum if by doing so he could purchase the revenge he so longed for.

The most awful curses came from his lips when he found himself unable to make such rapid progress as he would have wished.

The manner in which he treated his willing steed was barbarous to a degree.

Away—away they went, keeping all the time in the high-road, and going away from London instead of towards it as Jonathan had a little while before proposed.

Soon, however, he was encouraged to redouble his exertions, for he found that slowly and surely he was gaining upon the fugitive.

George Wild observed this too, and at the same time made the discovery that he was pursued by one man only.

"May I be d—d," was his inward thought, "if I gallop away any longer from a single man! If I don't give him his reward, d—n me!"

George uttered these words half aloud and half to himself.

But they were spoken in a tone of great resolution, and no sooner had he come to this conclusion than he checked his horse abruptly, and wheeled round so as to face his foe.

On came Jonathan like a whirlwind.

He was not surprised that George should adopt this course; he wondered why he had not paused earlier.

CHAPTER DCLXXX.

WILD JUNIOR ASTONISHES THE GUV'NOR BY HIS COOLNESS.

VERY calmly and quietly did Wild junior wait for his father to approach, though it must be stated that at that time he had not the least notion that he was pursued by anyone else save a police officer.

He held his hand as it seemed in a negligent manner by his side.

But it was a treacherous act.

In that hand he grasped a pistol on which he knew he could rely.

He waited until his foe should come near enough.

And now it happened that what little light still came from the moon fell upon George's countenance, and consequently upon Jonathan's back.

His features were, therefore, by no means plainly distinguished, and he had altered so greatly in consequence of the rough life he had led for so long, that it would be difficult indeed to recognise him at a first glance.

Suddenly George Wild raised his arm and fired.

There was a loud report, and Jonathan's hat flew off his head, and was carried over the hedgerow into a meadow.

Undeterred by this reception, he galloped on, nor did he pause until he was side by side with his son.

Then leaning forward in the saddle, he seized him tightly by the throat and shook him backwards and forwards.

So tightly did he press his fingers upon his son's wind-pipe that it deprived him not only of speech but of motion.

"Villain! wretch!" shrieked Wild, mad with fury. "I have caught you at last! Now there shall be a reckoning and a settlement in full between us! Curse you, I have half a mind to strangle you now, and would do so only I require some information from you! Promise to give it, or this moment shall be your last!"

George Wild could not speak, but he nodded his head violently to imply his consent.

Jonathan relaxed his hold, but took the precaution to seize the reins of his son's horse.

George Wild gasped fearfully for breath, and tried in vain to speak.

Several moments elapsed before an articulate sound came from his lips.

The first words that he ejaculated were:

"Well, I'll be d—d!"

That was all he said, and having so spoken, he sat upon the back of his horse looking at Jonathan with a comical expression of surprise.

"I wish you had been d—d a thousand times before I had seen you!" roared Wild. "But I have you now, and you shall not escape!"

"I don't mean now, guv'nor. I'm glad I've found you, for I intend to stick to you like a blessed brick!"

The impudence of this assertion, given under such circumstances, was so great that Jonathan Wild was for a moment struck dumb with astonishment.

"No, guv'nor," continued Wild junior—"I'm glad we've met; it will be a good thing for you and a good thing for me, for we've always managed to work well together yet."

"Yes, curse you! You come to me at the time of my success, and having learned where my wealth was, had secretly obtained it, and then departed until all was spent."

"That's about it, guv'nor. We're the right sort to be partners, and no mistake—you get the money, and I spend it. That brings things to a level."

"I will not listen to your foolery now," said Jonathan, wrothly. "We have met, and I will take care that you don't again quit my side—"

"Glad to hear it, guv'nor, because that shows that in this matter we are both of one mind!"

"I say," screamed Wild, at the top of his voice, "that you shall not leave me until you have told me what you have done with the twenty-five thousand pounds that you drew out of the bank!"

"Oh, d—n it!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, I made a fool of myself."

"How?" said Wild. "Explain yourself. It is necessary now that I should have the use of that money."

"Is it, though?" said George, with perfect calmness. "Then I tell you what it is, guv'nor, you won't get the use of any of it—not so much as a d—d sixpence!"

"You—you don't mean to say," gasped Wild, "that you have spent it all?"

"Oh, no—I only wish I had!"

Jonathan breathed again.

"You have not spent it, you say?"

"No, I have not."

"Can you tell me where it is?"

"I can."

"Then—then you have been alarming me without a cause!" said Jonathan, anxiously, for he knew how much depended upon obtaining this amount of money.

"Well, you do seem to be rather excited, guv'nor; but I can't think what it's all about. Surely a matter of twenty-five thousand pounds is but a trifle to you!"

"A trifle?" screamed Wild, his voice rendered almost inarticulate with passion. "It's life—it is all the world—it is everything to me! George—George, tell me where that money is, or a considerable portion of it, and I will overlook the past—we will be friends from henceforth!"

"How affecting!" said George. "Upon my word, guv'nor, you're quite pathetic; I should not have thought you could have done it so well!"

"But you will tell me where the money is, George?"

"Oh yes—I will—I will—I have said so!"

"Then where is it?"

"Why, in a d—d lubberly steward's pocket, who found out I'd got the money with me, and quietly put me overboard one night as I was making my escape to the continent."

"What—what?" yelled Wild, for he could not believe that he had heard aright.

"Why, the short and the long of it is, guv'nor, I meant being very comfortable with that twenty-five thousand pounds, but the steward of the ship found out I'd got it, so he drugged my drink one night, took possession of my money, and then threw me overboard."

"Villain—monster—wretch—it's a lie! I'm sure it's a lie! I will not believe it! Tell me the truth at once, or you die upon the spot!"

"Just as you like, guv'nor, but I have told you the truth this time, and that's a fact. I wish it was false. If I had spent the money, I should not have cared a rap; but to be plundered of it all in a lump—Well, well—I won't say what it is, guv'nor!"

"I can't believe it," said Wild—"I can't believe it. It is some invention of yours to enable you to retain possession of my wealth."

"Oh, well!—have it your own way, guv'nor, if you like; but I can only say that's the fact, and if you will listen to me for five minutes, I will tell you all about it, and then perhaps you can judge better."

Jonathan made no reply, and so Wild junior gave a very clear and circumstantial account of how he obtained the money and how he lost it again.

There is no necessity to repeat his narrative, for all the circumstances must be fresh in the recollection of the reader.

Jonathan bent his head.

It was no longer possible to doubt.

He knew his son well, and felt confident that he was speaking the truth.

But the disappointment that the loss of this money caused him was almost more than he could bear.

"George," he said, "but for your ingratitude and villainy, I should now be able to achieve a perfect triumph over my enemies. As it is, through you I am left entirely defenceless and unprotected."

"Well, it cannot be helped, guv'nor—I am very sorry."

"Sorry? You have been the curse of my entire life! If I could have read the future, I would have put an end to your existence long ago. What could be more base and villainous than your conduct with respect to that money? If you had not lost it in the manner you have described, you would have gone abroad and spent it in reckless, riotous dissipation, never giving one thought to me."

"Now, now, guv'nor, don't pitch it quite so strong! You hurt my feelings—upon my word you do! Just look at the circumstances, and tell me whether you thought I could act any differently."

"Act any differently?" said Jonathan, stupefied with amazement.

"Yes; I am sure it was doing you a kindness—a great kindness. I thought so all the time."

"This is monstrous!"

"No. But it got wind somehow that the money was yours, and I heard of it, so I thought to myself, 'I will be beforehand with the rest—I will go and draw it out and be off,' so I did it."

"And what of me?" said Wild—"did you give one thought to me?"

"Well, the fact is, guv'nor, I hardly thought you worth one! You see, you were safe in Newgate. You had been tried and found guilty—the day of your execution was fixed. I could see no probability of your escaping your doom, so I judged it best to consult my own safety by beating a retreat while I was able to do so."

CHAPTER DCLXXII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON BEGIN TO COME TO AN UNDERSTANDING.

JONATHAN WILD was absolutely staggered by his son's audacity.

And well he might be, for surely it had never had a parallel.

But a feeling of the greatest despondency and grief had come over him.

He sat on his steed, gazing abstractedly upon his horse's mane without venturing to say another word.

"Now you have heard the full particulars," continued George. "I have made a clean breast of it, so what do you say to going into partnership once more?"

"Peace! Let us have no more of this folly!" answered Jonathan. "I am now in a position of the utmost danger, but wealth would have lifted me out of it. But something stays my hand, or else why do I not raise my pistol and put an end to your existence? for you have been nothing else but a curse to me all your life!"

"Now, don't be harsh, guv'nor! Think how I have fallen in with all your plans, and how I have assisted you! It's not my fault that they have failed."

"But I say it is."

"Then you are unreasonable. I can assure you I was quite rejoiced when I heard that you had cheated the hangman. It was a narrow squeak though, guv'nor, wasn't it?"

Jonathan shuddered.

He could not treat the subject as his son did.

"However, I thought we should meet sooner or later, and instead of wasting my time by galloping after you, what do you think I did?"

"I don't know."

"Can you guess?"

"No."

"Keep your courage up, guv'nor—you're not dead yet! Why, I did my best to serve you, although, perhaps, you won't believe it."

"I doubt it."

"Well, then, I tried hard to capture Edgworth Bess. I knew that it was not too late to carry out that clever scheme of yours. But, curses on her, she slipped through my fingers, nor could I again obtain possession of her!"

"And where is she now?" asked Jonathan, eagerly, for this golden dream in which he had indulged so long suddenly presented itself before him.

"Her claims have been admitted and recognised," was the reply. "She has now assumed her title, and is in full and uncontrolled possession of her estates and wealth."

"Is it so?"

"It is indeed; and what think you? That villain Steggs—you remember him?—he has brought all this about, and he made London too hot to hold me. That's how I came to be here. But I shall meet him yet, and then—"

George Wild did not finish his sentence, but the ferocious manner in which he spoke, and the abrupt manner in which he paused and clutched the butt-end of a pistol convulsively, declared his intention more plainly than any open threat could have done.

"And she has recovered possession of all, then?" murmured Wild.

"Yes; as I told you, she is now mistress of all."

Jonathan was silent.

But though his tongue was still his thoughts were busy.

He was turning the matter over in his mind, and wondering whether he could not obtain, after all, some considerable advantage.

"I know what you are thinking of, guv'nor," said Wild junior, interrupting his meditations. "Now, take my word for it, the best thing we can do is to form an alliance with each other. We shall then both be working to one end to our mutual benefit; otherwise, we shall only be acting in antagonism to each other, and then you can guess the result."

"What do you mean, George?"

"Oh, you know what I mean plain enough! We have failed so far, but that's no reason why the scheme should be given up just yet."

Wild started, for these were his own thoughts.

He had come to the selfsame conclusion.

"I have trusted you too much already," was the reply. "Henceforth we must be strangers to each other."

"No, no—guv'nor! I'll be d—d if I won't! Recollect there are two words to that bargain. I tell you, for the future I mean to stick on to you like a leech. So don't try to shake me off, for you will not succeed."

"But I cannot trust you. I will not have you with me—at the last moment, I feel sure you will betray me."

"No, no, guv'nor—nothing of the sort—nothing of the sort, I can assure you!"

"But I say it is so."

"Well, have your own way, then. You were always an obstinate old fool, and I see you have not altered in that respect."

Jonathan ground his teeth, but said nothing.

"Then you are determined that we shall be foes?" said George, at length.

"I am."

"Then I am not. I see that you have not sufficiently considered the matter. You must turn it over in your mind again. I cannot take that for a reply."

"But you must—you shall take it."

"Now, look here, guv'nor. I'll tell you what I intend to do, and if you like to aid me in it, why, so much the better for both of us. In the first place, I would have you consider what objects we have each severally in view."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. Give me a little attention, and you will find that I shall speak rationally enough. I have two objects to live for, and so have you. Those two objects are the same. You long for money and revenge, and so do I; and if you will join with me, guv'nor, why, d—n me, we shall have them yet!"

"Yes, yes—revenge!" said Wild, fiercely. "I will have revenge—a full, deep, bitter, and lasting revenge! Then, when I have had it, I shall not care in the least. I shall be content to die by any death, but I can't quit existence until I have had a full and deadly vengeance!"

"Now, guv'nor, look here!—if you go on in that extraordinary style we shall part at once—I can't do with it anyhow. That's just how it is that you have failed hitherto instead of being successful. Of course I can make allowances for you—you are getting old, guv'nor—you are getting old!"

"Peace, fool!"

George shrugged his shoulders.

"It seems to me we differ as to what a fool is. I consider myself to be particularly sensible; but don't interrupt—let me go back to the original question."

Wild was silent.

"If you will only listen, I will tell you how we can get both the things we want. First we will have money, and then revenge; or, if you like it better, both shall come together."

"What's your plan?"

"Simply this: we will wait a little while until this excitement about us calms down, and then, when the objects of our hate are completely lulled into a sense of false security, I will tell you what we will do."

"Well—well?"

"We will go to the place where Edgworth Bess may be—we shall easily be able to find that out—and, having done so, we will seize her, carry her off, and keep her securely confined until she consents to our terms."

"And what will they be?"

"There is plenty of time to consider them yet, guv'nor. But she will have almost an unlimited command of money, so we shall be able to demand our own price for the ransom."

"I see—I see!" said Wild. "It's a good thought, George—a very good thought! We will make her freedom dependent upon the ransom, and then when we have got it, George—"

"You mean the ransom?"

"Yes—when we have got it we will keep it, and we will keep her too. We will be revenged!"

"Exactly, guv'nor; but we will leave the details for a future discussion—that's my plan. I have told it to you. Have you got a better to propose?"

"I have not."

"Then what do you say to my original proposition? Shall we be partners or not?"

For several minutes Wild hesitated.

But after weighing all present and future circumstances over in his mind, he came to the conclusion that it would be better to remain in peace with his son than at war.

CHAPTER DCLXXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON ENTER INTO AN ALLIANCE WITH EACH OTHER.

"Now, guv'nor," said Wild junior, after a pause, "is it to be a bargain—yes or no?"

"Yes, if you will swear solemnly to act fairly and justly by me."

"All right, guv'nor. I'll swear that or anything else you like. It's agreed, then, is it?"

"Yes."

"And now from henceforth we are to be partners, both working together?"

"I suppose so."

"Then hand over some clink, old man, for mine's all gone."

"If you want money you must obtain it," said Jonathan. "I have none."

"I don't believe that, guv'nor. However, I suppose it won't matter if there is a little difference of opinion between us. I feel sure you've got money somewhere. If I hadn't, do you think I should have been such a fool as to put you up to that nice little plan of mine? Why, you would never have thought of such a thing yourself. You think yourself clever, guv'nor, but you are not, and you know it."

"I can tell you this, once and for all," replied Jonathan—"I have no money, and if I had I should not give it to you—you have plundered me enough."

"Don't use hard words, guv'nor; you hurt my feelings—you do indeed; but bear this in mind—I can't carry on without money."

"Then get some."

"What's the good? You know, guv'nor, that I'm no hand at getting money, but I'm never at a loss to know what to do with it."

"That is nothing to do with me. In a little while I will aid you in this plan you have proposed, and what we can obtain by it we will share together."

"Now, guv'nor, don't be unreasonable. Do you mean to tell me that you have been knocking about the country all this while without laying hold of a trifle?"

"I have been unfortunate, George—most unfortunate. I had money, but lost it."

"More fool you, then! How much better it would have been if I had been with you,—then it would have been spent, and that would have been a great consolation to both of us."

"What are you going to do?" said Jonathan, abruptly. "It's growing towards morning, and I know hot search is being made after us by the police, and during daylight we must remain concealed somewhere."

"I suppose we must, but I was so carried away with joy at having met with you that I forgot all about it."

"Well, then, where shall we go?"

"Where do you propose?"

"I feel I am in want of rest. I have not known what it is to sleep in peace or comfort for a very long period. I am wearied almost to death."

"Well now, guv'nor, if you had only got a trifle of money with you it could be managed easily enough."

"How so?"

"Why, we would find out some retired public-house, and stop there all the day, and at night set forth and do anything that might be arranged between us."

"Do you know where there is any such place?" asked Jonathan.

"I don't,—I can't call to mind such a one, but if we travel on we shall doubtless find it; and I'll tell you another thing, guv'nor—you don't look flourishing; you have a decidedly suspicious look—your clothes are torn and mud-stained; you must make some changes in your apparel."

"But how can it be done?"

"Oh, we'll find the means, never fear! Can't you understand that your present appearance is suspicious to a degree, and calculated to attract the attention of all persons? You must make a change."

"I must—I will. I don't know how it is, George, but at times there comes over me a dreadful sense of weariness, weakness, and disgust of life."

"You're growing old, guv'nor—that's the reason."

"But there is one thing that will always animate me—that will always enable me to triumph over my foes—and that is, the strong desire I feel to have revenge. I will be revenged upon them all!"

"Shall we count them over?" said George. "We may as well refresh our memories a little while we are journeying along, it will afford us considerable pleasure."

"Yes—yes."

"Who, then, do you place first on the list?"

"Edgworth Bess."

"You long to have revenge upon her?"

"I do."

"And so do I, for I hate her bitterly—hate her for her behaviour towards me."

"And then," said Wild, "the next is Blueskin. Upon him I shall wreak my deadliest vengeance. At the present I cannot think what form my revenge will take, but something will suggest itself ere long."

"Kill him—kill him!" said George. "My revenge is always satisfied with death."

"But not mine," said Wild. "I require something more than that."

"And consequently you never get it; but I shall get you out of all these foolish whims and fancies before long. Who is next?"

At this moment a sudden recollection came over Jonathan Wild. Something that he had forgotten returned to his mind with full force.

He trembled in every limb.

The perspiration started out upon his face, and his hands quivered convulsively.

"What ails you?" said Wild junior, with surprise—"what's the matter?"

"I will tell you," said Jonathan, in a hollow voice, looking around him cautiously as he spoke—"I will tell you."

"Go on, then."

"Well, George, do you believe in ghosts—spirits—apparitions?"

Wild junior laughed.

"Not likely," he said; "such things were only invented to frighten people with. I have no belief in them at all."

"But I have," said Wild—"I have!"

"Then that's another sign you're growing old and weak-headed, guv'nor."

"I have good reason for believing in them—it seems impossible now to doubt."

"Bah!—ridiculous!"

"But I tell you I have evidence that cannot be disputed—the clearest—the best evidence, for—for—"

"For what?"

"I saw an apparition to-night."

"To-night?"

"Yes, to-night, just before I first encountered you. I saw it—I saw it!"

"Saw what?"

"The apparition—the very image—of one who I know full well is numbered with the dead. By this time his body must almost have turned to dust; but yet I saw him, looking just as he did in life!"

"Who—who?"

"Why did he come from the grave to visit me? Why is it that his spirit has returned to earth? Why did he confront me? It was horrible—horrible!"

"But, d—n it all," roared Wild junior, "can't you tell me who it was?"

"It was Jack Sheppard!"

"Jack who?"

"Sheppard."

"It's all d—d nonsense, guv'nor, and you must know it! Didn't you see Jack Sheppard swinging from Tyburn Tree with your own eyes?"

"I did—I did; and most surely he is dead!"

"Dead and buried too, and I will never believe that the spirits of the deceased return to earth."

"But I saw him, George—I saw him as plainly as I can see you now; aye, plainer—for then the moon was shining with great power!"

"And you were moonstruck, I suppose?"

"George, you may scoff, and jest, and disbelieve it, but I can assure you I am not more certain in my own existence at this present moment than I am that I saw the ghost or apparition of Jack Sheppard standing in the lane."

"It was some accidental likeness," said George—"that must be it. You are weak, and in want of rest and food—your disordered imagination has construed some slight resemblance into a perfect one. Bah! I am ashamed of you."

"But, George, answer me one question—is he dead or not?"

"Why, dead, of course! I was never more certain of anything in the whole course of my life."

"And so am I quite sure he is dead, and yet I am equally sure and certain that I saw him to-night. Do you think that I could have forgotten his appearance? Do you think that my memory would fail me in any respect? No, no! I tell you I saw him plainly and distinctly, just as he looked on that day when he took his last ride from Newgate to Tyburn Tree. And what's more, George, I saw—I saw—"

"Saw what?"

"Why, a dark and livid mark around his neck—the mark that had been left by the pressure of the hangman's rope!"

CHAPTER DCLXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON THINK THEY HAVE GOT INTO COMFORTABLE QUARTERS.

ALTHOUGH he showed but little symptoms of it, yet George Wild was considerably impressed, not merely by what had been told him, but by Jonathan's manner.

How to account for this appearance he could not tell.

But he still clung, or professed to cling, to his belief that his father had made a mistake.

"Do you know," asked Jonathan—"have you ever heard what such an appearance as I have described portended?"

"Oh, gammon!"

"I ask you, have you ever heard it? Have you ever been told that when an apparition like this appears to anyone, it is a token of their approaching death? Does it mean that my death is approaching? Is my race nearly run?"

"Never your mind—keep up your courage, guv'nor! Pay no attention to such tales as these—I never did, and never shall; what's the use?"

"But—but there are other things."

"What other things?"

"An old woman—a witch—has prophesied—"

George drowned his voice with a laugh.

"You are growing superstitious, guv'nor. Upon my word, I am surprised at you—quite surprised! I could never have believed it of you—it's too absurd!"

"You may affect to treat it lightly," responded Jonathan. "I try to banish it from my mind, but there are times when I cannot do so—when these thoughts will obtrude themselves."

"And I daresay they do just at the present time."

"They do—they do!"

"I am not surprised at it—I can easily account for it."

"How so?"

"By your own confession you are in want of food and sleep. Rely upon it, when these wants are supplied, you will be quite another being. Come on—let us make better speed!"

At a more rapid rate than before, they now trotted along the high-road.

Morning was slowly breaking, and the damp, chill wind that came blowing from the east certainly tended in no way to raise Jonathan's drooping spirits.

"Perhaps he will appear again—perhaps I shall once more obtain a glimpse of him—perhaps you may see him too."

"Well, guv'nor, perhaps I shall, and I sincerely hope it."

"Hope it?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Do you know what I should do?"

"No. Perhaps be paralysed by fear, as I was."

"No, guv'nor—nothing of the kind. I should fire a pistol at him, and d—d soon make out whether he was a live man or a ghost!"

"But you could not—you could not! I am sure that you would be completely overcome when your eyes rested upon such a supernatural visitor. I was, for I sank back in a swoon, and in a swoon I remained for many hours."

"No doubt it was caused by want of food—there can be no question about that. But keep your courage up for five minutes longer, guv'nor, and then you will be all right."

Jonathan did indeed seem to be in a most despondent state of mind.

Beyond a doubt George Wild had hit upon the true solution of his bodily condition.

"Look before you," said Wild junior, "and take courage from the sight. Do you see those chimneys and that red roof yonder?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, I feel pretty certain that is an inn. When we once gain the shelter of that, all will be well."

Jonathan looked with eager eyes towards the dwelling before them.

It was at some distance off and much hidden by the trees, and it was only indistinctly visible in the dim, grey morning light.

Upon a closer approach, however, Wild junior found that he was in error.

He had made a mistake as to the character of the building.

It was not an inn, but a farm-house.

He raised himself in the stirrups, and looked all about him in the hope of discerning another habitation.

But in this he was unsuccessful.

Jonathan was deeply disappointed.

"I tell you what it is, guv'nor," said George; "we won't go travelling on any further if we can help it. Come along with me. We will ask for food and shelter at this farm-house—that is, if you have got a little money in your pocket that will enable us to pay for what we have."

"I have a little," growled Wild, "but only a little."

"But will it suffice for our purpose?"

"Yes."

"That's all right, then, guv'nor. Come along—I have no doubt we shall be able to make ourselves very comfortable in this quarter."

At a sharp trot they advanced to the gate leading to the farm-house.

Through this they passed, and soon afterwards stopped at the homestead.

Early as it was—the hour being only just about sunrise—the inhabitants were all astir.

Wild junior took the lead in all these proceedings, for he found that he was most competent to do so.

He knocked loudly at the door, and waited impatiently for a response.

A rough-looking labourer opened the door.

"Is the master in?" said George, boldly. "If he is, I want to speak to him."

The man turned round, and immediately afterwards the farmer himself appeared.

"We are travellers," said George, in a bluff, off-handed way he could assume very well when he liked—"rather poor ones, to be sure, but we are badly in need of a little food and shelter. Don't think we come to beg. We have money enough to pay you for all we have, if you will only allow us to enter. We have been looking for hours past for an inn, without being able to find one."

"No, no," said the farmer—"there are few places of accommodation in this country. I have thought more than once that I would do a little business in the public line myself. But walk in—walk in; you are quite welcome to such accommodation as we can give."

"Thanks—thanks!" said George. "And our horses?"

"Oh, they shall be attended to, never fear! Nice-looking nags they seem to be."

"Yes," said George, "but rather tired. Like us, they want rest and something to eat."

The man who had opened the door took charge of the horses and led them to the stable, while Jonathan and his son were ushered into the large kitchen of the farm-house, where a considerable number of people were assembled, sitting down to a most substantial breakfast.

The appearance of two strangers appeared to be a most unusual event, for they could scarcely continue their eating operations, they stared so at the new-comers.

A very tempting and succulent breakfast, for hungry men especially, was placed upon the table, and to it Wild and his son did ample justice.

There was plenty of good home-brewed ale to wash the viands down, and, in fact, it had been many a day since Jonathan had fared so sumptuously.

The farmer seemed inclined to treat them with a very great amount of respect, and chatted agreeably about various matters.

George Wild kept up the conversation, and he was so good an actor that he not only overcame any feeling of suspicion which the appearance of Jonathan might create, but actually succeeded in producing a favourable impression as regarded himself.

When the meal was over, the labouring men took their departure for the fields in order to commence their daily toil.

The farmer himself rose as if to accompany them, and George Wild said:

"Now, sir, if you will complete your hospitality and render us an additional service, you will allow us to lie down somewhere and go to sleep. We shall not be particular where it is, but so many hours have elapsed since we slumbered last that it will be almost impossible to resume our journey without a nap."

"Oh, I have no objection," said the farmer—"not the least in the world! Here, dame, you see to them. Show them up into one of the rooms, and let them lie there and sleep as long as they choose. Good morning to you both!" he added, as he quitted the farm-house.

The farmer's wife, little dreaming who her visitors were, and what was their disposition, led them upstairs into a clean but rudely-furnished room.

Making some apology for the pooriness of the accommodation, she closed the door and left them.

CHAPTER DCLXXV.

GEORGE WILD BUILDS SOME VERY FINE CASTLES IN THE AIR.

JONATHAN WILD and his son flung themselves upon the bed without going through the ceremony of undressing.

"Did you notice anything peculiar in the farmer's manner?" asked George Wild, abruptly.

"No, certainly not—did you?"

"Yes, I did."

"What was it?"

"Well, I can hardly tell you—something strange and unnatural in his conduct."

"I didn't observe it."

"I did. I am sure in his inmost heart he wished us far away from this spot. I could tell it by his looks."

"Then why did he not refuse us shelter?"

"Because he might fancy that doing so would provoke suspicion. Rely upon it, there's something going on that we know nothing about, so while we stay here we must keep both our eyes and our ears open."

"But does it mean danger to ourselves?"

"There now, don't frighten yourself about nothing at all—there's no occasion. What danger can come to us, I should like to know? Who could recognise us?"

"You can't tell, but I judged from your manner that you expected something of the sort."

"No, no. The farmer has got something on his mind, I am sure of it, though what it is I can't exactly make out—perhaps we shall be able to discover ere long."

"What do you intend to do?"

"Nothing at present, guv'nor. I have locked the door, so that's all right—I shall have as long a sleep as I can get."

"But had we not better watch and sleep by turns?"

"I can't see any necessity for it. Go to sleep, guv'nor, and so will I. If anything unusual takes place I shall be sure to hear it, for at all times I am a light sleeper."

With these words George turned on his side, and soon afterwards a frightful succession of snores proclaimed that he was sleeping.

Jonathan, however, could not take things quite so easy, and so he lay for a long time in a very uneasy, restless state.

But at length he too dropped off into a profound slumber.

It seemed to him that only a moment had elapsed from the time of his closing his eyes when he felt some one touch him on the shoulder.

He started up in affright.

"Hush, guv'nor—be quiet! There's something going on, and if we are careful we shall find out what it is."

"There's no danger, then?"

"Danger? What a state of dread you are always in! Of course there's no danger; if there was, do you think I should be taking things so d—d easy as I am?"

"Well, I'm glad of it. Why, it's dark!"

"Of course it is, guv'nor, and a precious good sleep you have had—very nearly twelve hours, I calculate."

Jonathan pressed his hand to his temples.

His brain was confused.

He could scarcely believe that he had slumbered for so long a period.

But upon looking out of the window he was convinced.

"Hark!" said his son—"can you hear anything?"

With a beating heart Jonathan listened.

"I can hear a sound like the murmuring of voices," he said, at length.

"Just so—that's precisely what you can hear."

"What is it about?"

"I can't make out at present. I awoke and heard it, and then I awoke you. Come gently to the window; we will open it a little way and listen."

The window was a latticed one, so that by the exercise of a very trifling amount of caution they were able to open it noiselessly.

Night had evidently set in, for there was a complete darkness all around.

Unlike the preceding one, however, there was no moon shining in the sky.

The whole of the firmament was covered up by one huge cloud.

Now that the window was open the murmuring of voices became much more distinct—indeed, the very words that were uttered were plainly audible.

Three men were standing close together just outside the farm-house.

They were in a kind of angle of the building, and had doubtless retired there in order that their consultation might be secret.

Little did they think, however, that there were listeners at one of the windows above.

"I feel uneasy," said a voice, which they recognised immediately as the farmer's—"I feel very uneasy about this matter, and wish to goodness it was safely over! While it was no more than a little smuggling I didn't care, but this is a great risk!"

"Very true," said another voice; "but, then, remember what we shall pocket by the transaction—more than we could make by a whole year's cruising, and it will be done in less than a week."

"Yes, yes, I know that," said the farmer—"that is, of course, provided that nothing wrong takes place."

"Of course," said the other man, who had not yet spoken, but whose tones seemed those of command. "I have laid all my plans very carefully, and I might say I have no doubt as to the result."

"I wish it was over," said the farmer—"I heartily wish it was over!"

"Well, now, don't show the white feather, whatever you do! It seems to me you have got the easiest part to perform, and yet you make the greatest fuss about it."

"I can't help looking at the consequences of detection," said the farmer.

"Bah! I have no patience with you! You have no heart or courage! There's only one thing that makes me feel at all insecure, and, after all, that is a trifle."

"And what may that be?"

"I wish I had two men more for my undertaking. If I had, I should feel quite confident of success."

"Have you not enough already?"

"No, I have not, or I should not have spoken. I suppose now, however, it is too late to repair the omission."

"Well, I don't know," said the farmer, brightening a little. "Two men came this morning and asked for shelter."

"Surely you did not consent to it?" was the reply, given in accents of alarm.

"Yes, I did, for I thought that would be the best way of diverting suspicion. They will be off in an hour or two, no doubt. But they were much fatigued."

"Well, what of them?"

"They looked to me," said the farmer, lowering his voice, "as though they had been knocked about by the world a good deal, and as though they would not care particularly what they did to better their condition."

"In fact, you judge them to be a couple of desperate adventurers?"

"I do."

"And you think they might be disposed to aid us in our scheme?"

"Very likely."

"But there's the risk."

"I know that," said the farmer. "Yet we might feel our way gently with them, without letting them know what our purpose really was."

"So we could."

"For instance," continued the farmer, "instead of telling them that we are going to bring Prince Charlie over to his own country again—"

"Hush—hush!" said the other, interrupting him.

"Although we are quite alone, it is dangerous to utter such words."

"Well, well—but you know what I mean. Instead of telling them that, we might say that it was a little smuggling expedition, that would considerably benefit them if they took a share in it."

"I must think about it," said the one who appeared to be in command. "I don't like to judge hastily in such an important affair. Let us go inside. You shall have my answer presently."

With these words the three conspirators—for such they were—moved slowly from the spot, and disappeared round an angle of the building.

George Wild quietly shut the window and fastened it.

Then he flapped his hands rapidly against his sides, and in a very low tone produced a tolerable imitation of the crowing of a cock.

His exultation was extreme.

He grasped Jonathan's hand and shook it violently.

"Hurrah, guv'nor!" he said. "Three times three for good luck! We're in the way now! This is what you may call good fortune indeed! I can see my way now quite clear out of all our difficulties—I can indeed!"

"How so—how so?" said Jonathan.

"Can't you comprehend, guv'nor? It struck me all at once, like a flash of lightning. But I'll tell you."

"What is it?"

"Why, in the first place, it has turned out that I was quite right about the farmer."

"So it has."

"We know now what the secret is upon his mind. He is a Jacobite, and so are those who are with him. Their intention, as avowed, is neither more nor less than to bring Charles Stuart, the Pretender, over to England. Depend upon it, they will secrete him in this farm-house. Why he is coming, of course we cannot tell; but that they mean to bring him seems quite certain. Now, guv'nor, I only hope one thing, and that is, that they will ask us to join them."

"Do you think they will do so?"

"Well, that is just the difficulty. I really hope so, because if they do I shall consent, and then, guv'nor, our fortunes will be made. You will be able to recover all your lost power. Money will pour in upon you, and, guv'nor, I shall be your partner!"

CHAPTER DCLXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD INDULGES IN THE DREAM OF RESUMING HIS FORMER GREATNESS, AND GEORGE WILD SUSTAINS HIS PART TO ADMIRATION.

"A DREAM—a dream!" said Jonathan—"that's all a dream—a dream in which it would be vain and foolish for me to indulge! No, no, George—those times are past and gone, and never can return!"

"I say no, guv'nor!"

"A castle in the air," continued Jonathan, "and an altogether foolish notion! No, no,—I cannot—must not buoy myself up with the hope that I may once again find myself in the possession of that power that I have lost for ever!"

"Now, guv'nor, will you listen to me?"

"Yes—go on."

"Don't speak in that desponding way, but pay attention."

"I am paying attention."

"Can't you see how it is to be done? You shake your head. Then I will tell you."

"Do so, but don't speak in quite such a loud voice."

"A good caution, guv'nor—a very good caution."

George Wild lowered his voice and said:

"Now mind this, guv'nor, if we are asked about this matter, let us swear ourselves to be true Jacobites—Jacobites to the backbone. Do you hear that?"

"Yes."

"We will fall in with all their views exactly, and lead them to suppose that our heart is in the work—as it will be—as it will be!" he added, rubbing his hands together gleefully as he spoke.

"How so?" said Jonathan.

"Why, when we get Prince Charlie on board we will never lose sight of him, and instead of his coming to this house, mind you, we will carry him off somewhere and keep him secure. In the meanwhile, we will communicate with the Government and make known our capture. You know their hatred of the Stuarts as well as I do, and you must be aware that they would jump at any opportunity of putting the Pretender out of the way. They will be induced to forgive and forget all our past offences, and, take my word for it, a full and free pardon will be made out for both!"

While Wild junior spoke, Jonathan's eyes grew brighter and brighter.

His face flushed with excitement, and his breath came short and thick.

"I do believe it, George," he gasped—"I do believe it! But the prospect is too much—too great for me to bear."

"I would bet my life upon it," said George Wild—"the only difficulty is in getting the Pretender into our possession. If we can once do that, we can dictate our own terms to the Government."

Jonathan clasped his hands over his head.

"Oh that I could stop the dreadful beating in my brain!" he said. "But this excitement is too much—too much!"

"Calm yourself, guv'nor," said his son—"calm yourself! Lie down for a short time, and then we will descend. You must be very careful in all your behaviour. I only hope the leader of the expedition will make up his mind to ask our aid."

Jonathan's excitement was too great to allow him to rest.

After a brief pause they both descended to the kitchen.

Here they found the farmer and several other men—all strangers, and certainly bearing about them the appearance of belonging more to the ocean than the land.

"We are indebted to you for your hospitality," said George, advancing towards the farmer. "Let us know how much we have to pay you. It is time for us to start again."

"And where may you be bound?" asked the farmer.

"Nowhere in particular," replied George, in his off-hand way. "We are looking out for anything that may turn up. We have had bad luck lately—very bad luck!"

There was a pause, during which the landlord glanced at one of his guests.

This George concluded to be the leader of the expedition.

There was a degree of doubt and irresolution on this man's face, as though he was undecided what course to adopt.

At length, turning round, he said:

"I suppose you are not very particular about what you do?"

"How do you mean?" said George. "We are not very particular in some things, for in such hard times as these we should find it difficult to live if we were."

"I thought so. I suppose you would think it no great sin to cheat the tax-collector?"

"No, d—n me if I should!" said George. "I consider that a virtue and a duty that ought to be practised by every man."

There was a laugh at this, and the stranger continued.

"Then I suppose you would not mind depriving the revenue officers of a trifle, eh?"

"Smuggling?"

"Yes, if you like to call it so."

"Not by any means," said George. "I have done a little in that line before now, but not much, and it is a good many years ago."

"Well," said the stranger, "I may as well out with it at once. We know of a capital run, but we can't take advantage of it, because we are short-handed. Now, if you two will make up your minds to join us, why, it will be a very nice thing indeed for you."

George turned aside and made a pretence of consulting Jonathan.

"We are quite agreeable," he replied; "in fact, to tell you a little secret, we were making our way down to the sea-coast in the hope of falling in with something of the kind."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; we have facilities for disposing of silks or brandy, or in fact, anything that crosses the water on the sly, and we thought we might be able to make some arrangements."

"I am glad we have had the good fortune to fall in with you, then," said the stranger, with a sigh of relief.

It must be borne in mind that it was never his intention to trust these two men—Wild and his son—with the important secret of their undertaking, but only to lead them to believe that it was a smuggling expedition.

But, as we are aware, the secret was already known.

"When shall you require us to start?" said George.

"We are in perfect readiness for any time you may think proper to appoint."

"At midnight," said the stranger. "All our preparations will be made by then."

"We will be ready," said George. "What's the hour now?"

"Almost eleven."

More refreshments were brought out and placed before them.

Both were in a state of the greatest possible excitement. As for Jonathan, he could scarcely contain himself.

Fortune, he firmly believed, was once more about to smile upon him, and he no longer looked upon what his son had said as a mere dream or castle in the air.

There was a kind of tangible reality about it, and a strong degree of probability.

The glass circulated freely among the men, and one of them, standing up, said:

"Here's to the health of the King!"

This was a toast they all intended to drink with the greatest enthusiasm, for while it would provoke no suspicion and seemed quite loyal, they could really drink to the health of the exiled favourite.

"Stop!" said George, suddenly. "What King do you mean?"

The others stared at him in surprise.

"I am no King worshipper," he said, "and I am not afraid to say it; but least of all I like those German paupers who have settled themselves in this country, so if you are going to drink his health, I say no! It's what I have never done yet, and may I be d—d if ever I do!"

George Wild spoke these words with great boldness, and apparent warmth.

The leader of the expedition looked upon him with an admiring eye.

He judged him to be reckless, daring, courageous—not caring what he said.

There was a momentary hesitation, and the men all looked at one another.

"If you are no friend to the Georges," said the leader, at length, after a long pause, "we need not fear telling you what King we are drinking to—it is to the health of Charlie over the water, and may he soon come back to his own!"

"So say I!" said George, heartily. "If we are to have a King at all, by all means let us have one from the old stock! Here's to the health of King Charles, and let us hope that it will not be very long before he really is so, not that there appears any chance of it at present, for the people of England are forgetting the Stuarts, and becoming accustomed to German rule."

[THE CONSPIRATORS DRINK THE HEALTH OF CHARLES STUART.]

CHAPTER DCLXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON JOIN THE CONSPIRATORS.

An ominous silence followed these words of George Wild's.

All the men stood round, with their glasses half raised to their lips.

Then the one who appeared to be in command over the rest said:

"I don't know about that, young man—I don't know about that; indeed, it is my belief—and I have good ground for having it—that the people are growing more and more disgusted every day with the present ruler of these realms. If King Charles could only once plant his foot on English soil, he would be surrounded in a few hours by a large army; every day would add to its numbers, and, like some mighty tide, it would go rolling on and entirely overwhelming those who are at present in power."

"Well, perhaps it may be so, or perhaps not,—d—n me if I much know or care either; but, as I said before, I have no objection to drinking the health of Charlie over the water."

"Then," said the leader, "prepare all of you to drink. Drain your glasses to the toast: Here's to the health of King Charles of England, and may the time soon come when he will be seated on the throne that rightfully belongs to him!"

The toast was drunk with enthusiasm, especially by Jonathan and his son.

But after that there was a pause, and, as it seemed, rather an awkward one.

Each man looked half suspiciously and half distrustfully into the countenance of the one standing next to him, as though he feared to find a spy or a traitor.

All were conscious that the words they had just spoken and the toast they had just drunk were rank treason, and that if a knowledge of their proceedings came to the ears of the Government it would be sufficient to consign them to the prison—perhaps to the scaffold.

The leader of the expedition appeared inclined to sound the two strangers still further as to their views.

"Should you have any objection," he said, "to place yourselves beneath the banner of our lawful King? Let us know; if so, you may find that I shall have something to say to you that will turn out greatly to your advantage."

"Not the least in the world," said George, readily. "King George is no friend of ours, and never has been, and I should rejoice to see him lying in the dust."

"Well, then, swear solemnly that you will not disclose anything I may tell you, and we will proceed further."

"We'll swear," replied George. "Propose any oath you may think proper."

The leader did so, and a terrible formula was pronounced.

Then a little book was produced, which George and Jonathan both kissed, and said:

"We swear!"

"That is enough," said the leader. "And now, when I have spoken, you can please yourselves whether you consent to join us or not—it is by no means compulsory. If you have any objection to it, say so, and you shall depart in peace—only you must forget what has taken place to-night. On the other hand—"

He paused.

"Go on," said George—"let us hear it. If it is something that will put money in our pockets, that after all will be the chief inducement, for we have been terribly pushed of late."

"It will put money in your pockets, then," replied the leader—"it will make the fortunes of both of you for the remainder of your lives. Listen! Secret arrangements have been made for a long time past for a second uprising in the favour of Charles Stuart—one that will be infinitely stronger and better conducted than the one in 1715. Our part of the duty is to cross over to Ostend in a small vessel that we have belonging to myself, and at the place I have mentioned we shall find King Charles. He will be disguised. We shall bring him on board and return with him to England. The intelligence of his landing will spread itself like lightning through the land, and in a single day he will have an army at his back. All those who take an active part in these preliminary proceedings will meet with a large reward—not merely a reward paid down to them in money, but in appointments to various offices, and large salaries that will last during the whole of their lifetime."

"It sounds well," said George—"very well, and we are with you. I will help you to the last."

"Good—then for this little voyage to Ostend and back you shall have each of you ten pounds. Here—hold out your hands and take the King's money."

Jonathan and his son stretched forth their hands eagerly.

Five guineas were counted into the palms of each.

"That is half the amount," said the leader—"the remainder you will receive when the journey is accomplished."

"And when do we start?" said George.

"To-night—I might say immediately. All is in readiness, and the sooner this part of our work is over the better. The people now are ripe for a rebellion; they will bear the German yoke no longer, and are determined to cast it off."

"Very good," said George—"I am quite willing. The sooner the better, say I."

"We will have one more toast before we separate," cried the leader. "Fill up your glasses to the brim, and we will drink—Success to our expedition!"

The men drained their glasses eagerly, and, with the exception of Wild and his son, there can be no doubt that they were all fully in earnest in what they were about, and all extremely anxious that the young Pretender should be seated on the throne.

"Now, then," cried the leader—"follow me! Horses are ready, and the distance to the sea-shore is trifling.

Come on—in a few hours more we shall have the satisfaction of kneeling before our King!"

With these words the leader left the farm-house, and was followed by the men, the farmer himself being one of them.

Horses were waiting outside, and with very little delay the whole party seated themselves in the saddles.

The word "Forward!" was then given, and off they went at a rapid trot.

No particular order of march was observed.

They rode in a straggling throng.

Jonathan and his son kept side by side.

By slow degrees they dropped further and further back into the rear, so that they should be able to exchange a few words with each other without being overheard.

Jonathan himself was exceedingly anxious to speak.

Since he had heard the conspiracy, he had been plunged in deep thought, and had indulged in a thousand strange meditations.

"George," he said, in tones just loud enough to reach the ears of his son.

"What now, guv'nor?"

"Don't speak so loud, but just attend to what I say."

"All right—go on!"

"Candidly and truly, what do you think of this conspiracy?"

"Why, that in the end it will turn out a d—d good thing for us!"

"No, no—that is not what I mean. What is your opinion as to the success that it will meet with?"

"I don't know, guv'nor, how it might be if we hadn't joined them; but I shall take care that the affair is nipped in the bud, because I intend taking the young Pretender prisoner before King George my very own self."

"Hush—hush! The wind is blowing, and some of the words you are saying may reach the ears of those men; if so, our death would be certain!"

"We had better say no more about it," returned George. "It appears to me that our minds are made up as to the manner in which we should proceed, and therefore there is no necessity for conversation."

"But I wish to say a word or two, George."

"Say on, then; but be careful in your speech."

"I will. You remember what you were saying to me with regard to the position I had lost, and the probability there was that I should regain it?"

"Yes, yes! And are we not in a fair way for it—eh, guv'nor? This will be the best thing in the world for us!"

"Yes, no doubt; but suppose for a moment that this enterprise should succeed—how then?"

"It is impossible that it should. We don't intend to let them."

"But if otherwise? There seems a reasonable prospect. Is it not worth while for us to consider whether we shall really espouse their cause and not pretend to do so? Recollect what the leader of the expedition said. He told us that not only should we receive a great reward, but we should also be appointed to different offices. Now, if all goes well, I can see clearly enough how I may regain my former power, and how I shall be able to wreak my utmost vengeance upon those I hate! What do you think of it, George?—tell me that!"

CHAPTER CXLXXVIII.

JONATHAN AND THE CONSPIRATORS REACH OSTEND IN SAFETY.

"Why, I think while you are growing older you are turning into a d—d fool!"

"But you have not considered my question."

"Yes, I have. Don't get your head full of those foolish notions, guv'nor, because if you do we shall be done for at once; besides, I don't intend to allow it."

"Allow?"

"Yes; I am determined to take the lead in this affair from beginning to end. I will not suffer any interference on your part. It is a most excellent thing, and will turn out greatly to our advantage if we manage matters rightly. But don't you think for one moment that the Stuarts will ever return to take their place on the throne, because I am quite sure they will not. Now, then, let that end the matter once and for all!"

After these words, Jonathan rode on for a long time in gloomy silence.

He was pondering in his mind upon all that he had heard, and, strangely enough, he felt more inclined to take part with the conspirators than to betray them.

He felt sure that, could their end be achieved, he should obtain such power and position as he had never before dreamt of.

But what was sweeter than all, every one of those persons who had had any share in his capture, imprisonment, or pursuit would be entirely in his power.

The Secretary of State, too, who had been such a bitter foe to him, would be a proscribed exile.

It was a delightful thing for Jonathan to dream upon.

It was glorious even in fancy to endeavour to decide what would be the ultimate fate of those he hated.

His speculations and reflections were broken in upon by his son.

"Now, guv'nor," he said, "I can tell just as well as if you were speaking that you are still thinking about the benefit you would derive if the conspirators succeeded in their designs. I am right, am I not?"

"Yes, I was thinking of it. The more I turn the matter over in my mind, the more convinced do I feel that they will succeed."

"And the more I consider about it," said George, "the more certain do I feel that they will as signally fail. As yet the enterprise may be said to be entirely in the bud. So much depends upon circumstances, and, as regards all the parties concerned, the result will either be a success or utter ruin. And now just think. It seems to me without any reasonable grounds they count upon gaining a large number of people to their side. This I firmly believe will turn out to be a mistake."

"Do you really think so?"

"I do, guv'nor; and bear in mind the proverb which says, 'A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.' You know well enough what an intense hatred and fear the King has of all Jacobite plots, and when we succeed in destroying this conspiracy, and in dragging the object of it before him a prisoner, will he not be so overcome with joy as to be ready to grant any request that may be made to him?"

"Yes, George; I am obliged to admit that is very reasonable indeed. I have played upon the King—the Government—pretty well with Jacobite plots at one time or other, and I know just what effect they have upon his mind. I know, too, that he would give almost anything for a pretext to put an end to the life of Charles Stuart."

"Then, after that knowledge," said George, "how can you hesitate about the course we must pursue? Our path is as clear as noonday. Don't trouble your head one bit more about it, but leave the whole to me. Do just as I tell you—obey my directions, if needs be, without asking a question, and if you do so, rely upon it the result will be a free pardon for both of us, and a reinstatement in your old position."

Again Jonathan was silent, and George appeared to consider that the reason was because he had been satisfied with the arguments given.

Jonathan, however, was in a very great state of indecision upon the subject, and indeed there is no question that but for the company of his son he would certainly have joined the conspirators in earnest.

At length the sea-coast was reached.

The horses were left in charge of a man who appeared to be there waiting them, and to him the leader of the enterprise addressed a few words.

What they were Wild junior could not hear, but they appeared to be satisfactory.

"Stand close together beneath this rock," said the chief, "and then I will signal the boat."

He was obeyed.

From his pocket he rapidly took a small object which proved to be a rocket.

It was ignited, and up into the air it soared to an immense height, and was carried far over to seaward by the wind, and then it burst, and a shower of glittering fragments descended.

Several anxious moments passed, and then the chief uttered an exclamation of satisfaction.

Wild and his son looked across the sea, and then in the distance they saw a bright red light.

It seemed a long way off, and no doubt it was secured in some way to the rigging of the vessel.

Then the chief produced another packet which he placed upon the ground.

Its shape was conical.

This also was lighted, and a beautiful red flame immediately arose.

It burned with great steadiness and brightness, despite the wind that was blowing.

It was easy to conjecture that this light was shown in order that the rowers of the boat should know to what point to steer.

Presently the silence of the night was broken in upon by that peculiar rattling sound which is produced by the motion of oars in the rowlocks.

Then a small boat appeared in sight, in which two men were seated.

By the time it touched the beach the red light had died out.

It had just burned long enough to answer the purpose for which it was designed.

"In there, and take your seats quietly!" said the leader.

It was rather a heavy load for the boat to take at once, but the sea was calm, so they did not fear, to crowd into it.

It was hard work to row, and the boat moved sluggishly across the surface of the water.

Wild and his son exchanged no further conversation, because it would have been impossible to speak without being overheard.

But they strained their eyes endeavouring to pierce the darkness, for they were anxious to make out the size and nature of the vessel that was to carry them to Ostend.

Upon coming alongside they saw it was a lumbering, clumsy-looking craft, more resembling a large fishing-boat than anything else.

With little difficulty all got on board, and then the signal to weigh the anchor was given.

Then ensued the greatest confusion.

But in a short time the sails were spread in the requisite direction to catch the wind, and with a rolling, heavy movement the vessel plunged on her way.

Wild and his son made a computation of the number of people on board the boat, and, including themselves, they discovered the number to be about twenty.

The sea was calm and the wind favourable.

The leader of the expedition was also captain of the vessel, and he looked up at the sky and nodded his head with satisfaction.

He descended to the cabin, and was there occupied for a considerable time in writing.

George Wild was anxious to learn all, and peeped through the skylight and saw him thus engaged.

All the crew were very sanguine as to the result.

A double allowance of grog was served out, and they drank to the health of King Charles with great enthusiasm.

Wild junior was in high spirits.

He considered that he had been favoured by Fortune to an uncommon extent.

Nothing could be better or more agreeable to him, and, looking into the future, he felt confident that everything would turn out well.

His only uneasiness was caused by Jonathan.

That he was still indulging in speculations of what would be the result to himself if the conspiracy turned out successful he was quite sure, and he regretted it, for the credit must be given to George Wild of being able to weigh the probabilities of the occurrence of any future event pretty accurately.

In his nature, he was to the full as unscrupulous as his rascally parent; and, as we know, it was not from any devotion to the crown or any loyal feeling that he determined to unmask the conspiracy, but only because he believed his personal gain by doing so would be considerable.

His only course was to keep a sharp look-out upon Jonathan, and prevent him from taking any other course than that which had been agreed upon.

Without the occurrence of an accident, or any incident of importance, the voyage was performed.

When the land was visible, all the men displayed great joy and satisfaction; and as they knew there was nothing to fear from a disclosure of their sentiments, they spoke freely concerning King Charles.

Although the conspiracy seemed to be so badly planned, yet they were all most sanguine as to its results.

The idea that they should fail, and that the end of all would be an ignominious death upon the scaffold, never once entered their minds, or, if it did, they banished the thought as being not worthy to be dwelt upon.

CHAPTER DCLXXXIX.

WILD JUNIOR AND JONATHAN COMMENCE THEIR VOYAGE HOMEWARD.

It was quite dark when the lumbering vessel cast anchor just off the shore.

The captain was in a state of great excitement, and no sooner had he seen that all was right than he ordered the small boat to be lowered.

Into this heleaped, having two of the crew with him to row him to the shore.

Jonathan and his son, leaning over the edge of the vessel, watched the boat depart and disappear in the darkness.

They would have been very glad to have taken part in that portion of the enterprise, but they were not permitted to do so.

They would have to wait in suspense until the captain came on board again.

Wild junior glanced keenly around him, and finding that there was no one within earshot, said:

"Now, guv'nor, above all things take care what you do, or this elaborate scheme of ours will be entirely spoiled."

"I will be careful. Don't show any further anxiety on my account—it is unnecessary."

"I don't think so, guv'nor. I know just what you are. But when this Charles Stuart comes on board, be sure you do everything you can to display your devotion to his cause. You may depend I shall be profuse in my professions, and if you do the like, why, then, all suspicion will be turned away from us."

"I will do it," said Jonathan—"I will do it; but enough has been said upon the subject."

"Very good. It's a dangerous matter to converse about, and yet, guv'nor, I can't help looking into the future, and picturing to myself how things are likely to turn out."

"I do the same."

"I know you do; but I am afraid you are misled by a false notion. I am quite certain, however, that if we can only succeed in making the Pretender prisoner, King George would be ready to accede to any demands we might think proper to make."

"Yes—I should not wonder," said Wild; "but yet, if by any means this rebellion could be carried on successfully—"

"Bah!—rubbish!"

"I say if it could, then what a complete satisfaction it would be to us! All the past could be forgotten, and we should be able to trample our powerful enemies beneath our feet!"

"But you need not speculate on that, guv'nor, as I told you before, because it is quite impossible. Always stick to the strongest side, and you may depend that in this case the strongest is King George. He is too firmly planted upon the throne ever to be hurled from it. I am quite sure this is the case."

"Well, well—I must give you credit for having sound common sense on your side, George. There is nothing like keeping on the strongest side, and therefore I am agreeable that our original scheme should be carried out."

"I wish I could keep you in that mind, guv'nor. I believe you see the reasonableness of it now, but in a little while you will begin to think again, and your mind will change."

"I think not, George—I think not."

"Well, hush—don't say another word just at present! There's one of those fellows coming skulking along towards us. Take no notice of him."

The approach of one of the crew put an end to this conversation between Wild junior and Jonathan, so they leaned over the side of the vessel in silence, watching for the return of the captain.

George Wild was more anxious to catch sight of the Pretender than perhaps he would have admitted even to himself.

He desired to see the man, so that he might judge of what chance he would stand in an encounter with him, for his plan was to secure him as a prisoner, and carry him to London in triumph.

How this was to be achieved while the prince kept any sort of body guard about his person, not even Wild junior could tell.

But he trusted entirely to events.

Some accidental circumstance might occur of which he would be able to take every advantage.

Nearly the whole night elapsed without anything being seen of the captain.

At last, towards daybreak, there came the sound of oars upon the silent water, and soon afterwards the boat appeared in sight.

It was rather heavily laden with individuals of rather a motley appearance.

Jonathan and his son took up such positions that they were able to give a scrutinising glance to everyone who stepped on board.

Lanterns were fixed to various parts of the vessel's rigging, and by the dim, uncertain light that this afforded, they perceived the captain ascend the vessel's side.

Then followed some rather unprepossessing individuals—people having the appearance of depending entirely upon their wits for a subsistence, and by the manner in which they glanced about them it would seem as though they were ever in dread that some bailiff might step forward and touch them upon the shoulder.

As these new-comers reached the vessel, they stood round so as to be in readiness to welcome the Pretender in somewhat of a royal fashion.

They took off their hats and bent their knees, all on board following their example.

Then there appeared upon deck a tall, pale man, very thin, and with an anxious, careworn countenance.

This was Charles Stuart, the Pretender.

Loud cries now rent the air, every man trying to outvie his neighbour in exclaiming:

"Long life to King Charles of England!"

A flush of colour suffused the usually pale features of the Pretender, and he took off his hat and bowed deeply, muttering some words of acknowledgment.

Perhaps at that moment he felt almost like a king.

Certainly it recalled with painful distinctness past events that he would gladly enough have forgotten.

"Welcome, your Majesty!" said the captain, advancing—"welcome to this vessel! Upon its deck only your true supporters stand—men who are anxious you should obtain that which is rightfully your own—men who are willing to strain every nerve and to pour out their life's blood in the accomplishment of that purpose."

Then, one by one, those who were on board walked past the prince and saluted him.

This ceremony over, they returned to their ordinary duties.

The anchor was weighed, and after some short delay the vessel commenced her voyage homeward.

In spite of the many vices, follies, and faults of which the Stuarts were guilty, and which produced the decapitation of one and the dethronement of another, it is impossible not to feel a strong degree of interest in the descendants of this unfortunate race.

Nor can we wonder that all those descendants should continually keep their attention fixed upon the prize they had lost; and although year by year their hopes of regaining it grew less and less, yet it was long before they ceased altogether their endeavours to seat themselves upon the English throne.

The misdoings and foolish actions of a father had brought upon them this eternal exile—doings over which it was impossible they could exercise any control.

Another reason why a great degree of compassion must be felt for the descendants of the Stuarts is, because they were so unfortunate in the choice of their friends and defenders.

In fact, they inherited from their parent that weakness and feebleness of disposition which had always characterised the Stuarts, and thus it was that they became the dupes and prey of a horde of designing scoundrels, who, in some mysterious way, seemed to live upon the spoil, and to bring those that they supported into disrepute.

It was a harassing, sad existence that they all led, and even now at the present day it may be that some of their direct or remote descendants may look with longing eyes towards England, and reflect that but for the follies of one they would be, if not actually in possession of the throne, at least holding high rank in the land.

The prince and his friends descended to the cabin in company with the captain.

Wild and his son had again an opportunity for a few moments' conversation.

"Well, gov'nor," said George, "what do you think of the would-be King now?"

Jonathan shook his head.

"Depend upon it," said his son, "there is not in him the stuff that kings are made of! He will never be a ruler—he could be nothing more than the weak instrument of others! I might have felt some little compunction in betraying him had he been other than he is; but now—"

"Well?"

"Why, now I feel that I shall be doing myself a service, you a service, him a service, and a service to the whole nation at large."

"How so? I can understand your words so far as they apply to ourselves, but what's the nature of the service you would render him?"

George gave a peculiar smile.

"Why, his life must be a most unfortunate possession for him—he can never know happiness, and therefore it would only be an act of mercy to put him out of his misery."

CHAPTER DCLXXX.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON ONCE MORE COME IN SIGHT OF ENGLAND.

WILD junior laughed discordantly at what he was pleased to consider his own wit.

"Bear in mind also," he continued, "how great a satisfaction it would be to the King and all the people at large if they knew that these Stuarts were carefully put out of the way of doing any further mischief to anybody."

"Well, George, I will tell you one thing."

"What's that?"

"I am quite sure you are quite right, and that the course you have adopted is the best for us to pursue. I can tell that the prospects are very slight indeed of such a one as he is succeeding to the English throne. The fate of this insurrection must be a thousand times more disastrous than any yet."

"Yes, you may rely upon that, but I question whether it will come so far as an open rebellion. Consider in your mind what will be the best plan for us to adopt, and how you think we shall be able to succeed in making the Pretender prisoner and carrying him to London."

"He does not look very strong."

"No; on the contrary, he is weak, and if he was taken by surprise he would be so overcome that he would be as helpless as a child. From him we have nothing to dread; but bear in mind that we are only two in number, and that he is surrounded by a large troop of friends, and numbers in such a case as this makes all the difference."

"I know all that. It must be a stratagem—some deeply-laid and cunningly worked-out scheme."

"That's it, gov'nor, and I fancy that between us we shall be able to hit upon something. At any rate, there will be plenty of time before we get to England. Was there ever such a slow-moving craft as this?"

"Never: I should think she seems scarcely seaworthy. I suppose the reason why she was chosen is because suspicion would not be likely to be directed to it."

"That's it, you may depend; but look at those clouds yonder—how threatening they look! I fancy, although I know little of the sea, that we shall have a storm."

Scarcely had Wild spoken than the captain, who had come on deck, roared out some orders to his men.

Instantly ail was the greatest bustle and confusion—everyone was making as much speed as possible, for the danger that threatened them was imminent.

Scarcely had the last order been obeyed than there came a tremendous gust of wind, which almost buried the lumbering vessel beneath the waves.

Then a calm succeeded, and the vessel managed to right itself.

It was a calm of brief duration, however, and it was succeeded by a squall of wind infinitely more violent than the first.

Then the storm broke forth with great fury.

"It is a case with us," said Wild—"we are done for at last! This vessel can never outride a gale like this—we shall all go to the bottom, as sure as fate!"

Jonathan was greatly alarmed, but he had already had some severe experience in nautical matters, and was, therefore, scarcely so downhearted as his son.

Some alarm was, however, evidently felt by the Pretender and his adherents, for they all quitted the cabin and came on deck, looking about them anxiously.

In vain the captain implored them to go below.

"There is no danger," he cried—"at least, no particular danger. You may not think well of this old craft, but I can tell you she has weathered many a gale when better ships—to all appearance—have foundered. She is light like a cork—we carry no heavy load—her timbers are every one sound, and unless some accident should happen we shall be all right."

Although the capt. in spoke in this tone of confidence, his words did not tend to reassure them very greatly.

The waves became more and more turbulent, and the clumsy bark seemed every now and then as though it would plunge headforemost to the bottom.

Then it would roll fearfully to one side, to the great terror of them all.

But with an awkward motion she would right herself.

The huge billows that came rolling on like mountains broke over her, pouring tons and tons of water on her deck, but it ran off quickly, and she floated as freely as ever upon the surface.

For hours and hours the storm continued to rage with unabated violence.

All the sails had been taken in, and they were scudding under bare poles.

Yet such was the violence of the wind that the masts bent over like reeds, and threatened every moment to give way.

Suddenly, with a terrific crash that sounded high above all other sounds, the mainmast toppled over the side, and then it did indeed seem as though the vessel would be dragged beneath the waves.

But the captain did not lose his presence of mind.

He shouted out his orders to his men with calmness and precision, and, seizing an axe himself, he rushed forward, and set them the example of cutting the vessel clear of the ropes and tackle that were dragging her down so fearfully on one side.

This, however, owing to the manner in which the waves continued to break over them, was a most difficult task.

But the men, encouraged by the example of their leader, stuck to their work bravely, and at last, with a rush, the mass of hamper slipped into the sea, and the vessel, suddenly released of the strain, rolled over to the other side.

That danger was past.

There was only one more mast, and that was so small, and bent so freely before the gale, that they had little fears concerning it.

Still the bravest of them could not help giving evidence of their emotion.

They were, indeed, strongly moved by finding themselves so close in the presence of death.

Whether they had been carried by the fury of the wind and waves they scarcely knew.

All their attention was directed to keeping the bark above water.

When the captain said that all the timbers were sound, he must have spoken truly, for, notwithstanding the violence of the weather, she had not up to this moment sprung a leak of any particular importance.

Some of the men were kept at the pumps, but this was only an occasional and not an unremitting labour.

The day had almost gone before the tempest showed any signs of abatement.

By slow degrees, however, the storm subsided without having inflicted any further damage than snapping the mainmast.

Slowly the wind subsided and the waves became less angry.

But if the bark had been an indifferent sailer when furnished with a mainmast, what was she now when deprived of it?

Her motion through the water could scarcely be perceived, it was so intensely, wearily slow.

Yet all were thankful for the narrow escape from the great danger that they had had, and they were inclined to put up with this inconvenience, quite thankfully and willingly.

Just before sunset the captain succeeded in taking an observation, and then, by his calculations, he made out that they had been driven many miles out of their course, and that a considerable time would elapse before they reached the place which had been appointed for landing.

There was no help for this. They had to put up with it as best they could.

Two days and nights passed away before they saw anything of the land.

It was early in the morning when the shores of England became visible in the distance.

The captain, after a few anxious words of consultation with the Pretender, stood off to sea again.

To attempt to land during daylight would have been hazardous in the extreme, and so they were compelled to beat about during the whole of the day, keeping out of sight of land.

As soon as darkness descended, however, they made the best speed they could to the coast.

A rocket was sent up from the deck of the vessel, and all eyes were anxiously turned to the land for the response to the signal.

It came in the shape of the same crimson light that we have previously described.

"All's well," said the captain—"there is no danger, and no people lurking about, or that light would not be exhibited. Courage—courage! We have had much danger up to the present, but there is nothing but security before us. In an hour from now at the most we shall be on shore, and in a few days after that I trust we shall all have the satisfaction of seeing the throne of England occupied by its rightful heir."

A loud cheer was given by all the men at the conclusion of this speech.

The sound rang out clearly and distinctly over the waves, and the captain, raising his hand, cautioned them to be silent.

CHAPTER DCLXXXI.

WILD JUNIOR DEVISES AND PUTS INTO EXECUTION A VERY CUNNING TRICK.

"Hush—hush!" he said—"make no more noise than you are absolutely obliged! We want no attention called to our proceedings. Now, the more secret we are the better. Defer your cheers until the proper time, and then you may shout aloud to your hearts' content."

Abashed, the men shrank back, and soon afterwards they were employed in casting anchor.

"Now," whispered George, to Jonathan, "if they will only send us with the Pretender in the first boat, and leave us on shore with him while they return to fetch the rest, why, all will be well. We shall have great odds to contend against, but, then, I don't despair of success."

"It is too desperate, George—too desperate!" replied Jonathan, shaking his head.

"Well, we shall see; if I perceive the chance and commence the attack, you must second me as well as you are able—that will be our only chance."

"I will; but don't lose all through a little rashness. Be patient and abide your time,—the opportunity will come, you may rest assured of that."

To George's extreme disappointment, he was sent with some more of the men in the first boat.

All the way he continued to mutter curses under his breath.

Upon reaching the shore, he found that many other persons had assembled—a much greater throng than he had expected.

They were persons of considerable influence, who had been told that the Pretender would arrive, and who had repaired to the shore in order to welcome him as soon as he landed.

Several journeys had to be made before they all stood up in the beach.

The form of greeting the Pretender was again gone through, and this time with much more ceremony than on the previous occasion.

Horses had been provided in readiness for all, and after a little delay they mounted and set themselves in motion.

They were truly a most formidable troop, and George Wild saw his chances of being able to make the Pretender his prisoner grow less and less; in fact, it seemed totally impossible while he continued surrounded by his adherents as he was then.

Nor was it possible that the expedition could be long kept secret.

The appearance of such a troop passing through the country would attract not only attention but suspicion.

Wild junior was exceedingly curious to know what would be the nature of their movements.

All their future proceedings, however, were kept a profound secret; not a word was uttered respecting them.

Therefore Wild and his son were obliged to draw their conclusions from what they saw.

"I have it, guv'nor," cried George at length, in a low voice. "I know what's their first move. I recognise the road now well enough. They are going to the farm-house."

"Do you think they will stay there?"

"Well, that is more than I can tell."

"I should think not, for the place appeared to me to be small, and quite incompetent to lodge so many men."

"I don't know. It is in a very out-of-the-way place, and you cannot tell what they may have agreed to do, nor what accommodation they have provided."

"No, we cannot tell that," returned Jonathan, "and men are easily lodged anywhere."

"True, and now it seems to me we must deliberate a little."

"Upon what?"

"I am undecided whether it will be better for us to proceed to the farm-house or not."

"But how can you help doing so? How can you leave this tarrog?"

"Oh, I will find a means of doing that! But just consider this point: These men are in strong numbers, and it seems to me that it is utterly impracticable to carry out our first plan."

"You mean, to seize the Pretender?"

"Yes. You may depend he will never be left alone for a single moment, and for two men to attempt to bear him off in face of so many is too absurd to be thought of."

"But what else can we do?"

"I have just been thinking. Beyond all reasonable doubt, they are going to the farm-house, and probably will stay there for some hours, in order to rest themselves after their long journey."

"Well?"

"We, I think, had better adopt some stratagem to leave them, but, mind you, without creating any suspicion in their breasts."

"But that is impossible."

"Well, we shall see. Where there's a will, guv'nor, there's a way."

"But I can't see how there is in this case."

"Wait a little while, I say. We must do this, and afterwards we will gallop on to London and make the King acquainted with the particulars of this conspiracy—let them capture the Pretender themselves. But I admit that it is not so good as carrying him before them a prisoner ourselves, but that thought I am convinced must be abandoned."

"But now, what about this plan for quitting them without causing suspicion?"

"I must put it into execution at once," returned George, "or we shall be too near to the farm-house—just listen."

George bent sideways in the saddle and murmured a few words close to Jonathan's ear.

He comprehended their purport, and nodded his head with satisfaction.

Suddenly Wild junior's horse reared up and became, or, rather, appeared to become, quite unmanageable.

The whole troop was thrown into confusion by the restiveness of this one horse.

George appeared to be making every effort to calm it, but to all appearance without any success, for the horse, rearing up suddenly on its hind legs, flung Wild junior to the earth, where he lay as if stunned.

The whole thing, as the reader of course comprehends, was a mere trick.

He had taken care to slip off the horse in such a manner as to hurt himself very little, if at all, and yet he lay in the road like one half dead.

This accident caused a complete stoppage.

Jonathan descended from his steed.

"My poor son!" he exclaimed, "he is killed—he is dead!"

"No he is not," said one of the men, "he is breathing."

At this moment Wild junior uttered a low groan.

With well-meant intentions several dismounted, and, going to him, attempted to raise him to his feet.

"He will be all right," they said to Jonathan, "as soon as he gets on his legs again."

But as soon as they were about to touch him, Wild junior screamed out as if in great agony.

"Don't touch me!" he cried—"don't touch me; let me lie just where I am for awhile—don't touch me!"

They shrank back.

The leader of the expedition now made his appearance in order to ascertain the meaning of the stoppage.

"An accident?" he said.

"Yes," replied Jonathan, with well-acted concern, "it is my son; his horse suddenly shied at something and threw him. I fear he is very badly hurt."

"What is to be done?" said the leader. "There are no halibutions anywhere about this region, and no opportunity of getting assistance."

"I don't know what can be done, sir!" replied Jonathan, humbly. "I am willing to leave it all in your hands."

"Well, we cannot all stop here with the Prince as well, that's quite certain, and, moreover, we could render him no service if we did."

"Then, if you are willing," said Jonathan, "I will stay with him. Perhaps after a short time he may so far recover as to be able to resume his seat in the saddle."

"I think it very likely he is bruised and stunned, but I hope not seriously hurt. You shall remain with him, and we will push on. Our destination is the farm-house—you know it?"

"I do."

"We shall stay there twenty-four or thirty-six hours, perhaps longer. If in the meanwhile you can get your son along slowly, we will take care that he has every attention as soon as he arrives."

"A thousand thanks, sir!" said Jonathan, earnestly—"a thousand thanks! My poor son! I am afraid he is more hurt than you imagine!"

"I hope not; but, however, you must do your best to recover him and get him to the farm-house. Now, then," he added, turning to his men, "quick march!"

The whole troop now set itself in motion.

Jonathan, kneeling down by the side of his son, watched it as far as he could.

While one man was in sight he did not alter his attitude in the least, nor did George Wild venture to move.

As for the leader of the expedition, he rather regretted the accident that had occurred, yet did not think much about it—his head was too full of the more important objects of the enterprise to dwell much upon a trifle like that.

CHAPTER DCLXXXII.

GEORGE WILD DICTATES A LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

"GONE!" cried Jonathan, in an exulting voice—"gone—they're all gone! The last one is out of sight!"

"Capital—capital!" cried Wild junior, as, uttering a loud laugh, he sprang to his feet. "D—n me, guv'nor, if I didn't manage that well!"

"You did indeed!"

George shook the dust from his apparel.

"Are you hurt, George?"

"No, not in the least. I have bruised myself slightly, but nothing worth speaking of."

"Well, then, let us mount, and make all speed to London."

"Yes, to London, guv'nor—that's our destination, and we have got some important information to carry with us."

"We have. You were right as to the place they were making for. They'll stay at the farm-house perhaps for a couple of days."

"That will give us time," said George, "but none to spare. We must make our horses do the work, guv'nor. We have a long, hard ride before us, but it must be performed."

Wild and his son mounted their steeds, and after a brief deliberation struck off across the fields in the direction of the metropolis.

The course they took would, they knew, carry them far away from the farm-house.

The horses upon which they rode were those that they had left on the beach when they went on board the vessel.

During their absence the animals had been well and carefully attended to, and were full of spirit.

They would doubtless gallop far without resting, and Jonathan calculated that by good fortune they would be able to reach London in twenty-four hours.

It was strange to see how intently they fixed their minds upon this one object.

At any other time they would have been careful to look around them in search of their foes, and have shrunk back from the idea of galloping along the high-road to the metropolis.

Yet they did this on the present occasion almost without a thought.

In the very boldness of this course there must have laid some safety, for they were not molested or interfered with by anyone.

When half their journey was performed they stopped to rest.

By giving the landlord of the inn where they halted a sum of money—in fact, very nearly all they possessed—they induced him to exchange their tired, worn-out horses for two more of good quality that were in his stable.

The possession of these animals made a wonderful difference to them, and their prospect of reaching London by the time specified was very good.

As for Jonathan and his son, they seemed insensible to all fatigue, for they resumed their journey without resting for more than an hour.

While flying along at this tremendous pace, it was not possible to exchange much conversation.

But all the while Wild junior's brain was busily at work.

He was endeavouring to decide upon the safest course they could adopt upon reaching London.

This baffled him for a long time, and more than once he seemed inclined to give up thinking in despair.

It was not until the last moment that the right idea flashed into his mind.

"Hurrah, guv'nor!" he cried—"I have it! I know what we shall do now. I can't tell it you at present, but as soon as we arrive I will do so."

Jonathan gave a sigh of relief.

He had been taxing his brains to no purpose in endeavouring to decide how to make his communication known in the proper quarter.

Now that his son George had thought of the means, there was no need for him to perplex his brain any longer.

Wild junior paused at a small clothier's shop in the outskirts of London, and here he purchased two long riding cloaks such as were then generally in fashion, when people were more exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather than they are now.

They were of the most ample dimensions, coming right down to the heels, and enveloping the body entirely.

They were furnished also with large fur-lined collars.

that, when turned up, concealed all the face with the exception of the eyes.

This protected the wearer from the rain.

Such garments were just what Wild and his son required.

Two persons so attired would in these days attract much attention, but then it was different; scarcely a second glance was bestowed upon them.

George looked right and left for some place where they could stop for a short time—some place where there was not much probability of their being known.

At last, a small, retired inn, situated in an obscure byestreet, came under his notice, and he decided immediately to take up his quarters there.

It was a house where little trade was done, and the landlord was glad enough to see two travellers arrive on horseback, who by their manner seemed as though they intended to stay for a night or two.

Perceiving that the landlord was ready to treat them with every imaginable respect, George Wild assumed an air of the greatest haughtiness, and succeeded in fully impressing the landlord with a sense of their great importance.

In a loud, authoritative voice, he demanded a private room, and he was at once shown into an apartment, very rudely furnished indeed, but yet the best in the whole place.

As it was dark, the landlord did not recognise them, and when a candle was placed upon the table, the two visitors sat as far away from it as they could, so that their countenances were not revealed.

A substantial meal was first ordered and despatched, for both were weak and faint from long abstinence.

As soon as this was over, drinkables were brought, and George Wild began to discuss his plan.

Pens, ink, and paper had been called for, and when the landlord had left the room, and the door was closed, George said, in a low tone of voice:

"Now, guv'nor, just attend to me."

"I will, you may depend."

"That's right."

"I have been waiting most anxiously and most impatiently to hear what this plan of yours may be."

"Can you not guess it?"

"I can't. I have taxed my brain to the utmost, but failed to hit upon anything satisfactory."

"Then this is what you must do—it's very simple, as you will say."

"What—what?"

"Write a letter to the Secretary of State."

Jonathan shook his head.

"I had thought of that," he said. "George, I am disappointed—that won't do."

"Don't you be a fool, guv'nor! You have not heard what my plan is yet. I say, in the first place, you must write a letter to the Secretary of State."

"But—"

"I will have no 'buts' in the case, guv'nor! Once for all, will you listen to me?"

"I am listening."

"Well, then, I will dictate the letter to you. It will save time if you write it down as I dictate, and then I will finish my explanation. I have thought a great deal about it, and I am sure there is no other course that we can adopt that is so well calculated to answer the end we have in view."

Jonathan Wild took up a pen.

"Now, guv'nor, just put down the words I tell you. Let me see, to-day is Friday—put down 'Friday night' at the top of the letter."

"It is done."

"To the Secretary of State for the Home Department."

"My lord,"

"Have you got that?"

"Yes."

"Then go on thus:—"

"This letter comes from one who confesses he has violated many of the laws of this land, but yet from one who has been wilfully misrepresented in his general character by interested persons."

"That's a d—d good sentence, isn't it, guv'nor? Have you got it down?"

"Yes."

"Very well, go on thus:—"

"I am most anxious, my lord, to make some atonement for the past wrong I have done, as you will find by what I disclose. I can most solemnly assure your lordship that at this moment the Pretender, Charles Stuart, is on English soil. I know the spot where he now is, with a band of trusty adherents around him, numbering in all about thirty or forty persons. He is in hiding at a farm-house which I can point out, and at this farm-house he will remain for one, or perhaps two days longer. He will then march forth, and I am credibly informed that as soon as he raises his standard numberless disaffected persons will flock round it. It is, indeed, the most formidable Jacobite conspiracy since that which took place in the year '15. That all I now state is perfectly true I solemnly pledge myself, for I pretended to join with these rebels in order to find out their plans. I had hoped to bring the young Pretender a prisoner to your lordship, but I found he was too well protected by his friends for me to stand the least chance of success if I made the attempt. However, I can put your lordship in the way of capturing him without difficulty, and possibly without bloodshed."

"Need I tell your lordship that I look upon this as a most important service—a service to the King and country whose laws I have outraged. It is only reasonable that in return for this I should look for some acknowledgment, and the acknowledgment I require is simply this: that you offer a free pardon to myself and my son George—a most excellent and worthy young man—who, I regret to say, has been implicated with me."

Jonathan uttered a growling, snarling sound, and seemed half inclined to fling down the pen.

"Don't you like that, guv'nor?" asked his son, with his usual coolness.

"Like it?—it's outrageous! I won't write it!"

"Yes you will, guv'nor, or I'll be d—d if I don't give you into the custody of the police officers—now, this moment!"

"But you would be captured too."

"I can't know about that—I rather think I should get off if I handed you over to the authorities. But don't let us talk such rubbish as this—go on with the letter, and be d—d to you! If you interrupt me like this, I shall forget what I was going to say, and I have been thinking it over for hours. Go on, I say, and don't be a fool!"

Jonathan hesitated a moment, and then, as it seemed upon a second thought, resumed his pen.

"If, my lord, you will publish in any of the papers," continued George, "a promise that you will pardon us both if we disclose all the particulars of this plot, we shall see it, and we will lose no time in presenting ourselves before you as soon as we are aware that we can do so in safety. The means just mentioned is the only one by which you can reply to this communication; and in the hope that your lordship will give the matter the serious attention that it deserves, I beg to subscribe myself

"Your lordship's most humble and obedient "servant to command,

"JONATHAN WILD.

"P.S.—I can most positively state, and would swear if necessary, that if no notice is taken of this letter, in three days you will find the young Pretender marching upon London with a strong army at his back. This is no mere pretence, but absolute truth; for I do assure your lordship that I was in the vessel which brought him over from Ostend last night."

"J. W."

CHAPTER DCLXXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON AWAIT A REPLY FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

"THERE now, guv'nor," cried Wild junior, in an exulting tone of voice, as soon as the letter was finished—"what do you think of that? Is it not first-rate?"

"It is good so far as it goes," was the reply, "but I don't see how it is to answer our purpose."

"Then you are not so quick of apprehension as you used to be, guv'nor. It is my intention to put the letter in the post and then patiently await the result."

"And what do you suppose the result will be?"

"Why, I have not the slightest doubt that the Secretary State, finding the matter is so serious, will not hesitate to grant us the pardons on the conditions we ask for them."

[JONATHAN WILD WRITES A LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.]

"And you think he will put a notice to that effect in the newspapers?"

"I do."

"I am inclined to be doubtful," said Jonathan—"very doubtful! Ten to one if he gives the subject a moment's thought."

"You are unreasonably despondent, guv'nor! Cheer up! It's always darkest just before the dawn, you know!"

"It may seem strange to you, George, but now that I have written the letter I don't feel half so certain about the results as I did before."

"But I do, guv'nor, and let that be sufficient. But can you propose anything better? If you can, by all means let me hear it."

"No, I can't—that's the worst of it."

No. 145.—BLUESKIN.

"Then be content to let events take their course."

"I suppose I must do so."

"You must. Come, guv'nor, just rouse up a little. My confidence in the success of our scheme is undiminished. Fold up the letter and address it, and I will carry it to the post-office."

Jonathan complied with this instruction, but it was easy to see that he had quite ceased to feel any interest in what he was about.

"Be careful," he said, as he handed the letter to his son. "Take care how you leave this house—mind you are not followed."

"All right, guv'nor! Don't you trouble your head about me. Leave me to take care of myself—I am quite competent to do so. I shall be back in a few minutes."

George Wild wrapped his cloak closely around him and put on his hat.

He descended the stairs quietly.

At the bottom, on his right hand, was the bar window, and through this he gave a hasty glance.

The landlord must have heard him descend, for he turned round quickly, and seemed rather confused in his manner.

Why or wherefore it was impossible to tell, and anyone less keen-sighted than George Wild would not have noticed it.

"Going out, sir?" said the landlord, interrogatively, coming close up to the counter.

"Yes—I shall be back in a few minutes."

George stalked down the passage and out of the door into the street.

He had some distance to go before he could find a post-office, for in those days very few letters were transmitted.

At length he deposited the precious epistle, and then turned his steps towards the inn again.

Before ascending the stairs, he gave one more glance into the bar.

But this time he perceived it was vacant.

"Guv'nor," he said abruptly, as he re-entered the room, "have you heard or seen anything while I have been away?"

"No,—why do you ask?"

"Don't be so alarmed, only I fancied the landlord's behaviour was rather suspicious. Perhaps, after all, it was no more than my fancy."

"But we ought to be careful, George," said Jonathan, somewhat nervously, "for they are making close search after us—very close indeed, and to be captured now would be bitter in the extreme."

"Don't think about it, guv'nor. I don't intend to give up just at present. While we are here we will sleep with one eye open, and be ready to clear out at a moment's notice if necessary."

The remainder of the night passed by quietly enough.

Wild and his son were shown into a bed-chamber, and here they passed the night, one watching while the other slept.

In the morning, finding they had met with no interruption, they felt more at ease.

Their spirits rose as well, for once more they thought well of their scheme—perhaps better than they had yet done.

They made a hearty breakfast.

"Guv'nor," said George, addressing Jonathan, "have you made up your mind what to do while we are waiting for a reply to our letter?"

"No, I have not."

"Well, I think we are tolerably safe here, and such being the case, in my opinion we cannot do better than remain quietly where we are, and wait for the reply."

"How soon can you expect one?"

"Not before the morning, guv'nor—certainly not before then."

"I am afraid, after all, that that will be too late."

"Too late?"

"Yes. By the time we can get to the farm-house, the Pretender will have left it, and will be well defended by a large army."

"Well, guv'nor, we have no resource but to wait."

"And supposing no answer does come, how then?"

"I would rather leave the discussion of that until the time arrives. It's no good meeting trouble halfway, guv'nor—I never did it yet."

In this unsatisfactory manner the day gradually wore away.

Every now and then the villains would be startled by some simple sound or occurrence, for to them everything was alarming, being well aware of the dangerous position in which they stood.

Towards nightfall, Jonathan's impatience grew so great that it could not be restrained.

"It's no good, George," he said—"no good at all! I can't stop here, and that's a fact!"

"Where would you go, then, guv'nor?"

"Anywhere—anywhere—I don't care where!"

"Have you forgotten that there may be just a little danger in taking an evening stroll?"

"No—no. But, George, I'll tell you what I have thought."

"What—what?"

"That our communication may have been deemed of considerable importance—of too much importance to be delayed; and if so, I think it more than likely that a handbill would be issued and posted up, offering the pardon we are asking for."

"That is very likely, guv'nor—quite likely; and the thought never occurred to me."

"Is it not worth while to ascertain?"

"I think so."

"Then let us wrap ourselves up closely in our cloaks, and look around us. If we don't find the handbill, we shall be in no extreme danger; and if we do, our danger will be over—we shall be able to walk in the streets securely."

"What a glorious thing that would be!"

"It would. But come—if we are going, let us go at once."

Wild and his son enveloped themselves in their cloaks, and concealed their countenances as much as they could.

As they descended the stairs they again saw the landlord, apparently watching for them.

"We shall be back soon," said George, not giving him time to ask a question. "We intend taking a stroll—that's all."

The landlord made no reply, and the pair left the house.

They paused a moment in the street outside, uncertain where to go.

"Come," said Jonathan, "we will walk towards the City; if there are handbills out, they will surely be posted there."

"Or at Bow Street Police Station," said George.

"Yes, certainly there; but that would be running too much risk. Come on—come on!"

They strode forward rapidly in the darkness.

It was a night that favoured them exceedingly, for it was so disagreeable that no one would be abroad except upon necessity.

A bleak easterly wind was howling through the streets, and every now and then the rain would fall sharply; no doubt there would have been a complete downfall of it but for the violence of the wind.

The cold was intense—it seemed to pierce them through and through.

Ere going far, however, George exclaimed:

"Hush, guv'nor! Don't start or seem alarmed, but I have something particular to tell you."

"What is it—what is it?"

"Be calm!"

"How can I be calm? Tell me at once what it is, or my agitation will increase!"

Jonathan evidently apprehended some great danger, for he trembled from head to foot.

"I believe there's a man following in our footsteps," said George, calmly. "Whether he is or not I can scarcely say at present; but I have had my eyes open, guv'nor."

"What sort of a man does he seem?"

"I can hardly tell in the darkness. It is nothing more than a figure flitting behind us like a shadow. If I see him much longer I shall decide in my mind that he is a spy; if he is, then let him beware!"

Jonathan was thrown into a state of the utmost alarm by this revelation.

Unquestionably, both the powers of his body and mind were much shaken and enfeebled by all he had gone through.

He was no longer the bold, fierce, turbulent spirit that he had been.

George, however, possessed many of his father's characteristics, and on the present occasion he displayed one.

That was, perfect calmness and apparent indifference to the danger that threatened them.

"I will turn round three corners rapidly," said George, and if he follows us round the last I shall be convinced of what he is; then, I say, let him beware!"

"What shall you do, George?"

"I can hardly tell at present, guv'nor, I am thinking. Certainly, if I can, I will prevent him from interfering with our business any more."

The manœuvre that Wild junior had projected was carried out.

Three successive corners were turned, and in such a way that they actually doubled upon their course, so that it would be strange indeed if anyone was going in such a roundabout direction to any place.

Just as they were turning the second corner, Wild junior, by half turning his head, caught sight of the dark figure behind him.

The same took place at the third.

"Yes, guv'nor," he said, "he is a spy, and now I'll tell you how to settle him."

"How?"

"Increase your speed—keep up with me, and when I come to the next corner I will turn round it in such a way as to make the spy think we are about to run off. He will come round the corner hastily, and we will stop there waiting for him; when he does come he will remember me, I'll warrant!"

There was a tone of excessive malignity perceptible in Wild junior's voice as he thus spoke.

Jonathan saw at once how effectually the spy might be disposed of.

Accordingly, he quickened his steps as George had directed, and the two hastened along the street, not at a run certainly, but yet at a pace that could scarcely be considered a walk.

Then they came to a corner.

"Now, then, guv'nor, round it at full speed," said George, in suppressed tones, "and then stop as soon as ever you possibly can!"

This direction was obeyed implicitly.

They checked themselves as soon as they were able, and then George Wild, keeping close against the wall, so that its shadow should conceal him, crept back to the angle of the building, and waited for the spy to make his appearance.

CHAPTER DCLXXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD SEES A BILL OF A VERY DIFFERENT CHARACTER TO THE ONE HE WAS LOOKING FOR.

GEORGE WILD had not long to wait.

He clenched his teeth together.

The sound of rapid footsteps came upon his ears.

He threw back his cloak over his shoulders, so that it should not impede the free motion of his arm.

In his right hand he held a large pistol by the barrel.

The butt was of unusual size, and was massively bound with brass.

Closer and closer came the footsteps, and then he raised his arm in an attitude to strike.

Little dreaming of the danger that threatened him, and fully impressed with the idea that the fugitives were hastening along at the top of their speed, the spy came round the corner.

Wild junior had his arm raised in the air.

No sooner did the unfortunate man appear than the butt of the pistol descended with terrific force and accurate aim.

There was a dull, sickening sound—a low, gasping, gurgling cry, followed instantly by another blow, and then the spy fell in a huddled-up heap upon the pavement.

"He's settled," said George, quietly, as he restored the pistol to his belt. "Now, where can we put him out of the way, so that when he recovers he will not be able to create much disturbance.

"Will he recover?"

"I don't know. I should think so."

"They were two heavy blows, George."

"I know that; they were effectual ones, too. I rather think I have stopped his noise and his gallop at the same time."

George looked about him for some place where he could dispose of the body.

But for some time he looked in vain.

Then all at once his eye rested upon one of those iron gratings that are to be found at the corners of nearly all streets.

"Here, guv'nor," he said; "this is just the thing—help me!"

He strode towards the grating as he spoke.

"Now, then, put forth your strength; it's a good weight, I know, and not very convenient to grasp hold of; but we can manage it between us."

"Shall you put him down there, George?"

"Yes; why not? Perhaps the cold water at the bottom will revive him a little."

George laughed hideously at this pleasantry, and, bending down, he thrust his fingers in between the bars of the grating.

Jonathan did the like; and by their united efforts, they managed to raise the mass of iron and place it on the roadway.

"I think he is dead," said George, as he again bent over the prostrate form. "I only hope there are no marks about, and then people will wonder what on earth has become of him."

He seized hold of the unfortunate man by the feet, and thus dragged him to the hole the grating had covered.

He allowed his feet to fall down first, then, going round, he raised him by the shoulders, and, with a rush, he descended into the dark and loathsome pit.

There was a loud splash, and then silence.

"That is done!" said George. "Now, then, guv'nor, pick up the grating, and we will put it in its place again. Then the sooner we are off the better."

Jonathan was quite of this opinion, so he made all the haste he possibly could.

But while they were in the act of putting the grating into its proper place, they heard an approaching footstep.

Then round the corner of the street there came a watchman, holding his lantern as high as he could above his head, and endeavouring to see around him.

"It's a Charlie," said George, as he caught sight of him.

"Hullo!" cried the watchman, as he made out the two dusky figures near the edge of the pavement. "What are you doing there? Who are you? Speak at once, or I'll take you up!"

"It's all right," said George, walking up to him as calmly as anyone possibly could. "There's nothing the matter."

"But I say there is!" said the watchman. "I heard a cry. There's something amiss, and I insist upon keeping you both in charge?"

"Oh, do you? Then we don't intend to permit you to do anything of the kind!"

The watchman opened his mouth, and doubtless was about to utter something in a very loud voice—perhaps call for the assistance of some companion.

George was prepared for this extremity.

One hand was full of black, slimy mud that he had gathered up from the gutter.

As soon as the watchman opened his mouth in the manner we have recorded, he flung it in with full force.

He gasped, and struggled, and fought hard for breath—he was, indeed, in imminent danger of suffocation.

Before he could make use of it, George snatched the rattle from his hand.

"Now, then, guv'nor," he said, "off we go as fast as you like, and it's very odd to me if we have any intruders after us again!"

The watchman tried his utmost to call for assistance, but it was in vain.

The last Wild junior saw of him he was standing near the grating, spitting and spluttering, and making the greatest and most extraordinary exertions and contortions.

"Those two little adventures have quite warmed my blood, guv'nor," said George. "Now, then—come on! If we can only find the bill you spoke of, we shall be as right as the bank!"

They hurried on through several streets, looking about at various places Jonathan knew of, where bills were frequently posted up.

There were several to be seen making announcements of one sort or other, but not the one they were looking for.

"I'm afraid it's a case, guv'nor," said George. "We shall have to wait until the morning, and look in the paper. It's pretty certain no bills have been issued."

"There's one more place I should like to try."

"Where is that?"

"Temple Bar. If there is not one there, I shall conclude there is not one anywhere."

"You might almost conclude that now, guv'nor; but, however, we'll go there if you like."

To Temple Bar accordingly they went.

But here, as in the other places, no signs of such a bill could be seen.

"I am inclined to give up," said Jonathan. "I am losing all faith and confidence in the scheme, and yet how promising it looked at first!"

"Wait till the morning," said Wild junior—"we shall know more then—wait till the morning."

"But where shall we wait, that's the question; certainly it would not be prudent to go back to the inn where we have been staying."

"No, certainly not; but then our horses—what about them?"

"Ah! I had forgotten; we cannot do without them."

"True; and yet we must not sacrifice our lives for the best horses in the world. I told you I had my suspicions of the landlord, and it seems to me they were well grounded."

"You think he sent out that spy?"

"I am pretty sure of it. You may depend the police officers are waiting there in readiness to capture us as soon as we return."

There was a silence of several minutes' duration after this, that was broken by George Wild.

"Guv'nor."

"What?"

"As we are so near, I am more than half inclined to stroll past the station in Bow Street."

"No, it will be too dangerous."

"Not so—not so; the hour is late, there will scarcely be anyone about, and above all they would never think of looking for us in such a quarter as that; they would never think we had the boldness to go near it."

"There's a good deal in that," said Jonathan.

"There is—and what's more, we are more likely to see the bill we want stuck up against the wall of the station than anywhere else."

"I am well aware of that; but as I said before, I think the danger is too great."

"Well, guv'nor, but we have come so far in safety, and I think that ought to be an encouragement for us to think that we should not run into any additional peril by merely walking up Bow Street."

"Come on then, I am willing."

Bow Street was very close at hand, and they gained it in a short space of time.

In spite of their boldness and hardihood, they trembled a little as they approached thus the head quarters of the police.

All around them, however, was perfectly silent, no officers were in sight, and at the station they could only see the oil lamp that was burning over the doorway.

"Walk on boldly," said George—"don't shirk or tremble, or look about you as though you were in fear of capture; if you do, suspicion will be at once excited."

Jonathan could not altogether control his agitation, yet he tried hard to do so.

A few more steps took them past the door of the police station, and then they paused opposite the building.

As usual, a great many bills relating to such matters as they had come upon were exposed to view.

Suddenly Jonathan seized his son's arm with a convulsive grasp, and half uttered an exclamation.

"Look, George," he said—"look there—look there."

"Don't be a d—d fool, guv'nor, or you will spoil all. Look where?"

"Look at that bill—do you see it, that one with the large letters yonder? Just glance at it and then come away—we dare not stay here."

"What bill, guv'nor?"

"That one—can't you see it? Five hundred pounds reward. There are the letters and figures large enough. And look below—there's my name and yours; there's some smaller type between them. No doubt it's our description. Come away—come away at once, for if we should be seen we are lost."

"Or found," said George, with grim wit. "I see the bill now, guv'nor. Come away. I'm afraid it's all up with our scheme now!"

With hasty steps they made their way along the street, and at every step they took they drew a long breath of relief, for they considered that they were so much further from great danger.

"D—n it, guv'nor!" cried Wild junior, "that's awkward enough—five hundred pounds reward—that's enough to tempt anyone, is it not? We must be doubly careful."

"We must, George—we must be careful! Oh, be careful, for my heart fails me!"

"Then if that's the case you are as good as taken and done for already."

"No—no."

"Cheer up, guv'nor—all is not lost yet. I will not believe that until the last moment! I would rather think that the time is come when we shall have our full revenge! Do you hear that word, guv'nor? Revenge—revenge!"

"Yes—I hear it," said Jonathan, "for the sound of it sends new life and new blood darting through my veins. Revenge—revenge! That shall be the word that I will always keep before me—revenge! I should like to glut my vengeance on the whole human race—I should like to have them all before me now—now!"

CHAPTER DCLXXXV.

JONATHAN AND HIS SON MAKE UP THEIR MINDS TO RUN THE RISK OF RETURNING TO THE INN.

JONATHAN WILD struck out with his arms fiercely, as though he imagined that the whole human race was before him as he had wished, and that he was actually gratifying his revenge.

"Keep still," said George—"keep still! What do you want to behave in that extravagant fashion for? Keep still, can't you?"

"I will be still—it is necessary to be cautious."

"It is highly necessary."

"But my feelings carried me away just then. I was anticipating the joys of revenge!"

"But, guv'nor—"

"What?"

"You have not forgot about our horses, have you?"

"No."

"What are we to do with them?"

Jonathan shrugged his shoulders.

"Have you made up your mind to abandon them?" continued George.

"Scarcely that, and yet it would be foolish in the extreme to run any great risk on their behalf."

"I don't know that, guv'nor. I am low in funds, and so are you, and what's more, they are a couple of first-rate animals."

"They are, indeed."

"And we want horses—must have horses, in fact!"

"Well—well, wait until to-morrow morning."

"And suppose we should not see the notice, as I'm afraid we shan't?"

"Well?"

"I hope we shall, but that hope must not be trusted to."

"It's a frail one, I admit."

"Then let us go to the public-house, and obtain our horses."

"But the officers are there."

"Perhaps."

"You may almost make sure of it; but if they are, we might outwit them if we tried, and when we were possessed of our horses we should be in a much better position to escape our foes should the notice not appear."

"But the risk—think of the risk!"

"I do think of it, but yet I think it worth while to make the effort."

"Agreed—then let it be done! Now, then, consider of the means."

A silence followed, during which the minds of both were busily at work devising some means by which they should be able to obtain possession of their horses.

In the hearts of both there was by this time considerable doubt as to whether any notice would be taken of their communication—both were, in fact, prepared for a disappointment.

Looking forward, then, to this disappointment, it was in the highest degree important that they should be in possession of their horses.

They had tried them, and found their quality to be excellent, and now they had had sufficient rest to recover entirely from the effects of their previous journey.

Neither Jonathan nor his son possessed anything like the amount of money that would be required to purchase two such steeds, nor was there any prospect of their being able to obtain such an amount.

Some time elapsed before either spoke, and then, at last, in an impatient voice, Jonathan said:

"Have you thought of anything, George?"

"Nothing very definite, guv'nor. Have you?"

"No, I have not."

"You were trusting to me I suppose?"

"I confess I was, George; the conviction comes more and more strongly over me that I am not what I once was, and that I shall never be able to recover my lost energy."

"Pooh—stuff! Do you mean to go on talking like that, guv'nor?"

"I can't help it."

"Well, then, I'll tell you what I would recommend."

"What?"

"Go straight up to Newgate, or to Bow Street if you like it better, and surrender yourself quietly; then you will save all further trouble or fuss."

"No—no!"

"You don't like the idea of doing that?"

"Not at all; I will fight it out to the last gasp—I will die rather than surrender!"

"That sounds better, guv'nor; I have more hopes of you now!"

"It has been prophesied that I should end my days upon the scaffold—that I should hang dangling from Tyburn Tree. I will disprove that prophecy. I can die—I will seek death in any form, but the officers shall never capture me—they shall never hang me up at Tyburn!"

"That's the spirit, guv'nor—you keep that sort of feeling warm in your breast, and you will be all right. We have much to do yet, guv'nor, and if this little scheme of ours fails, why, if we are careful, we shall be no worse off than we were before we thought of it, and we will let it be a warning to us—we will engage in no other transaction of the sort—we will bend all our energies to revenge."

It was wonderful what an inspiriting, revivifying effect the mere pronunciation of that one word had upon Jonathan Wild.

George noticed and knew it, and that was why he continued to harp upon the same word.

"But, guv'nor," he continued, "it is not the time exactly to think about revenge now; we must turn our attention instead to getting our horses out of that stable. Tell me how it is to be done."

"I can't George—I can't."

"Well, then, I'll tell you my thoughts."

"What are they?"

"It is my opinion that the landlord of that public-house, having his suspicions, called in the police, though his suspicions were not quite strong enough to be beyond a doubt. They might have guessed who we were without being certain of it."

"Well, well—what of all that?"

"You will see directly. That man they sent out to watch our footsteps. If we had merely taken a stroll and then returned to the inn, he would not have interfered with us, except by watching. When we were once in the building, they would be able to use their discretion."

"I see. Depend upon it, George, you are quite right in your suppositions."

"I think I am. The officers, finding that the spy does not return, will grow anxious. Perhaps they may send off one or two as scouts to learn intelligence, or they may abandon the inn altogether. In any case, however, I think we may manage to creep quietly in at the back premises, and, if there is no one about, saddle our horses and escape."

"We must go back, then, and see?"

"Yes. We will reconnoitre first."

"We have not very far to go, I think."

"No—only a few yards. Follow me, and I shall be able to take you to the back of the stables."

George Wild led the way, but before going to the back he walked past the front of the public-house, in order to see whether it presented its usual appearance. He was as much gratified as astonished to find that the house was completely shut up, and that all the lights were extinguished.

Feeling more confident in his ability to obtain possession of the horses, he crept round to the rear of the premises.

Here, also, all was dark.

Making signs to Jonathan to be as cautious and quiet as he could, George stole on tiptoe towards the door of the stable.

He opened it gently.

But no sooner did he cross the threshold than he found himself firmly grasped by some one.

"Now, guv'nor," he said—"quick—help me!"

Not in the least did he lose his presence of mind.

He struck his assailant a violent blow, and then seized him tightly by the throat.

By this means he prevented him from uttering a cry that would doubtless have brought others to his aid.

In the stable there was a dim light feebly burning, and by the aid of this scanty illumination it was perceived that Wild junior's antagonist was no other than the ostler.

He was short and wiry-looking, and apparently quite a youth.

But he was gifted with considerable strength, and therefore George had much difficulty in obtaining the mastery.

But he managed to force the ostler back until he was close to the wall, and then, increasing the pressure on his throat, he shook him violently backwards and forwards, each time knocking his head with great violence against the wall.

The blows had a very alarming sound, but the ostler had a thick, hard skull, and withstood the effects of them astonishingly.

But in a few seconds he succumbed to the combined effects of them, and the combined effects of the pressure of Wild junior's fingers on his throat.

His hands gradually relaxed, and then he let his arms fall to his side, for he was powerless.

"Confound him!" said George. "What a trouble he has been! However, I won't hurt him, poor fellow, as he has done us no harm. Open that box, guv'nor—we will put him inside out of the way."

The box to which Wild junior alluded was a good-sized corn-bin.

Jonathan raised the lid, and immediately afterwards the unfortunate ostler was flung into it.

Already he showed signs of returning animation, so George hastily shut down the lid, and secured it by the hasp and staple with which it was furnished.

"There," he said—"he's all right. Now, guv'nor, the horses!"

Jonathan had not taken any part in this fray.

He not only saw that his son had only one antagonist to contend with, but also that he was a slim, thin fellow, who would doubtless be easily overcome.

Instead of interfering in this conflict he did the very best thing he could under such circumstances.

This was to run to the horses and begin to put on the saddles and bridles.

He had almost finished when George called to him to open the corn-bin.

He returned to his work immediately afterwards, and when the lid was secured and George turned round he saw that with the exception of a few buckles the process of harnessing the horses was quite complete.

Jonathan had indeed made the best use of his time.

"Now, guv'nor," he said, "I should think it's very likely that some of the police officers are waiting in the house."

"What makes you think that?"

"Why, if we had returned, and found the house shut up, they might have calculated that it would allay any suspicions we might have. The ostler was evidently told to watch for our arrival, and to raise the alarm if we attempted to enter the stable. That we have stopped; and if we can only manage to get away silently and unheard, we shall do very well indeed."

"But how is it to be done?"

"That's just the point. If we lead the horses ever so gently across the yard, their shoes must make a clatter on those confounded stones, the officers would hear it, and then they would be after us in no time."

"But we should have the start," said Jonathan. "Come—come, be quick—the risk must be run!"

"Not at all," replied George—"not at all! I will tell you how we can get off without making the least sound, or without the officers being aware of our departure even if they should be listening for it."

"How—how?"

"Why, we will bind up the horses' feet with these haybands. Take one, and imitate my example."

"Capital," said Jonathan—"capital! That's a good thought of yours—a very good thought! We shall be able to get clear off unheard beyond all doubt."

"Of course we shall!" said George. "But make haste!"

CHAPTER DCLXXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD HAS A STARTLING AND TERRIBLE DREAM.

WILD junior set about binding up his horse's feet in a very scientific manner.

Jonathan watched him, and followed his example.

Behind the stable door were several haybands, and in a few moments the horses' feet were so well incased in these that they would be able to walk quite noiselessly.

"Now, then, guv'nor," said George, "we'd better mount inside the stable—you can bend your head and ride out easy enough. Now, then—quick!"

This order was obeyed.

George Wild placed the door ajar, so that when he was mounted he could open it easily.

"Are you ready, guv'nor?" he said.

"Yes, quite ready."

"Then follow me."

He flung open the door as he spoke, and crossed the yard at a rapid rate.

In some way or other one of the bandages got loose, and the consequence was that a sharp, clattering sound broke upon the silence.

Wild junior uttered a curse.

"Come on!" he said. "We are found out now to a certainty!"

He clapped spurs to his steed while he spoke, and so did Jonathan.

They rode full speed out of the yard into the street.

There was an immediate uproar.

The back door of the inn was instantly thrown open, and several police officers appeared.

They rushed out into the yard, but were too late to accomplish their purpose.

The two villains had gone, and they could only hear the dull strokes of their horses' feet in the distance.

The rage of the police may be imagined, and it was under the influence of their angry passions that they saddled their horses and rode off in pursuit, though, had they given the matter a little calm consideration, they might have known that it would have been totally impossible to effect a capture.

"That was what I call a narrow squeak, guv'nor," said George, as, finding they were free from all pursuit, he gently pulled in his horse. "There's no occasion to break your neck now, guv'nor; we are out of danger."

"It was a narrow escape!" Jonathan replied. "And where shall we go now, George?"

"Well, we will think a little. In the first place, we ought to consider ourselves very lucky indeed in having obtained possession of our horses with so little trouble."

"I do; but I mean, what is to be our next step?"

"It can't be very far from morning, guv'nor. Suppose we wait about where we are for a time, keeping quiet, and then, when it is fairly daylight, we will obtain a paper. I have not lost all hope yet."

Jonathan shook his head.

"Well, you may have done so—I don't dispute it."

"I have, George. It will be very dangerous to attempt to obtain a paper, and I really do not think it will be worth while to encounter that danger."

"I do; it is most important that we should know for certain one way or the other. However, yonder seems to be a building of some sort. Let us conceal ourselves there, and wait till morning."

Wild and his son were then on the outskirts of London, and the building he pointed to was either a house that was partially built, or else one that was falling to decay; which of the two it might be could not be ascertained in the darkness.

Towards this building, however, they made their way.

"It's a ruin, guv'nor," said George. "I suppose the people lived in it as long as they could, and then ran away for fear it should tumble about their ears."

"Will it be safe to enter?"

"Oh yes—come on; I'm not afraid."

George entered the house boldly, though certainly it required no inconsiderable amount of courage to do so.

The whole place seemed in a frightfully dilapidated state, and as though it would require only the least thing in the world to bring down the edifice with a tremendous crash.

The horses were led in and secured to some upright posts of timber that had been used to support the floor above.

Then Wild and his son flung themselves down upon the floor, resolved to wait till morning.

At last, to their infinite satisfaction, the sun rose.

George Wild went to the door of the ruined house and looked around him.

He saw no one, nor was there a single habitation in sight.

"We're snug enough here, guv'nor," he cried; "we've only to wait a little longer, and then we will start for London. It's no good starting at present, I am sure."

"It's not worth while to run such a fearful risk," said Jonathan; "the more I think of it the more sure do I feel."

"I don't care how you feel, guv'nor. I've made up my mind to this course, and let what will be the consequence, I will adopt it."

"Well, then, I refuse."

"You refuse?"

"Yes."

"Well, you are welcome to do so. I don't want you to come with me—in fact, now I give the subject a second thought, I feel sure that I shall be more likely to succeed, and certainly be much safer if I am alone. You stop here where you are, guv'nor, and wait till I come back."

This proposition was scarcely agreeable to Jonathan, for there was nothing he disliked so much as being left entirely alone. Any society, no matter what, was preferable to solitude.

But now that George had taken this idea in his head he would not be turned from it—he clung to it with his characteristic pertinacity.

When the time came for him to set out, Jonathan anxiously entreated him to allow him to go too.

But George was inexorable.

"No, no," he said—"it would only be to redouble the danger and the chances of detection."

"I can't see that."

"But I can, and that's much more to the point. The officers now know that we are together, and will be looking for the pair of us, therefore it is clear that one will stand a much better chance of escaping undetected than the two."

But Jonathan would not be convinced.

George, however, firmly refused to take him.

"Stay here," he said—"you will be perfectly safe—no one will come near to disturb you. I shall not be long away, and when I return I shall bring the paper with me."

Once more enveloping himself in his large cloak, George Wild took his seat on the back of his steed and rode away.

Jonathan watched him with wishful eyes, and longed to set out too.

It may seem strange that he did not gratify this inclination, but George had assumed great power and mastery over him, so that he shrank from setting him at defiance.

Oh! what a miserable time it was for him while his son was absent.

The day wore on, the sun rose higher and higher in the sky, but yet he perceived no signs of his return.

Once or twice, when looking from the doorway, Jonathan had seen people moving about, and their appearance alarmed him.

No one, however, came near his hiding-place.

For some reason all seemed to shun it.

Jonathan looked round and round at the crumbling, decaying walls, and wondered how it was that the place was thus left to decay.

Nothing that he had seen was calculated to afford him any information on this subject.

At length, worn out with speculations and with watching, he sank back upon the flooring, and fell fast asleep.

At first it was the sleep of sheer fatigue, but as soon as nature had to some extent refreshed herself, his brain began to work.

Then the most horrible visions and dreams that could possibly be conceived flitted before the mind of Jonathan Wild.

What he endured under these circumstances can never be described.

But could it have been known what his feelings were, all would have considered that such sleepless visitations were almost sufficient punishment for all he had done.

He writhed about in his sleep upon the floor of the ruined house, for then he was dreaming that he was attacked by an overwhelming force of police officers, and that he was struggling frantically and furiously with them, but to no effect.

Large drops of perspiration coursed down his face, brought forth by the tremendous exertions he was compelled to make.

He groaned fearfully, and his struggles grew fainter and fainter.

He felt himself being gradually overpowered—the officers were gaining the victory.

Then he was bound securely with many thongs, and taken back to his old quarters in Newgate.

Everything was so vivid that it was not possible to conceive it to be anything but stern reality.

Then Jonathan was so familiar with Newgate and with all that was done to convicted felons, that, in imagination, he was easily able to go through it all.

He was taken from the condemned cell to the press-yard, and there he was pinioned.

Then placed in the cart, and the ride to Tyburn commenced.

He could see the thousands of faces on both sides of him.

He could hear their yells and imprecations upon him.

Then, last of all, he could see the triple tree at Tyburn.

He was taken beneath it, and then the hangman shook him roughly to make him stand upon his feet while the noose was adjusted round his neck.

But at the last awful moment Jonathan thought he would make a struggle for his life.

He grappled with the hangman, and the two swayed backwards and forwards in the cart.

Then Jonathan experienced some sharp blows, causing him exquisite pain.

Then a voice cried loudly in his ears:

"Get up, you d—d old fool—get up! What are you fighting on the ground like that for?—get up! Oh! you won't?—then take that, d—n you!"

CHAPTER DCLXXXVII.

WILD JUNIOR AND JONATHAN STILL CLING TO THEIR SCHEME IN THE HOPE OF BEING ABLE TO OBTAIN A FREE PARDON.

JONATHAN WILD awoke.

He opened his eyes and looked up.

Then he saw standing over him the form of his son George.

"Oh! the last kick did the business, guv'nor, did it? Well, now then, sit up. What's the matter?"

Jonathan slowly raised himself to a sitting posture.

His dreams were mixed up with realities, and for a moment or so he could scarcely separate one from the other.

"What's the matter with you?" said his son again, impatiently. "D—n me, if I don't believe you have gone mad at last! I always thought you would some day or other!"

"No, no—George! I'm not mad—I'm all right now!"

"Well, I'll be d—d if you look as if you were, that's all!"

"I am—I am!"

"Then get up!"

"In a moment, George—but—but——"

"But what?"

"I have had such fearful dreams—frightful, horrible dreams!"

"Bah!—stuff!"

"But I tell you I have, George. If you could form any idea of what they were like, you would not speak in that contemptuous fashion—nothing could be more terrible. In my sleep I have died a thousand deaths!"

"More fool you, then!" was the consolation his son gave him. "Why don't you keep awake?"

"I got tired of waiting for you. But the result, George—ah! now I recollect!—what's the result?"

Wild junior, instead of replying, broke forth into a torrent of the most frightful oaths and imprecations.

In this accomplishment he even rivalled his worthy parent.

"I thought as much," said Jonathan—"I thought as much."

"I know you did, you old croaker!"

"And you saw a paper?"

"Yes, d—n it, and it very nearly cost me my life! I bought one, but was recognised, and I had to fly for my life. However, it's not a bit of good talking about that; you see I am here, safe and sound, so that must be sufficient."

"And no notice was taken of my letter?"

"Oh yes, there was!"

"What notice?"

"Why, not the kind you expect—I can assure you of that."

"What then?"

"Why, there was a large advertisement in it, doubling the reward that you saw was offered for us. It was equally divided—five hundred for me and five hundred for you."

"Did you read it at all?"

"Not I. I flung the paper away in disgust. A few lines at the bottom did, however, catch my eye."

"And what were they?"

"To this effect, that the authorities had very good grounds for supposing and believing that we were both concealed somewhere in London, and urging the police officers to make diligent search after us."

"Then we will disappoint them," said Jonathan. "Let us ride off at once."

"We will directly, but we may as well wait a little longer."

"No, no—at once—now, at once!"

"Not just at present. Look here, guv'nor—see what I have brought!"

George produced a small packet of provisions.

Jonathan looked at them hungrily.

"Where did you get these?" he asked.

"Never mind where I got them,—they are here, and let that content you."

"I am very hungry."

"So am I—I have eaten nothing since I left you. We will just devour this, and then off we go."

It was only a small packet that Wild junior had brought, and therefore it quickly disappeared.

"Now, George," said Jonathan, "which way shall we turn our steps now?—what shall we do?"

"I have been thinking about that, guv'nor, all the way back, and I have come to a conclusion."

"What is it? Let me hear it."

"The conclusion is, that the reason why no notice was taken of your letter was really because they do not believe in the truth of the statements made in it."

"I have thought that myself."

"Oh, have you? Well, now you see the disadvantage of being an infernal liar. You speak the truth, and, as a matter of course, you are not believed."

"But do you think that if they had believed it it would have made any difference?"

"Yes, certainly it would, and for that reason I don't feel inclined to abandon our project."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, we have failed at present, but yet we have only failed partially, not utterly."

"I can't understand you."

"You will in a moment. The means we have tried have failed, but yet I fancy that if we are speedy and resolute there yet remains the means which we first decided upon."

"Do you mean the capture of the Pretender?"

"I do. If we can get back to the farm-house before he leaves it, I think we shall stand a very good chance of achieving our purpose."

"How so?"

"We must be on the watch, and no doubt some opportunity will present itself of which we can make use. If we can once seize upon him we will drag him away, and bring him in triumph to London. Then when we have really and truly surrendered him to the authorities, and when it is known that we, by ourselves, captured him, the Government, instead of giving us the reward in money that is offered for anyone who will make the Pretender prisoner, will pardon us."

"There does seem great plausibility in what you say, George, so far as I can judge. I feel certain that the Government will pardon us, or anyone else, no matter what they may have done, who could bring the Pretender a prisoner."

"Yes—that would cancel everything," said George. "The King, I am sure, is only anxious to find some pretext for keeping him safe prisoner in the Tower. This would give him good grounds for such a course, and when the head of the Jacobites was under lock and key, he would cease to feel those alarms that now so much disturb him."

"Well, we will try it, George," said Jonathan, with a little of his old energy perceptible in his manner. "We can but fail after all, and if we do we cannot make our position worse than it is at present."

"True. That's the way I want you to look at it, guv'nor. In this affair we have nothing to lose but everything to gain, so let us use our utmost exertions to win."

"We will—we will, George. I will back you up in everything."

"If you do—if you are half so bold, and courageous, and resolute as you used to be in former times, we shall certainly capture this Charles Stuart. We will make a triumphant entry into London then, guv'nor, and you will once more take up your quarters in Newgate Street."

"No, no—not there," said Jonathan, hastily, in whose ears the very name of Newgate now had a most unpleasant sound—"not there!"

"Well, in any other part of London you may think proper. I am not going to dispute with you about it."

"Let us start, George," said Jonathan. "I am all impatience to commence this undertaking! Come on!"

"I am ready. I have every hope of success, and while that hope continues all will be well."

"But, George, should we be disappointed—should things turn out differently to the way we expect, the disappointment will be more than I can bear."

"Pooh!—rubbish! Don't think about disappointment or failure; keep nothing but success in view!"

"You are right, George—and I will do so. Are you ready?"

"Quite ready. It seems to be growing dark at an earlier hour than usual this evening, as though nature would favour us in what we have to do. Every half-hour is of importance now."

"Yes, yes! Do not hesitate any longer, George—forward—forward!"

Wild junior was as much surprised as he was pleased to find that Jonathan was so impatient and determined.

Without further delay they rode out of the ruined house, and took their way as nearly as possible in a straight line to the place they wished to reach.

A very long ride was before them, but yet they thought nothing of that.

They had good horses under them that were well fitted to perform such a journey.

"Take it easy at first, guv'nor," said George, as he perceived Jonathan spurring his horse violently—"take it easy at first—we shall gain time in the end!"

"I ought to know that," said Jonathan, tightening the rein—"but I am so impatient—so anxious."

"I know you are, guv'nor, and believe me I rejoice to see it."

At a rapid rate, yet without particularly distressing their horses, Wild and his son continued their journey.

They rode on almost without stopping until sunrise the next morning.

The horses then began to show great signs of exhaustion and fatigue.

The only time when they had allowed them to diminish their speed was when ascending a hill of more than usual steepness.

Upon gaining the summit, they had allowed them to stand for a few moments to recover wind a little, and then they had urged them to the top of their speed again.

Just about the time when the business of the day was commencing, they reached a small public-house, for in those days wayside inns were much more plentiful than they are now, and did a much better business.

From the remote nature of this dwelling, Jonathan and his son both thought that they should be in little danger of detection.

Assuming a swaggering and important air, they asked whether they could be accommodated for a few hours.

Of course a reply in the affirmative was given them.

Their horses were stabled, and they were shown into a tolerably-well furnished room.

Here refreshments were placed before them.

"We won't ask for a bed, guv'nor," said George, "although we are so weary; there's a sofa yonder—lie down on that for an hour or so and get a little sleep; I will watch the while, and then have a nap afterwards."

"No, no, George—you sleep and I will watch; believe me, I tremble with dread at the bare idea of having to close my eyes again. What I suffered in my last dream I could not possibly express."

"Well, well—just as you like, guv'nor. I paid you the compliment of asking you first. I think I am more entitled to rest than you, for I have had no sleep at all since we left the inn in London."

So saying, Wild junior flung himself at full length on the sofa he had mentioned, and, after several times enjoining Jonathan to keep a good watch, and on no account to close his eyes, he sank off into a profound slumber.

CHAPTER DCLXXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON SET OUT FOR THE FARM-HOUSE.

GEORGE WILD was allowed to slumber peacefully for several hours—that is, till he awoke.

He stared around him.

Jonathan was seated near the window, anxiously looking out, but yet in such a position that he could not be seen by anyone outside.

"Hallo!" said George. "Anything amiss, guv'nor?"

"No—nothing."

"That's right! Now take your turn, and when it is dark we will start."

"Let us go now."

"No—you must wait rest. Besides, it will not be safe for us to travel in the daytime."

Jonathan threw himself on the couch which his son had just quitted.

He was afraid to sleep.

After awhile, however, his eyes closed unconsciously.

The two villains were fortunate in the place they had selected for their halt.

It was in a very retired situation, and though Wild junior sat at the window for several hours, he saw no one.

The inmates of the dwelling evidently did not suspect their character.

All was well.

On this occasion, those dreams which made sleep a terror to Jonathan did not fail to exert their influence.

To such a pitch did they eventually reach that he writhed and groaned like one in great agony.

[JONATHAN WILL AND HIS SON WATCHING THE CONSPIRATORS.]

His son sat for some time watching him with curious eyes.

At length, however, he arose and shook Jonathan violently.

"Wake up," he said—"wake up, and don't make that d—d row any longer! You will frighten all the people in the house! It's enough to make them think some one is murdering you!"

Jonathan gazed about him vacantly for a moment or two.

He was unable to realise exactly where he was.

At last his recollection returned to him.

He said:

"Thanks—thanks, George—a thousand thanks for arousing me from that dreadful slumber! What I suffered you cannot by any possibility imagine! It was fearful!"

And Jonathan shuddered at the remembrance.

No. 146.—BLUESKIN.

"You must be in a nice state of mind, guv'nor."

"I am—I am! I shall never dare to close my eyes again! If you see me falling off into a slumber, let me implore you to arouse me, and save me from this torment!"

"But you must sleep, guv'nor—you must sleep!"

Jonathan knew this, and his head was racked by a violent pain.

He clasped his hands over his temples, and fell back again upon the sofa, and then such a feeling of unutterable wretchedness and misery came over him that he wished his career on earth would come to a termination.

This state of mind did not last long, however.

Springing up, he cried:

"It's brandy I want, George—burnt brandy! I have not had enough of it lately, and that's why my system is out of order. Brandy—brandy!"

"Well, don't make such a row about it, guv'nor. I will call the landlord."

The landlord was accordingly summoned, and brandy brought.

Jonathan had not the patience on this occasion to put into practice his favourite process, but he drank off the brandy just as it was.

The quantity he swallowed made even his son stare.

Then Jonathan drew a long breath.

"Ah," he said, "I feel better now—much better!"

"I shouldn't wonder," said George.

"I do—I do! I feel fresh life and strength within me!"

"Well, I tell you what it is—I could never have believed that you or anyone else could drink so much raw brandy at one draught. It was enough to kill you!"

"No," said Wild—"I was low-spirited, and this has put me right. How long will it be before it is dark enough for us to start?"

"Not long now," said George—"in fact, I think, as it is growing dark, we might venture to start at once."

"Come on, then!" said Wild, in a loud voice, for the brandy seemed to have imparted to him a great deal of his original courage and resolution.

"Don't make a row," said George. "We may as well be quiet. This inn is in such a lonely spot that I question whether we shall see anyone until long after we have left it behind us."

"Let us call the landlord and have the horses got ready."

This was done, and in a quarter of an hour afterwards Wild and his son were again in the saddle, galloping towards the farm-house in which the unfortunate Charles Stuart had taken refuge.

Such good speed did they make that they arrived at their destination while the night was yet young.

They halted a considerable distance from the farm-house, being fully impressed with the necessity of advancing with the greatest caution.

It was probable that sentries had been posted in different places, in order to give warning in case anything of an unusual character should occur.

But they were by no means certain that the prince was still there.

He might by this time have changed his quarters.

Wild and his son left their horses in a little plantation.

Plenty of grass was growing around, so that they would be all right so far as that was concerned.

They were secured by one rein to the branch of a tree, so as to prevent them from straying away.

Then, cautiously and on foot, Wild and his son crept towards the farm.

The night was dark and inclined to be stormy.

The wind, that blew in sudden and fitful gusts, was sufficient to drown any ordinary sound.

They concealed themselves by creeping forward almost on their hands and knees.

Their progress was slow, but it was sure.

Finally, having reached some of the outbuildings belonging to the farm, they stopped to reconnoitre.

A sound resembling that produced by footsteps had struck upon their ears, and they were anxious to learn who it was that was near them.

Stepping forward on tiptoe, they peeped round the angle of the building, and then perceived the figures of several men standing together in a group.

In the darkness they were scarcely visible, but Wild and his son both had keen eyes, and they distinguished them tolerably well.

These men were evidently holding a consultation with each other, but the two listeners could form no idea whatever of its character, for they spoke in such low tones that not even the murmur of their voices reached them.

To have attempted to approach any nearer would have been highly dangerous, so they were forced to content themselves with remaining where they were.

The figure of one man, who seemed to take a prominent part in the discussion, appeared familiar to Wild junior, and he was not long in recognising it as that of the man who was in charge of the whole expedition.

"It would be a bad thing if they saw us lurking about here, guv'nor," he said. "We must be particularly careful, for if they found us they would most certainly put an end to our lives."

"Yes," said Jonathan; "but don't speak, for fear some one may be near enough to overhear you."

"A very good caution, guv'nor; but I wish I could make out what those fellows yonder are talking about."

"It is impossible. We must content ourselves by watching their movements."

The conference, whatever it was about, lasted for a long time—so long as to try the patience of the two eavesdroppers considerably.

Judging from the gestures made use of by them, they were unable to come to a decision upon some important point.

But eventually this was decided, and, shaking hands with each other, they separated.

About half of them struck across the fields, and the remainder bent their steps in the direction of the farm-house.

This was only a few yards distant from where Wild and his son were concealed, and, in fact, if they had gone round the angle of the building, a dozen steps would have taken them to the door at which they first solicited admittance.

George watched the men as far as he could, and then, turning to Jonathan, he said:

"It's pretty clear that the prince is still concealing himself in this place."

"Yes," said Jonathan, "there is no doubt of that, and you may depend the reason why he is doing so is that those who promised to come forward and assist him have failed to do so."

"That's about it, guv'nor, and I should not be surprised to see him make his way with all speed to Ostend again. I think it far more likely he would do that than advance towards London. In either case, we must try our best to make him prisoner."

"If we can only accomplish that, and carry him to London, we shall be able to dictate our own terms."

"Yes, guv'nor, if we can only accomplish that we shall be all right."

"Quite right; but come a little closer. Now that these men have gone, there is no longer the necessity to remain just here."

"Where would you go?"

"Follow me round this corner. I think then we shall be able to watch the house itself."

This was done, and for some moments Wild and his son stood gazing at the farm-house in silence.

"It's a difficult job, guv'nor, that we have set ourselves, and now we are on the ground I can scarcely see how it is to be done."

"Think—think."

"Yes, it's all very fine to say that, but, you see, we dare not show our faces to anyone here. If we did, they would be down upon us as traitors."

"True."

"Well, then, let me ask you, what chance have we of getting near to the prince at all?"

"He will have a body-guard around him, doubtless, for the greater part of the time, but then, when he retires to rest—"

"Yes, I should say he would be alone then."

"Of course he would, but then there's one little difficulty in the way of that."

"What is it?"

"How are we to find out which room he occupies?"

"Well, it must be done somehow. If we could only find him in his bedchamber alone, and enter it unheard and unseen, we would threaten him, and compel him to follow us quietly."

"I like the plan. I confess I like the plan."

There was some further discussion on this topic, and then they observed lights flitting about in the upper part of the farm-house.

This seemed to show that the inhabitants were retiring for the night.

In the hope that such was the case, Wild and his son fixed their eyes intently upon the windows.

Half an hour elapsed, and at the end of that time nearly all the lights had been extinguished.

"Now, guv'nor," said Wild junior, "this is the chance to try our luck. Do you see that kind of wooden gallery yonder?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, we must climb up into that; we shall then be able to peep into several rooms, and perhaps we shall find the one that we want."

"I hope so."

"Come, then—follow me quietly and cautiously. I am pretty certain there are no sentinels about to observe our movements."

Like shadows, Wild and his son crept along towards the east front of the farm-house.

Along this ran a kind of balcony or gallery.

It was very rude in its construction, and was perhaps intended more for ornament than use.

The woodwork of which it was composed was of curious shape, and it was overgrown by various kinds of climbing plants.

It was the easiest matter in the world to climb up on to such a balcony as this.

The only fear was whether it had been made strong enough to sustain the weight of two men.

That could only be decided by the actual experiment.

George felt nervous as he found the woodwork creak beneath his weight.

He climbed up with great agility, however, and then stood on the flat roof above.

Jonathan ascended next.

The wood cracked several times, but yet not alarmingly, and it was scarcely likely that so slight a sound would be taken any notice of by those within.

George was able to render assistance to his father, and in a few seconds they were both crouching down upon the balcony and listening.

There was a window close to them on their left hand, and through this they at length ventured to peep.

A dim light was burning in this room, and by the aid of it they saw the figure of a man seated in a chair that was drawn up close before the fire.

His face was buried in his hands, and, from his immovable position, he was either asleep or else deeply plunged in meditation.

CHAPTER DCLXXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON FAIL IN THEIR ATTEMPT TO CAPTURE THE PRETENDER.

It was some moments before they could make out this figure distinctly, owing to the dimness of the light; in fact, there was no lamp, and the fire had burned low.

A little blaze would every now and then shoot up fitfully from the dark mass of embers, and it was only at these times that the two watchers could see.

They made out, however, that this person was attired richly, although plainly.

They could see the sparkle of several jewels about his person, and at length they came to the conclusion that it must be no other than Charles Stuart that they beheld.

His attitude and manner seemed to favour this idea.

He looked like one in deep grief and sorrow.

Perhaps he was thinking how all his hopes had been dashed to the ground, for this enterprise, of which he had been led to think much, had turned out an utter failure.

He could no longer disguise the fact from his mind, and but for the obstinacy of his adherents he would have made all speed to the coast and put off to sea again.

After gazing for some time, George touched Jonathan upon the arm and retreated to a little distance.

"Guv'nor," he said, "that's the Pretender—I am sure of it."

"I think so," said Jonathan.

"Yes, yes—I am sure of it. Fortune favours us in a most extraordinary manner. One bold stroke, and our object is achieved."

"But how is that bold stroke to be taken?"

"We must endeavour to enter the room unseen. If we can only pounce suddenly upon him, the sight of a pistol will prevent him from giving the alarm."

"Very likely."

"I am sure of it. Get your weapons ready, and be prepared to follow me."

George Wild again crept back to the window.

Peeping through, he saw that the man still occupied the same position.

A difficult portion of his work was now before him.

Could he open the window so noiselessly as not to attract the attention of the inmate of the room?

George took a small knife from his pocket and resolved to try.

The gusty wind of which we have already spoken now greatly increased in vehemence, and it howled round the farm-house in such a manner as to make it difficult to hear anything else.

With the blade of this knife George gently bent back the lead in which the panes of glass were fixed.

Then taking hold of the piece of glass itself, he gently drew it out.

So very silent had he been in doing this that not the least alarm had been given.

The figure was still sitting before the fire, and doubtless it would require a very loud sound indeed to arouse him from his abstraction.

Now that this pane was removed, it was perfectly easy for George Wild to introduce his hand and arm.

The fastening of the window was close by.

It was of simple construction, being nothing else than a button.

This he turned gently and slowly round.

He slowly withdrew his hand.

All he had to do then was to open the window as gently and silently as he could.

Inch by inch he pushed it open, and then with a sudden dash he sprang into the room and placed a pistol at the head of the figure.

"One word," he said, "one movement, and I fire—nothing can save you!"

The man removed his hands from his face and looked about him vacantly.

He had evidently been sleeping, not thinking.

"Come," said George—"rise—follow us—resist at your peril!"

Jonathan placed himself on the other side and pointed another pistol.

"What do you wish with me?" he asked, quietly—"who are you?"

The sound of the voice gave George a very uncomfortable sensation.

He kicked the fire with his foot and caused it to blaze up brightly.

Then he saw that the person he had seized was not the prince, though probably he was one of his followers.

An expression of great disappointment came over both Wild and his son upon making this discovery, and the man took the utmost advantage of it.

With a sudden movement he sprang aside, and then, perceiving that the window was open, rushed out upon the balcony before they could prevent him.

"Help—help!" he cried, in loud and startling tones.

"Treachery—treachery!"

There was an immediate uproar.

"Curse it!" said George, "we have failed, and we shall have to fly! It is no good—to remain here any longer would be madness! Come, follow me!"

He rushed to the window as he spoke, and lowered himself down from the balcony in a manner that made it appear as though he was perfectly reckless as to personal consequences.

Jonathan followed him, but not so quickly.

Scarcely did they reach the ground, however, before they found that the whole of the farm-house was in a perfect uproar.

Lights were flashing in all directions, and several people hastily attired rushed out upon the balcony, wondering what was the matter.

"There they go—there they go!" cried the one who had given the alarm. "Pursue them—pursue them! Their intention is to assassinate the prince!"

A shout of rage and execration followed this announcement.

Rapidly descending from the balcony, a considerable number of the prince's attendants commenced a pursuit.

But Wild and his son had already got a good start, which, under those circumstances, was a great advantage.

Convinced that there was no longer any hope of accomplishing their purpose, they ran with might and main towards the spot where they had left their horses.

If they could only manage to gain them without being overtaken they could bid their pursuers defiance. But a dense throng came hurrying after them.

Not only were their breasts filled with a desire to have vengeance upon those who had sought to assassinate their prince, but they were also anxious to overtake them because of the fear that they would betray them to the Government.

But Wild and his son knew that they were running for their lives, and therefore made incredible exertions.

They maintained the advantage they had gained at first, and at length, panting for breath, they plunged among the trees.

So well had they noted the spot where they had left their steeds that they made their way in a direct line to the exact spot.

To unfasten the rein and to mount was but the work of a moment.

Then they started off at a terrific gallop that soon left the farm-house and the Pretender's followers far behind.

When they found that they were no longer in the least danger of pursuit, Wild and his son pulled up their horses, and for several moments indulged in some violent language.

After this explosion their wrath cooled down a great deal.

"Lost!" said Jonathan—"that chance now is wholly and entirely lost! We shall never indulge in that hope again—we shall never have so good an opportunity of obtaining a pardon!"

"I don't agree with you, guv'nor," said George—"all is not lost yet. We will keep close to these Jacobites, and if any favourable opportunity occurs we will avail ourselves of it."

"No, no—let us give up the scheme at once!"

"But why should we? It's worth while to make an effort. After this discovery, they will, of course, make direct for the sea-shore and get on board. When once upon the water they will be beyond our reach, but until then we will be on the watch."

"It's a forlorn hope, George."

"Well, it may be, but yet it is a hope. There's a chance that we may yet succeed in our design, and if so, why, then our triumph will be all the greater."

Jonathan shook his head despondingly.

"Don't give up, guv'nor. I mean to keep up my heart to the last, for I know what a good thing this will be to us."

"What will be your next movement?"

"Why, to retrace our steps, as far as may be prudent. We will watch the farm-house, and see whether the prince and his followers leave it."

"There can be no danger in doing that."

"None whatever."

"Come on, then, or perhaps they may get too great a start of us."

They turned their horses' heads round, and once more advanced to the farm-house.

Their pursuers, finding they had horses, had given up the pursuit entirely.

They had by this time reached the farm-house again.

After going as far as they thought was prudent, Wild and his son paused to make their observations.

By the manner in which the house was illuminated, they could tell that considerable excitement was going on within.

Then, in a short time, they heard the trampling of horses' feet.

"I was right!" said George. "Look—they are beginning their flight already!"

"How soon!"

"Yes, they are thoroughly alarmed, and the kingdom will hear no more about this conspiracy without we should happen to succeed in capturing the Pretender."

From where they stood, they saw the dark forms of men and horses moving rapidly about, and then, after a brief delay, quite a large troop was mustered.

Then they all set forward in an irregular, straggling line.

As soon as they started, Wild and his son started too.

They followed as closely in the rear as they dared, and continued to do so until daybreak.

Then they perceived that the prince was riding in the centre, and that all the others were clustered around him.

Knowing that there was a plot to assassinate him, they were extremely vigilant and alert.

"I have a good mind to give it up, guv'nor, after all," said George, when he saw it. "The Pretender's fears are aroused, at any rate, and rely upon it he will take good care to keep as many of his followers round him as he possibly can."

"Yes," said Wild. "We might manage to pick him off with a bullet, and even that would be difficult."

"And not only that," said George, "but if we did it our purpose would not be answered."

"Not at all."

"Do you agree to abandon the enterprise, then?"

"Yes."

Jonathan sighed, for, in spite of what he had said, it seemed that up to that moment he had indulged in the hope of being able to succeed.

"What's to be done now?" he asked—"what shall be our next step?"

"I have already arranged that in my mind," said George.

"What is it?"

"Why, I hinted my purpose to you some time ago. We have another hold upon safety besides this one which has just failed us—a much better hold;—not one, perhaps, that would produce such good results as concerns ourselves, and yet in the end it might even be better."

"But what do you mean?" said Jonathan. "Why do you not speak out plainly?"

"Is it possible that you do not comprehend the meaning of my allusions? Of course, I refer to no other than the heiress. You remember now what I said? We will find out where she is—we will make her a prisoner, carry her off, and then we shall be able to dictate our own terms."

CHAPTER DCXC.

REVERTS TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD, AND RELATES WHAT BEFEL THEM IN THEIR SEARCH AFTER JONATHAN WILD.

We will now leave Jonathan and his son for awhile, as it is high time we returned to the proceedings of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

When we left them last was, as will be remembered, just when they came in sight of the empty house in which Jonathan had taken refuge, and in which such terrible events had occurred.

There was something in the appearance of this building that made them believe it would be just the place where Jonathan would try to hide himself from his pursuers.

Going there, however, they could glean no information whatever.

Their repeated peals upon the bell were totally disregarded.

"If there is no one here," said Jack, "who can give us information, it is scarcely worth while for us to enter."

"I don't know that," said Blueskin. "If the house, is as I take it, completely deserted, we might be able, by going in, to ascertain whether the villain had stayed in it or not."

"True; but assuming that he had, what clue would it give us?"

"Very little, certainly, and yet, who knows what we may find there that would throw light upon his doings?"

"Then you intend to enter?"

"Yes, certainly."

The gate opening into the grounds around the house to let was firmly secured.

They tried to force it open, but failed.

The walls were high and difficult to surmount.

Yet this was the only means by which they could hope to gain admittance to the interior.

After much difficulty, they succeeded in their object.

Though much against their will, they had to leave their horses outside while they carried on their investigations within.

They determined, however, that this should not occupy any more time than was absolutely requisite.

Passing through the deserted and long-neglected garden, they were surprised to perceive, first of all, that it had been trampled all over by heavy footsteps.

"They have been here, Jack," said Blueskin, "you may depend upon it! Look there!"

He pointed to the footprints.

"Yes, and a great many others, I should say, judging by the appearance of the ground. This seems more and more mysterious."

Following chiefly in these footprints, they arrived at length at the door leading into the house.

They began a rapid search, and the reader can tell without further description what was the nature of the discovery that awaited them there.

It was truly a fearful one, for the dead bodies had not been removed or touched in any way by the conspirators.

Indeed, when they found that their secret meeting-place was known, they abandoned it with all possible speed, and never ventured to go anywhere near it again.

"This is indeed evidence of Jonathan's handiwork," said Jack, as he looked at the dead bodies. "Wherever he goes he leaves slaughter behind him. When will his end be reached?"

"Soon, I hope, Jack—very soon. Such deeds as these are enough to make the whole country rise up against him."

Not satisfied with what they had seen, they continued their explorations until they had been all over the building.

Nothing of any note was seen, however, with the exception of that singular room that we have already described, in which the conspirators held that midnight meeting.

Then, coming into the open air again, which the two friends breathed with the greatest possible amount of pleasure and delight after the damp, stifling atmosphere in the house, Jack said:

"Beyond all doubt he has been here, and now the question is, which way did he go when he left?"

"That we must try to ascertain," said Blueskin. "To linger in this garden any longer will be quite useless. We will make our way back to our horses, and then, standing close to that door, through which Jonathan doubtless passed, we will endeavour to decide in our minds which would be the route he would most likely take."

"There is no need to climb over the wall again," said Jack; "from the inner side we can doubtless open the door."

"It is not worth while," said Blueskin—"it will be far better not to disturb the appearance of the place; we will leave it exactly as we have found it, without altering or touching anything. Come!"

Jack saw at once that this would be the best.

Trees were growing close to the wall in one place, so that it was by no means so difficult to climb over.

They lowered themselves down to the ground, remounted their horses, and then took their stand at the gate.

Then they looked all around them, and as they were on rather an elevated spot they commanded a somewhat extensive view.

Nothing, however, met their gaze save trees and fields, and for aught they could tell, Jonathan was just as likely to have gone in one direction as another.

"Chance only could guide us," said Blueskin—"there is nothing else that we can trust to. We will strike off in any direction you like, and ride on, and if, after going a reasonable distance, we hear nothing of him, we will retrace our steps and try again."

Under the circumstances, there was nothing better to be done, and so this arrangement was carried out.

At a rapid rate, they took their way across the country, and at random, but yet, nevertheless, preserving one certain direction.

But there were no habitations to be seen, and scarcely any travellers.

The latter they avoided, for fear of being recognised.

Therefore they obtained no information whatever, and towards the close of the day Blueskin pulled up as he said:

"I don't think it is worth while to go any further this way, Jack—we will try elsewhere."

"But we ought to have a rest; our horses require it as well as ourselves, and I am sick for want of food."

"If we could find some inn in this locality," said Blueskin, "we should be safe enough, beyond all doubt. We might stay there for an hour or two, and perchance learn something that will be useful."

"Then, by all means let us ride forward—that is our only hope of finding an inn, for, as you know well enough, there is nothing of the kind the way we have just come."

"No. Forward—forward! Surely in a mile or so we shall find what we require."

In this hope they rode forward, and they were not disappointed.

They came at length to a lonely inn—one that seemed just the place for safety.

"If Jonathan saw that inn," was Blueskin's remark, "he would certainly take shelter there. He could not pass such a place—he would see what a chance there was of his security."

Animated by the hope that they might, after all, learn something, they pressed forward at a more rapid rate.

They gave their horses into the charge of the ostler, and entered the inn.

So much good had resulted from taking a private room and then getting into conversation with the landlord, that they thought they could not do better than adopt the same mode of proceeding now.

Accordingly they did so, and Blueskin commenced his questions cautiously at first; but he soon found that the landlord was possessed of truly startling intelligence.

As the reader may perhaps guess, this inn was no other than the one where Wild had stopped, and where he had heard the story related respecting the haunted mill—the same public-house that he had afterwards robbed.

They were close to the mill where such terrible and exciting scenes had taken place, and at no great distance from the residence of the old miser.

All these facts, with which the reader, in following out the adventures of Jonathan Wild, has been made acquainted, were related to them, considerably exaggerated, it is true, but in the main correct.

They learned that the police officers had been summoned, and that a chase had been commenced after Jonathan Wild, with what result the landlord could not tell, for he had heard nothing of them since they took their departure.

As soon as they had heard all this, and found that they were so close upon the villain's track, Jack and Blueskin had great difficulty in restraining their impatience.

But they remained, making every inquiry they could think of, and when they were convinced they had learnt all, and not till then, they prepared to resume their journey.

In the meanwhile they had both partaken of a good meal, and their horses had been rested somewhat.

A longer halt would have been more comfortable for all; but so great was Blueskin and Jack's anxiety to renew the chase, that they knew it would be useless to attempt to sleep.

Accordingly they mounted their steeds and rode off, for they had been able to learn tolerably well the course the officers had taken.

They passed by the ruined mill, which was now no more than a heap of fragments, which would soon disappear altogether.

Upon this they could not help gazing for some moments, though they little knew all that had taken place around that spot.

For some hours they rode on continuously, only stopping at the various inns to make inquiries respecting the officers.

In every case they had information that they were on the road before them, and this urged them to increase their speed.

It is true that some considerable time had elapsed since the officers had been seen, but yet they hoped to come up with them.

No intelligence had spread abroad that either Wild or Noakes had been captured.

From this they concluded that the two villains were being chased from one place to another.

That they would be eventually captured they did not doubt.

When Jack and Blueskin should find themselves anywhere near the officers they were so anxious to overtake, they would have to act with great prudence and caution.

It was not likely that the reward offered for Blueskin had been forgotten, or that he would fail to be recognised by some of those officers; and as for Jack himself, it was most important that he should keep out of sight.

Both were thinking of all these things, but the subject was not mentioned by either.

For one thing, conversation would have been difficult; and again, they thought there was time enough in the future.

At length they learned at a wayside inn a rumour to the effect that Jonathan and Noakes had been captured by the sea-shore.

It was only a rumour, however, and a vague one, and they failed to obtain any particulars beyond the bare statement of the fact that the capture had been made.

They were inclined to doubt the truth of this good news, but there was only one way by which their doubts could be set at rest.

This was to push on with all speed for the place that had been mentioned, and this accordingly they did.

CHAPTER DCXCI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD AT LENGTH REACH THE SEA-SHORE.

As the reader must already be aware, it was no apparition that Jonathan Wild beheld that night when he peeped through the hedge.

It was Jack Sheppard himself, in flesh and blood.

Just at that time his horse, which was of much better quality than Blueskin's, had increased the distance between them to the extent of several yards.

Being plunged in deep meditation, Jack was some time before he observed this.

But at length making the discovery, he pulled up suddenly, and waited for Blueskin to regain his position at his side.

Little did Jack think that on the other side of the hedge was the man he was so anxious to make prisoner and hand over to justice.

But we have seen already what a terrible effect was produced upon Jonathan Wild by this apparition.

It gave such a shock to his whole system as he had never before experienced—in fact, his horror was so great that his senses entirely deserted him, and he fell back bereft of all motion.

The slight sound that he made falling down upon the grass was not sufficient to reach Jack Sheppard, although all around was so very silent.

Perhaps he really did hear it, slight as it was, but he would imagine it was produced by the rustling of the trees.

Could Jack only have known it, how easily he could have secured his great enemy!

He could have bound him without a struggle, and made quite sure of his being placed properly in the hands of the police officers.

But, as we know, it was not to be—Jonathan's race was not yet run.

In his own mind the villain felt that it was drawing to a close, but yet he struggled hard against the conviction, and tried his best to preserve his life and liberty.

Jack, moreover, did not expect to find Jonathan anywhere in that locality, but closer to the sea-beach.

In a moment after Jonathan had lost his consciousness, Blueskin came up.

"You are impatient, Jack," he said, "and I don't wonder at it. I am anxious myself, too; but at the same time I feel terribly fatigued."

"And so do I," said Jack, pressing his hand against his forehead. "Now that I have halted I seem overpowered by weakness."

"We must certainly rest somewhere," was Blueskin's answer, "and that before long."

"Let us endeavour to reach the coast first," said Jack. "Don't give up—surely it cannot be much further?"

"I should think not—perhaps only a few miles."

"If we have been correctly informed," said Jack, "it can't be any more than that."

"Oh! doubtless our information is correct enough, and I only hope the good news will be confirmed."

"So do I; we have the best of evidence how closely the officers have kept upon his track. Rely upon it, they will not rest until they have hunted him down."

"Forward, then—forward once more! We will ride on until we reach the next inn; we will then inquire how far it is to the coast, and if the distance is inconsiderable, we will continue on our way. On the other hand, should it be much further than we imagine, then we will rest."

This being agreed upon, they again urged onward their exhausted steeds.

The animals had indeed performed their part well; but they were even more worn out than their riders.

Nearly an hour elapsed before they arrived at the next inn.

Here they allowed the horses a little hay and water, but they did not dismount.

They were informed that the sea-coast was not more than five miles distant—it might be rather less.

Such a distance as this, after the long journey they had made, appeared the merest trifle.

Strangely enough, at this public-house they could hear nothing relative to Wild's capture, and therefore they began to feel more doubtful still.

A little while now would serve to set all their doubts at rest.

The horses, however, were so dreadfully tired that the remaining five miles were performed at a scarcely quicker rate than a walk.

At length, however, the roar of the waves, as they came rushing towards the shore, reached their ears.

It was now early morning, and by the aid of the rising sun they perceived a small collection of huts upon the beach.

Towards these, of course, they directed their horses' steps.

The place was so small as scarcely to deserve the name of village, and yet there was one house that was evidently used as a place of public entertainment.

It was a rudely-built place, standing at some distance from all the other habitations.

A dark, dilapidated, ruinous house, built for the most part of old timbers that had from time to time been washed up by the restless waves.

There was no sign showing it was a public-house; but, as a substitute, a wisp of straw had been hung out.

"That's the place," said Jack. "We shall learn all we want to know there, I'll warrant. We shall be able to rest ourselves and our horses' too."

"Yes," said Blueskin, "for let the intelligence we have heard be true or not, we cannot proceed any further without a long halt. I am thoroughly exhausted."

"So am I," said Jack. "We will stay here until our horses and ourselves are thoroughly refreshed."

The appearance of the two strangers attracted but little attention, for the inhabitants of the little huts seemed all asleep.

The door of the public-house, however, was standing open, and as soon as they halted before it a man came out.

A dark, evil, repulsive-looking man he was—one whose appearance harmonised well with the wretched building in which he dwelt.

"We shall stay here for a few hours," said Jack, "if you can accommodate us and our horses."

The man stood gazing at them for some time before he ventured to reply.

Then he said:

"Yes, gentlemen, you are welcome—quite welcome, though you will find this a very poor place to stay in."

"It will do for us," said Blueskin, as he slowly alighted.

"I am glad to hear it," said the man. "I will take the horses. Be good enough to walk indoors the while. You see, there is not much trade done, and I am obliged to be ostler and waiter and everything myself."

"I presume you are the landlord?"

"Yes; but go in. You will find the old woman indoors. She will give you what you require."

"No matter," said Jack; "we will follow you with the horses."

The man did not appear to receive this announcement with any amount of pleasure, yet he could not make any objection to such a proceeding.

Accordingly the two friends followed him, and saw their steeds properly fed and stabled.

Then they turned back to the inn, and seated themselves in a miserable, comfortless apartment, but yet the best of which the place could boast.

By this time they had managed to dispel much of the landlord's surliness.

He spoke to them much more freely than he had at first.

When they imagined he was inclined to be tolerably confidential, they began to speak about Jonathan Wild.

The man regarded them suspiciously and anxiously for a moment, and then gave them a long narrative.

He told them how a boat belonging to one of the villagers had been seized, and how Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes had put to sea in it, and how, after a lapse of some days, they had been driven back by the force of the storm close to the spot from which they had embarked.

He informed him also that the police officers, happening to reach the coast just at that moment, perceived them and made them prisoners as soon as they landed.

When they were assured that Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes had beyond all doubt been made prisoners by the police officers, Jack and Blueskin drew long breaths of relief.

It was an immense satisfaction for them to know that their once powerful enemy was now again in the grasp of justice.

The landlord entered into a circumstantial narrative of the whole affair, and what he said convinced his hearers that there could be no mistake either as regarded the facts or the identity of the prisoners.

Nothing better than fish was to be had in the shape of food, but they were hungry, and therefore they made an excellent meal.

A reaction now begun to set in.

The excitement which had kept both up for so long departed.

Fatigued as they were, they felt they could do nothing but fling themselves down somewhere and sleep.

Very many hours had indeed passed since they closed their eyes.

The landlord was called in, and he led them to a sleeping room on the ground floor of the building.

The accommodation here was more wretched than ever, but there was a rude apology for a bed, and they were so overtired that they were indisposed to find fault with anything.

The door was secured as well as the nature of the fastenings would permit, and then Blueskin said:

"I don't like the looks of this place at all, Jack—do you?"

"I do not."

"And I don't like the feel of it either. I have done nothing but shiver ever since I have been in it."

"It must be our fancy," said Jack. "And yet the landlord is about the most disagreeable-looking fellow that I have seen for many a long day."

"Hush! don't speak so loud. He may overhear us, and you may depend he would not take any such remark as that in good part."

"True. I don't like the idea, though tired as we are, of both going to sleep together. You don't know how soon danger may assail us, nor what form it may assume."

"We are safe here—don't feel afraid of that."

"It is best to be careful," said Blueskin. "Let us watch and sleep by turns. We will take short spells at first, and draw lots to decide who shall sleep first."

This was agreed to, and Blueskin had to keep watch.

"Now, Jack," he said, "sleep, and sleep soundly without fear. I will keep good guard all the while, and in an hour or so I will awake you, and you shall take my place."

Jack laid down on the bed, and so thoroughly was he overcome by exhaustion and fatigue that he closed his eyes and fell almost immediately into a sound sleep.

Blueskin sat upon the one chair there was in the room, and looked out of the window which commanded a view of the ocean.

But, strive as he would, he could not resist the influence of sleep.

He shook off the feeling several times, but at last it proved the conqueror.

Presently he slipped from the chair on to the floor, and there remained slumbering heavily, and insensible to everything that was going on around him.

CHAPTER DCXCII.

JACK SHEPPARD HAS A SINGULAR DREAM IN THE INN ON THE SEA-SHORE.

WHEN Jack Sheppard awoke, all around him was plunged in darkness.

He started up suddenly, like one alarmed.

He glanced around, and it was a minute or two before he could recollect just where he was and what had last happened to him.

The darkness surprised and puzzled him.

He could not believe that he had slumbered for so long a time.

In a low voice, he called upon his comrade.

But for some time there was no reply.

At length, Blueskin started up.

He also was confused, and he said:

"Why, Jack, I must have tumbled off to sleep myself without being aware of it."

"I don't wonder at it," was the reply. "We seem to have slept peacefully and safely, though had I known that you were not watching I could not have closed my eyes."

"It was wrong of me," said Blueskin, "but, as it happens, no harm has come from it."

"I think not. But, Blueskin—"

"What?"

"I have had a dream."

"A dream?" was the response, given with a start.

"Yes, a fearful, terrible dream—so vivid that even now I almost feel in doubt whether it is something I have been witnessing or merely a vision!"

"It is strange," said Blueskin, in an impressive voice, "but I, too, have dreamed!"

"A fearful dream?"

"Yes, terrible!"

"Hush!—don't speak so loud! Let me hear it."

"No, let me hear yours—you spoke first."

"As you like," said Jack. "Come closer to me, and listen."

Blueskin obeyed, and then, in a low tone, scarcely above a whisper, Jack said:

"I don't know how it was—I can't possibly recollect—but in my dream I all at once found myself watching the movements of a man. He was walking slowly and wearily along the same high-road we travelled yesterday, and was going towards the sea."

"He supported his steps by a stout stick, and on his back he carried something that looked like a large square basket, covered over with some black substance."

"What this contained I don't know, but I remember thinking that it could not be very heavy, because the man who carried it walked nearly upright."

"He perceived, at length, this very inn in which we now are. As soon as he saw it, he bent his steps towards it. He arrived, and was greeted by the landlord in a similar way to what we were."

"He entered, and called for some refreshment. That was placed before him."

"Then I thought, while the man sat making this meal, that it grew very dark and rainy."

"The pedlar—for such I took him to be, by the large pack he carried—looked out of the window, and, perceiving the aspect of the weather, shook his head."

"Just then the landlord entered, and I dreamt I heard him say:

"'We shall have a very dirty night, master, I can promise you; I know what it means when the wind begins to blow in that quarter.'"

"'Yes,' replied the pedlar, 'it will be rough weather.'"

"'Shall you continue your journey in spite of it?'"

"'I don't know,' was the reply. 'Can you find me a bed if I want one?'"

"'Oh, yes—certainly!'"

"Then I shall see presently. If the weather does not improve I shall stay all night."

"It will get worse instead of better," was the landlord's rejoinder, as he left the room.

"Then I saw the pedlar look anxiously and half-timidly all about him, and I saw him place his hands upon his breast in a peculiar manner, as though to satisfy himself that something he had concealed there was quite safe."

"He smiled, and put his hand inside his coat and drew out a large leather bag. He glanced around him apprehensively, but finding no one in sight, he untied the mouth of the bag and took from it one of the many gold coins that it contained."

"Then all at once I became aware that the landlord was peeping through a small window in a dark corner, watching every movement of the pedlar."

"When he saw the large bag of money, I perceived his eyes gleam ferociously, and his countenance was truly terrible to look on."

"The pedlar seemed greatly agitated, and hastened to conceal the bag again under his coat. Then he rapped upon the table with his knuckles, and in answer to the summons the landlord appeared."

"I shall stay here all night," said the pedlar—"the weather is too bad to go any further. Here—take for what I have had, and for the bed as well, as I shall want to leave early in the morning."

"Very good," said the landlord, as he gave him the change; "you can start away as early as you think proper, and if you like to go to bed now, the room is ready for you."

"Well, I will; I am very sleepy and tired—show me the way."

"The pedlar picked up his pack, and the landlord, observing the ease with which he lifted it, said:

"Your goods seem very light, master."

"They are," replied the pedlar, with a smile; "my pack is empty at present, but I hope to have it full in a day or two."

"You have come down here to make some purchases, then?" continued the landlord, with a peculiar smile.

"Yes, such is my intention."

"Ah! I understand," said the landlord, with a laugh. "You are going to buy silks, and lace, and things of that kind, and buy them free of duty," he added, with a smile. "There, don't make a fuss about it—I know how these things are managed. Tell me whose boat you expect. It won't be in to-night, that's certain."

"The pedlar hesitated, and then he answered:

"The fact is, I am expecting Derrick's boat."

"I know," said the landlord, with a nod—"he meant being here to-night, but I don't think he will. I know he has a rich cargo of silks and stuffs on board, and I suppose you are going to deal with him?"

"I shall try," said the pedlar. "If you hear anything of the boat arriving, let me know, because the sooner I am off with the goods the better."

"I will awake you," said the landlord—"don't feel afraid of that."

"The pedlar passed into this very room, where he was conducted by the landlord."

Upon reaching this point in his strange narrative, Jack trembled and shook.

He paused, and Blueskin said, in a hollow voice:

"It is very strange, Jack—very strange!"

"But the strangest has yet to come."

"I don't mean that—I don't mean that!"

"What then?"

"Why, all that you have told me is just what I have dreamt myself."

"You—you had the same dream?"

"Yes—every particular corresponds. You have told it well, Jack—you have left out nothing, except that you did not mention that the pedlar had a long, grizzly beard coming down to his breast, and that he wore a felt hat with a broad brim."

"That's proof conclusive," said Jack. "I didn't mention it, but such was the very appearance of the man."

"Is it not strange?"

"It is wonderful! But follow on: you tell the remainder of the dream, and I will see whether it corresponds with mine."

"I cannot."

"Cannot?"

"No, for just when I reached the point in my narrative where you have left off, I heard you calling upon me, and I awoke."

"Then you have been spared a knowledge of the worst—the remainder is dreadful."

"Go on, Jack, but speak low."

"I will; but I can't understand how it is that you should have been dreaming the same curious thing—it passes all belief!"

"It does; but we will speculate upon it at another time. Go on; tell me the rest—I am most impatient to hear it."

"Well, then, the landlord entered the room with the pedlar, and put down the candle; then a few more words passed, and he left the room, closing the door behind him."

"Then the same suspicious, uneasy, restless look that I had before noticed in the pedlar's eyes again appeared. He seemed to be trembling with excitement. His teeth chattered."

"With silent steps he crossed the room to the door, and secured it as well as he was able by the one bolt that you have shot into its socket."

"When he had done this he appeared to be more satisfied and content."

"He walked across to the window, and saw that that was also properly fastened."

"He next sat down in a dark corner, and produced from the breast of his coat the bag of gold that I had seen him place there."

"About this, for some reason or the other, he seemed to be exceedingly solicitous."

"He was nervous and restless, and his hands trembled excessively, as he again untied the string with which it was secured."

"Then, putting his hand in, he drew out a handful of gold pieces, which he counted over slowly one by one."

"In doing this, he was careful not to make any chinking sound."

"In this manner he proceeded until the bag was emptied."

"Then he looked satisfied, as though, upon examination, he had found the contents of the bag all right."

"Once more the gold was restored, and, when the bag was tied up, he looked around him, as if undecided where to place it for safety during the night."

"At length making up his mind, he placed it beneath the pillow; then, not troubling to undress himself, he lay down at full length on the bed, and shortly afterwards appeared to fall into a profound slumber."

"How long he might have remained thus I know not."

"I fancied in my dream that I watched him for a considerable period, but presently all grew confused and indistinct."

"At length, however, my vision grew clearer, but I saw before me another and a very different scene."

"It was in one of the back rooms of the inn, and the landlord was engaged in sharpening a knife upon a piece of stone."

"The expression on his face was dreadful to look at—there was murder in every lineament."

"I knew instantly that it was his intention to murder the pedlar for the sake of his gold, and I struggled about, being anxious to warn the man of his danger, but in vain. I had no control over any of my limbs, and, much against my will, I was compelled to remain a motionless spectator of all that took place."

"The operation of sharpening the knife having been completed, the landlord turned slowly round and made his way towards yonder door."

Jack pointed to the door of the room while he spoke.

"He was careful to come along on tiptoe. He made not the slightest noise, or I should have heard it, for the peculiar noise produced by sharpening the knife had been quite audible."

"Pausing, at length, on the other side of the door, he raised the latch gently and tried to open it."

"He clenched his teeth together with vexation when he discovered that the door had been secured."

"Really, however, this made little difference to him, and by what he did I came to the conclusion that he had entered the room when the door had been thus fastened on more than one occasion."

"He took a little piece of wire from his pocket, which he pushed through two holes in the door near the bolt.

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ALARMED AT THE APPROACH OF THE LANDLORD.]

"He worked it about for a moment or two, and then, gently and slowly, drew back the bolt.

"The door was then open, and there was no obstacle to prevent him from entering the chamber.

"Before he ventured to do so, however, he stood listening for several seconds.

"The slight noise that he had made might have partially aroused the sleeper.

"Satisfied, at length, by the regular, heavy breathing, which I could hear with perfect plainness, he entered the room on tiptoe.

"How hard I tried to make my presence known, either to frustrate his villanous intention or else to wake up the pedlar and put him on his guard!

"But I was powerless. I could see, and that was all.

No. 147.—BLUESKIN.

"Half a dozen strides brought the landlord to the side of the bed.

"He raised the glittering and newly-sharpened knife in the air, and then prepared to strike.

"Just as the weapon was descending, a kind of shiver overspread the pedlar's body, and he opened his eyes.

"They encountered the gleaming knife and the distorted countenance of the landlord.

"Before he could move, or utter the cry that rose to his lips, the knife was buried in his heart.

"There was no need for the landlord to repeat his blow.

"His aim had been well taken—death was instantaneous.

"The limbs of the murdered man quivered and trembled a little, but not much; the muscular action soon ceased, and then he lay profoundly still.

"As he was now past all help, I looked upon the remainder of the landlord's proceedings with a calmer eye.

"I was curious to know what would be his next proceeding, and how he would dispose of the body.

"I was not kept long in doubt, for, as you shall hear, I witnessed the whole of these occurrences, and then woke up, wondering greatly where I could be, and whether it was a dream or reality."

CHAPTER DCCXCIII.

IN WHICH IT TURNS OUT THAT JACK'S VISION WAS NOT ALTOGETHER A DREAM.

"It was truly an awful dream, Jack," said Blueskin, drawing a long sigh—"and, by the manner you relate it, it must also have been a vivid one!"

"Most vivid!"

"Well, go on. Make haste—let us get the story over."

"With all my heart; but I could not rest until I had told you all."

"Nor could I until I had heard it."

"Well, then, listen."

"I am all attention."

"The landlord stood watching the dead man for several moments.

"He made no attempt to draw the knife from the wound—it remained there, buried up to the hilt.

"As though the task was a repugnant one, he turned the pedlar slowly over in the bed, and then thrusting his hand beneath the pillow, drew forth the bag of gold.

"The murderer's eyes sparkled and glistened as he seized it, and when he found how much wealth it contained, judging from its weight, his delight knew no bounds.

"He looked round the chamber for some place in which to secrete it, but finding nowhere to his mind, he consigned the bag to one of his capacious pockets.

"Once again he turned towards the bed, and then I knew what it was he intended to do next.

"It was to remove the body.

"He was by no means gentle in his treatment.

"The pedlar was a man of average size, and therefore it would have been difficult to carry him.

"Seizing him by the feet, he dragged him from the bed on to the floor.

"The crash that the body made when it struck upon the boards was awful—I fancy I can hear it now."

And Jack shuddered at the recollection.

"In this manner, holding him by the feet, the landlord dragged the pedlar out of the room, along a narrow passage, and through another door, into a neglected piece of garden at the back.

"I looked to see in what direction he was going, and perceived an old, ruinous kind of well.

"The brickwork around it had half crumbled away, and the wooden framework of the windlass above was half decayed.

"I was conscious that he intended to throw the body into this pit, and my conjecture was soon after verified.

"Raising him up, he tugged him over the edge of the brickwork, and then with a sullen plunge the body vanished in the depths below.

"The landlord then drew a long breath and turned away, going in the direction of the inn.

"I am conscious that there is something I have left untold, but what it is I cannot now remember; perhaps my memory will serve me better in a little time.

"However, you see that my dream furnishes a very circumstantial account of a most barbarous murder."

"It does—it does indeed, and it is more than strange that you should be able to remember so many details."

"It is extraordinary."

"And are you sure that this is the room in which the crime was committed?"

"Yes, this is certainly the room I saw in my dream; but why do you ask the question?"

"Because if there is any real truth in it we should probably be able to find somewhere in the chamber corroborative evidence of what you have seen."

"I had not thought of that," said Jack, springing up.

"That's a good thought—we will see."

"Yes, such is my intention. Wait a moment, and I will get a light."

Blueskin quickly lighted one of those small tapers that he always carried with him, and by the aid of this they commenced their investigations.

"The bed," said Jack—"let us look at that first, for if there is any truth in what I have dreamt, surely some signs of the deed will be shown upon it."

"Certainly."

The clothes were rapidly stripped off, until the mattress was exposed to view.

The light of the taper was cast upon it, and then the two searchers started and looked curiously into each other's countenances.

Upon the mattress there was a large, dark, reddish-brown stain.

It was about two hands in breadth.

"That looks as though there was some truth in the vision," said Jack.

"It does indeed. Rely upon it, all that you have seen in your dream is but a repetition of what has taken place here at some time or other. I consider that stain the ample proof."

"So do I. It is fortunate that we have so little money, or the landlord might have been tempted to treat us in a similar way."

"Or it may be that he would shrink from encountering two," said Blueskin, "and he might guess from our manner that we should not submit easily."

"He might, that is true."

"There is one thing, however, I should like to have cleared up before we leave this place, for my curiosity is strongly excited by it."

"What is it?"

"Why, to ascertain whether there is a garden similar to the one of which you dreamt, and whether there is a well in it."

"I have no doubt about it in my own mind," said Jack, "judging by what we have already seen."

"Still, I should like to have it put beyond all possibility of doubt."

"And so should I; but hush—hark! I can hear some one approaching. Put out the light—quick! Perhaps it's the landlord who is coming."

The taper was hastily extinguished, and then Blueskin and Jack crept noiselessly towards the door.

Here they stood listening, and then the sound of footsteps came plainly on their ears.

The next moment they saw through the chinks of the ill-fitting door a faint flash of light.

The landlord was evidently carrying a candle.

Was his destination the chamber in which they stood?

They were not long kept in doubt upon this point, for the footstep paused upon the threshold, and then there came a sharp knocking upon the woodwork.

"What is it?" asked Blueskin—"what's the matter? Why do you knock?"

"I only came to inquire whether you were awake, gentlemen," said a voice which they immediately recognised as the landlord's, "and if so, to know whether you would like any refreshment."

"Yes, we don't mind if we do," answered Blueskin; "we will be with you in a few moments."

"Would you like the light?"

"No, it does not matter."

The landlord then slowly retired, and Jack said in a whisper:

"Don't talk about any refreshments here, I beg. I could not bear to eat or drink anything more beneath this roof."

"But I think that is rather foolish, Jack. We may have to go a long way before we have the chance of getting a meal again."

"No matter. You can have what you like, but I shall touch nothing."

"Will you go into the garden first?"

"I think we may venture to do that; at any rate, let us try."

So saying, they opened the door and left the chamber. They then found themselves in a dark, narrow passage.

By turning to the right they knew they would reach the front portion of the inn, where they had previously sat, but turning to the left Jack believed would take them to the garden he had seen in his dream.

No signs of the landlord could be seen, and therefore they did not hesitate to take this course.

At the extremity of the passage was a door which was secured only by a latch.

Raising it, they passed out.

Young as the night was, the moon had already risen.

It is true she was but a few degrees above the horizon, yet her beams served to illuminate all objects with tolerable distinctness.

In comparison with the darkness of the chamber in which they slept, it seemed positively daylight in the open air.

"It is all as I dreamt it," said Jack, in a hushed voice. "Look—there's the well."

"Where—where? I can't see it."

"Yonder. There seems only the crumbling brickwork remaining around it—it looks as though the windlass had quite decayed away. But step forward—a closer inspection will prove the truth of this."

They walked straight up to the edge of the well, and its appearance corresponded exactly with the description that Jack had given of it.

The brickwork was indeed in a most ruinous condition, so much so that it was positively dangerous to approach close to the brink.

At each side, however, two darkened stumps of wood could be seen protruding from the soil.

They were the remains of the frame of the windlass Jack had seen.

"Some time must have elapsed since this deed was done," said Jack, "and I think we are right in concluding that it has been done, for, so far as I can tell, these stumps have been like this for a long while."

Blueskin did not reply, but leaning forward as far as he dared, looked down.

But the darkness in the well was too profound to be pierced.

He saw, however, that near the top the walls were wet and slimy, and in many places overgrown by moss and other green creeping plants.

Jack looked down too, and raising his foot, kicked away one of the bricks.

It fell with a rushing sound.

They heard it strike twice against the sides, and then with a loud splash it reached the water at the bottom.

The depth was very great.

Just at that moment they fancied they heard a slight noise behind them.

Turning round, they saw the landlord only a few paces off.

He had evidently been advancing towards them.

An angry scowl was on his face, and his manner was exceedingly confused.

He tried hard to calm himself, however.

But his voice trembled as he spoke.

"I was looking for you, gentlemen. I did not know where you had gone."

"We were just looking about us," said Jack, coolly.

"What a deep old well that is you've got in the garden—I should think it's very dangerous to have it in such an unprotected state; why, in the dark anyone might walk into it."

"That's true, gentlemen; but then this bit of garden I consider private—no one goes into it but myself."

The words themselves were calm and collected enough, but they were spoken in an agitated, breathless manner.

"It will be a fine night," said Blueskin, glancing up at the sky; "we will not stay much longer, but resume our journey to-night."

"Very good, gentlemen; if you will follow me I will take you to the front room. I have prepared as good a repast as I am able, but you must not expect many luxuries in this out-of-the-way place."

"Lead on, then," said Jack—"we will follow."

The landlord turned slowly, and as it seemed unwillingly, and led the way back to the inn.

Jack took hold of Blueskin by the arm, and then whispered in his ear:

"We turned round just in time. I am sure from the villain's manner that he was creeping up behind us stealthily, and that it was his intention to have pushed us down the well."

"And he would have done it, too," said Blueskin, "if he had managed to reach us unperceived. When we were in that position the slightest touch would have thrown us off our balance, and then nothing could have saved us—we must have perished."

Both shuddered, for upon reflection they saw what a narrow escape they had had from a frightful death.

CHAPTER DCXCIV.

THE VILLANOUS INTENTIONS OF THE LANDLORD ARE MADE FULLY APPARENT BY BLUESKIN'S STRATAGEM.

THAT Jack and Blueskin were perfectly correct in their surmises respecting the intentions of the landlord there could be not the least doubt.

By accident he discovered they had left the room in which they had slept, and he had followed them into the garden.

When he saw them standing near the well, a thousand terrors sprang up in his breast—so true is it that a guilty conscience is its own accuser.

Something seemed to come across his mind and tell him that his secret crime had been discovered, or else why should they be standing on the margin of the well endeavouring to look down it?

Simultaneously with this thought came the resolution of destroying them, and, therefore, as noiselessly as possible he stepped across the soft, rank mould in the garden.

Yet he could not avoid making a slight sound, and that sound reached the ears of Jack and Blueskin just in time.

The landlord did not turn back, but yet he knew that they were whispering to each other, and he knew also that they were speaking of his late intent.

He compressed his lips and clenched his hands tightly, while the frown upon his brow told that he had come to some stern and terrible resolution.

Upon reaching the room where the two friends had first sat down, he said:

"There is your supper, or dinner, or whatever you choose to call it, gentlemen. It looks very plain and very rough, I daresay, but yet it is wholesome. However, I have some capital ale that you can wash it down with, and that will perhaps make up for the shortcomings of the rest."

"Very good," said Jack, "and in the meanwhile you can be getting our horses ready for the road, for as soon as ever we have despatched this meal we will be off."

The landlord then left the room.

Blueskin sat down at the table, but looked doubtfully at the viands before him.

Certainly they were by no means tempting.

Then he remembered Jack's words.

"Are you really in earnest about not having anything to eat?" he asked.

"Yes, quite in earnest. I could not bear to touch anything either in the shape of food or drink."

"But why not?"

"The landlord I am convinced wishes us no good; he must suspect that we have a knowledge of his crime—if so, rely upon it he will try to make that knowledge valueless."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, he may place something of a poisonous character either in the food or in the drink, and so make himself sure of us."

"I will taste the ale, at any rate," said Blueskin, "and see whether your suspicions are just or not."

"Pray do no more than sip it!"

"I will not, you may depend."

Blueskin placed the jug of ale to his lips, and took a small quantity into his mouth to taste it.

"It has a strange taste!" he exclaimed. "I am sure it is not the same we had before. Your suspicions, Jack, are just. At first he probably had no intention upon our lives, but now, finding we have guessed his secret, he has resolved to put an end to us."

"That's it; the ale may only be drugged, and he would calculate on making us an easy prey after we had drunk a little of it. You must remember it is not at all strange that he should have the means at hand of drugging the liquor, for you know publicans have all sorts of stupefying things at hand."

"Yes—yes," said Blueskin; "and yet—"

"Yet what?"

"I should like to ascertain whether our suspicions really are well founded."

"I doubt whether it is worth while. Had we not better ride off? We shall have much difficulty in overtaking Jonathan and his party."

"I don't know why we should hurry," said Blueskin. "If they are captured they are safe, rely upon it. All we have to do is to journey on towards London; we shall soon learn whether anything unusual has taken place."

"Very true; and certainly after all this trouble it is not at all probable that the officers would allow Jonathan to slip through their fingers."

"Well, but to go back to what I was saying."

"About putting the landlord to the test?"

"Yes, that's it. Supposing we pour this ale away, and then put our arms upon the table and rest our heads upon them as if asleep? If he comes in and is surprised at our position he will awake us; if not, we shall know his intent, and shall have time to defend ourselves from him."

"So we shall. Let it be done."

The ale accordingly was poured away upon the floor, and as there was plenty of sawdust lying about it was quickly absorbed.

Just then, a miserable, half-starved-looking dog came sneaking into the room.

As soon as he saw him, Jack said:

"Try him with some of the food, Blueskin; we shall see whether he eats it, and if he does, what effect it has upon him."

"Very good," said Blueskin—"it will seem as though we have both had something to eat and drink."

"It will."

Some portions of the food were cut off and given to the dog, who snapped them up eagerly.

The creature seemed half famished, and he swallowed the morsels instantly.

"Come and sit by my side," said Blueskin; "then when we hear the landlord approaching we can easily put our heads down and pretend to sleep."

"We had better do it at once," said Jack. "Look in yonder corner—there's the window I saw in my dream, through which the landlord watched the movements of the pellar. I don't think he is there now, yet he might watch us."

"It is best to be cautious," said Blueskin.

Accordingly the two friends rubbed their eyes and stretched their arms, as though struggling against the influence of slumber.

At length they slowly allowed their heads to fall upon their arms, which rested on the table.

In this position they could converse easily enough.

A long time passed in silence, and they began to grow tired of their experiment.

Presently, however, the whole of their attention was absorbed by hearing some one approach.

Then the door was pushed open, and the landlord said:

"I have seen to your horses, gentlemen, and they—"

He paused suddenly.

"It's all right!" he added, in a whisper. "How soon it has taken effect! But they are safe now—quite safe!"

Blueskin gave a loud snore.

From what the landlord had said, it was clear the suspicions against him were well founded.

He stood for several moments quite motionless.

He was reflecting.

His lips moved, but no audible sound escaped them.

After awhile, however, he came to a decision, and he glided quickly from the room.

"What shall we do next?" asked Jack, in a whisper, as soon as he departed.

"Hush!" said Blueskin. "Keep an eye on all his movements, if you possibly can, and be on your guard against an attack."

"I will. Hush!—he's coming again."

The landlord again approached.

But before he ventured to enter the room, he projected his head a little way into it.

He saw that his two guests had not changed their positions.

Then he stepped noiselessly across the threshold.

In his hand he held a long-bladed knife—the same weapon that Jack had seen in his dream.

He was feeling the point of it, as if to be sure of its sharpness.

Satisfied apparently, he approached the table with long strides, halting for a second between each one.

"I must be quick," he muttered, audibly. "Yes, that will do it."

One more step brought him to the side of the table opposite to that at which Blueskin and Jack sat.

As their heads rested upon their arms in the manner we have described, the back part of their necks was displayed to view.

This was where the landlord fully intended to inflict two hasty stabs, and in that vital portion of the body they must inevitably have proved fatal.

Had Jack and Blueskin really been overpowered by the drug, as the landlord imagined they were, he would certainly have accomplished his purpose.

They waited until he was in the attitude to strike, and then started suddenly to their feet.

He uttered a howl of rage and fear.

Jack and Blueskin drew their swords, and the latter cried:

"Villain! Your purpose was suspected, and we have proved ourselves in the right! But you shall suffer dearly for your crimes! The old well shall be thoroughly searched!"

The landlord uttered another yell upon hearing these words, and then all reason and prudence appeared to forsake him.

Brandishing his formidable knife, he rushed upon the two friends.

But they were ready to receive him, and held out their swords in such a manner that he could not reach to make use of his knife.

Finding himself thus baffled, he howled and foamed with rage.

"You shall die!" he shrieked, passionately. "I will have your blood—your blood! You shall die!"

Again he uttered a yell, and this one purely of fright.

The dog sprang suddenly from the crouching position it had taken before the fire, and fixed its teeth in the landlord's leg.

The animal was mad.

The food it had eaten was poisoned or drugged as well as the ale, and now the brute was under the influence of it.

In vain the landlord tried to shake him off—the animal only closed its jaws more convulsively together.

Then, stooping down, he stabbed it fiercely with his knife—stabbed it until life was extinct, and then the dog's hold relaxed, and he freed himself.

But it would almost seem as though the poison he had so ruthlessly prepared for others took a speedy effect upon himself.

From that moment his actions were certainly those of a lunatic.

Regardless of their swords, he precipitated himself upon Jack and Blueskin, fighting wildly with his knife.

Under these circumstances, it was hard indeed to defend themselves from a chance wound.

But they managed to do so, though in self-defence they struck him several times.

"Drive him forth!" said Jack—"drive him forth! We will get into the open air! The sooner we ride away the better."

The landlord laughed hideously.

Then he flung his heavy knife with full force at his antagonists.

It missed Jack only by a hair's-breadth.

Then, after striking against the wall, it fell clattering to the floor.

Screaming with laughter again, the landlord rushed into the passage.

Then, turning round, fled hastily in the darkness.

"Let us follow him!" said Blueskin. "He's mad! Let us see that he does no mischief to anyone but himself."

CHAPTER DUXCV.

IN WHICH THE LANDLORD IS OVERTAKEN BY A JUST BUT TERRIBLE RETRICTION.

UTTERING shriek upon shriek, the landlord pushed open the door at the extremity of the passage, and ran into the garden.

Jack and Blueskin were much surprised that he should have taken this route, leading as it did to the spot where he had disposed of the evidence of his crime.

But that the landlord had no control over his movements and no idea where he was going is quite certain.

"What do you intend to do?" asked Jack. "How far will you follow him?"

"That depends; but it would be wrong for us to allow a lunatic—for such he certainly is—to injure other people whom he might happen to come across."

"It would—it would."

"But look at him now!" said Blueskin. "What ails him?"

The movements of the landlord now became singular in the extreme.

For a time, they puzzled both the witnesses of them.

At last, however, they were forced to come to the conclusion—extraordinary as it was—that the landlord was to all appearances struggling with some one.

He tried hard to get away, and yet appeared to be dragged still further and further in a direction he did not wish to take.

This was indeed a most singular spectacle, and Jack and Blueskin remained immovable, gazing upon it.

In a harsh, shrieking, terrified tone of voice, the landlord spoke.

"Loose me—loose me!" he yelled. "Let me go! Why do you cling so tightly? Loose me, I say! I will not be dragged to the well! That's where you are trying to drag me! But I will not go! Release me, I say—let go your hold!"

These words were uttered sometimes with a pause of several seconds between them, and all the time the landlord continued to writhe about in the garden with his invisible and imaginary foe.

Yet, strange to state, in spite of all his frantic efforts, he continually got nearer and nearer to the brink of the old well.

He renewed his cries and shrieks, and entreaties to be let off.

"Not the well—not the well! Anywhere but there, and I will follow you! It is so deep—so very deep! You have threatened me many a time, and now I am in your grasp! But let me go—let me go! Ah! you will not?—you refuse to listen to my words? Then I will compel you!"

The struggles then became much more violent than before.

But the result was just the same.

Slowly but surely the landlord was making his way nearer to the brink of the well.

"He will go over," said Jack, breaking the silence by an effort—"I am sure he will go over if we do not prevent him!"

"I shall not make the attempt," said Blueskin. "It is pretty clear that he imagines that the pedlar he has murdered has seized him in his grasp. It is a phantom he is struggling with, though to him it appears like reality. If we were to approach, it would probably only have the effect of hastening his fate."

"Then we can do nothing but watch."

"Nothing; and it will be well for some such fate to overtake him. It would be a retribution that his crime well merits."

With even more interest and curiosity than before, they continued to watch the strange scene that was taking place before them.

Nearer and nearer to the brink of the fatal abyss the landlord drew, although he evidently fancied that he was trying his utmost to go in some other direction.

And now, when he got very close to the brink of the well, his shrieks became terrible to listen to.

In the most earnest tones he implored to be released.

Then, by an effort, he would appear to get one arm at liberty, and with this he would strike fierce and random blows.

At length he stood close against the brickwork of the well, and then the manner in which he swayed backwards and forwards was singular indeed to witness.

"There's murder in your eyes!" he cried. "I can see it. I know your thoughts—you mean to drag me down to keep company with you at the bottom of the well! But I will not give up my life without a struggle!"

Just at this moment he struck the crumbling wall heavily with his feet.

It only wanted such a blow as that to send the whole mass down into the depths of the well.

With a last loud, despairing shriek, the landlord followed it.

When they saw him disappear, Jack and Blueskin ran forward, but did not venture to go too close to the verge.

Then they listened.

But all was as still as the grave.

The landlord's end was come.

"This is terrible," said Jack, as he drew a long breath of relief—"terrible in the extreme!"

"Yes," replied his companion. "It is a sight I should not care to witness again, yet I cannot help feeling a great degree of satisfaction at finding things turn out as they have done."

"Yes, that's right enough; but now the end has come, let us depart. There can be no reason to linger here now, and the sooner we depart, the more comfortable shall I feel."

"Yes, so shall I. It's an awful den! Let us try and find our horses."

"I trust they will be safe."

"Oh, yes—don't doubt that! It would not be to the landlord's interest to injure them."

"Come, then!"

Willingly enough, both left the weed-grown garden.

A little door in the wall led them into another yard, and on the other side of this they perceived a low, badly-built shed that doubtless answered the purpose of a stable.

Towards this they bent their steps, and found they were correct in their conjectures.

The horses were there, apparently safe and sound.

With all convenient speed they saddled and bridled them.

Then they led them out and mounted.

"Now for London!" said Blueskin. "We cannot do better than push on for the metropolis with all speed. The officers, having Jonathan in their possession, would be sure to take the nearest way to the Old Bailey."

"Yes, beyond a doubt they would do so."

"Yet as we go along we will inquire."

"Yes, that follows as a matter of course."

The horses had not been badly cared for, and the long rest they had had sufficed to recover them from their fatigue.

Our friends found this by the manner in which they started out.

"There is no occasion for any immediate speed, Jack," said Blueskin, "and so we will not tire our horses out by pushing on at their utmost. Depend upon it, by this time Jonathan Wild is safe in Newgate, and we shall reach London in time to witness his execution."

"It seems like it—it does indeed!" said Jack. "I cannot conceive that the officers, when once they seized him, would ever allow him to escape again."

"I think it is a groundless fear."

"And so do I; and yet, in spite of all, I can't help feeling it. It may be foolish, but it is nevertheless a fact."

"I must confess to a similar feeling myself, for I know well what courage and energy Jonathan possesses. He has made his escape before, recollect, and under very extraordinary circumstances."

"He is, I admit, no common man, but yet—"

"Yet you would like to know that he was safe in custody?"

"I should; and therefore I feel anxious that we should push forward without much delay."

"It will be a saving of time," said Blueskin, "if we take our horses gently. We have not the means to obtain fresh ones should these become exhausted, and therefore it is to our interest to husband their strength as much as we can."

In this Jack could not help agreeing, but for all that he contrived to be continually a yard or so in advance of his companion.

They took the high-road towards London, and, emboldened by the safety with which they had performed the other part of their journey, they scarcely gave a thought to their own peril.

Without the occurrence of any accident, they arrived at that inn where, as we know, the officers, when they had Wild and Noakes prisoners, made a halt.

At this place they obtained confirmation of the intelligence they had previously received.

The account given by the landlord placed the matter beyond doubt.

Jonathan and Mr. Noakes, both well secured and watched by the officers, had certainly been there, and, after partaking of some necessary refreshment, they had continued their journey towards the metropolis.

Strangely enough, since they had left his house the landlord had heard nothing whatever of their proceedings.

In these days it may seem strange that such was the case; but then the difficulty of communicating between one place and another was very great indeed, and as the landlord lived in a very thinly-populated locality, he had heard nothing of Jonathan's daring escape.

It was only a brief stay that they made at this inn, and then they resumed their journey.

They were now in much better spirits than before, and felt a much greater degree of confidence in the security of their arch enemy.

The landlord had minutely described to them how both were bound, and how jealously they were watched by the police officers.

It was also described how they were placed on the horses, and strapped to two police officers.

Escape under these circumstances appeared absolutely impossible.

"It will be soon over," said Blueskin; "and then, when I have seen his end, I shall be content. When once he is in Newgate there will be no time lost. His trial has already taken place, and sentence been passed upon him. They will make short work of it, for, knowing his desperate character, they will be as anxious to see him swinging at Tyburn as we are."

"Yes; and surely I should think that when he dies there will not be found one to pity him in the least or to regret his fate."

"No one—certainly no one."

"But look," said Jack, pointing along the road. "What do you imagine is the meaning of that?"

Blueskin did not immediately reply, but looked in the direction to which his friend pointed.

Then, somewhat to his surprise, he saw sitting down by the side of the hedgerow, and with his body partly supported against the embankment upon which the hedge was planted, an old man, whose body was thin and wrinkled to a degree.

His face could not be seen, for it was completely hidden in his hands.

His hair was long and white, and fluttered strangely in the gentle breeze.

What was stranger still, was the fact that standing near him was a well-made, powerful-looking horse.

Apparently, there was no one in charge of the animal—certainly no one held the reins.

But it stood in a strange, dejected attitude, with its head low down towards the ground, and outstretched towards the form of the old man, which it appeared to be regarding with great intuentness.

CHAPTER DCXCVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ENCOUNTER ANOTHER VICTIM OF JONATHAN WILD'S CRUELTY AND TREACHERY. ALMOST UNCONSCIOUSLY, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard slackened the speed of their horses, and as they advanced at this diminished rate they continued to observe this peculiar spectacle.

In the attitude and manner of the horse there was something almost human.

It seemed to be looking into the old man's face with an air of melancholy solicitude, as though anxious to learn what ailed him, and, if possible, to render some assistance.

To all appearance, however, the old man himself was insensible to all that was going on around him.

He neither moved nor spoke.

"It is very singular," said Jack, as they drew nearer.

"Very singular," was his companion's reply; "but I suppose it is no business of ours."

"None whatever."

"Then shall we ride on without seeking to know more?"

"I think so. It will not do for us to mix ourselves up in any events that we may see occurring around us, because, if we do, we may indefinitely prolong our journey."

"You are right enough there, and yet it seems to me that the poor old man is in a very bad way indeed."

"I think we ought to ascertain whether it is in our power to render him any assistance."

"Well, as you will; it will be no more than a simple act of kindness—such a one as you might be grateful for yourself at some time or other."

Upon hearing them approach, the horse raised his head, and regarded them attentively.

Then, uttering a low, wailing sound, and pawing the ground with one of its fore feet, it renewed its gaze upon the form of its aged master.

Upon reaching the spot, Jack Sheppard alighted.

He stepped quickly up to the old man, and as he did so, he perceived that his dress was composed of good materials, and that it had a half military appearance about it.

"Sir," said Jack, "look up! Are you in need of assistance? If you are, speak, and all that I can do for you I will."

Slowly the hands were removed, and then a pallid, careworn, sorrow-stricken countenance was revealed.

He made a slight sign with his hands, as though he desired something to drink.

Judging by appearances, Jack concluded that he must be in a kind of faint.

At the last inn he had procured a bottle of spirits that he carried in his pocket.

This he now produced, and poured a small quantity of the liquid into the old man's mouth.

It was swallowed eagerly and greedily.

Its revivifying effects were soon made manifest, and, in a tremulous, broken voice, the old man uttered his thanks for the service that had been performed.

"You are quite welcome," said Jack; "take a little more—it will refresh you."

The old man complied with this request.

"I am better now," he said—"much better."

"Can we be of any further service to you, sir?—if so, don't be afraid to speak."

"No, no—I will not trespass upon you any further. The fact is, I have travelled far to-day—too far, indeed, for one so old and weak as I am. A little while ago, feeling quite overcome and prostrate, I slipped off my horse and sat down here. I fancy I must have been in a swoon."

"It is very likely. Shall I assist you to mount?"

"If you would not mind, young man, I should be very thankful. You may think it strange to find one like myself travelling alone, but the fact is, I am all alone in the world, and I am making a journey to London."

"To London?"

"Yes. You are surprised, doubtless, to find one of my age contemplating such a thing, but I have strong feelings to carry me there—they are hatred and revenge!"

Jack was still more astonished when he observed the amount of energy with which these words were pronounced.

The old man's eyes flashed, and, under the influence of passion, he drew himself up to his full height.

"Yes," he said—"I have heard that one who has worked much woe, and wretchedness, and misery to me and mine is about to meet with that fate that he so well deserves, and I am hastening to London in the hope of witnessing the last act of justice."

These words astonished Jack and Blueskin more and more.

The former said:

"Of whom do you speak in these terms? Who is it that has done you this injury?"

"Can you not guess?"

"I might, perhaps, if I tried, but yet it would be more satisfactory for you to speak."

"Well, then, this man who has wrought so much misery to so many people—I am not the only one—I do not stand alone by myself, I am one of a large crowd—the man I seek is Jonathan Wild!"

"I expected as much," said Jack—"the words you have spoken can apply to no one else but that monstrous villain."

"Monstrous indeed, good sir, he is."

"Yes, I do not scruple to confess that in myself and my companion you see two more of Jonathan Wild's victims; he has been the bane and scourge of my life, and he brought my father to the scaffold."

"Then it seems to me," exclaimed the old man, "that we are animated by one common feeling. You two are journeying to London, are you not?"

"We are. Like yourself, we have heard that Jonathan Wild has been made prisoner by the police, and therefore we are journeying to the metropolis in the hope of being present at his execution."

"It is that which I am going to see—it is the hope of beholding that that keeps me alive, and enables me to retain what little amount of strength I do possess. So that it will serve and carry me to Tyburn, I care not. When I know that he has quitted this world, I shall be glad to leave it too!"

"You speak," said Jack, "like one who has indeed suffered deeply at his hands."

"I have—I have! If you would be content to journey onward at the same gentle pace that we are now going at, I could relate to you such particulars of my life as would fairly chill your blood with horror."

Jack, upon hearing this, glanced at Blueskin, in order to ascertain what were his feelings in the matter.

He understood the glance that was given him in return.

"In all that pertains to Jonathan Wild," he answered, "we are most deeply interested; and therefore, if it will not fatigue you too much, it will afford us great delight to hear whatever particulars you may have to give us."

"Then I will speak. It is long—very long since I had a confidant—very long since I had an ear into which I could pour the account of my many sorrows; it will therefore be a great relief to my mind—it will take a great weight off my heart—if I can speak freely."

"Do so—do so. Be under no fear."

"I would confess to you some portion of my own life previous to my connection with Jonathan Wild; before doing so, however, I must tell you that what I shall say will involve the confession of my participation in a guilty act—an act, the consequences of which I have hitherto escaped, and now I think I am too old to be punished in the ordinary way. Do not imagine, however, that I have escaped without punishment. What I have endured has been truly fearful! I have wished over and over again that the law had put an end to my life years and years ago, for I have lived for nothing but wretchedness and woe!"

There was a tone of great agony and contrition in the old man's voice as he spoke these words.

There was also a very great degree of impressiveness in his manner, so that Jack and Blueskin felt constrained to sit and listen silently to all he said.

"Before I begin, then," said the old man, "will you promise to keep secret what I shall reveal to you, at least until after my death?—when that happens you can proclaim my story far and wide, and I trust it may serve as a warning to others who may chance to find themselves in similar circumstances to mine."

"We willingly give that undertaking," said Jack. "You may rely upon our secrecy—we would not betray you to the officers of justice for the world!"

"With that assurance, then, I am content," said the old man, "and if you will listen, I will tell you all, and as briefly as I possibly can; but it is the history of a whole lifetime that you are about to hear—a lifetime filled with such vicissitudes as happily fall to the lot of very few."

Both were silent, and after a brief pause, during which he appeared to be collecting his thoughts, or considering what precise words he should use to commence his narration with, the old man spoke.

They were proceeding only at a walk, so that the motion of his steed gave him little inconvenience, and scarcely interfered with his voice.

The brandy he had drunk and the excitement which the reminiscences of the past had produced had made a great alteration in him, though it is probable that when the excitement had passed away his strength would depart also, leaving him more prostrated than before.

"As you may perhaps have guessed by my pronunciation of some words," he began, "and by my general accent, I am not a native of this land, but of France."

"I speak the language tolerably well, because I have lived here during the latter half my life."

"When a youth, however, I lived in a small village in France, along with my parents."

"At that time my native country was at war with Germany. The campaign had been a long and disastrous one, and more soldiers were required."

"At the intelligence of the fresh conscription my parents were greatly troubled—more troubled than I was myself, for I confess I had always a slight inclination for a military life."

"They, however, could not bear to part with me, for I was their only child. They wished that I should follow in their humble footsteps and live in the village, as they and their forefathers before them."

"Would to Heaven that that wish had been fulfilled! But it was not to be—it was not to be, and I was made the most miserable of all human beings."

CHAPTER DCCXCVII.

IN WHICH THE SINGULAR OLD MAN COMMENCES THE STORY OF HIS LIFE.

THE old man's voice quivered, as though these recollections of the past were very painful and unpleasant to him.

But he conquered his emotion quickly, and resumed.

"Such wishes as these are quite idle and useless, and so I will indulge in no more of them, but bring my story as quickly to a close as I am able, though mine has been a long and most eventful life."

"The day of the conscription arrived, and it fell to my lot to be a soldier."

"I will pass over the grief of my parents without further mention, though I must admit it produced a deep effect upon me. That feeling, however, quickly wore away after I had bid them adieu."

"We were first taken to Paris, and there drilled and instructed."

"This occupied a considerably long time."

"At last, however, a certain number had made sufficient progress to be ordered off to the seat of war, and I was one among them."

"It wanted about ten days to the time appointed for our leaving Paris, that one night, as I walked through a dark and lonely street, I heard the clashing of swords."

"The sound warmed my blood and quickened my pulses."

"I rushed forward to ascertain the cause."

"I then saw one man in a long cloak, defending himself with a sword against the attack of three ruffians, whose intention evidently was either to rob or to murder him."

"Uttering a shout, I rushed forward, and joined in the fray."

"At the first stroke I disabled one of the gentleman's assailants, and engaged myself with another."

"The combat lasted several minutes, and at the end of that time I was left master of the field."

"The three villains decamped, but they left the gentleman I had protected stretched senseless on the ground."

"I hastened to kneel down beside him, and raised his head."

"In doing so, I saw that he showed signs of returning animation."

"He quickly recovered himself, and, remembering all that had taken place, he said:

"Thanks, stranger, for having saved my life! I have had one hard blow, but I shall be little the worse for it. Can you assist me to rise?"

"Of course I did so."

"Then I inquired his address, in order that I might see him safely home."

"He gave it to me, and expressed himself very warmly for my kind attention."

"What was my surprise and joy to discover that the gentleman to whom I had rendered this important service was no other than one of the captains of the regiment into which I had been drafted.

"He was a generous, high-souled, noble-minded young man, for his age did not exceed mine by more than two years, and he set himself to work to make some recompense to me.

"Finding out that I was in his own regiment, he used his influence and interest, which were very great, and obtained for me the rank of cornet.

"We were now enabled to rank on equal terms with each other, and over and over again we vowed eternal friendship with each other.

"So great was the pleasure that we mutually felt when in each other's society that we were rarely apart.

"Monday was the day appointed for us to leave, and on the preceding Saturday my new friend, whose name was Dupin, said to me:

"I am going to-night to a party or ball at the house of one of my intimate friends; I have been requested to bring with me any friend I liked to invite. Will you come?"

"At first I hesitated, for, having led so long such a retired life, I was embarrassed and confused upon finding myself in strange company.

"But the captain pressed me to give my consent, and at last I did so.

"We went, and the scene was to me as delightful and enchanting as it was new.

"One object alone attracted and received my attention; all things else, even my new friend who had behaved so generously, to me was forgotten.

"This one object was a young girl of seventeen or eighteen years of age.

"In my native village I had been accustomed to see only the peasants' daughters, and in Paris I had never before had an opportunity of mixing in society.

"You may judge, then, the rapture that I felt upon beholding this lovely being.

"For some time I could only remain gazing upon her, watching her every movement, and dwelling on the delicate features of her face.

"She was, beyond doubt, the fairest and loveliest of all the assemblage, and was as superior to them as she was to the peasant girls of whom I have spoken.

"Suddenly my friend came up and touched me on the arm.

"I must introduce you to some one," he said. "Come this way."

"He smiled while he spoke, and I, with a beating heart, followed him.

"To my mingled confusion and delight, he led me up to the young girl upon whom I had been gazing with so much admiration.

"He murmured some words of introduction, but then my senses were in such a whirl that I could only guess and not comprehend their purport.

"I recovered sufficiently to ask the favour of her hand for the next dance, and the request was granted with a smile—as I thought, a pleased one.

"Now that I was brought into so much closer contact with this fair being, and could hear her voice, my admiration increased a thousandfold.

"The charming gracefulness and ease of her manner enabled me to throw off all awkward embarrassment, and in a short time we were chatting and laughing with each other as gaily as though we had been friends of long standing.

"During the night I danced with her many times, and I was irresistibly led by her manner to come to the conclusion that she found my society agreeable and pleasant to her.

"I went back to my humble lodging with my brain in a perfect fever.

"I could not see my friend—I could not speak to him. I felt that I must be alone—that I must dwell upon the fair image of the beauteous girl.

"A love, deep, strong, ardent, had sprung up in my breast, and had already taken root there.

"I made no attempt to banish the thoughts that thronged into my mind—in fact, I encouraged them, and dwelt upon them with secret rapture.

"On the following evening, which was Sunday, I again saw my friend.

"He smiled frankly and good-humouredly as he shook hands with me, and then inquired how I had enjoyed myself on the preceding night.

"You may guess my answer.

"Then he said:

"By-the-way, what do you think of that girl I introduced you to—the one you danced with so frequently?"

"I broke forth in a torrent of rapture.

"I poured out before my friend all those secret thoughts in which I had indulged the night before.

"But as I proceeded I found that his countenance grew graver and graver, and at last it assumed such an expression that I suddenly stopped.

"You are enthusiastic," he said, endeavouring to smile.

"Who could fail to be? But, my friend, who is she? Let me know her name, for when you introduced me I was so embarrassed that I could not hear it?"

"Her name," replied the captain, 'is Louise. She is the only daughter of the lady at whose house the party was given; she is also my affianced bride. We are to be wedded in the morning, previous to our departure for the seat of war.'

"I felt as though I had been suddenly struck by a thunderbolt.

"My heart stood still, and the blood ceased to circulate in my veins.

"A kind of film overspread my eyes, and for a few seconds I could see nothing.

"By a desperate effort I partially recovered my composure.

"I stammered out a few words of surprise, and then, seizing my hat, abruptly quitted the apartment.

"If you have ever loved you can guess what were my feelings at this time.

"I was like one bereft of all sense and judgment.

"My grief overwhelmed me, and a thousand vain projects flitted before my mind.

"About to be married!

"How strange that she did not mention it, or drop some hint to the effect during our conversation.

"Perhaps she imagined as I was his friend that I knew all already.

"What was most surprising, however, was the manner in which she had behaved to me.

"Could I have been led into an error?

"No, certainly not, for, setting all vanity aside, I felt that she had looked upon me most favourably indeed.

"In her countenance I could trace the reflection of my own feelings, and then, mingled with these thoughts, came the remembrance of the friend to whom I owed so much.

"My course was clear before me, however.

"I must endeavour as best I could to forget all about Louise, and to remember my friend.

"Whether it would be possible for me to banish her image from my mind I knew not; but I could not be so base—so ungrateful—as to rob my friend of the object of his affections; that would be to place enmity between us at once, and then what should I suffer?

"One by one, the hours passed by.

"Morning came, and as the time approached for the ceremony to take place I became more and more feverish and frantic.

"I wandered about like some restless, unquiet spirit, and the tortures I then endured no tongue ever could describe.

"At last the fatal hour was over.

"I knew then, that Louise was already wedded—she was my friend's wife, and lost to me for ever.

"The time for our departure was now approaching, and I hastened towards the appointed spot.

"On my way I met my friend.

"He greeted me warmly and affectionately as before, taking no notice of what had passed between us.

"Louise is mine," he said. "I am happy. We were wedded this morning. I searched everywhere for you—I intended that you should be present."

"I endeavoured to thank him, but failed to articulate my words distinctly.

"I have just bidden her farewell," he resumed, 'for she will not accompany me to the seat of war—at least, I expect not at present, for she is too delicate to lead such a rough life as we shall be obliged to lead. The war, however, will, doubtless, soon be over, and then I shall return, full of impatience and joy. But you, my friend,' he added—'Louise has asked about you, and said she wished to bid you farewell; there is yet time if you will be speedy. Go, you will find her at her own home. Make haste back, for there is no time to lose!'

[JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON ON THE WATCH.]

"With these words, he turned round hastily and left me.

CHAPTER DCXCVIII.

THE OLD MAN CONTINUES TO RELATE THE VICISSITUDES OF HIS CAREER.

"For several moments I stood quite still, gazing in the direction in which he had gone.

"I knew that my best and wisest course was to follow him—to make no attempt to see Louise again.

"All would be happier if I adopted such a course.

No. 148.—BLUESKIN.

"But the longer I stood deliberating the less inclined I felt to practice this self-denial.

"I remembered that I was going for an indefinite period on a dangerous service.

"It might be that I should receive a fatal bullet in the first engagement—perhaps I should never again have the opportunity of seeing Louise in life.

"Above all, she desired to bid me farewell, and, at length, coming suddenly to a resolution, I darted off in the direction of her abode.

"I found her seated near the window, in a pensive attitude.

"The murmur of some sad song was on her lips.

"The embarrassment was equal on both sides when we endeavoured to speak to each other.

"'I have come,' I said, at length, with a great effort, 'to bid you farewell.'

"But I must not—dare not linger over this interview.

The recollections it recalls are too painful. Let it suffice to say that I was much longer away than I ought to have been, and, moreover, I obtained from her an admission that the passion I felt for her was returned.

"I folded her once in my arms, and pressed my lips to hers, then, overcome with remorse for what I had done, I tore myself away, and ran with full speed to rejoin my regiment, leaving Louise in a half-insensible condition."

"The confession of affection that I had received from her only made my woe and wretchedness the greater."

"How guilty, too, I felt! I dared no longer look my friend in the face, for fear he should read in my countenance the nature of my thoughts."

"But I could tell that in the fulness of his generous nature he trusted to me—he had every confidence in the sincerity of my friendship."

"This was an additional pang to me, for I knew how greatly I had abused it."

"The bustle consequent upon our setting forth was grateful to me, for, for a time, it drowned my thoughts."

"Upon the march to the seat of war I shall not linger—it was not marked by any particular event."

"I can only say that the captain was as kind and friendly in his behaviour as ever."

"He still seemed to feel the same delight in my companionship."

"I observed that he heard frequently from Louise."

"Oh, how I envied him those letters, and wished that I might be the recipient of them instead of him!"

"And on these occasions he would dwell with great delight upon her beauty, her graces, and accomplishments."

"In him I beheld the ardent lover, and every word of adoration that he spoke was like a dagger plunged into my heart."

"At length came the day for our first engagement."

"The enemy was drawn up in a hostile attitude, ready to attack us, and in numbers far superior to our own."

"However, all our men were actuated by one feeling."

"They believed that victory would yet attend upon them, and that this impending struggle, though necessarily severe, would be the last."

"Dupont had already seen active service, and therefore he did not experience the same strange sensations as I did."

"On the preceding night we sat together talking, and before we separated we renewed those vows of friendship that we had made."

"Will it be believed that I was so base—so hypocritical—as, while simulating friendship and the kindest interest in his welfare, to be all the time secretly wishing and hoping that on the morrow some friendly shot would lay him low?"

"Should he perish on the field of battle all would be well—there would then be no obstacle between Louise and me."

"So much did I dwell upon this idea that I almost overlooked the probability that I should be quite as likely to be slain as my friend."

"But I did not."

"While hoping for his death, I entirely forgot my own danger."

"It was a terrible fight—a more sanguinary one than had yet taken place."

"It commenced with the rising of the sun, and it only ceased when darkness again covered the plains, and after all that slaughter and carnage no advantage could be said to have been gained by either army."

"Eagerly I hastened to my captain's tent, hoping and fearing that I should not find him there."

"But my hopes were not realised."

"I saw him standing safe and unhurt."

"As soon as he caught sight of me his face lighted up with genuine joy, and, stretching out his hand, he congratulated me upon having escaped the perils of the fray."

"How different it was to my own base, heartless conduct!"

"At that time I felt how guilty I had been."

"I own my protestations of friendship were on this occasion sincere."

"I resolved over and over again that I would forget all about Louise."

"In this humour I joined in the fight on the following morning, when it was resumed with additional fury."

"As long as I could I kept my eyes on him, but soon, in the confusion, I lost sight of him."

"Then, suddenly I felt a sharp, acute shock."

"I tried to stand—to move; but in vain—I fell down, and hundreds of soldiers rushed over my prostrate form."

"What took place after that I knew not, until, opening my eyes, I found myself in a tent."

"Bending over me, with earnest and affectionate solicitude, was my friend."

"'Heaven be thanked!' he said—'you are saved! I feared I had really lost you, my true and only friend! But you will recover now, and quickly—I am sure you will soon be well.'"

"'And you, Dupont—have you again escaped?'"

"'Yes, with the exception of a mere scratch, which is not worth thinking of.'"

"At this time, I assure you, I received this intelligence with unfeigned pleasure."

"Contrary to the anticipations of the captain, I grew rapidly worse and worse."

"The surgeon came to see me, and shook his head."

"I might get better, he thought, but it was very doubtful."

"This was indeed poor consolation."

"I found that the fortune of war was against us."

"We had been defeated, and compelled to make a rapid retreat."

"All this had been done while I was insensible."

"We were now, it was believed, in a place of safety, and our generals were busy in concentrating their men, so as to be in readiness for another attack."

"My friend devoted himself to me unceasingly, and supplied my every want, and ministered to me as tenderly as a woman could have done."

"How pure and noble he seemed when contrasted with myself!"

"I felt that I was a wretch, and unworthy to live."

"At last, so much did my remorse work upon me that I resolved to make a full confession of my baseness."

"I was moved to do this by what the doctor had said."

"He told me that there was no hope of my recovery—that I must die."

"'Surely,' I thought, 'as Dupont knows this, he will not mind if I confess to him the guilty passion that I have entertained.'"

"Accordingly, I told him all, without reserve."

"To my surprise, as soon as I had finished he took hold of my hot and feverish hand, and pressed it kindly between his own."

"'My friend,' he said, 'this raises you higher than ever in my estimation. I am glad that you have made this confession. I knew all about it from the first. Louise wrote and told me so.'"

"I closed my eyes."

"I felt happier then than I had done for a long time."

"But the excitement caused my wound to break out afresh, and alarmed my friend greatly for my safety."

"But it turned out that this accidental circumstance in reality preserved my life."

"The fever passed away, and though the loss of blood left me in a frightful state of weakness, yet my wound healed, and I grew better daily."

"Still, I was only an invalid, and it would be some time before I should be able to resume active service."

"Therefore, I had a month's leave of absence granted me."

"The surgeon ordered me to repair to my native village, the air of which, he said, would do more to recover me than all the drugs he could administer."

"I confess I looked forward with delight to passing a short time among the scenes that were rendered dear to me by the remembrances of childhood."

"My friend, too, bade me a tender and affectionate farewell."

"'Should you see Louise,' he said, 'tell her that I am well, and looking forward anxiously for the conclusion of the war. Tell her how I long to be in her society!'"

"But you know," I said, "what I have confessed. It will be better for us not to meet again."

"As you will," he said. "That's a point for you to settle in your own mind. For my part, I know your worth so well, and have so much confidence in your friendship, that I do not feel afraid of the result. Still, you shall act exactly as you think proper."

"It was with this understanding that we parted."

"Never—never," I said to myself, over and over again, "will I betray such a trusting confidence! I should be the blackest monster if I did so! I will not yield to any weakness! I will not see Louise—nothing shall take me near her! I will go home to my native village, and there stay until my leave of absence has expired!"

"Would—would that I had adhered to that good and virtuous resolution! I should then, beyond a doubt, have been saved not only much guilt but much misery, for, as you will find, I have experienced more woe than usually falls to the lot of human beings."

"But I have deserved all—everything; and I am also conscious that my punishment is not yet over."

"But these remarks are from the point. I will continue what I have to say."

The old man's voice had grown very husky, and tears must have risen into his eyes, for he drew the dust-stained cuff of his threadbare coat rapidly across his face.

As for Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, they were so deeply interested in all they had heard, and so anxious to know what would be the result, that they were full of impatience because he paused, and they felt inclined to urge him to continue.

CHAPTER DCXCIX.

SHOWS HOW ONE CRIME WILL ALWAYS BE THE MEANS OF PRODUCING ANOTHER.

The next half-mile of their journey to London was performed in silence.

The old man, they could see, made several efforts to speak.

But his voice failed him.

He tried to clear his throat of the huskiness that continually settled in it.

At last, making a powerful effort, and gazing beseechingly and deprecatingly into the countenances of his two companions, as if to ask them not to be too harsh upon him when they heard his confession, he resumed.

They understood the meaning of that glance.

They comprehended, also, the meaning of his hesitation.

It was because he had something to confess that would stamp him as a villain of the blackest dye.

"For some days after my arrival in my native village," he commenced, "I was happy enough."

"My journey in my weak state had fatigued me greatly, and I was glad to rest and recover my strength."

"But before a week was over, a wild, insatiable longing to see Louise once more came over me."

"I was able to recall everything that had formerly taken place between us."

"As on the preceding occasion, I reasoned and argued that perhaps I should never more be afforded the opportunity I had then."

"I had had one narrow escape of my life, and I might not be so fortunate another time."

"Besides, there could be no wrong—no harm—in simply seeing her."

"I had her husband's permission to do that—indeed, he had wished me to assure her of his safety."

"I need not tell how I struggled and argued with myself, and how at last I permitted myself to be conquered by this false reasoning."

"My weakness triumphed."

"I most solemnly declare, however, that my intention was only to call and see her, and speak to her, and say farewell."

"One morning I set out."

"On my arrival, I found that she was anxiously expecting me."

"She had had a letter from her husband, telling her of my wound and happy recovery, and stating that he had requested me to call."

"As soon as the first greeting was over, there was a constraint visible on both sides."

"For my own part, I did not strive to overcome it."

And the old man paused again abruptly, for his voice was choked by a sob that sounded almost like a groan.

"Excuse me," he said—"I cannot dwell upon this scene, nor upon what took place afterwards—your imagination can easily fill up the details."

"The first visit was innocent enough, but I was weak, and went again and again, until at length I forgot my vows and protestations of friendship, and Louise forgot the vows that she had made to her husband."

"Several weeks passed by in a kind of blissful, intoxicating dream."

"Then suddenly the spell was broken, for the term of my leave of absence had expired, and I was ordered back to rejoin our regiment."

"The remorse on both sides was great indeed."

"I know the extent of my own, and could form an idea of what were the feelings of Louise."

"Her peace of mind and happiness had flown for ever."

"We were compelled to part, for I knew the consequences of trifling with the order I had received, and as I journeyed on to the town where the regiment I belonged to then was, I wondered to myself how I should greet my friend and what I should say to him."

"You may easily imagine that I dreaded this prospect above all other things."

"I was ashamed of my conduct, and felt that I could not possibly look my much-injured friend in the face."

"It was indeed a most wretched journey altogether, and the only consolation I could find was indulging in the hope that I should discover he had fallen when I arrived."

"This enabled me to keep up my spirits a little."

"Moreover, I contrived to persuade myself that there was the utmost necessity for caution, otherwise all would be discovered."

"It was very late at night when I arrived, and, therefore, I was spared the trial of meeting with my friend."

"But I knew the evil moment could not be put off, as I ascertained upon inquiry that he was alive and well."

"In the morning I was calmer, and managed so to disguise my villany as to greet him as I used to do in former times."

"He inquired most eagerly and anxiously after Louise."

"How to answer him I knew not, and I am certain my answers were in the highest degree confused."

"But not much time for conversation was left us; we were much harassed by our foes, who, having the advantage over us in point of numbers, continually drove us back."

"The retreat was a most disastrous one, but our general determined once again to take the field, and therefore all the available forces were mustered and we were marched out."

"No particular engagement took place for some time, though there were continual skirmishes, in which we lost many men."

"But my rival—the man I called friend—seemed to bear a charmed life, and so did I, for we were neither touched."

"About three months afterwards we were driven back to the town from which we had set out, and this was well manned in every part, and got ready to stand a siege."

"It was about this time that I received a letter from Louise, stating that it would be impossible for her much longer to conceal the evidence of our guilt."

"The letter was blotted and smeared with tears that had fallen upon the paper while she was writing."

"How bitterly she repented and regretted the past."

"Every day she heard rumours of the end of the war, and she knew not how soon her husband might return, that which event, instead of being a source of the greatest joy to her, was a perpetual dread."

"What would be the result of his return home?"

"This letter almost drove me distracted."

"I was quite at a loss to know what to do or how to act."

"At one moment I felt ready to rush out and surrender myself a prisoner to the enemy, and at others to put an end to my wretched and unworthy life."

"Unfortunately for myself and all connected with me, I lacked the resolution to carry out either of these purposes, and so time continued to roll on.

"Eventually it became known that an attack would be made upon the town on the following night, and if we were then defeated as we had been in every previous engagement the war would be declared at an end.

"Our generals would submit to the conquerors.

"Knowing this inspired every man with double courage and valour to do battle for his native land.

"They were not dispirited by the prospect; but, on the contrary, all were eager for the fray, hoping in this one night to turn the tables upon their foes.

"This bustle served to calm my mind to a great extent, for it prevented me from dwelling upon my evil deeds.

"We were besieged for a long time.

"The issue of the contest seemed very doubtful.

"One night my friend Dupont came to me and said that he had received orders to make a sortie from the walls and harass the foe.

"I was rejoiced to learn that I was to take part in this dangerous excursion, and I devoutly wished that it would terminate in the death of one or other of us.

"Both, I felt, could not live, and surely under all the circumstances it was better that my friend should die than myself.

"He was the one barrier not only to my happiness but the happiness of Louise; and if that barrier could only be removed, the past would no longer be a source of such poignant grief.

"I was thus reasoning with myself during the time we were making the preparations for the sortie.

"The appointed hour at last came, and we were all marshalled ready to sally forth.

"My friend seemed overcome by an unusual gloom.

"His spirits were entirely overcast.

"There is a presentiment of coming evil hanging over me," he said, as he wrung my hand at the last moment. "I wish I knew what form it would take."

"I could not answer him, for dark thoughts were brooding in my mind.

"How many times already he had escaped the hand of death, and, judging from the past, how slight was the probability that this would be his last engagement.

"I felt that it would be vain and foolish to make any calculations upon his destruction, and again and again I wondered how all this was to end.

"For my own part I felt that I was a base wretch, unfit to live, and I would have died willingly but for the remembrance of Louise.

"Her happiness I had every reason to believe was bound up in my own.

"She did not suspect one half of the villany that I had begun to contemplate.

"The sortie turned out a disastrous one.

"Our enemies by some means gained information of it, and came up in overwhelming numbers, striving to cut off our retreat.

"But our men performed prodigies of valour, and though many fell never to rise again, yet the remainder steadily made their way to the narrow portal through which they had emerged.

"Thus it happened that the group grew closer and closer to the wall, fighting with each other, and mingled in inextricable confusion.

"But our men stood firm, and I saw that we should be able to retire in safety.

"Just at this time I came closer to my friend.

"He was fighting desperately, but, as usual, was unhurt.

"I began to think that he bore a charmed life.

"Closer and closer still we came, until I was behind him.

"The conflict now was at its height.

"How easy," I thought to myself, "it would be to rid myself for ever of this obstacle to our happiness! Yes, it shall be done."

"This is what I had been long contemplating, and there was such a favourable opportunity of carrying out my fiendish purpose that I could not resist availing myself of it.

"Without staying to deliberate any further, I drew a pistol from my belt, raised it quickly to a level, and fired.

"In the confusion and riot that was going on around, the noise of the explosion was unnoticed.

"But I saw my friend turn round strangely in the saddle.

"I saw the blood pouring down from the wound which the bullet had made.

"He fixed his eyes reproachfully upon me, and then fell headlong from his steed, and I saw him no more.

"He was dead—at least, I feared so, for, strange as it may seem, now that the deed was done I regretted it, and wished that I had turned the pistol against myself instead.

"Moreover, I was a good deal alarmed by the thought that I might have been seen by some of my comrades, and if the act of assassination had been witnessed I knew what would be the consequences to myself.

"My mind at this period was in such a strange condition that I did not pay proper attention to what was going on around me, the consequence was that I received a sharp blow from a sabre, and the next moment found myself a prisoner in the hands of the enemy.

CHAPTER DCC.

THE OLD MAN PROVES HIMSELF TO BE AN EXAMPLE OF EARTHLY RETRIBUTION.

"THE wound I had received was only a slight one, but yet, owing to the state of my mind, I was thrown into a delirium, and I remained unconscious of what was going on for some time.

"When I recovered myself I found that the battle was over, the victory was won, the enemy had gained the advantage over us, and my countrymen had been compelled to submit to the terms they proposed.

"This having been done, the prisoners of war on both sides were set at liberty, and so I then found myself at liberty to turn my steps in whatever direction I thought proper.

"And now the very serious question presented itself to my consideration—what should I do?

"From Louise I had heard nothing for some time.

"I was not quite certain whether her husband was dead, nor was I sure that my base assassination had not been witnessed?

"Upon some of these points, however, it was easy enough to satisfy myself, and so I travelled on with the view of obtaining more information before I decided upon my future proceedings.

"Everything I heard appeared to be satisfactory.

"My friend Dupont was dead and buried.

"Some of his comrades had recovered possession of his body, and had interred it with all honour, for he was a great favourite with all.

"Every one admired him, and there was many a tear shed to his memory.

"It was also given out that I, instead of being instrumental in his death, had been killed while defending him from his numerous foes, but that my body had not been discovered.

"So far, then, surely all was well—I had nothing to fear: there was no reason why I should not disclose myself.

"I did so, and was overwhelmed with praises for my valour.

"I was complimented on all sides, and I was given my discharge.

"Then I asked myself should I—could I go to Louise?

"Although she and the world knew it not, my hands were red with his blood. The guilt of his murder lay heavy on my soul.

"Could I, under such circumstances as these, go to her—deceive her by declaring that the account she had heard of her husband's death was a correct one?

"Could I wed her after having slain her husband in so dastardly a fashion?

"For a long, long time I shrank from this, and yet I knew not where else to turn except towards her.

"All the old feeling of passionate love came strongly back to me.

"There was nothing I desired so much as to be with her.

"Should I then shrink back, now that I knew the barrier that had interposed itself between us was removed?

"I determined at length that I would not.

"My mind having been thus made up, I felt calmer.

"I journeyed on until I arrived at her residence,

"I fully intended to make her my wife.
 "Upon arriving I found that she was dangerously ill, and that her life was despaired of.
 "On making myself known I was immediately admitted.
 "I approached the bed she occupied with feelings of awe.
 "Those feelings were intensified when I caught a glimpse of her pale, wasted countenance as she raised her head with difficulty from the pillow.
 "Had not my punishment already commenced?
 "I felt that it had, for I had looked upon death too often not to know that her hours were numbered.
 "A feeble flash of joy overspread her countenance as she saw me advance and hold out my hand, which she pressed tightly between both her own.
 "'You have come back,' she said, 'and you have come back in time—only just in time.'
 "'In time for what?' I asked.
 "'To atone to some extent for our mutual crime. Send for a notary—be speedy if we must be married!'
 "'Now?' I exclaimed, starting back in astonishment.
 "'Yes, now—in an hour or so it may be too late.'
 "'But,' I said, 'this is extraordinary: what will be thought of such a proceeding?'
 "'I care not what may be thought, but I am dying—yes, surely dying; I know it, I feel it, and this marriage is the only way by which our shame may be covered, and our little ones brought into the world without disgrace.'
 "I tried, but vainly, to dissuade her from this project.
 "So, in this strange, unnatural fashion, we were wedded—wedded while she was hovering between life and death.
 "As soon as the ceremony was completed, a marked change for the worse took place.
 "The surgeon who was there drew me aside and whispered:
 "'Say your last farewell now. I expect every moment that insanity will begin, and it will only close with her death, which must take place within an hour at the most. If she once loses her senses she will never regain them.'
 "This was indeed dreadful—terrible news, and I groaned aloud in the bitterness of my anguish.
 "I hastened again to the bedside, but was just a moment too late.
 "The insanity of which the surgeon had spoken suddenly broke forth.
 "She was mad—delirious—unconscious of all that was going on around her.
 "She knew not me or anyone.
 "Quietly, yet firmly, the surgeon led me from the room and closed the door.
 "Mechanically I entered the next apartment.
 "Then a succession of frightful shrieks and screams came upon my ears.
 "In vain I clasped my hands over them and tried to shut out the dreadful sounds, but instead of dulling them it only seemed to make them more shrill and intense.
 "I flung myself down upon the ground and groaned and wept.
 "Miserable wretch that I was, what misery and unhappiness had I not produced by my own villany?
 "What I suffered then you may perhaps be able to form some feeble conception of.
 "Try if you can to place yourselves for a moment in imagination in my position, and judge what effect these dreadful events would have upon you.
 "Presently I became conscious that the shrill screams were subsiding.
 "In the same proportion I grew calmer.
 "At last they ceased entirely, and then a long interval elapsed, during which I sat in a species of stupor.
 "My heart seemed like a lump of ice in my breast, and the agony I suffered was almost beyond endurance.
 "From this condition I was aroused by the pressure of a hand upon my shoulder.
 "I looked up and saw the surgeon standing before me.
 "He looked reproachfully into my countenance, and he said:
 "'The result is as I foretold.'

"Then she is dead?"
 "She is."
 "And—and—"
 "I paused, for I could not shape my lips to utter the next word.
 "But the surgeon understood the question I would have asked.
 "'Come,' he said, 'you shall see.'
 "Dreading the worst, and with my limbs trembling beneath me, he led me back into the other chamber—now the chamber of death.
 "The curtains were drawn closely round the bed, so that I could not see Louise.
 "But, in charge of a woman, who sat near the fire, were two infants—twins.
 Here the old man again paused.
 During his horrible confession he had become more and more bent down.
 He did not venture to look either of his hearers in the face.
 He dreaded to witness the expression they would wear.
 He continued, somewhat hastily:
 "Louise—unfortunate Louise—was buried, and, feeling that I was the most wretched and miserable of all created beings, I again enlisted as a soldier, trusting that war would quickly break out, and that an end would be put to my life.
 "The little children—one of whom was a girl and the other a boy—I gave in charge of the old woman who had first nursed them, and to whom I paid as much money as I could spare for their support.
 "Thus things went on for some years.
 "People pointed me out in the streets because of my melancholy, dejected attitude.
 "I never looked a fellow-being in the face if I could possibly avoid it.
 "I felt an irresistible impulse to grovel on the ground—to crawl somewhere out of sight.
 "But, to my great regret, I could hear nothing of the approach of war—there was no sign of it whatever.
 "Then I was sought out by a stranger—though a relative to poor Louise.
 "He told me that a considerable sum of money had been left to me in charge for the children.
 "This bequest was made by Louise's mother, who had lately died.
 "The amount, though not very large, was yet enough, when put out at interest, to support us in comfort.
 "I remained for a long time consulting with myself what I should do, and at last determined to resign my commission in the army, and to cross over into England, where I should be unknown.
 "I would have the children with me, and devote the whole of my time to make them happy.
 "I felt that in them lay my only earthly consolation.
 "When they grew a little older they would love me, and in their love I should be content.
 "This project, then, I may briefly say, I carried out.
 "I bought a house, and some land adjoining it.
 "The money I invested at a good rate of interest, and then withdrew into this solitude, determined to spend the remainder of my life with my children, who were inexpressibly dear to me.
 "And something like peacefulness then came over my soul.
 "Vain wretch that I was, I imagined that I had suffered enough for my crimes—that my punishment was over—instead of which, I soon found, it was only to begin.
 "Being myself an example of the awful results of crime and sin, made me especially careful to bring both my little ones up in virtue and rectitude, and this task I performed to the very best of my ability, for my whole heart was in it.
 "It was not long, however, before I discovered that I had difficult natures to deal with.
 "Instead of being full of that love for me, which I expected, they were morose and sullen, and half hated me.

CHAPTER DCCL.

THE OLD MAN RELATES HOW THE PUNISHMENT FOR HIS CRIME IS MADE COMPLETE.

"DAY by day as they grew older so did their vicious natures become apparent.

"They must indeed have been corrupt, for I beheld the result after all my careful training and my endeavours to keep them from evil.

"If they had by chance been thrown upon the world and deprived of such care, what, then, would have been the result?

"Can you guess what a deep-seated grief this was to me?—a grief that grew greater every day, when I saw that all my strenuous efforts were productive of no good.

"It is true, they were but slight tokens that I judged by, but yet, to me, they were sufficient, and I sighed when I thought what would be the end if such propensities were not entirely overcome.

"This was the task I set myself.

"I tried hard to accomplish it, but uselessly.

"And so, with every day adding to my load of grief, the time passed on.

"The first blow that I received was dealt to me by my son.

"I kept him up to the age of sixteen, but then his character only seemed to have grown more and more settled in evil.

"For an act of wanton and barbarous cruelty which I had witnessed him practice, I severely chastised him, and locked him in a room.

"There I determined he should remain until he came a little to his senses.

"But, alas! to my grief and horror, in the morning on entering the room, I found that it was empty.

"The window was wide open, thus showing that he had made his escape.

"Some time elapsed before I could recover from the anguish which this discovery occasioned me, and, as soon as I calmed myself a little, I set out in search of him.

"But, like all my other efforts to reclaim him, it was in vain—he had gone, leaving no clue behind him.

"I looked upon my boy now as lost.

"My heart was almost broken, and I longed every day that I might fall into my grave.

"The girl, now that her brother was away, became more kindly in her disposition, and I had great hopes that here at least I should not reap bitter fruit.

"I grew more satisfied day by day, and strove to banish the remembrance of my son from my mind.

"He was not willing, however, that I should forget him.

"One night he had the audacity to return, in company with a villainous-looking rascal.

"He demanded money of me, with many oaths, and, being in fear of my life, I allowed him to take what little I had in the house.

"He cursed and swore, and behaved himself like a thorough ruffian.

"I found that he had become a professed thief, and that he was in continual communication with Jonathan Wild.

"Having obtained what he came for, my son departed, and I resolved to put it out of his power to pay me such another visit.

"This I knew I could do by changing my residence.

"I was already beginning to grow tired of England.

"I thought I would cross over to some other country.

"But upon speaking of my intention to my daughter, I found that she was much opposed to it.

"She declared that she would not go, and that fierceness of disposition which I trusted I had eradicated from her breast broke out with greater fury than I had ever before witnessed.

"I sternly told her, however, that I could listen to nothing she had to say upon such a matter.

"It was for her happiness as well as mine that we should move away.

"I told her so, and then she went, sobbing and crying, to her chamber.

"After awhile, I did not think so much of this as at first.

"I believed that her inclination to move away was caused by the fact that she had lived in that one spot nearly as long as she could remember.

"That night I was busy in making various preparations to start.

"I resolved not to remain after daybreak.

"But I over-calculated my strength, and, unconsciously fell off into a deep sleep, produced by sheer exhaustion.

"When I awoke the day was considerably advanced, and the first thing I did was to call my daughter.

"No voice replied.

"With a dreadful sensation at my heart, I searched the cottage, but, like her brother, she had gone—vanished I knew not whither.

"The cup of my wretchedness, I then thought, was full to overflowing.

"My two children, instead of turning out blessings and comforts to me, became a curse.

"From inquiries I made, I then found that the dissolute son of a wealthy man living in the vicinity had seen my daughter on several occasions and won her heart.

"Surely she must have inherited the sin of frailty from her unhappy parent.

"She could not bear the thought of going away from him.

"Moreover, he had long been urging her to elope.

"She took advantage of my sleep to depart, and, I grieve to say it, she carried away the few portable articles of value that I possessed.

"I wept—I tore my hair—I groaned, and went through a thousand such manifestations of unutterable grief, but all in vain—they brought no solace to me.

"But I resolved not to give up my children without a struggle.

"I sought for them far and wide, but to no purpose.

"Some time afterwards, I learned that she had accompanied this young spendthrift to London, and had there lived in wanton extravagance and open shame for several months.

"Then, growing tired of her, he shook her off as a useless incumbrance, leaving her to go where she liked—to live or die, or starve or steal, so long as he was troubled with her no more.

"It was easy for her to sink down lower and lower.

"She seemed, like my son, naturally depraved.

"They had inherited all the worst qualities of their miserable parents.

"In this condition my daughter met her brother, and he, lost to all sense of shame and honour, introduced her to the disgraceful company that he himself kept.

"He was then a noted thief, with half the officers in London ever on his track, and yet, by some strange means, he kept them all at defiance.

"I found out afterwards that this was in consequence of a compact that he had entered into with Jonathan Wild, who got him out of all these difficulties.

"Then, worse than all, Jonathan Wild beheld my daughter, and persuaded her to live with him.

"She did so, under the name of Mary Milliner."

Upon hearing this name, Blueskin and Jack exchanged rapid glances.

They knew and remembered perfectly well that violent and unscrupulous female.

The old man, bowed down by shame and grief, did not perceive the exchange of this look.

"When once this fiend in human shape had obtained command over my daughter, he treated her after his own brutal and vicious fashion.

"On one occasion my son witnessed a cowardly, ruffianly attack that he made upon her.

"Some spark of human feeling and justice yet lingered in his polluted heart, and, striding forward with an oath, he interposed.

"A violent struggle then took place between them, and the result was that he obtained the victory.

"Another moment would certainly have put an end to the life of the thief-taker, but then several of his followers, hearing the noise, rushed to his assistance, and seized my son, and bound him securely.

"Jonathan was furious with rage.

"He yelled out all manner of threats, and he kept them all.

"My boy was locked up in one of the cells beneath his house.

"From there he was taken before the magistrate, then brought up for trial, and found guilty of committing a highway robbery.

"He endeavoured, when placed at the dock, to give an account of his connection with Jonathan Wild.

"He made a long statement, but no one would listen to it or attach the least importance to it, for they believed the whole to be a fabrication; so the judge passed sentence of death upon him, and he was executed on the following Monday at Tyburn.

"Thus did Jonathan have his revenge upon my son, who unquestionably he made a thousand times worse than he would have been, had as his nature originally was.

"All this made a great noise, and it was then that I found out exactly who and what Jonathan Wild was, and when I learnt that my daughter, the once beautiful girl resembling so closely her unfortunate mother, was now living with him, and had become the most repulsive object in female form that the eye could possibly alight upon.

"Lost and degraded as she was, I made an effort to see her, and succeeded.

"I knelt down before her, and beseeched and entreated her to leave the way of life she was leading, and to accompany me, and endeavour to atone for her sins.

"But she only laughed, and scoffed, and mocked at me.

"My groans and my tears were alike disregarded, and at length she had me contemptuously turned into the streets.

"Was not this an awful though a just punishment for the crimes of which I had been guilty?

"What human justice could compare with this?

"But in spite of all this my heart yearned towards my daughter, as being the only thing left connecting me with this life.

"Oh, how I cursed and hated Jonathan Wild!—not only for dragging my boy to the scaffold, but for making my daughter such an abominable wretch.

"But she was punished, for he treated her with ever-increasing severity.

"His cruelty was beyond all bounds.

"He learned—of course in a moment of weakness—that she had a right to a large sum of money, which had been left in my charge until she should become of age.

"She was the sole inheritor of it, and, in order to obtain this money, Jonathan altered his demeanour.

"But as soon as the gold was handed over to him he recommenced his cruelties, and he continued them until, perhaps as you have heard, he murdered my poor girl in cold blood, and threw her, like a lump of carrion, into a hole hastily dug in the earth.

"And such was the end of both my children—such was the result of their vicious inclinations, and thus was my punishment made complete!"

CHAPTER DCCL

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD HAVE GREAT HOPES OF COMING UP WITH JONATHAN WILD

THE old man ceased.

For some time his voice had been growing more and more inarticulate, and he pronounced the last words with heavy sobs between each.

Neither Blueskin nor Jack ventured to speak.

They only gazed at one another in silence.

But if their tongues were still their thoughts were busy.

What a terrible confession they had listened to.

It seemed as though no punishment could be too great for such crimes.

Yet what had not the old man suffered?

He had been wounded where he thought himself most secure, and yet in the tenderest part.

His children that he hoped would love him had both come to ignominious ends.

Finding that they continued silent, the old man again broke the silence, though it cost him a severe effort to do so.

"Do not judge me too harshly," he said. "No one could be more sensible of the enormity of my crimes than I am, but I repented—truly and sincerely repented, and I hope before it was too late. Yet, as you have seen, that repentance has availed me nothing. I am now feeble and almost at the end of my days," he added, "but as I said before, I have been told that Jonathan Wild's career of guilt has at last reached its termination, and that he has been captured by the officers of justice. I was told also that his execution would quickly follow, and it was in the hope of witnessing this that gave me strength and resolution enough to begin this long and weary journey. It is certain that but for your kindness I should never have accomplished it."

"You are quite welcome to all that we have done," said Blueskin, "and we are both very sorry for you. Great as your crimes have been, they sink into absolute insignificance when compared with those that Jonathan Wild has committed, and moreover, you have repented, and he has not."

"And never will," said Jack.

"He murdered my two children," said the old man, "and bad and corrupt as they were I loved them, and would have sacrificed my own life if by doing so I could have procured their happiness, but it was not to be—it was not to be."

"You have a long journey before you still," said Blueskin—"do you think you shall be able to accomplish it?"

"If I can meet with any kind strangers, yes."

"Have you the means of staying at any inn and procuring rest and refreshment?"

"Alas, no. I am a beggar."

"Well, then, as a proof that we commiserate you, here is money—take it, and do the best you can with it. And now we will say farewell, for we must part."

The old man tried to express his thanks for what he had received, but could not—his voice here altogether failed him.

Yet he looked wistfully and anxiously at both of them, as though he could have wished that he had their society.

Blueskin understood the glance, and replied:

"It is necessary that we should journey on at a much more rapid rate than your weakness will permit, therefore it is necessary that we should separate. Farewell."

"Farewell," said Jack.

As they thus spoke they increased the speed of their horses, and soon the old man was left behind.

Some time elapsed before the two friends addressed a word to each other.

But at last coming to the foot of a long, steep hill, they checked the speed of their horses and renewed their conversation.

"It's a terrible history that we have been listening to!" said Jack—"such a one as I should not care to hear again!"

"You are right!" said Blueskin. "And yet I can find abundance of pity for such a man."

"So can I—so can I! After sinning so deeply, what a disappointment it must have been to him, upon his return, to find that the woman he had stained his soul for was in the agonies of death!"

"Don't allude to it any further, Jack. I would gladly forget all about that adventure and our preceding one. Let us think of Jonathan Wild."

"With all my heart! And yet what can we say, or what conclusion can we arrive at until we reach London?"

"How much longer do you think it will take us?"

"Eighteen hours at the very least—perhaps twenty-four."

"That's a long while. But come—let us make the best speed we can."

The top of the hill was now reached, and before them the road lay straight and level for a considerable distance.

Accordingly, their horses put forth excellent speed.

They neared London rapidly.

So well did they follow the course that the police officers had taken, that they rode over the bridge where Jonathan had made such a miraculous escape.

Little did they think that anything of this kind had occurred.

In imagination they could only see their enemy tied securely to a police officer, and riding behind him on his horse, with all the others clustered round, and keeping a sharp eye upon him.

Under these circumstances, escape was a thing not to be thought of, nor did they believe that the officers would relax in their vigilance.

After all their trouble, they would, having captured him, take every precaution to prevent his escape.

It was a great pity that Jack and Blueskin should have been so confident about the officers keeping their prisoner secure.

But for this feeling of confidence they would have continued to make their inquiries along the road.

But they did not, for, as they drew closer to London, they knew that the chances of their discovery were very much increased.

Above all things it would be necessary to keep out of the way of any of the officers of police.

It thus happened that they journeyed right on to the metropolis before they heard one word about Jonathan's escape.

Their rage and vexation may perhaps be imagined when they did hear it.

At first they were incredible.

Upon strict inquiry, however, they found that the evil tidings were indeed too true.

Mr. Noakes, and Mr. Noakes alone, had been brought into London.

Certainly the officers had looked well after him, and he had received the punishment due to his crimes.

But it was not Mr. Noakes that our friends were so anxious to secure.

It was Jonathan Wild.

Had Mr. Noakes escaped they would not have troubled themselves any further in the affair.

Now instead of having, as they fondly hoped, reached the end of their dangerous campaign, they were only on the threshold of it—they had to begin all over again.

Going to a retired public-house, the two friends entered a private room and sat down to discuss their future proceedings.

There seemed nothing for them to do, however, but ride off again and endeavour to get upon Wild's track, and then follow him up closely and persistently until they overtook him.

They sat debating for a long time, and then retired to rest, for they were thoroughly worn out.

At the close of the next day, they started again upon their expedition.

They found, upon sallying forth, that Jonathan Wild, accompanied by some one else, who undoubtedly was his son, had had the audacity to venture again into London.

This fact, astounding as it seemed to them, admitted of no dispute, for they saw not only announcements in the papers offering rewards for their apprehension, but also bills stuck up at every conspicuous place.

"Surely," said Jack, as he saw them, "this must be sufficient to rouse the police officers into action. Certainly Jonathan Wild is doomed to destruction."

Blueskin shook his head.

"I am beginning to feel doubtful."

"I don't wonder at it. Who would?"

"We should never be able to feel sure of him again—no, not even if he is a prisoner in the cells of Newgate."

"Very true," said Jack. "We must not trust to the cleverness of the police officers, that's certain. But such a commotion will be created by these events that we shall hear tidings of him on all sides."

"I hope so. I should be glad enough to receive any definite information respecting their whereabouts."

It was easy enough to ascertain which direction the police officers had taken in order to commence their pursuit, and it was easy for Jack and Blueskin to follow them.

But what they wanted was to get first, and to obtain some independent information of their own.

It was also requisite that they should keep at a safe distance from the officers, who might be disposed to ask them some very troublesome and inconvenient questions.

At one roadside inn they were told that the police officers could not be more than a mile or a mile and a half in advance of them.

"Come," said Blueskin, "we shall do now! I believe if we take to the meadows it will be easy for us to get in advance of them, and at the next inn we will try whether we can learn anything respecting those we seek."

The officers had tracked Jonathan Wild with considerable accuracy.

Blueskin and Jack, by taking to the meadows, easily got on the road before them, and the next public-house they happened to arrive at was the one where Jonathan and his son had stopped to rest themselves and their horses.

Blueskin merely gave a description of them, and inquired whether they had seen anyone answering to such a description, either riding past the house or calling there.

The appearance of Jonathan was too peculiar and remarkable to pass unnoticed by anyone, and therefore as soon as Blueskin spoke the landlord remembered him.

"Why, yes," he said, "just such a looking man as you describe called here with another very much younger than himself, and here they remained for some hours."

"And do you know which way they went when they left?"

"I only know that they appeared to continue their journey," was the reply. "They came along the road, as if from London."

"Enough," said Blueskin. "You have given us valuable and important information."

The two friends were not likely to be in the humour to stay at this inn after the receipt of such important news.

Their horses had been supplied with a little hay and water while this conversation had been going on, and Blueskin and Jack had some slight refreshment themselves.

Now they sprang into the saddles, and rode off at full speed down the road.

"Hurrah!" said Jack. "I begin to feel more hopeful now. Surely we shall have him at last! Oh, what a triumph it will be to me if I can only seize him, overpower him, and leave him helpless on the roadway to fall into the hands of the police as soon as they come riding by!"

"We will do that," said Blueskin, "or something very like it. He cannot be very far on the road before us. We must of necessity overtake him before long. The clue grows more and more distinct."

CHAPTER DCCIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON HOLD A CONSULTATION AS TO THE BEST MEANS BY WHICH THEY MAY OBTAIN FUNDS TO CARRY OUT THEIR PLANS.

WE return now to the proceedings of Jonathan Wild and his son George.

It will be remembered that the latter had expressed himself with great confidence as to the results he should be able to achieve by carrying off Edgworth Bess.

That, he felt sure, would make them entirely masters of the field of action.

They would be able, as he expressed it, to dictate their own terms with the knowledge that no matter what they demanded it would be acceded to.

"Yes," said Jonathan in reply, "but you must bear in mind that this is our last chance."

"Well, what of that?"

"If it fails us, what then?"

George shrugged his shoulders.

"It will be all over with us then, guv'nor, and no mistake, for that reason we must not fail—we must succeed."

"It's very well to say that, but we can't make sure of it."

"Yet it appears to me that we have no very difficult thing to do—we have only to keep a good watch, and at the proper moment seize her and carry her off."

"It sounds easy enough, I admit, but then, for one difficulty, we don't know where she is at the present time."

"But we can find out, guv'nor—at least, I mean to do so."

"How?"

"Never mind how—it must be done. To my mind there is a much more serious and important objection than any that you have mentioned."

"What is it?"

[JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE MANSION.]

"Why, we are infernally short of funds, guv'nor. What with this riding up and down the country, and submitting to the extortion of landlords, the end of my purse is almost reached, without you have a supply."

"No—no, George, I have not a farthing left; you know I gave the last I had to you."

"And what could you have done better with it?" asked George.

"Let us have no folly."

"Well, guv'nor, I will be as serious as you like. Money we must have—that's quite certain."

"Quite."

"And if you will give it a thought, rather large funds will be required in this little enterprise; don't you think so?"

"I do."

"Well, then, can you tell me the easiest means by which that money can be obtained?"

No. 149.—BLUESKIN.

Jonathan Wild hesitated.

He thought of the money that he had buried in the ground, and which he firmly believed remained where he had placed it.

Should he trust his reprobate son so far as to tell him of this secret hoard, and conduct him to it?

That was a question Jonathan could not make up his mind to reply to all at once.

George noticed his hesitation, and was impatient accordingly.

"What are you thinking about, guv'nor?" he asked. "What are you pondering over? Come, there must be no secrets between us, or else we part."

"I was thinking," said Wild, slowly—"I was thinking—"

"Well, of what?"

"Of how the money we want can be easiest obtained—but, for my part, I can only see one way."

"And what way is that?"

"Why, we must stop the first persons we meet, and compel them to hand over."

"That was all I could think of," said George; "but then that is open to a serious objection."

"I know it is."

"The officers you may depend are not very far away from us, and a little affair on the highway like you mention would be just the thing to bring them down upon us."

"So it would."

"But we must not forego our purpose for the sake of that."

"Is there no other way?" asked Jonathan, for now he had made up his mind that he would keep the miser's hoard a secret.

The more he reflected, the more certain he felt that this was the right course for him to take.

Even if his son George proved faithful after coming in for a share of this wealth—and it was very doubtful—he would be better off if he kept it as a last resource.

But then, George might be tempted to seize the whole and decamp, leaving him to fight his own battles as best he might.

The hopeful youth had done the same thing more than once before, and it was very likely that he would do so again.

So—very wisely, we think—Jonathan resolved to trust his son no further.

The secret of the hidden money he would keep treasured up in his own breast until some other time, when there might be a more pressing need for it.

"What do you say to cracking a crib somewhere, guv'nor?" asked George. "We might manage that on the quiet, I think, and without anyone believing that we had a hand in it. What do you say?—are you willing?"

Jonathan considered a moment, and then he said:

"Why, of the two, I think there will be less risk in that. We must look out for some suitable and convenient place, and, moreover, it must be a place that will repay us for our work."

"Oh yes, decidedly! It would never do to have all that trouble, and then only carry off a few guineas. We must make a good booty, guv'nor—that's quite certain."

"Well, then, we will say 'agreed' upon that."

"Very well. If we only meet with tolerable luck, the money we shall get hold of then will be enough to answer our immediate purpose. Then, guv'nor, for our one grand last trial, and, as it is our only hope, we must succeed; if we don't, there will be utter ruin before us."

None knew this better than Jonathan himself.

But the failures that he had recently met with, when he had imagined himself so very safe, made him doubtful of all.

But a burglary in some quiet, out-of-the-way spot was far more to his liking than crying "Stand!" on the highway.

There was much more danger to life and limb in this latter mode of proceeding, and, moreover, the officers would be more likely to track them in consequence of it.

Striking off at right angles across the country from the direction they had previously taken, Jonathan and his son rode for many miles without coming to a halt.

At length they pulled up on the skirts of a thickly-wooded plantation.

They were tired, and so were their horses, and they imagined that here they should be able to rest in safety and security.

Accordingly they dismounted, and plunged among the trees.

Coming at length to a place that suited them, they halted.

The horses were glad to crop some of the sweet grass, and to slake their thirst at a little brook that wound its way among the roots of the tall trees.

"We must have something to eat, guv'nor," said George. "What danger will there be, do you think, in knocking over a bird?"

"I don't know—it is impossible to tell. Some of the gamekeepers may be watching close at hand, in which case, upon hearing the report, they would rush towards us and try to take us prisoners."

"Well, guv'nor, we will just have a look round, and if we find all quiet, why, we will take the risk, for we cannot stay here and starve."

The two villains tramped about among the bushes and trees for some time.

But not finding any signs of gamekeepers or persons of any description, George Wild took confidence.

In the plantation all the living creatures seemed tame enough.

They would certainly be able to pick one off with a pistol.

George took aim, and brought one down.

Their next proceeding was to light a fire, and they cooked the bird in a primitive fashion.

But they were hungry, and despatched it eagerly. They were in no humour to find fault with their own cooking.

From the last inn they had stopped at they had brought a large bottle of brandy, and this, mixed with a little of the water in the brook, served to wash down their repast very well.

"Now, guv'nor," said George, "as we have made ourselves all comfortable, suppose we take a peep around us."

"With all my heart."

"It is just growing dusk now, guv'nor, so we shall not be in much danger of being seen."

"Where do you think of going?"

"Through to the other side of this plantation. Rely upon it, there's a gentleman's residence somewhere not far off, and if so, and we find all things convenient, we will make an attack upon it this very night."

This agreement having been made, they secured their horses to a tree, and pushed their way through the thickets and masses of undergrowth that obstructed their progress.

After more than half an hour's hard walking they reached the other side of the plantation.

They did not venture to emerge from the trees, but stood so that they could command a view of the scene before them.

Twilight was now fast deepening into night, but yet it was not so dark as to prevent them from seeing around them tolerably well.

"I told you so," said George, suddenly. "I knew I was right—look there!"

He pointed as he spoke to a well-built, imposing-looking mansion that was situated on the summit of a slight eminence.

The ground sloped down gently from it on all sides.

The grounds around it, consisting of lawns, and meadows, and gardens, were in the highest state of cultivation, and altogether presented an appearance that would have gladdened the eyes of anyone who looked upon them except the two wretches who seemed now to be actually profaning it with their gaze.

"That's the place for us, guv'nor," said George. "If we can once manage to get in there, I'll warrant we shall find plenty of things well worth carrying off—don't you think so?"

"I do. And do you observe that the blinds are all drawn down?"

"Yes—I can see it, now you mention it, guv'nor. What sharp eyes you must have!"

"They used to be, George," said Jonathan, with a sigh; "but every now and then there comes over me a strange feeling—"

"Oh, bother your feelings!"

"A feeling that I can't describe," continued Jonathan—"one that tells me that the end of my course is nearly reached."

"You should take a pull at the brandy bottle, guv'nor, and you would soon get rid of such ridiculous fancies as those. But what were you going to say about the blinds being down?"

"Why, I think we may conclude from it that the owners of the house are not there, and that the place is in charge of servants."

"Yes," said George, "we can conclude that, guv'nor, and how easy that makes the task we have proposed. If we have only servants to deal with, we may make sure of ransacking the place."

"But there's a disadvantage connected with it," said Jonathan, for he had had great experience in matters of that sort.

"What's that?"

"Why, it is not likely that there will be very many portable articles of value left—such things are generally carried away."

CHAPTER DCCIV.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON ENDEAVOUR TO EFFECT AN ENTRANCE INTO THE MANSION.

"Yes, to be sure, there's an objection," said George, thoughtfully, rubbing his head. "That did not occur to me. Upon my word, gov'nor, you are rather a useful man to have in an affair of this sort."

"I ought to know something about such matters. I have planned many such affairs in my time."

"I know you did, gov'nor, and I always admired your style of doing business. You took the largest share of the profits, did none of the work, and ran no risk."

Jonathan did not reply to this speech, but turned round, and, placing his hands over his eyes, looked scrutinisingly at the mansion.

George no sooner saw what he was about than he followed his example.

"Yes," said Jonathan, at length—"you may depend I am right—the place looks perfectly deserted."

"We shall soon know, shall we not?" said George.

"When they begin to light up the house, if we see a light at one or two windows only, we may make sure that we shall meet with very little interference. But, gov'nor—"

"What?"

"If they are only servants left in charge, suppose we were to walk up to the place and ask for admittance? They would, ten to one, let us in, and then what a deal of trouble we should be saved!"

"It would not do in this case," said Jonathan, emphatically. "It succeeds sometimes. It won't do now."

"But why not?"

"Our appearance would go against us. They would not let us in, or, if they did, they would keep such a sharp eye upon us that we should be able to do nothing."

"Then you are in favour of waiting until they have all retired to rest, and then breaking in?"

"Yes."

"But our tools? What shall we do without tools?"

"The best we can," said Jonathan. "We are ill provided, but yet we shall find some weak point or other where we may creep in."

"Well, gov'nor, I shall defer to you entirely. I will be content for once to place myself under your directions."

"You can't do better, George. But somehow I feel so low-spirited and dull to-night that—"

"Why don't you drink some brandy, gov'nor?"

"I can't drink it. It seems cold, and as weak as water."

"I like that, gov'nor!" said George, with a laugh. "The idea of brandy being cold! Who ever would have thought of such a thing?"

Jonathan smiled grimly; but it was quite evident, from his manner and from his speech, that he was very low in spirits.

He had no heart for the enterprise before him.

"Shall we watch from here?" asked George.

"I think we may as well."

"And our horses?"

"We will leave them where they are. They will be safe."

The two villains then flung themselves down at full length upon the grass between the trees, and, concealed by the dark shadow that they cast, remained with their eyes fixed upon the mansion.

They observed with satisfaction that lights appeared at only one or two of the windows.

This strengthened Jonathan's supposition.

A long, weary time it was to elapse between then and the hour when all the inmates could be supposed to be asleep, for Jonathan sank off into a gloomy silence, and would not be spoken to.

George fortified himself from time to time with copious draughts of the brandy, and encouraged Jonathan to follow his example.

"It's all right, gov'nor," he said. "Don't spare it; drink it up—we shall soon have plenty more."

"When?"

"To-night, when we get inside yonder. I'll warrant we shall find more brandy than we shall care about carrying away with us."

"Very likely."

"Well, then, drink it up, and don't be afraid."

Jonathan took a hearty pull at the brandy, which apparently he drank just as he would have drunk cold water.

Still George failed in his efforts to draw him into a conversation.

Accordingly, he cursed and swore horribly, which was the only amusement he could find to make time pass by.

As the hour grew later and later, however, he took out his weapons, and got them in readiness for immediate use.

He had a large clasp-knife, with a long, heavy blade, and with this he expected to be able to do a good deal.

It would have to serve the purpose that other house-breaking implements would be put to.

It was a murderous-looking weapon—one that could scarcely be gazed upon without an unpleasant sensation.

Then, one by one, the lights in the mansion began to fade out.

Seeing this, Jonathan aroused himself from his half-dormant state.

"The time is approaching," said George—"get all in readiness."

"I am ready," was the reply, "except looking to the primings of my pistols, and that I shall leave until the last moment. Curse them—what a while they are, to be sure!"

"They are a long while, gov'nor; but look—there goes one more light! The house will soon be in darkness now."

This assertion was quickly verified, and one light was observed to flit past many of the windows, as though the bearer of it was engaged in securing various doors and windows.

Then they saw it on the upper story, and again up above.

Here it burned for a considerable time, looking like a small star.

At last it was extinguished.

"I should think we might venture to creep a little closer now, gov'nor," said George, "and begin to reconnoitre."

"No, no," said Wild—"not just at present! Precipitation will ruin all! Wait—wait!"

This, under the circumstances, was a difficult thing for Wild junior to do, as his patience was exhausted already.

In this manner about half an hour elapsed, and at the end of that time Jonathan re-primed his pistols.

"Are you ready to go a little nearer now?" asked George.

"Yes—we will creep forward gently, but we must not attempt to effect an entrance for some time."

"I know that; but we have a great deal to do. Recollect that we have no idea at present how the house can be best approached."

"That will not take us long," said Wild; "but by the time we have done it, we may venture to make the attempt."

"Come along, then, for I am tired of waiting in this place."

Stealthily and slowly, like two beasts of prey that never venture forth until the darkness to commit their depredations, Jonathan and his son left the shade of the trees, and crept towards the house.

They sheltered themselves as well as they were able by means of the trees and hedgerows, taking every precaution to remain unseen, for although there did not appear to be anyone about, yet there was great necessity for caution.

Such a mode of progress as this must of necessity be tedious, and therefore some time elapsed before they at length stood before the front entrance of the mansion.

It was a substantial edifice, built of dark red bricks. The windows were small, and fitted with the usual diamond-shaped panes.

Through one of these Jonathan hoped to be able to make his way easily, and so he said to George.

"I shouldn't wonder, guv'nor—and this little toothpick of mine will be just the thing to take the panes out, and then I can put my hand in and undo the fastening easily."

George produced the huge clasp-knife of which we have spoken, and with the point of the blade easily bent back the lead-work in which the panes were fastened.

A small piece of glass was soon removed, and he took it out carefully, so as to prevent its fall making any sound.

Then he placed his arm through the aperture he had made, but immediately withdrew it with an execration.

"We're done, guv'nor!—we sha'n't get in so easily as we thought."

"Why?—are there shutters?"

"No—but bars of iron placed across, and so close together that we could not possibly squeeze through."

"Then it's no good thinking of trying to get in by that means," said Jonathan. "Let's look a little further—we shall manage it after awhile, no doubt."

They moved off slowly, but the house looked as impenetrable as a castle.

Turning round the corner to the west, they came upon another window.

Jonathan placed his eyes close to it and looked in.

But he found that, like the other, it was protected with upright iron bars.

"We must try the upper story," he said—"those windows will not be secured like that, you may depend."

"Why not go round to the back?" said George.

"Because we are better here."

"How so?"

"In the yard there is probably a dog, perhaps more, and should we be heard, such a barking would be set up as would rouse everybody."

"Very true, guv'nor; but how are we to get to any of the upper windows?—that's the question."

"We will go round to the east side," was the answer.

"You know, as a general rule, there is a balcony or verandah running along one side of a house of this kind, and if so, it will be easy for one to assist the other up."

"So it will, guv'nor. Come along, and let us see."

"Hush!—don't speak any louder than a whisper, and tread as lightly as your feet can fall—it would be a thousand pities to create an alarm."

Wild junior thought so, and for that reason did not give any reply.

He followed Jonathan in silence.

A few minutes took them round to the east side of the house, and there, sure enough, as had been expected, was a balcony running the whole length of it.

"This is the very thing," said Wild; "and look!—yonder is a kind of staircase leading down on to the lawn. Why, we shall have no trouble at all!"

Jonathan Wild was correct.

From one end of the balcony there was a rustic flight of steps, so that anyone upon it might descend into the garden without taking the trouble to go down the principal staircase and out at the front door.

"Wait a moment," said Jonathan, as he paused at the foot of it—"we will listen before we venture to go any further."

CHAPTER DCCV.

Jonathan Wild and his son succeed in effecting an entrance to the mansion.

FINDING that the intense silence was unbroken, however, Jonathan silently and noiselessly ascended the winding flight of stairs.

George followed in his footsteps, and, in spite of all their precautions, they could not avoid making a slight creaking sound.

Yet it was no more than the wind might easily have produced, and therefore they did not feel the least alarm in consequence.

Even if anyone in the house heard it, which was not likely, they would take no notice of it.

Jonathan touched George upon the shoulder, and then placed his finger on his lips.

Now that they were so close, it would be by far the best to work by signs and not by speech.

Jonathan crept along until he came to the window.

Here he stopped, and pressing his face close to the glass, peeped in.

Owing to the darkness, he could obtain only a very imperfect view of the interior.

Yet what he saw satisfied him that all was well.

He made a sign to George, which that worthy instantly comprehended.

The services of his clasp-knife were again called into requisition.

The lead round one of the panes was gently forced back.

The diamond-shaped piece of glass was extracted.

Placing his hand through the aperture thus made, George felt for the fastening.

It was of a very simple kind, and yielded to his fingers at once.

Upon this upper floor there were no bars to the windows as there were before, therefore the window opened gently and silently to their touch.

They crouched down and held their breath, for, for aught they knew, discovery was about to follow.

But still the silence continued, and again touching George lightly, Jonathan rose up, and stepped into the chamber.

Although it was night and there was no light in the room, yet Jonathan and his son had been so long in the darkness that they were able to make out with tolerable accuracy the various objects that were around them.

They discovered immediately that it was a bed-chamber into which they had intruded.

In one corner was a large bedstead, and whether this was occupied by any sleeper was more than they could tell.

They listened vainly for the sound of regular breathing.

"It's all right, guv'nor," George ventured to say, in a whisper. "We are lucky! This room is vacant."

"So it seems. But hush!"

"I will be as silent as the grave, guv'nor."

"Mind you are."

"Will it be safe to show a light?"

"Yes, if you have one."

"Well, then, guv'nor, here you are—as nice a little lantern as anyone need wish! I will light it in an instant."

George produced a small lantern from one of his pockets, and proceeded to light it.

"I didn't know you had that!" growled Jonathan.

"Very likely."

"Why didn't you speak before? It would have been of service to us on the outside."

"It will be better here, guv'nor," was George's reply.

"Now, then, we shall see what there is to be seen."

He flashed the light around him.

But the room contained only such ordinary articles of furniture as may be found in almost any sleeping apartment.

On a bed was something white, and, impelled by curiosity, they advanced to see what it was.

Even George Wild started, strong as his nerves were.

What he saw upon reaching the bedstead gave him a shock.

Jonathan started too, and it was lucky he did not hold the lantern; if he had, it would doubtless have fallen from his trembling fingers.

Lying out at full length, and covered only by a white sheet, was a corpse, evidently, from the long, dark hair, that of a woman.

It must not be supposed, however, that there was anything repulsive in the appearance of this dead body.

On the contrary, so far as the aspect of the features and the expression of the countenance went, one might almost think that it was sleep, not death.

But the jaw had fallen, and there was an unmistakably glassy appearance in the small portion of the eyes that was visible through the partially-closed lids.

For some time Wild and his son continued to gaze upon this spectacle.

But there were particular reasons why they should do so, and why the sight should interest them.

The long, dark hair was ornamented by a row of pearls twisted among it, and on the cadaverous neck was a pearl necklace, the whiteness of which contrasted horribly with the skin on which it reposed.

Whether upon the hands or arms there were any other valuables of a like nature the two intruders could not tell, for from the neck downwards all was covered by the sheet.

"Guv'nor," said George, in a whisper, "we're in luck, and no mistake!"

Jonathan shuddered.

"Surely—surely," he said, "you would not——"

"What?"

"Lay a hand upon those things?"

George turned round and contemplated his parent with a stare of blank astonishment.

"Well, guv'nor, curse me if I can make you out at all! I can only account for your whims and ways in one manner."

"How is that?"

"Why, I'll be d——d if you are not drawing to an end—your life, I mean! When people begin to grow good all at once, it's a very bad sign."

"No, no, George—don't speak in that way, and don't interfere with any of these articles. Let us penetrate further into the house, for depend upon it, if they would decorate a corpse in that fashion, we shall find plenty of valuables belonging to the living."

"That's the most rational speech you've made to-night, guv'nor," replied his son, "and we will see what truth there is in it."

"Come, then."

They moved slowly from the side of the bed towards the door.

They were easily able to maintain silence, for the room was covered by a thick carpet, upon which their footfalls produced no sound.

The door, to their annoyance, they found was locked.

The key had been turned in the lock by some one on the other side, and left sticking there.

"Hold the light, guv'nor," said George. "Let me see whether my clasp-knife will be of any good in this case."

He drew forth the weapon again, and inserted its point into the box of the lock.

By working at it gently and carefully, he gradually got the bolt back, until, having reached a certain distance, it was carried back altogether by the spring.

A sharp snap was the result.

A slight sound, it is true, but yet one that was, in the darkness and silence, loud enough to startle the two burglars.

For some time neither ventured to move; but at length, considering that no alarm had been given, Jonathan slowly opened the door.

He still carried the lantern, but he took the precaution to cover it over with the skirt of his coat.

Upon stepping into the passage and finding all was dark, however, he once more allowed the light from its lens to stream forth.

"Let us go downstairs," said George, "and try and find the plate first. I'll warrant there's plenty, if we can only get to the right place. After that, we will try what ready money and other valuables there may be on the premises."

This was consented to.

A few steps brought them to the head of the staircase.

They descended.

Jonathan was tolerably familiar with the interiors of most houses, and now, after standing for a moment or two at the foot of the staircase, he was able to say with tolerable precision into what rooms such and such doors would be likely to open.

"This way, George," he said—"this way! We shall be all right!"

He paused before an ordinary-looking door.

"Open that," he said, briefly.

George set to work, and after a few minutes' labour the door receded upon its hinges.

Passing through a small apartment, they came to another door, which, from its appearance, was evidently a very strong one.

What was greatly in favour of the burglars, however, was, that all the fastenings were on this side, and were plainly to be seen.

Yet it was quite certain that some time would elapse before they could possibly get the door open.

Jonathan, fearful of a discovery, was unwilling to make the attempt.

But George was determined.

He set to work forthwith.

Considering that he was unprovided with house-breakers' tools, he made very satisfactory and rapid progress.

In less than twenty minutes the door yielded.

Crossing the threshold, they found themselves, as they fully expected, in the plate-room.

The plate was not lying about, however, just convenient and ready to their hands, but it was locked up in various strong-looking boxes that would require both strength and time to open.

But none of these obstacles served to cast down George Wild.

On the contrary, they seemed to rouse him to make fresh and greater exertions, and he no sooner espied these boxes than with great resolution he commenced an attack upon one of them.

There was no other weapon that they could work with, so Jonathan was compelled to comparative inaction.

He could only assist his son by holding the light.

This, however, under the circumstances, was most material aid, and facilitated George's progress exceedingly.

He broke several pieces off the end of the blade of his knife.

But at last he was rewarded by the lid of the box flying open.

A quantity of various articles of plate was displayed to their view.

"Hurrah, guv'nor!" he said, drawing his arm across his brow. "It's been warm work, but this is reward at last!"

"Yes," said Jonathan, with sparkling eyes. "The question is, how shall we get it away?"

"That ought not to be an obstacle now," said George.

"Just show a light in this next room. I believe I saw a bag there that will answer our purpose."

To the next room they accordingly went.

But they found no bag.

A basket of rather unusual dimensions was, however, hanging upon one of the walls, and this Wild junior appropriated with a cry of delight.

"Now, guv'nor," he said, "bundle in the swag! Be quick, but don't make a noise—we may as well get quietly off as not."

CHAPTER DCCVI.

IN WHICH GEORGE WILD MEETS WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE, AND HAS TO MAKE A PRECIPITATE RETREAT.

"Of course you will not attempt to open any of those other boxes?" said Jonathan.

"No, we shall be obliged to leave them as they are; not only would it take too much time, but the weight of the plate would be more than we could carry away."

"Yes, let us be content," said Jonathan, "with what we have. We can open one of those doors easily, no doubt, and get off without raising the least alarm."

"I don't quite see the force of that, guv'nor," said George.

"Why not?"

"Because I think that in the house there is plenty of portable property, such as cash and jewels, and I think, too, that they are to be had with a very little trouble."

"Don't run the risk," said Jonathan. "Take my word for it, it will be the best policy to remain contented with what we already have."

"Don't be a fool, guv'nor—you know nothing at all about it. That which we have we cannot turn into money very readily; moreover, we want cash for immediate use, and, what's more, now I'm here I mean to have it."

Jonathan Wild gave a sigh, but said no more.

It was strange indeed to find that his nature had so greatly altered.

He who had always been so domineering over everyone completely succumbed to his son.

But George had a bold, defiant, reckless spirit, while Jonathan was worn out with the hard life that he had led for so long.

"Well, leave the basket down here in the hall, guv'nor," said George, "and then we will go upstairs together, and try what we can find."

"No," said Jonathan, faintly; "I will stay here and mind it."

"Not if I know it, guv'nor. You come along—don't shrink your share of the work!"

"But I would rather stay."

"Oh, no doubt! Perhaps you might fancy you heard some one coming while I was gone, and open the door, and cut off with the swag. No, guv'nor, I shall trust you just as far as I can see you. I don't intend to allow you to go out of my sight."

"Very well, then," said Jonathan; "lead on, and I will follow you."

Up the staircase, accordingly, the two villains crept. They shuddered slightly as they passed the door of the room in which the corpse lay.

The next moment they paused before another door at no great distance off.

Listening for awhile, George ventured to turn the handle slowly.

Then, inch by inch, he pushed the door open.

Still all remained silent.

So, making a sign to Jonathan, he stepped in on tiptoe.

A dim light was burning in this room, and upon entering it further, George perceived a night-lamp burning upon a bracket.

This shed a dim but uniform light all over the apartment, and it was sufficiently bright to enable him to see all objects as distinctly as he wished.

First of all, he went to the dressing-table.

On this were a couple of watches of beautiful manufacture, with long, massive chains attached to them.

These disappeared in an instant, and so did several other trinkets of less worth that were lying near them.

There was also a curiously-carved casket, which, from its size and general outward appearance, George felt certain contained nothing but jewels.

This he handed over to the keeping of his parent, while he continued his search.

In the dressing-table were several drawers, one of which George forced open.

This contained a leather bag filled full to the top with money, though of what kind he could not tell, as the mouth was tied up.

This he placed in his pocket, and then, having satisfied himself by a hasty glance around that there was nothing else in sight that would be worth carrying away, he quitted the chamber without having aroused the person or persons who occupied it.

Jonathan had, however, all the time been in a perfect fever of suspense.

The success, so much greater than he had expected, unnerved him.

"Now, George," he said, "you will go—will you not?"

"I think not, guv'nor. While we've got our hands in, we may as well get all that we can."

"But what more is there to take?"

"Do you forget those pearls?" he said, in a whisper.

"Forget them?—no; but I wish you would do so."

"Not a bit of it, guv'nor. I mean to have them. I have set my heart upon it, so it's no good for you to say a word."

"Then I will not accompany you."

"But I say you shall! Come on—you shall hold the light. Why, d—n it, it won't take a minute!"

"But I would rather not, George."

"What is it you are afraid of, guv'nor? You are trembling and shaking there like a leaf."

"I am not afraid."

"But I say you are."

"I tell you again I am not—I am cold."

"Well, you will be warmer presently. Be quick, I say—I don't intend to stand disputing here. Frightened of a dead body!—the idea is ridiculous! Why, she is but a woman. And supposing she had been alive, what could she have done to us? Just nothing at all. And of course she is more helpless now than ever, being dead."

But Jonathan Wild could not look at the transaction in such a philosophical light as his son did, and he still shrank from entering the chamber of death.

Yet he feared the consequences of flatly and openly refusing compliance with his son's requests.

His hand shook to such a degree that the light of the lantern went dancing all over the walls in a most eccentric manner.

It proved of little service to George, who continued to mutter all kinds of curses in a whisper.

Determined to have the matter over as quickly as possible, he hastened to the bedside.

Then, leaning over it, removed the row of pearls that had been twisted in the hair.

Hurriedly placing them in his pocket, he took hold of the necklace, and tried to unclasp it.

But the spring by which it was secured appeared to be of a very complicated description, and, try as he would, he could not get it undone.

His curses grew louder and deeper.

But yet the necklace was obstinate.

Then, his patience being altogether exhausted, he uttered an oath, and snatched the necklace violently.

Yet it did not break, and he repeated the snatch again and again.

At the third time the thread broke.

But at the same instant a wild and fearful shriek filled the apartment, echoed by a shout from George Wild, for he suddenly felt himself in the grasp of two icy-cold hands.

He was evidently in the grasp of the corpse, and this idea was such a truly horrible one that it caused even George Wild to lose his customary firmness and presence of mind.

He struggled furiously and fiercely to get free from the tenacious grip, but could not.

Trembling, and overcome with horror, Jonathan Wild dropped the lantern and rushed precipitately towards the window.

Such a noise as had now been made could not fail to awaken all the inhabitants of the house, and, accordingly, in a second there was a great tumult, for all were anxious to know what was the matter.

George fought, and struck, and struggled.

But he was deprived of his usual strength, or else he could have flung off such a grasp easily.

It was not for long, however, that he suffered his fears to get the better of him.

Summoning what fortitude he could to his aid, and recovering possession of his scattered faculties, he came at length to the conclusion that the person he had seen was not dead, but only insensible, and the violence he had used had resuscitated her.

This was conclusively proved by the actions of the supposed corpse, and by the continual shrieks that thrilled from her lips.

Still George could not free himself.

The sound of hastily-approaching footsteps and the appearance of flashing lights made him desperate.

Capture he feared was about to follow. The success he had so fondly felicitated himself upon was only the precursor of an utter failure.

With a mighty effort he released one arm, and no sooner did he feel it at liberty than he struck a fierce and random blow.

Another shriek that was pealing forth was cut short.

The grasp upon his other arm relaxed, and immediately after there was the sound of a heavy fall.

No sooner did he find himself free, than, forgetting all about the booty he had obtained with so much difficulty, George rushed to the window, sprang through it, and, reckless of personal consequences, flung himself into the garden.

The house was now in the greatest commotion.

A man carrying a long fowling-piece in his hand rushed into the room just as George quitted it.

He saw him spring over the balcony, and hesitated to follow him.

But, he raised his weapon to his shoulder, and, perceiving a dark figure on the ground below, he took aim hastily and pulled the trigger.

There was a stunning report, followed by a yell either of fright or agony.

Then the bright flash of the gun disappeared, leaving all objects plunged in deep darkness.

The rushing of footsteps and the rustling of the shrubs in the garden below proclaimed that the shot had not been very effectual.

In fact, George Wild had only been struck very slightly by some of the scattered shots, which were very small in size.

At first, however, he feared he was shot.

But finding the injury he had received was so trifling, he set forward with renewed vigour.

In advance he could hear distinctly the sound of a heavy footstep.

It was Jonathan, and he tried hard to overtake him.

He proved himself the fleetest runner of the two, and just as they reached the boundary of the estate he stood abreast with him.

Looking back, they saw lights moving about in the garden, as though the servants were searching there for them.

CHAPTER DCCVII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON TALK OVER THEIR FUTURE PROCEEDINGS.

"ESCAPED, guv'nor!" said George, in a gasping, breathless voice—"escaped!"

"Yes," said Jonathan, "luckily we have got off all right; but if you had been captured you would have had no one to blame but yourself. You refused to take my advice."

"Well, guv'nor, and what if I did? I think we have managed pretty well after all. We have left the plate behind us, it is true, but yet I don't grieve much about it, for it would have been difficult to carry, and more difficult still to dispose of."

Jonathan was silent, for he knew well enough that this was perfectly true.

"Come on," said George—"don't dally! The sooner we can reach our horses, mount them, and be off, the better it will be for us. Look—those rascals are actually coming this way!"

"Never mind them," said Jonathan. "We shall be able to outrun them easily as soon as we mount."

"We shall. Forward, guv'nor—twenty yards more will take us to the spot."

Twenty yards were soon traversed, and then, to their infinite satisfaction, they found their steeds safe and secure.

To untie them and to spring to the saddles took them only a moment, and then, choosing the best route they could find, they made their way as quickly as possible out into the open country.

They were careful not to emerge on the side of the plantation that faced the mansion they had entered.

While they had all those trees between themselves and their foes, they stood a better chance of making their escape.

George Wild's horse was slightly the best, and therefore he was able to keep the lead.

He directed his course completely at random, his sole intent being to get as far away from that part of the country as he possibly could.

Presently he ventured to decrease his speed, and he called out to Jonathan to do the like.

"There is no occasion to distress our horses now," he said; "we are safe and secure."

"Yes; though the escape we have had is truly marvellous."

"Never mind, guv'nor, so long as it was an escape. I am pleased to think that we have made such a good night's work of it."

"What do you intend to do next, George?"

"I have just been thinking; and it is a point that we had better talk over together. What have you to propose?"

"I am ready to listen to anything you have to say."

"You are very obliging, guv'nor, and I won't keep you in suspense. This money that we've got will, I hope, supply our immediate wants."

"No doubt it will."

"Well, then, you know our great object? It is to obtain possession of the girl. If we can only succeed, we will not let her slip through our fingers as we have done more than once in times gone by."

Jonathan sighed.

"What do you make that noise for, guv'nor?" asked his son.

"Why, I was thinking how strange it was that all the attempts I have made against the happiness of that girl have proved fruitless. Whenever I have captured her she has eluded me; and, in fact, I verily believe that I, and I alone, have been the means of bringing her into possession of her title and estates."

"Of course you have, guv'nor, and she ought to be grateful for it; and if she is not, we will try and make her, that's all, guv'nor!"

"But," said Jonathan, "I am at a loss to know how you are to effect your purpose."

"I don't know myself as yet, but you can tell me where she is most likely to be."

"No—that I can't."

"You speak too hastily, guv'nor. Think again for a moment or two. I am certain that you will recollect."

"Recollect what?"

"Why, some of your former cunning and skill. Have they quite deserted you?"

"I think so."

"And d—n me if I don't think the same! But you can answer me this question: Where was the late Lord Donnull in the habit of residing?"

"At his mansion in Oxfordshire."

"Do you know the situation of it?"

"Yes—quite well."

"Perhaps," said George, gleefully, "you have often been there?"

"I have."

"Into the house?"

"Yes—over almost every part of it."

"Well, then, if that's the case," said George, "what we have to do is as easy as easy can be."

"But how do you know the girl is there?"

"I don't know it, guv'nor; I only go by probabilities. Most likely she is there."

"Yes—I think so too."

"Well, then, guv'nor, turn your horse's head in that direction, and I will follow you. Ride as straight to it as you possibly can. Don't be afraid to get there too soon."

"Is it likely that I should have any such fear? But it seems to me, George, there is one thing you have forgotten."

"What's that?"

"Why, should we succeed——"

"Say when we have succeeded, guv'nor, and I will listen to what you have to say next."

"Well, then, when we have succeeded, what are we to do with the girl?—where are we to keep her?"

"That's well thought of, guv'nor—very well thought of. I confess it had quite escaped my notice."

"Yes, it is something that must be decided upon beforehand."

"Exactly. Can you give a suggestion?"

"Perhaps I could. Can you?"

"Not as yet."

"I confess the best way will be for us to think that point over as we ride along."

"With all my heart."

George Wild was by no means pleased at finding Jonathan in such a mood as he was at present, and he wondered what he could do to rouse him out of it.

He knew that it was only a temporary depression of the spirits, and that if he could only strike upon the right note an immediate alteration would be made.

Remembering what influence he had formerly obtained over him by merely pronouncing one word, he resolved to try the effect of pronouncing that word again.

"Guv'nor," he said, after a short pause.

"Well, what now?" was the gloomy, sullen answer.

"Why, you have been reminding me of something I have forgotten, and now it is my turn to remind you."

"Of what?"

"I say you quite forget, and, not to keep you in suspense, I will just say that you have told me more than once that there is only one thing that you live for, and that one thing is revenge."

Jonathan was silent.

"Do you hear what I say?" continued George. "Have you agreed to forego your intention? Have you altered your mind? Do you intend to allow your foes to obtain the complete mastery over you without some demonstration being made by you?"

"No," said Jonathan. "I have not forgotten, nor have I any such intention."

"Well, then, rouse yourself—summon up all your energies, and, by one bold stroke, place yourself in the position I propose."

Jonathan slowly shook his head.

"My many failures, and especially those that I have had lately, greatly dishearten me; in fact, I cannot by any means keep up my courage."

"Bah! You must! We shall soon be in better feather."

"I wish I could make sure of it."

"I am sure of it," said George.

"But I am not," returned Jonathan. "Yet——"

"Yet what?"

"If I could only once be aware that this girl who has given us so much trouble was once more in our power, my drooping spirits would revive. I should feel then I had the strength to do battle with my enemies. I would then do something that would make them remember there was such a man as Jonathan Wild in existence—something that would appease the intense longing for vengeance that I have felt so long!"

"Now you speak better, guv'nor," said George. "You are coming gradually to your senses. Don't feel afraid about the success of our plan. I feel quite confident in it."

"Do you indeed, George, honestly and truly, or are you saying it?"

"I do believe it, of course, for it seems to me nothing can be more simple. You know the situation of the place—are acquainted, in fact, with all its intricacies."

"Yes, yes—that's right!"

"Well, then, what so easy as for us, after we have arranged some place where we can keep her—you understand?"

"Yes, yes."

"What so easy as for us to take up our station somewhere near the mansion, and watch patiently for her to come forth alone? Whenever she does this—and you may depend that she will do it sooner or later—we will follow stealthily and silently in her steps, then seize her, and secure her before she can utter a sound that will give an alarm."

"Now you put it in that light, George," returned Jonathan, "it does indeed seem easy, and, in spite of all the past, I begin to feel renewed hope."

"Of course you do, guv'nor! It will not be long before her friends discover not only her loss, but that you had a hand in carrying her off. Then will be your time to make whatever terms you may think fit. You will have all of them in your power, and you can do what you like to glut your revenge."

Whether George was sincere or not in this is difficult to say; but his words produced upon Jonathan the effect he fully calculated and intended they should.

He waved his arms fiercely in the air, and muttered words escaped his lips.

Beyond all question, it was gratifying in the highest degree to him to be able to indulge then, with anticipation, in the prospect of obtaining a full and deadly vengeance upon all those he pleased to call his foes; and these, as the reader knows well, were those persons who had refused to permit him to do just exactly as he liked in the days when he wielded so much power.

George watched him with silent satisfaction.

Perhaps, ere long, we may be able to fathom the depths of his mind and understand what were the motives that actuated him.

For the present, however, we can only continue to describe what he did.

His end was best served, however, by keeping up in Jonathan's breast a spurious kind of courage—just enough, in fact, to enable him to be of use and service in any nefarious scheme that he might plan, and which required the aid of some one else besides himself to carry into due execution.

"Are you thinking over what I have said, guv'nor?" he asked, after a long silence. "I know well that it will bear thinking about, and the more you turn all things over in your mind, the more convinced you will be that if we're only moderately careful it will be impossible for us to fail in what we have agreed to do."

"You are right, George; and I promise you now that I will do the best in my power to second you in this enterprise. But if it fails?"

"Don't trouble yourself with that contingency," said George, hastily.

"But if it fails," added Jonathan, "I shall no longer have the heart or courage to try anything, no matter how bright and hopeful it may seem."

CHAPTER DCCVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON FEEL MORE AND MORE CONFIDENT AS TO THE RESULT OF THEIR DARING SCHEME.

"Do your best this time, guv'nor," replied George, "and I will answer for the result; don't let the idea of failure ever occur to your imagination."

"I will not."

"That's well said; and now tell me how far you think it may be from this place in Oxfordshire that you mention."

"Very many miles."

"How many?"

"I could not possibly pretend to tell you. I can only say that it is a long and weary journey that we have before us."

"Never mind that, guv'nor. Our horses are good, and will travel it easily; moreover, we have money to defray all expenses, and if we can only avoid the police officers, why then all will be well."

"So it will," said Jonathan, "and I sometimes think——"

"Think what?"

"That if I could only obtain a rest for a short time—not very long, but yet for a time—that I should regain my former energy."

"I should not wonder, guv'nor; but you must not talk of resting now. Wait until we can go to watch; then you can rest as much as you like!"

Every moment that elapsed seemed to have the effect of reviving Jonathan's energies, and he no longer spoke in the depressed, languid manner that he had hitherto done.

Looking forward into the future, he began to see what a many chances of success George's plan displayed.

Surely the abduction of Edgworth Bess could not be such a difficult matter if they were only careful to make their arrangements properly.

When once they had got her in their power, he knew what a tremendous advantage they would gain.

If they let her go again, it would be wholly and entirely their own fault—they would have no one to blame but themselves.

In fact, if Edgworth Bess was again so unfortunate as to fall into their clutches, her case would be pitiable indeed.

There was every probability of success, and the more the subject was pondered over by Jonathan, the more he was forced to this conclusion, and his spirits rose accordingly.

Next morning, just before daybreak, they stopped at a lonely roadside inn, the inhabitants of which were glad enough to hail two travellers, for it was seldom that people passed that way.

George began by making liberal promises of payment, so that the best the inn could afford was quickly placed before them.

"Now, landlord," he said, "we don't want to be disturbed; just let us alone until we choose to call for you, and you will find that you will be a considerable gainer."

Of course the landlord promised, and the two villains were left to themselves.

Although apparently in a position of so much safety, they adopted their usual precaution of sleeping and watching by turns.

Before either of them could close their eyes, however, they were obliged to look over the booty they had obtained.

[GEORGE WILD BREAKS OPEN THE CASKET.]

Accordingly the door was firmly secured to guard against any sudden intrusion, and then, one by one, the different objects were examined.

The leather bag was filled as full as it could possibly hold of guineas.

These were indeed most welcome, and better suited to their wants than anything else could have been.

With respect to the casket, however, they were much disappointed.

They reserved that for the last, imagining that it would prove the greatest prize.

The lock for a time baffled their attempts to open it, and George, having but little patience, took up the poker, and, with one well-directed blow, demolished the lid.

It was then discovered that only a few papers—letters, No. 150.—BLUESKIN.

apparently, and turned quite yellow with age—were contained in it.

They were tossed out, with many impatient gesticulations.

They came also across a small miniature portrait.

It was that of a young man dressed in the uniform of a British officer.

Not upon this account, however, did it attract the attention of Wild and his son.

They observed that the case was thickly set with diamonds and other precious stones.

These were worth preserving.

But the portrait itself they broke, and threw the fragments into the fire.

The same fate befel the letters and one or two other trinkets, doubtless relics of some dear departed friend or some lost love.

"In order to hide all traces of this," said George, "we had better break up the casket and burn it also."

Accordingly this was done, and then both feeling highly satisfied with the result of their night's work, and with the prospect they had before them, they drew lots as to who should sleep first.

The chance fell upon Jonathan, who was so excited by these varied events that had occurred that he quite forgot all his dread of slumber.

The fact was, his body was weary and his eyes heavy with want of sleep, and he no sooner laid himself down than he was sound asleep.

George watched patiently and well.

This was from the caution of the man's disposition.

Nothing, however, occurred to disturb them.

As usual, when nature had recovered herself, Jonathan began to be assailed by frightful dreams.

George knew the symptoms, and did not hesitate to wake him up at once.

Besides, his own eyes ached fearfully with watching.

Jonathan professed to be deeply thankful for having his rest broken.

After giving him very particular instructions not to fall asleep, George laid himself down on the rude settle which they had made do duty for a bed.

By dusk they were again in readiness for the road.

They paid the landlord so liberally that that individual jumped immediately to the very erroneous conclusion that two princes at the least had chosen to pass a few hours at his house.

He certainly did his best to please them and give satisfaction, for the horses were in capital condition.

"Now, guv'nor," said George, "we have one object before us, and let us keep it in view, and no other."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, you know what our intention is, and you know as well that we are now possessed of the means of carrying it out."

"Yes, yes."

"Well, then, don't let us attempt to engage in any adventure of any description, or be called off by any prospect of gain from what we are about."

"I agree to that with all my heart."

"I am glad you can see the policy and advisability of so doing."

"We seem to have got quite out of the way of the police. They must be searching for us in some other quarter, and I trust the same good luck will attend us all the way."

"So do I. But how near to London shall you have to go, guv'nor, in order to reach this place?"

"Why, not near it at all. It would be altogether out of the way to approach within thirty miles of it."

"So much the better, then. Rely upon it, the further we keep away the better."

"And," said Jonathan, "if we can make a good journey to-night, I should think one more night will almost bring us there."

"That's good news again, guv'nor. Our horses seem inclined to carry us well."

In this kind of conversation Jonathan and his son whiled away the tedium of their journey.

They were able to converse readily enough, for, in order to make their horses hold out, they went no faster than a trot.

The advantage of this was, that, although they did not appear to be going at any wonderful speed, yet it was continuous, and as the horses could keep up without resting for several hours at a stretch, they got over a much larger space of ground than they could have done had they put them to the gallop.

The whole of the night passed without one single adventure.

There was no incident that deserves to be placed upon record.

Once or twice they were met by people who they fancied looked suspiciously and doubtfully upon them.

But, after all, that might have been only their imagination.

On the next night they continued their journey as before, and this time without the occurrence of any incident except that they believed they saw at a distance some signs of the presence of a body of police officers.

If so, however, they were successful in avoiding them, and towards daybreak Jonathan declared that they must be within fifteen miles of their destination.

"Well, then, guv'nor," said George, as soon as this announcement was made to him, "it is pretty certain that we must be more than usually careful where we take up our quarters."

"Yes, there can be no doubt about that. I was just considering the point when you spoke."

"And I fancy, too," continued George, "that we are near enough to the place we are going to to look out for a permanent hiding-place. Do you know of anything that would suit?"

"I don't; but we must search around us to-morrow night."

"But where shall we pass the day?—that is the question."

"I don't know," was the reply. "To put up at an inn so near would be dangerous."

"Yes, the risk is too great to be thought of."

"Where else are we to go then?"

"Why, until some better place of shelter offers, I should recommend that we take up our quarters in a wood—there seem to be several about."

"Yes, I know of one," returned Jonathan, "that's of considerable extent, and in which we could conceal ourselves for almost any length of time."

"That's the place, then, guv'nor—lead us to it, and mind that you arrive before daylight; we will then consider our future proceedings."

"That's the way, then," said Jonathan, "and yonder is the wood."

He pointed across the country as he spoke, and by the aid of the moon George perceived, at no great distance off, a huge black mass of something that he could readily conceive was a wood.

Jonathan seemed perfectly familiar with his route, and therefore George followed him with the greatest confidence.

The road was rough and full of hollows, and they had to trust in a chief degree to the sagacity of their horses to keep them clear of these obstacles.

At length, however, the wood was gained in safety.

"Hurrah, guv'nor!" said George, as he plunged at once among the trees. "I feel now more assured of our success than ever; and if we can only find some place that will serve not only for us to hide but for us to keep our prisoner in, why then all will be as well as we could possibly wish. Success will be certain."

"I hope so," said Jonathan, "though where the kind of place we require is to be found, I confess I have not the remotest idea."

CHAPTER DCCIX.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON SUDDENLY FIND THEMSELVES IN UNEXPECTED QUARTERS.

"Some place must be found," said George, "though, to be sure, there's plenty of time. At present, the first thing we have to do is to make up our minds in what part of this wood we shall pass the day."

"Certainly."

"I think we shall have to dismount."

"Yes. The trees grow very thickly together, and the branches are low down to the ground, and even on foot you will find that we shall have some difficulty in forcing a passage."

These words were soon after verified.

Their clothes were torn and their flesh scratched by the brambles and other prickly shrubs that were growing on all sides.

But such trivial inconveniences as these were not heeded by Wild and his son.

The wood was situated upon the side of a hill, and rose up somewhat abruptly.

In places the ascent would be very steep, but in others comparatively easy.

Yet the whole journey was terribly fatiguing, and at length George said:

"Don't you think we have come far enough, guv'nor? Curse me—I am tired of this work!"

"A little further," was the reply. "Wait until we come to the next open space, and there we will stay."

To this George yielded a grumbling assent, and once more they continued to push through the trees.

Some time elapsed before a suitable spot was found.

At last, however, with great satisfaction, they halted in a little clearing about thirty yards in diameter at its widest part.

"This will do capitally," said George, "and thankful I am that we have at last pushed our way through those confounded trees. I hope we shall be able to find an easier way out again."

"Very likely we shall. But come, let us dismount and light a fire. We may as well make ourselves comfortable as not."

"But supposing the smoke should be seen?"

"It would only be attributed to gipsies," was the reply, and Jonathan stopped abruptly in what he was saying, and George uttered at the same time a loud cry of alarm.

A shrill whistle had sounded in their ears, and then immediately there dashed into the clearing some eight or ten ferocious-looking men.

At first, Wild and his son believed they were about to be attacked by police officers.

When they saw who their assailants really were, they felt considerably reassured.

These men were roughly and rudely apparelled, and presented altogether a truly hangdog appearance.

Their clothes were formed of the most heterogeneous materials, and were torn and worn in many places.

"Down with them!" they cried, rushing forward—"down with them! Have no mercy—no quarter!"

Luckily, Jonathan and his son had not alighted from their steeds, so they possessed a certain kind of advantage over their adversaries.

But the odds of two to ten or a dozen was truly fearful to think of. There could be only one result to such an unequal contest.

Jonathan held, however, displayed on the present occasion a good deal of his former presence of mind.

He raised his voice to a loud pitch, and cried:

"Hold—hold! Do not attack us, for you are interfering with your best friends. Attend to our wishes, and you shall have whatever reward you think proper to name!"

Such a magnificent offer as this was quite enough to take such miserable, wretched wretches by surprise, and therefore they one and all ceased in their attack.

"I will soon explain myself," cried Jonathan, finding the point he had gained. "But you must have some kind of a leader or captain among you. Let him step forward, and I will say more."

The men drew close together, and a whispered discussion took place between them.

It was followed by one of their number striding forward from the rest.

"You are the captain, then?" said Wild, eyeing him closely.

"I am," was the reply. "And now tell us how it is that you make yourselves out to be our friends. We are willing to listen to what you have to say, because we can make sure of your lives at any moment."

"You will find it to your advantage to hear us out patiently," said Jonathan. "We have come here to carry out a particular intention, which, nevertheless, does not concern you in the least; but if you like to aid us, there's a chance of earning more money than perhaps you will ever see again in the whole course of your lives!"

"Money is what we want," said the man. "Just show us a reasonable way of getting it, and we shall be content."

"It is a reasonable way," said Jonathan. "And now put down your arms all of you, and give me a proof that you mean well by us. On our part, we will give you an earnest of our liberality."

Jonathan made a sign to his son that he was not slow to understand.

He produced from his pocket the large bag of guineas, and, thrusting his hand into it, seized as many as he could grasp, and flung them towards the throng of men.

An immediate scramble ensued, and it was most ludicrous to observe how quickly the money was picked up.

It seemed scarcely to touch the ground.

"There," said Jonathan—"that's a trifle, and you can have more—as I said at first—if you choose to aid us!"

The captain's eyes sparkled when he saw the large bag of gold that George drew forth.

It effected a total change in his manner and behaviour.

From being defiant and insolent, he became cringing and obsequious in a moment.

"I beg your pardon, gentlemen," he said, touching his hat; "if I had known, you should not have had such a rough reception. However, as there is no harm done, perhaps it does not matter?"

"Not in the least," said Jonathan, in an offhand manner—"not in the least."

"Very well, then, from this moment you may count me and all my followers as your humble servants to command. Whatever you set us to do we will do faithfully and well."

"I will take you at your word," said Jonathan. "I want you to do no more at present than to show us to the place where you generally take up your quarters. You must have some lurking-place, I am convinced!"

"We have," was the reply, given with some slight degree of hesitation. "But if we show it to you, what guarantee have we that you will not betray us?"

"The best possible guarantee," replied Wild. "We shall pay you so well for what you do that you will have no occasion to make use of hiding-places in future."

"You promise well," said the captain, as he styled himself.

"And," said George, joining in the conversation, "you will find our performance of them as satisfactory as you can wish."

"Such being the case, then, follow me."

The captain—for so we may as well continue to call him, as we know no other name—turned round and beckoned to Jonathan and his son to follow in his footsteps.

They obeyed without the slightest hesitation.

They did not fear to go.

Near the edge of the enclosure, just where the ground began to rise abruptly, one of the men, at a sign from the captain, stooped down and seized hold of what appeared to be a long tuft of reeds and grass.

This he pulled energetically, and, to the astonishment of Jonathan Wild and George, a small opening in the earth, about large enough to admit a man's body, was disclosed.

"This is the way to our cave," said the captain. "I will go first, and you will follow next."

"And our horses," said Jonathan—"what will you do with them?"

"Leave them with one of the men. They will be perfectly safe, and well taken care of."

"Enough!" was the reply.

The captain lowered himself through the hole, and then disappeared.

Jonathan followed, and George after him.

Then came the other men, with the exception of two, who remained to take charge of the horses.

Jonathan found himself in a rudely-arched passage burrowed, to all appearance, out of the solid earth.

It wound about in a very tortuous fashion.

The darkness was profound, but the captain told them to walk on without fear, assuring them that there were no obstacles in their path.

Suddenly the whole party emerged into a cavern so vast and spacious that it was impossible to take in the whole dimensions of it at once.

It was lighted and warmed at the same time by a very large wood fire that was burning in the centre of it.

The blaze leaped up many feet into the air, and shed a ruddy and picturesque light upon all around.

In this cavern were several other men, who started upon seeing a couple of strangers.

But they were reassured immediately by their captain.

Soon afterwards the two men also came in who had had charge of the horses.

But they entered from the opposite end.

"There are more ways than one either in or out of this cavern," said the captain, in explanation. "It's a rather odd place, is it not?"

"It is indeed!" returned Wild. "I should never have thought of finding anything like it."

"I daresay not. But you see, the hill upon which the forest grows is almost hollow—it is literally filled with caverns, but this is the largest and the best of them all."

Wild and his son found much to admire in this singular place, and stood for a length of time gazing about them in astonishment.

At last, turning to the captain, they said:

"We are hungry, and require first a good meal. Don't spare your trouble or anything you have, for rest assured that we will pay well for all."

"We will not," said the captain. "You may depend upon our fidelity and willingness to serve you."

With these words he moved away, and George soon after touched Jonathan on the sleeve.

"Hush!" he said. "Don't speak on any account above a whisper, or seem surprised at what I am going to say!"

Jonathan only replied by a glance.

"Do you see how the captain is whispering and making signs to his men?" continued George, under his breath.

"I do!"

"Well, then, just beware! They may mean to act fairly by us, and it may be that my suspicions are unjust. However, no harm can result from keeping a close watch upon them."

"That's true enough," said Jonathan. "But what do you fear?"

"No more than I have said. I think, by all this hospitality, they are only acting a part—I don't believe they are sincere. It may be that they have trapped us into this place in order to obtain from us what money we have—that would be the easiest way of settling our business."

Jonathan was obliged to confess that this was correct, and the more he watched the captain and his men the more suspicious he grew.

They kept at some distance, and at one end of the cavern, whispering to each other, and apparently some most important subject was under discussion.

CHAPTER DCCX.

IN WHICH JONATHAN AND WILD JUNIOR HAVE A VERY NARROW ESCAPE OF THEIR LIVES.

THIS continued until the meal they were preparing was ready.

It was altogether a very rude repast, but yet to hungry men it was tempting enough.

A table was formed by placing three planks upon some blocks of wood that had been sawn from the trunks of some of the trees in the wood above.

Such blocks as these were used for seats.

"Eat," said the captain—"you are welcome to all we have. And what would you like to drink?"

"Brandy," said Jonathan—"have you brandy?"

The captain smiled significantly.

"The best there is in all England," he said. "I'll warrant there's none to equal it! I will go and fetch some. In the meantime, begin."

The captain moved off, and was absent for a considerable time.

But at last he returned, bringing with him several bottles that might be supposed to contain brandy.

"There," he said—"there they are. You can have one apiece, and I will have one, and here's one that can be shared among the rest."

The bottles were placed upon the table, and some drinking-cups beside them.

"Never mind drawing the corks," cried the captain. "Follow my example—it will save both time and trouble."

He took hold of one of the bottles as he spoke, and knocked the neck sharply against the edge of the table.

The glass broke at once, and a small portion of the spirit was spilt.

Jonathan and George both did the same, and so did the man who sat next to them.

"Fill up," said the captain—"fill up, and——"

He stopped, and, in a different tone of voice, ejaculated:

"What's that?"

The others turned round immediately.

This was an opportunity that George Wild had been hoping for, and yet fearing he should not gain.

He saw instantly that the attention of everyone was directed to another part of the cavern, and he took advantage of the fact to change his bottle for the one that was next to him.

Jonathan saw what he did.

His suspicions had been growing in strength.

Of course he was at no loss to comprehend his son's meaning, and, with exceeding dexterity, he followed his example.

The object that had so opportunely attracted the attention of the captain and his band was a man, who walked into the cave with the air of one who was thoroughly familiar with the place he was in.

He was recognised in a moment, and the captain sat down.

It was a critical moment, for Jonathan and George could not tell whether what they had done would be noticed.

Luckily, the alteration was passed over.

"I have returned sooner than you expected," exclaimed the new-comer; "but I can give you my reasons——"

"Hold!" said the captain, interrupting him, "we will talk about that another time. You see we have two visitors in the old cave."

The one who had just arrived looked with the greatest astonishment at the persons indicated.

"It's all right," said the captain. "They want us to do a little job for them, and are going to pay us for it like princes."

The other said nothing, but sat down close to the captain.

"Now," said that individual, rising to his feet, "fill up a bumper all of you, and I will give you a toast!"

He was obeyed instantly, and with great alacrity.

"Here's a long life and success to all of us, and may we earn the reward that has been promised us, and may it be larger than we expect!"

The glasses were drained.

But George took care to keep an eye upon all that was going on while he was drinking.

He observed that the man and the captain exchanged significant glances with each other.

He felt then that his surmise was correct—that the brandy had been drugged.

The whole motive of the men's conduct was now plainly enough displayed to him.

They had seen his money, and had resolved to adopt the easiest means of obtaining it.

This was to lure them into the cavern, and then render them insensible with brandy.

After that, it would be the easiest thing in the world to put them to death, to rifle their bodies of all the valuables they possessed, and dig a hole for them in one corner of the cave.

They would reckon that by adopting this course they would be sure to gain more than if they trusted to the fair promises that had been made to them.

Moreover, they would feel quite sure that the secret of the cave could not possibly be divulged.

The brandy must have been skilfully drugged, for neither the captain nor his men noticed any peculiarity in it, as George fully expected them to do.

Having obtained the bottle the captain intended for his own use, Jonathan drank deeply of its contents.

He was not alarmed for the results.

George watched the brandy disappear; but he knew well enough that Jonathan could take an immense quantity of the fiery beverage without the least appearance of intoxication.

But he noticed that the captain, and his men as well, seemed exceedingly pleased at every glass that was swallowed.

For his own part, he fought shy of the brandy altogether.

He was not accustomed to drink it in such huge draughts as his father.

Moreover, he felt that, let the stuff be what it might, he was better without it.

This was noticed, and the captain said, with some anxiety:

"You shirk your glass. Why do you do that? Is not the brandy good?"

"First rate," said George; "but I am not much of a tippler. However, it is really so good that I shall have one glass more! Here's to the health of you all!"

He drained the glass to the last drop. The captain now felt that he had his prey pretty secure.

"Well, now," he cried, "as we are all here together comfortable, just let us know the nature of the service you require us to perform?"

"All in good time—all in good time! We will let you know that, and the amount of the reward as well."

"Oh yes!" said the captain, with a silly, half-vacant laugh—"the amount of the reward, of course! Aha! now I call that a good joke!"

"What?"

"Nothing—oh, nothing! But what's this? I—

Confound it, what's it mean?"

He rubbed his eyes and his head vigorously. The fumes of the drugged brandy were mounting to his brain.

He could not make it out at all. The effects of the drug, though slow to come, were very rapid when they once displayed themselves.

A kind of mist floated before him, and far away in the distance he fancied he could see his two strange visitors sitting calm and composed.

"What's this?" he cried again, making an effort to speak in a loud voice, but failing in the attempt—"what's this?"

The question was little more than an inarticulate murmur.

But he rose to his feet, and made several frantic efforts to stand still.

It was in vain. He sank down again upon his seat.

The same effects were visible upon all the rest, though some of the men had only drunk sparingly of the brandy.

They had taken the alarm from their captain's manner.

George sprang rapidly on to the table, and called out to Jonathan to follow him.

"Draw your sword!" he said. "Place yourself back to back to me, and cut them down without mercy if they attack us!"

The men were alarmed at this sudden movement.

They tried to produce the various weapons they carried.

But their arms had lost all use and power. Their limbs seemed suddenly smitten with paralysis.

"Keep them at bay," said George, "and we shall be saved the trouble of killing them, for beyond a doubt the drug was a poisonous one."

His words were soon verified.

Several of the men, the captain included, after trying to steady themselves upon their feet, fell down, and lay as helpless as logs round the table.

Then others pressed forward with the intention of attacking the two strangers.

But the effects of the drug overpowered them, and they sank back.

Then others endeavoured to make their escape from the cavern.

But before they could reach its place of exit they dropped down upon the ground like poisoned rats.

In less than ten minutes afterwards there was not one of them that showed even the least symptoms of animation.

"We've tumbled in for a good thing, guv'nor," said George, in his usual careless tones.

Jonathan shuddered.

He could not treat the frightfully narrow escape they had had so lightly.

"We might have been worse off," continued George, as he jumped off the table. "Come, guv'nor, don't be scared—let us make the most of this strange adventure!"

"Strange truly!" replied Jonathan. "I confess that I am scarcely able to comprehend it yet."

"Oh! the whole thing is simple enough," said George, "as you will find as soon as ever you begin to reflect."

"But horrible!" said Jonathan. "But for you I should have drunk enough of the poison to kill fifty men."

"Very likely you would. But perhaps your suspicions would have been aroused as mine were; I thought their behaviour strange from the very first."

"Well, they are justly punished for their treachery."

"Yes, and, what's better, we've got this place all to ourselves, guv'nor, and what better place do you think we could wish for?"

"What, to take up our quarters in?"

"Yes. Didn't the captain tell us that all under this hill was burrowed with caverns? Why, we might bid defiance to detection here for any length of time, and keep our prisoner perfectly secure."

"That's true enough," said Jonathan, "though I should prefer some other cave to this, if we could find it."

"So should I."

"And our horses—I wonder what they have done with them?"

"They are safe enough above, no doubt," was the reply.

"But before we do anything more we must ascertain whether these fellows are really insensible or dead."

"It will be hard to tell that."

"Perhaps it will; so the safest plan will be to bind them all. Then, if they wake up, they will not be able to do us any damage."

"But the necessary material?" said Jonathan—"where are we to find that?"

"Let us look around," was the reply. "Depend upon it such fellows as these have all things of the kind ready to hand. We shall find rope enough, never fear!"

These words were true enough, for in one corner they found several coils of strong rope.

With these they bound the insensible men in such a manner that, if they recovered their consciousness, they would be utterly unable to make any aggressive movement.

This work occupied a considerable time.

But it was performed with very great cheerfulness.

"Now, then, guv'nor," said George, "I think we may make so bold as to say that we are perfectly secure. And now to carry out our little plan of operations."

CHAPTER CXXI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD CONTINUE THEIR SEARCH AFTER JONATHAN WILD WITH UNREMITTING DILIGENCE.

ONCE more we return to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, who were continuing their pursuit of Jonathan Wild in a manner as energetic as it was systematic.

It will be remembered that they contrived to pass the police officers on the road, and pushed on as fast as their horses would take them.

They were anxious to get as much in advance of the police officers as they could, so that they should be free to act independently of them.

After what had occurred, they felt very little inclination to place the least dependence upon their skill in either taking Jonathan prisoner or keeping him secure when they had taken him.

This duty, then, they resolved at all risks to assume.

Certainly if once they were so fortunate as to come up with Jonathan Wild, no skill or adroitness on his part would ever get him out of their clutches.

It would be in vain for him to attempt to make any escape.

They would not rest until they had seen him safely lodged in Newgate.

What they had heard filled them with hope.

Surely the moment was close at hand when they would be able to seize him?

Still, as we know, they were very much behind Jonathan in reality, for the movements of that individual had lately been very uncertain.

But they were able to trace him with tolerable accuracy as far as the farm-house, when, to their surprise, they learned by accident that he had positively returned to London.

This was most unfortunate and vexatious.

They understood clearly enough how they had missed him on the way, yet, far from allowing this failure to daunt them, they retraced their steps with a stronger determination in their minds than they had hitherto felt.

This journey up to London was not marked by any particular events.

At various by-places they heard intelligence of the man they sought, and it was perfectly clear that George Wild was in his company.

But at this time, while Jack and Blueskin were journeying back to London, Jonathan was actually on his way to the cavern in which, as we have seen, he had such strange adventures.

Therefore, upon reaching London, there was only another disappointment in store for the two friends.

With great difficulty, and only by the practice of the greatest ingenuity, they discovered that Jonathan had left, taking, as near as could be learned, the very same route as before.

This mystified them not a little.

They could not comprehend the meaning of such extraordinary conduct.

Could they but have known a little about the Jacobite conspiracy, everything would have been clear and plain enough.

When they learned that those they sought had missed them by little more than a hair's-breadth, they again prepared to continue their pursuit.

But this incessant labour told severely upon both of them.

They were so jaded and wearied with travelling so many miles without rest that they were scarcely able to sit in their saddles.

But they knew every moment they lost was of the greatest value.

Soon after they set out again they were overtaken by a violent and tremendous storm, that made it a matter of imperative necessity that they should seek shelter in some place or other.

Jack was unwilling at first, great as his fatigue was.

But the tempest increased to such a terrific pitch that it was no longer possible to remain under the open sky.

They were scarcely clear of London, and just at this time they entered one of its straggling suburbs.

Not a soul was to be seen in any of the streets.

But from the windows of one house there came bright and ruddy beams of light.

"There's an inn," said Blueskin. "Come, Jack, we must shelter there until this storm is past. To continue our journey would be impossible."

Blueskin turned down the entrance to the stables as he spoke, and Jack followed him.

The ostler protected himself by throwing a sack over his shoulders, and came out to take charge of the horses.

"See to them well," said Blueskin, as he dismounted.

"All right, gentlemen—you leave them to me."

"Come on," said Blueskin; "the sooner we get under cover the better."

They ran across to the inn as he spoke, and, pushing open the door, entered.

They found themselves at once in a kind of tap-room or kitchen, in which a great number of persons were seated.

They were people of almost all grades and of all kinds of appearances, and had been driven to take shelter by the storm.

Never before, probably, had the inn contained so many visitors at one time.

The kitchen in which they sat was cheerful enough, and formed a very delightful contrast to the storm that was raging so violently without, and threatening every moment to shake the inn to its foundations.

Among so many, two more were scarcely likely to be noticed, and, instead of pushing forward to the fire as most did, our two friends contented themselves with an obscure corner, where they would be less likely to be noticed.

Ale was brought to them, and they sat listening to whatever was going on, for on more than one occasion they had acquired valuable information in this chance and unexpected manner.

But the chief topic was the storm, which was one of so violent a character as to have no parallel in the memory of those who were then present.

Presently, however, the door was opened, and a miserable, half-starved-looking object, drenched to the skin, made his appearance.

His clothes were rusty-black, and worn quite threadbare, though, as they had been well wetted by the rain, they presented a glossier appearance than they did usually.

The same might be said of his hat.

So thin was this man—so wretched and so poverty-stricken in his whole appearance—that he immediately attracted the attention of all the persons in the room.

"I humbly beg your pardons, all of you," he said, in a shrill, piping voice, "but this storm was so dreadful that I was obliged to come in. Don't turn me out, Mr. Landlord—pray don't!"

"I am not likely to do that," was the bluff reply.

"Oh, I don't know," continued the old man—"I am often turned out because I have no money. Now to-night I have not a halfpenny, so that if you allow me to remain here out of reach of the storm, and where I can see the fire, it will be from charity only."

"Well, I am not a man to refuse such charity as that," said the landlord, "and, what's more, you can have a cup of ale to warm yourself with—you look as if you were frozen to the bone."

"I am—I am," was the shivering reply. "I was caught some distance off, and even when I reached this house I hesitated a long while before I ventured to come in, for fear that I should be driven out again."

"But what are you?" said the landlord, giving him the cup of ale he had promised. "You say you are very poor, yet you don't look like a beggar."

A faint flush of colour rose up into the countenance of the old man as he replied:

"No, I am no beggar—I have never begged anything but such a favour as I have asked you in all my life."

"And yet so poor?"

"Yes, very poor; I have been unfortunate."

By common consent, all the people in the room ceased talking, in order to listen to this little dialogue between the landlord and the old man.

Simple as it seemed, yet, from the appearance of the parties, they were strangely and powerfully interested in it.

"But, come," said the landlord, "you have not told us what you are—surely you must have some profession or avocation?"

The flush of colour upon the old man's countenance deepened as he replied:

"Yes, yes—it is true enough, I have a profession, but it is a poor one—a miserable one. I wish I had chosen some other."

"But what are you?" cried the landlord, growing impatient that his question should not be replied to.

"An author," said the old man, timidly.

"An author?" repeated the landlord.

"Yes; do you not understand what I mean by that?"

"Yes, you mean you write things."

"You are perfectly correct."

"I know you are always poor," said the landlord. "I have met with folks like you before to-night. Now what do you write?"

"Anything," was the reply—"anything that you like to mention. I can sing a song too, though my voice is not so good as it used to be, still I can sing, and I will make one up as I go along if you like, and bring in all that is taking place around us."

"Can you do that?" said the landlord.

"Yes, I can."

"Well then, let's hear you."

A loud knocking upon the tables by way of applause followed this proposition.

The old man's eyes brightened a little.

"Perhaps," he said, hesitatingly—"perhaps, good people all, if I amuse you by what I do you won't mind giving me a trifle for what I do?"

"No—no, certainly not," said the landlord. "I will go round to all, and we will raise a subscription for you."

This was a tempting offer to the old man, and for a moment or two he was quite overcome by it.

Then, in his peculiar, thin, shrill voice, he commenced a kind of doggerel song, bringing in with considerable address his own poverty and wretchedness, the storm, the generosity of the landlord, and the kindness of his auditors.

Of the poem or song in a literary point of view but little in the way of admiration can be said, but yet, as he praised everybody from landlord downwards, it was universally appreciated and applauded.

"Capital," said the landlord, when he had finished. "Now then, I will go round and see what I can get."

All gave something—some little, some much, but in the aggregate there was a goodly sum.

The poor author was profuse in his acknowledgments.

"Let us have another yet," said some one, "and we will pass the hat round again—this will be a good night's work for you, old fellow."

"I can't sing you another song, I am afraid," returned the old man—"I am getting too old and too weak to sing; it tries my voice too much; but I have something here which perhaps will amuse you quite as well—perhaps better."

Great curiosity was immediately manifest to know what this something was.

Slowly and carefully the old man unbuttoned his coat, and from one of his pockets produced a small roll of paper.

This he opened carefully and gently, and smoothed out with his hands.

It could then be seen that the roll was composed of several sheets of paper covered all over with very close writing.

"Now then, old boy," said the landlord, slapping him playfully on the back, "what have you got there? let us know what it is?"

CHAPTER DCCXII.

IN WHICH THE POOR AUTHOR READS HIS TALE.

"It is a little tale," was the reply, "founded on something that actually occurred. It's the last thing I have written, and I am in hopes that before long I shall be able to find a purchaser for it. I was on my way to London when the storm broke out."

"And you thought about reading it to us?" said the landlord.

"Yes," was the reply, "I think it will interest you, and serve to pass a few minutes away. It will not take me long to read it—not long enough to tire you by listening, I feel assured."

"Well," said the landlord, glancing around him, "what says the company—are you willing to hear this tale read instead of having another song?"

A unanimous "Yes, yes" came from all sides, followed by some applause that so excited the old man and made his hand tremble to such a degree that he could not hold his papers still enough to read them.

At last, amid a profound silence, he began, in a low, wavering tone at first, but as he warmed with his subject and grew more interested in it, his tones grew louder and louder.

"Toby Symptom," he began, "a pattern to Quakers, inhabited a neat little house in London, beautified by the presence of his daughter Mary.

"She—scarcely seventeen, a beautiful blonde, with blue eyes, and possessing as much wisdom as beauty—was sought by all the young men among her father's acquaintance.

"Those of the neighbourhood tried in vain to win a smile. Mary was not a coquet, and so far from turning to account the effect produced by her charms, she felt so much annoyed by it that she could hardly treat with civility her many admirers, one only excepted—William Beresford, a young artist who was intimate with the family.

"A simple occurrence was the cause of this intimacy.

"Premature death had taken away the wife of the Quaker, still in her youth and beauty, and he, wishing to perpetuate the memory of one so near to him, had called a painter to her death-bed.

"It was there that William first met the afflicted daughter.

"There, between the tears of one and the sacred employment of the other, grew up a serious attachment.

"A year passed over, that only served to strengthen the bond formed under such circumstances, and the young man had already ventured to declare his hopes and desires.

"Toby had no reasons for opposing the inclinations of the young couple.

"Without being rich, William earned, by means of his brush and palette, enough honourably to maintain a family.

"His father, Mr. Beresford, an old city merchant, had retired with an immense fortune, a rare example of rapid success in speculations so rapid that very few persons had been able to follow their progress.

"Mr. Beresford, being of a quick, stern disposition, lived alone in the West End of London, without troubling himself about his son, and leaving his son to shift for himself.

"He was one of those obliging egotists who trouble no one in order not to be troubled themselves—one of the most perfectly complaisant, providing nothing is asked of them.

"William, then, had nothing to hinder his courtship of the fair Quakeress.

"Knowing well that her father would not oppose her marriage, the situation of the lovers was most prosperous; and honest Toby waited for nothing to fix the wedding-day, saving the back rents due from his farms, intending to set apart that income to defray the expenses of the occasion.

"With this view, he left for the country, a few miles from London, in order to arrange his affairs.

"He was absent from home but a single day, and returning at night on horseback, he perceived, a little in advance, a horseman who blocked up the road.

"He stopped for a moment, uncertain whether to proceed or to turn back.

"While in this predicament, the stranger advanced towards him.

"It was too late to think of escaping, and, putting the best possible face on the affair, he started his horse again.

"As he approached the troublesome stranger, he perceived that he was masked—an unpleasant augury of what was soon confirmed.

"The unknown drew a pistol, and pointing it to the traveller, demanded his purse.

"The Quaker was not a coward, but, calm in character, inoffensive in religion, and unable to resist an armed man, he drew from his pocket, with the greatest coolness, his purse, containing twelve guineas.

"The highwayman took it and counted out the money, and let the Quaker pass, who, believing himself cleared, quickened his pace to a trot.

"But the highwayman, seeing how little resistance had been offered, and hoping for more booty, soon rejoined honest Toby, and again blocked up the way, and, pointing his pistol, cried out:

"Your watch!"

"The Quaker, although surprised, did not show it in the least, and coolly took out his watch, and, noticing the time, placed the jewel in the hand of the thief, saying:

"Now, I pray you, let me go home, for my daughter will feel uneasy at my absence."

"One moment," replied the masked cavalier, growing more urgent by his continued docility. "Swear that you have no other sum!"

"I never swear," replied the Quaker.

"Well, then, affirm that you have about you no more money, and, upon the word of a highwayman, I will not resort to violence towards a man who yields with so much grace. I will no further molest you."

Toby reflected a moment, and shook his head.

"Whoever thou art," he said, gravely, "you have noticed that I am a Quaker, who would not conceal the truth, although at the risk of my life. In my saddle-bags I have the sum of two hundred pounds sterling."

"Two hundred pounds sterling?" cried the highwayman, whose eyes glistened through his mask.

"If you are good—if you are humane," replied the Quaker—"you will not take away this money. My daughter is about being married, and this sum is necessary for the occasion. It would be a long time before I could get together a similar one. The dear child loves her intended, and it would be exceedingly cruel to deny their union. You have a heart—perhaps you have loved. You would not—cannot do so wicked an action!"

"What's your daughter, her lover, or their marriage to do with me? Fewer words and more promptness! Give me the money!"

Toby, sighing, raised the saddle-bags, took out a heavy sack, and handed it slowly to the masked man, and then attempted to gallop off.

"Hold on, my Quaker friend!" said the other, seizing the bridle. "The moment of your arrival, you will denounce me to the magistrates—that is usual, and I have nothing to say; but I must at least be beyond a pursuit to-night. My mare is feeble enough, and, what's more, she is fatigued. Your horse, on the contrary, appears vigorous, for the weight of the sack did not encumber him. Dismount. Give me your horse. You may take mine if you wish."

"It was too late to think of resisting, and, although the increasing demands were of a nature to heat the bile of the most patient man, Toby dismounted, and with resignation accepted the sorry jade that was left in exchange.

"Had I known this," he contented himself with thinking, "I should have run away when I first met the rascal, and certainly he would never have overtaken me with this courser."

"Meanwhile, the masked man, thanking him ironically for his complaisance, burying his rowels in the horse's flanks, disappeared.

"Before arriving in London, the plundered traveller had time to reflect upon his situation, and upon the disappointment of the poor young folks who loved each other so much, and whose happiness would be postponed.

"The sum taken from him was irrecoverably lost. There was no means to find or recognise the audacious thief.

"Nevertheless, as though struck by a sudden idea, he stopped short.

"Yes," he said, "I may succeed by this means. If this man resides in London, perhaps I shall be able to find him, as Heaven has doubtless determined that he should be imprudent."

"A little consoled by some hope, Toby went home, without appearing in the least trouble, and without speaking of his adventure.

"He did not go to the magistrate, but embraced his daughter, who, doubting nothing, retired and slept soundly.

"Next morning, he bethought himself to aid Providence to make researches.

"Bringing out the mare from the stable where she had passed the night, he placed the bridle upon her neck, hoping that the animal, guided by habit, would naturally go to her master's house.

"He let the unchecked beast go free in the streets of London, and followed her.

"But he overrated her instinct.

"For a long time she walked about, making a thousand turns and curves, without object, without directions—sometimes stopping, then starting in a contrary direction. "Toby despaired.

"The thief," he thought, "never resided in London. How silly I was not to notify the magistrate before it was too late, instead of depending upon the animal to find the way!"

"He was interrupted in his reflections by the cries of children who had been nearly trod upon by the mare.

"A moment since so quiet, she now started to run.

"Stop her—stop her!" cried everyone.

"Let her go!" cried the Quaker. "In the name of Heaven, don't stop her!"

"Following with anxiety the course of the animal, he saw her enter the half-open gateway of a splendid residence at the West End.

"It's here," thought the Quaker, raising his eyes to heaven in thanks to Providence.

"Then, in passing before the house, he saw a servant in the yard patting the beast and conducting her to the stables.

"He then asked the first person he met the name of the occupier of the house.

"What! are you such a stranger in this part of the town that you don't know the residence of the rich merchant, Beresford?"

"Toby's astonishment prevented him from replying.

"Beresford!" repeated the man, believing that he had not been understood—"you know well—the man who has made so great a fortune."

"Thanks, my friend—thanks!" replied Toby.

"He was unable to recover himself.

"Beresford—William's father—a respected man—he my thief!"

"He believed himself the butt of a dream, and wished to return home. Nevertheless, he called to mind several instances of respectable men who had been connected with bands of malefactors. Then this immense fortune, the source of which was so uncertain—then this mare, who seemed to be going to her master.

"Toby resolved to solve the mystery.

"He went boldly into the yard, and demanded speech with the master, who, although it was nearly noon, was still in bed—another indication of a night of fatigue.

"The Quaker insisted upon being introduced immediately, and soon found himself in Beresford's bed-chamber.

"He had just awoke, and rubbing his eyes, asked, a little out of humour:

"Who are you, sir, and what do you want?"

"The sound of the voice awakened Toby's recollection and completed his conviction.

"Quietly taking a chair, he posted himself near the bed, without removing his hat.

"You remain covered!" said the surprised merchant.

"I am a Quaker," replied the other, with much calmness, "and, you know, such is our usage."

"At the first words, Beresford sprang up, and closely examined his visitor.

"He recognised him, and turned pale.

"Well," he asked, stammeringly, "what is the business that has brought you hither?"

"I ask pardon for having shown so much haste," replied Toby, "but among friends it is not usual to stand upon much ceremony, and I have come, without form, to ask you for my watch, which you borrowed yesterday."

"The watch?"

"I value it much. It was my poor wife's, and I cannot do without it! My brother-in-law—the alderman—would never forgive me for letting a jewel which recalls to mind his sister pass from my hand a day!"

"The name of the alderman seemed to make some impression upon Beresford.

"Without waiting for a reply, Toby continued:

"You will much oblige me by returning those ten guineas which I lent you at the same time. Nevertheless, if you are in want of them, I consent to lending them to you, upon the condition that you give me a proper receipt."

"The coolness of the Quaker so much disconcerted the merchant that he did not deny the possession of the stolen articles; but, not wishing to acknowledge it, he hesitated to reply, and Toby added:

"I have told you of the projected marriage of my daughter Mary. I had reserved a sum of two hundred pounds sterling for the bride's portion; but I have met with an accident. Last evening, on the London Road, I was completely robbed—so completely that I have come to pray you to give your son a marriage portion, which had it not been for that I should never have asked of you."

"My son?"

"Eh?—yes. Don't you know that it is he who is in love with Mary, and is to marry her?"

"William?" cried the merchant, throwing himself at the foot of the bed.

"William Beresford," calmly replied the Quaker, taking a pinch of snuff. "Let us see you do something for him; I should not like him to know what passed last night, but if you do not furnish the sum I have promised, it will be necessary for me to tell him how I lost it."

"Beresford ran to a desk, opened it, and placed in Toby's hand his watch, his purse, and his sack of money.

"Good!" said the Quaker, on receiving them. "I see that I was right in depending upon you."

"Is that all you wish?" asked the merchant, in a brisk tone.

"No—I require something further of your friendship."

"Speak!"

"You must disinherit your son."

"How?"

"You must disinherit him. I don't wish it to be said that I have speculated upon your fortune."

"And speaking these words, the Quaker left the chamber.

"No," he murmured, when alone, "children are not bound by the faults of their parents. Mary shall marry the son of this man, but touch his stolen money—never!"

"Ho, my friend!" he cried to Beresford as soon as he was in the yard, for he perceived the merchant looking out of window—"order my horse to be brought out."

[THE CONSTERNATION AT THE ROADSIDE INN.]

"A few minutes after, Toby, well mounted, carrying behind him his bag of money, and provided with his watch and purse, at a moderate pace regained his house.

"I have just made my marriage visit to your father," he said to William, whom he found there. "I believe that we shall be able to agree."

"Two hours afterwards, Beresford arrived at Toby's house, and taking him aside, said:

"Honest Quaker, your proceedings have touched me to the bottom of my heart. You might have dishonoured me, dishonoured my son, ruined me in his eyes, and made him unhappy in refusing him your daughter. You have acted like a wise man and a man of heart. I wish no longer to blush in your presence. Take these papers. Good-bye—you will never see me again!"

"He then left.

"The Quaker opened the papers.

No. 151.—BLUESKIN.

"First there were cheques for large amounts on the first houses in London.

"Then came a list of names, and by the side of each name was placed the amount of larger or smaller sums. A note was joined to it, upon which the Quaker read as follows:

"These are the names of those who have been robbed. The figures are the amounts that ought to be returned. Draw the money from my bankers, as though for the purpose of foreign exchange, and then make the restitution secretly. All which remains will be my legitimate fortune, and your daughter will be able to accept of my inheritance."

"The next morning Beresford had left London, and all believed that he was gone to live on his income in France.

"On the marriage day of William and Mary, the Quaker assembled a large number of joyous friends, among whom might be noticed a number of persons rejoicing themselves with the proceeds of the London thieves, who, by the interference of Toby, had been induced to return to them their stolen property with interest.

CHAPTER DCCXIII.

A SINGULAR AND UNEXPECTED ARRIVAL TAKES PLACE AT THE ROADSIDE INN.

The old man's tale was listened to with the utmost attention, and when he concluded it he was saluted with a universal burst of applause.

"Good—very good, sir!" said the landlord. "I like that better than your song. If there's one thing more than another that tickles my fancy, it is a good tale well told. I will go round with the hat; and we ought to collect something good this time, for it has been a regular treat."

The old man blushed, and appeared greatly confused at hearing the rough praises.

But he was needy and in want, and therefore he watched the circulation of the hat with very great interest.

All contributed as largely as they could afford, and the poor author could scarcely believe that he had suddenly grown so rich.

"I wish I could thank you, gentlemen all," he said, as he pocketed the coin—"that is, I can thank you, but not in the manner that you deserve. However, you must take the will for the deed."

This they were by no means disinclined to do.

Jack and Blueskin had been interested with what was going on, but now the former, leaning towards his companion, whispered:

"Don't you think it is time we were starting?"

"I do; the storm appears to have given over."

"It does; we will pay our reckoning and be off. I am glad we took shelter here, for we have rested ourselves and not attracted any suspicion."

"You are right."

Just as Blueskin was in the act of summoning the landlord, a sudden commotion arose outside, and by a natural kind of instinct he paused in order to ascertain if possible the cause of it.

The hoarse murmur of many voices, the trampling of feet, and a babel of other sounds could now be heard, each moment increasing in plainness as they drew nearer to the inn.

"Bless my heart!" ejaculated the landlord—"what's that?"

So suddenly had the noise come upon them, that all sat perfectly still in their seats incapable of doing anything further than staring into each other's countenances.

Before the landlord could go to the front door it was suddenly dashed open, and a throng of persons poured in.

At first, nothing could be distinguished but a turbulent mass of people; but when they all entered the kitchen and drew aside somewhat, it was perceived that they carried some dark, heavy object.

As soon as it was caught sight of an immediate and intense interest was felt in it.

The men were carrying a wooden hurdle that had been hastily torn up from some field, and on it lay at full length a human form that was covered up, however, by a large, black riding cloak.

"An accident?" said the landlord.

"Yes," was the reply, as they set their burden down in front of the fire—"a sad accident too, I'm afraid. Is there a surgeon anywhere about?"

"If it is no more than a simple hurt," said a voice, "I can attend to it."

"Come forward, then."

An elderly man rose up from where he had been sitting and came towards the fire.

He stooped down and drew aside the cloak, asking as he did so:

"How did the accident happen?"

"He was thrown from his horse," was the answer; "the animal suddenly grew restive about something—the storm, we suppose—and threw him off with great violence; he has laid perfectly still ever since, showing no signs of life."

"I don't think he is dead either," said the one who had volunteered to come forward; "if we are careful we may restore him."

"Let him be carried upstairs at once," said the landlord; "in a case like this, who could help being charitable?"

Perhaps the landlord was induced to make this speech by the appearance of the stranger.

He was dressed plainly, but yet in rich attire, and no doubt if he recovered he would pay handsomely for the attention that had been paid; or, on the other hand, if he died, he would have relatives who would defray all expenses with the same amount of liberality.

Surely this stranger could be nothing either to Jack or Blueskin, and yet they felt a strange inclination to linger.

To be sure, although the thunder and lightning had ceased, the rain continued to fall, and this might have been one reason for their remaining.

At any rate, they stopped, though they did not crowd round the body like some of the others did.

"Yes," said the one who had taken upon himself the duties of a surgeon, "he would be much better carried upstairs and placed in a bed—let it be done forthwith."

"Very good," said the landlord, with a flourish. "Mary Jane, light a large fire in the best front bedroom."

"What sort of a staircase is it?" asked the surgeon.

"Why?"

"If it is a broad one we can carry him up on the hurdle just as he is, and that would be better than disturbing him."

"Oh yes, you can manage that," was the answer.

"Come along then, three or four of you," said the surgeon; "lift him up carefully—mind how you do it. There, that will do."

When the hurdle was raised, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard could not forbear from standing up in the hope of obtaining a glimpse of the person that lay extended upon it.

The cloak still remained covering over a portion of his body, but the face remained fully revealed.

No sooner did they catch sight of it than both started violently, and it was only by a powerful exercise of self-control that they prevented the escape of an ejaculation from their lips.

But for the fact that the attention of all present was concentrated upon one object, the change in their manner must have been noticed.

As it was, it escaped observation altogether.

The next moment the strange-looking procession passed out of the kitchen and made its way upstairs.

Jack and Blueskin did not follow—they were glad of the opportunity of saying a few words to each other as soon as they were left alone.

"Good heavens!" ejaculated Jack—"can it be possible?"

"I can scarcely believe my own eyes," answered Blueskin. "I was regularly staggered."

"So was I; but yet there can surely be no doubt. Are you quite sure of his identity?"

"Quite certain; I could point him out from a thousand. I am as sure that he is Steggs as I am that you are Jack Sheppard."

"Hush—hush! pray don't mention that name under any roof, even in a whisper—you know not what ears may catch it."

"True; the caution is a good one, and you will find that I shall not offend again. However, as we are alone, let us have a few words on this point."

"Well, the question is for us to consider whether his accidental presence here has anything to do with us?"

"I should think not."

"So should I; but yet you must remember how closely and intimately connected he is with what we have sworn to accomplish, and also that he is now, or was when we last heard of him, in close attendance upon Edgworth Bess."

Jack started again.

"Surely——" he said.

"I say nothing," interrupted Blueskin; "the question to me is whether we should leave here without endeavouring first of all to have a few moments' conversation with him?"

"But his state is so dangerous."

"So it appears to be just at present; yet if he has been thrown from his horse he may soon recover from the effects of that accident."

"And," said Jack, anxiously, "we have yet to know where he was riding in such speed. Surely the circumstances were of no ordinary importance that would make him willing to face such a storm as this has been."

"That's what I could not help thinking myself; and that he rode through it is pretty evident by the account given by the men who brought him in."

"I am perplexed, Blueskin—quite perplexed. My mind begins to be filled with all manner of forebodings. Some evil, I am sure, has happened."

He clasped his hands over his head as he spoke, and bent down over the table.

"Don't give up like that, Jack—that is never worth while, I am sure; let us ascertain the amount of the misfortune before we begin to grieve over it."

"But I fear a thousand things," was the reply.

"But it is foolish to torment yourself with fears alone—I would never do that; wait in patience for a while, and then we shall, doubtless, be able to ascertain."

"I have a thought," he cried, suddenly, "it is certain there is no suspicion against us here."

"Quite certain."

"Well, then, no doubt, if we ask for it, we can be accommodated with a sleeping chamber; then we could stay, and take the very first opportunity we could of joining Steggs, and having a few minutes' conversation with him."

"A good plan—the best under the circumstances that we could adopt. When the landlord returns I will speak to him about it."

"I shall be glad if you will; I feel almost incapable of calm speech myself."

"But you must not allow your agitation to be visible, or all manner of suspicions will be aroused. Be calm for your own sake and for mine."

"I will—I will. But rely upon it, some evil has befallen Edgworth Bess, and when he met with this accident Steggs must have been riding off somewhere for assistance."

CHAPTER DCCXIV.

REVERTS ONCE MORE TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF EDGWORTH BESS.

BEFORE the cause of Steggs's unexpected appearance at the roadside inn can be explained it will be necessary to go back for some time, to revert, indeed, to the doings of Edgworth Bess, of whom we have for a long time lost sight.

It will be remembered that her claims had been admitted, and that, by the powerful influence of the Lord Chancellor, she was placed in that position which was justly her own, and from which she had been so long kept out by the villany of her uncle.

It was, however, with a heavy and saddened heart that she left the Lord Chancellor's abode, for what must be her future residence.

This was a fine old mansion, in Oxfordshire, known by the name of the Manor House.

She was accompanied by Steggs, whose face was indeed the only familiar one around her.

All the others were perfect strangers, though many of them could recollect her parents, and were willing to give her a warm welcome on that very account.

It was some time before she could thoroughly recover herself from the great change which had taken place in her position; she could scarcely realize that it was out of the power of Jonathan Wild or anyone else to persecute her further.

At length, however, when she felt more calm and composed, she would occupy her thoughts by endeavouring to decide what should be her future plan of action.

Life in that place by herself, and separated from one who was so dear to her, was unendurable—she could not think of it for a moment.

"Tell me," she said, addressing Steggs one day on the subject—"tell me whereabouts Jack Sheppard and Blueskin are, or, if you know it go to them, and be the bearer of a message from me."

Steggs shook his head.

"I have no idea where they are at present," he replied, "and nothing that will serve me as a clue to guide me to them."

Edgworth Bess clasped her hands.

"But surely—surely," she exclaimed, "you could, if you felt so inclined, discover them?"

"I might; but yet I think it would be better not to interfere with their movements just at present."

"Why not?"

"You know full well that they have both set their minds upon the accomplishment of one object, and until they have attained it they will not rest, or listen to anything else."

"And that object?"

"Is, as you know, to capture Jonathan Wild, and place him securely in the hands of the officers of justice; then, when that villain has met with the fate he so justly deserves, they will be free, and at liberty to adopt any plan for their future life."

"If I could see them," said Edgworth Bess, who could not avoid shuddering at the bare mention of Jonathan Wild's name—"if I could see them I believe my influence would be strong enough to persuade them to give up this intention—to abandon this scheme of revenge."

"I think not," said Steggs, decisively. "It is a duty they owe themselves, and owe you as well, and I may as well take the opportunity of telling you that I have made up my mind to join in this pursuit; nothing could turn me from it, nor shall I be able to rest until I feel assured Jonathan Wild has met with his just doom."

"No, no—not you as well," said Edgworth Bess; "if you go too, I shall be alone."

"Don't ask me to remain," said Steggs, "and I think you will not if you take the matter fully into consideration."

"How so?"

"When I am also on the track, can you not see that the chances of capturing Jonathan Wild will be very much increased? Depend upon it, our object will be achieved in much less time if we all unite and act together."

"It will—it will; I can see that. But I have such a horror of that dreadful man."

"No doubt you have—it is no more than reasonable that you should; but I have no such terrors—my breast only burns for vengeance upon him."

"If I could advise," she said, with a sigh, "I should say leave him to the officers of justice, who, sooner or later, must lay their hands upon him; this interference of yours must be in every way productive of danger."

"You must not be offended if I say that you would have much difficulty in making either myself or the others think so."

"And you really have no idea where they are, Steggs?"

"None whatever, except that I feel certain they are on Jonathan Wild's track, and, wherever he may be at this present moment, I'll warrant they are not far off. Control your anxiety and impatience for a little while, and then the result will be all that you can wish."

"I am tired of being here, Steggs, and alone," she replied. "I am longing for some change to take place in my life—it is growing intolerable."

Steggs looked at her in surprise.

"Can it be possible?" he said. "You have attained the summit of your wishes—you have wealth, position—everything!"

"Not everything," was the answer, "for I have neither happiness nor content."

"But the reason is because you will not mingle with society as you ought; in a little while all this feeling of strangeness and desolation would wear off."

"No, no, Steggs—never. I cannot bear to enter into any public assembly—it is most painful to me."

"In what way?"

"No sooner do I appear than there is a general start of surprise—all eyes are fixed upon me, and when they are turned away it is in order that whispered remarks respecting me may be circulated."

"But you should take no notice of such trifling things as these."

"To me, I can assure you, they are no trifles. My story is a strange one; but so far from exciting pity, I obtain nothing more than contempt. I have overheard the most galling, insulting remarks, and I am determined to hear them no more; if they will say such things they shall not be said in my presence."

Steggs was silent for a moment or two, and then he asked:

"What plan for the future have you sketched out for yourself?"

"I can scarcely say that I have sketched out anything; I have only a vague idea before me."

"What is it?"

"To draw to my side those who have been my friends for so long under such adverse circumstances, and then to quit England for some foreign land, returning here no more."

"And what shall you do then?"

"That I have not paused to consider yet, but I know full well, and I rejoice at it, that I am now rich, and placed far beyond the reach of want. We may either remain in some obscure place, or travel from one country to another."

"It is a good plan," said Steggs, at length—"I cannot say anything against it."

"Then you are in its favour?" she cried, eagerly.

"Will you not do something to aid me to carry it out?"

"Everything."

"Then go at once to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, and endeavour to persuade them to give up their idea of revenge, and so prepare to leave England at once, while they are safe and at liberty to do so."

"Everything but that," said Steggs, "and that I refuse only because I am fully persuaded that it is quite useless to ask anything of the kind. It is the one settled idea—the one fixed purpose of their lives, and they will never rest in peace until they have accomplished it."

"Alas—alas that it should be so! There are times when a sad presentiment comes over me that the end of all this will be some terrible disaster, which might be averted by leaving England in good time!"

"That is only a fancy," was the answer, "and you will be wise if you discard such things entirely—you will be happier, too. Let me persuade you that it will be much the best if you allow me to start off without delay to join in this pursuit. Jonathan's capture will thus be made more certain, and will be accomplished sooner. If you refuse me, I shall do nothing but chafe and fret for freedom."

"I will not refuse you, and I trust that all will turn out for the best, but I confess I have very great misgivings."

"Wait with patience, and I promise that the result shall be all that you can wish."

"I hope so too."

"Then, when our object is accomplished—when we know that we have nothing more to dread from Jonathan Wild—when we feel certain that he has met with his just reward, Blueskin and Jack will only be too glad to fall in with your views, and to leave England."

"Then I must content myself with that arrangement. When shall you start?"

"Now, if you will let me. The less time there is lost of course the better it must be."

"But how long do you contemplate being absent?"

"That is more than I can tell you. No longer than I can help."

"Then I must make this stipulation. As frequently as ever you can find the opportunity, you must return here to me, and report what progress you have made. Remember that without you I shall be quite lonely, and all the time you are absent I shall be full of suspense."

"I will—you may depend upon my doing that," said Steggs. "Whenever I can get the chance, I will see you, because I know that it will relieve your anxiety greatly. I trust that the first message I deliver will be that we have succeeded."

"So do I, with all my heart, for, although Jonathan has been so bitter a foe to me, yet I cannot desire his death, though I feel, at the same time, that the crimes he has perpetrated should not go unpunished."

"That's a just view to take of the question, and, as you must be well aware, he is a bold and desperate man—in fact, he stands alone, a being like himself, without having any other parallel in nature. The officers, having nothing more than duty and the prospect of reward to urge them on, would be long before they effected the capture of such a one; but with stronger and more powerful motives, such as I possess in common with Jack and Blueskin, the result must be very different, for we should never tire or weary in our pursuit."

"It is so. Return, then, as quickly as you can. Until you come back, I shall count the time by seconds."

CHAPTER DCCXV.

EDGORTH BESS MAKES A SINGULAR DISCOVERY AT THE OLD MANOR HOUSE.

STEGGS was full of impatience.

Now that permission to go had been accorded to him, he felt that he could not possibly remain.

In less than an hour afterwards he set out.

He was provided for his expedition by one of the best horses in the stable, and by some firearms of excellent make.

As we know from the past, Steggs had no slight cause for desiring to be revenged upon Jonathan Wild.

He had suffered greatly at his hands, and his was a nature not to calmly put up with such treatment and to forgive it.

He felt the strongest, deepest craving for revenge, and as he rode along he made up his mind that his vengeance should be sure, certain, and immediate.

His resolution was that, at all risks and hazards, he would fire at Jonathan Wild the very first time he got within range of his pistols.

It might not be a manner of dealing with him altogether to be approved of, but Steggs was impatient to have his revenge gratified.

He clenched his teeth hard, and rode off at random, for he knew not in what direction to search for the object of his hate.

But he knew that the police officers were on his track in considerable numbers, and therefore he believed that he could not possibly go far without meeting with some intelligence.

Without going into detail, however, we may say that for a long time he was totally unsuccessful in learning anything, from the simple reason that as yet Jonathan Wild had not made his appearance in that part of the country.

Having come with this certainty to this conclusion, Steggs determined to return to the Old Manor House, and inform Edgorth Bess of his want of success so far.

Accordingly he did so, and told her that it would be necessary for him to go much further than he had already done, and consequently that a much longer time must necessarily elapse before he could see her again.

Of course he was equally unable to give her any intelligence respecting Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, though from the fact that he had heard nothing of them it was quite reasonable to conclude that they were in perfect safety.

Edgorth Bess watched him depart with tears in her eyes.

When he was with her she did not experience that terrible feeling of loneliness which characterised his absence.

The room she generally occupied was situated in a kind of turret at one wing of the large building.

She chose it because its elevation was considerably above any other portion of the edifice, and, by consequence, because from the windows she could command a very extensive view of the surrounding scenery.

Here she would sit for hours and hours, day after day, straining her eyes in endeavouring to pierce the distance, and hoping every moment to catch sight of the form of one of her friends approaching.

But every day she was doomed to disappointment.

The servants in the old house wondered greatly at her manner, but they had been so long without a mistress that they scarcely noticed her absence from among them.

Her retirement was complete.

No hermit could have isolated himself more thoroughly.

Steggs had now been absent a long, long time—much longer than she had anticipated or he had given her reason to expect.

Her mind suggested a thousand reasons for this non-appearance, and, of course, the most prominent one was that some terrible accident had befallen him.

One evening, when she was expecting the return of Steggs every moment—the evening after the night on which Jonathan Wild and his son had had such a singular adventure in the old cavern, and had so narrowly escaped with their lives—she sat watching until long after the sun had set—until, indeed, the beautiful twilight deepened into darkness, and hid all objects from her view.

Then, with a heavy sigh, she turned back into the room, and was surprised to find how dark it had grown.

She knew it not, but for some time the heavens had presented a lowering and terrible appearance, threatening to break forth into a storm of no ordinary violence.

Her first thought was to procure a light, and as the means were at hand, this was accomplished easily.

She set a large lamp down on the table, and remained seated for a little while in an attitude of profound thought.

Then, rising to her feet, unable any longer to subdue her agitation, she went to the window and looked out.

The heavens still looked dark and threatening, but as yet no rain had begun to fall.

Turning back, she walked round and round the room several times uneasily.

On each occasion she passed over the large hearthstone in front of the antique fireplace, and each time she trod upon it she fancied it moved slightly in its setting.

It was a trifling thing to take notice of, but her mind was in a peculiar condition, and she felt it to be a positive relief to have something to think about.

She remembered now that more than once before she had noticed the stone move beneath her feet, but had never deemed the circumstance worthy of a second thought.

Now she stooped down, prompted by an irresistible curiosity to endeavour to ascertain the cause.

She found that when standing at one end the other was considerably elevated.

It might be only from the effects of age, but she had often heard how people had chosen such places to secrete money and other valuables.

Some discovery might be awaiting her, for she knew full well that there were many strange, dark secrets connected with the history of her family.

With some little difficulty she managed, while standing at one end of the hearthstone, to insert a small wedge of wood, which prevented it from falling back into its setting.

Then, putting forth her strength, she slowly raised the stone an inch or two, and moved it little by little from its position.

She was encouraged to do this because she noticed at once there was a dark, deep, hollow place beneath.

In the excitement caused by this discovery she forgot all about the many anxieties and troubles that were pressing upon her mind.

When the stone had been pushed almost completely away, she went to the table and fetched the lamp.

With this in her hand, she knelt down beside the opening in the flooring, and proceeded to make a more minute investigation.

She then perceived, for the first time, that there was a flight of narrow, dark, uneven stairs, descending in a circular manner like those in a small round tower.

To what place these steps could lead she was unable to form a conjecture.

For a long time she remained holding the lamp in her hand, and looking down, endeavouring to account for the presence of stairs in so singular a place.

At that moment a strong desire came over her to descend the steps on an exploring expedition.

The house was her own, and surely no one was more fitted to become acquainted with its secrets than herself.

Moreover, she had no fears or misgivings about undertaking such a task.

Whatever dangers there might be in her way, she felt that by the use of a little caution and presence of mind she should be able to overcome them.

Yet, in spite of her boldness and confidence, she shrank a little from commencing the descent, the place looked so dark, and dismal, and chill.

But nerving herself for the effort, she placed her feet upon the first step, and then began to go down slowly.

The greatest care was necessary, for the steps, besides being imperfectly made and much decayed by age, were covered with moisture, which rendered them exceedingly slippery.

More than once she narrowly escaped a fall to the bottom.

Lower and lower she went, and was unable to find any signs of a termination to the steps.

She seemed no nearer the bottom than before.

Suddenly, and somewhat unexpectedly, she found her further progress barred by something that seemed like a door.

If it was one, it was of a most singular construction.

Bars of wood, or some similar material, crossed it in several directions; but the whole was so loaded with dirt and so blackened by age that it was impossible to tell by sight alone what it was.

She stretched out her hand and touched it.

Unconsciously she pressed a greater weight upon it than she intended, and, to her surprise, the substance before her immediately gave way.

A cloud of dust arose and almost stifled her, and well nigh extinguished the lamp.

But in a moment or two it subsided.

She had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the substance before her was canvas, or something similar, and that it had grown so tender and rotten with age that the pressure of her hand had forced a hole completely through it.

What might be upon the other side she could not tell, but was most anxious to ascertain.

Accordingly, she approached the aperture carefully, and held up the lamp in the best position she could.

Looking through, she then found that she commanded a view of an apartment, though of what kind or dimensions she was unable, from the deficiency of light, to tell.

It was strange that there should be such a means of communication between two apartments, and quite out of the question to decide for what purpose it had originally been constructed.

Most certainly, however, many, many years had elapsed since it was last made use of.

She stepped back a pace or two, and again looked at what she had first taken for a door.

She was now able to conclude easily enough that the pieces of wood she had seen crossing each other so mysteriously were used for the purpose of stretching the canvas over them.

She was unable to perceive any mode of opening the door, for such, no doubt, was the purpose it was intended to serve.

She did not give herself much trouble, either, to make the examination, for she knew how easily the place had yielded to her touch, and she could see a space between the bars of wood large enough for her to pass through, so that all that was necessary was to push away the canvas.

CHAPTER DCCXVI.

EDGORTH BESS CONTINUES HER EXPLORATIONS, AND MAKES SOME STRANGE DISCOVERIES.

REMEMBERING how the dust had arisen on the previous occasion, she set about performing this task with great circumspection, using no more pressure than was absolutely necessary.

Despite her care, however, the dust arose and settled upon her in incredible quantities.

It was with a feeling of great relief that she managed at last to pass through the small aperture she had made into the apartment beyond.

She stood a moment, to recover herself, and to allow the lamp to burn up more steadily.

The air in this chamber seemed damp and heavy, as though a long time had elapsed since any fresh air had gained admittance there.

The feeling of oppression upon her lungs quickly wore off, and the flame of the lamp assumed larger dimensions.

By the aid of this light she now looked carefully about her on all sides.

The room was one of no ordinary size, and furnished with peculiar magnificence, although the beauty of everything was much obscured by dust.

In what part of the building this room was situated she was scarcely able to tell.

But the edifice itself was so large and of such a rambling character that it would take a long time to grow thoroughly familiar with every portion of it.

For some reason, however, this room had remained closed up for a very great length of time—for so long, indeed, that probably the inmates of the house had completely forgotten its existence.

But what was the cause of this extraordinary proceeding?

That was the question that in a moment suggested itself to the mind of Edgworth Bess, and she kept repeating it over and over again to herself, without being able to arrive at any definite conclusion.

Having satisfied herself by making an attentive examination of everything the room contained, she looked back at the means by which she had entered it.

She then perceived that the wall had been ornamented in a strange and peculiar manner, and canvas had been stretched over the opening in the wall, so as to render it quite uniform.

It was certain, however, that anyone standing at the foot of the flight of steps would be able to overhear distinctly every word that was uttered in the large apartment.

Nearly opposite to this secret door was one about which no kind of concealment had been attempted.

It was large and massive, and set in a heavy wooden frame, and appeared to be the only regular mode of egress and ingress to the chamber.

Towards this door Edgworth Bess advanced with slightly faltering steps.

In spite of her courage and calmness, the cold, raw atmosphere in the room clung around her and affected her spirits.

She drew her breath with difficulty, and she felt that it would be such a relief to hear even the slightest sound that would break the dreadful, tomblike silence.

She might have raised her own voice and uttered her own thoughts aloud, but some kind of spell or fascination seemed to seal her lips, and she could not utter so much as a whisper.

Upon coming close to this large door her heart sank within her, for she feared, from its general aspect, that there would be an end to all her explorations.

It looked so massive and so strong as to be altogether beyond her power to force it.

Nervously and doubtfully she placed her hand upon the knob.

To her surprise, when she turned it the door yielded readily to her hand.

It communicated with another but much smaller room than the preceding one.

The same luxuriousness was, however, perceptible—indeed, rather more so, for here, owing to some cause or other, the dust did not appear to have accumulated in such large quantities.

Beyond the articles of furniture which it contained, and its general appearance, this room had no particular species of interest in it.

On the opposite side, however, a door was visible, and Edgworth Bess without delay made her way towards it, determined not to pause in her investigations until she had seen all.

Her disappointment was extreme, however, upon finding this door firmly fastened.

She placed the lamp upon an antique chair, and exerted her utmost strength, but failed to make it shake even in its setting.

"I can go no further on this occasion, at any rate," she thought, "but I will choose another opportunity, and have those with me who will be able to force their way."

A feeling of great fatigue at this moment came over her, and she sat down in a chair close to the one on which she had placed the lamp.

As she did so and looked around, a thousand strange thoughts rushed into her mind, and made her brain busy with speculations.

How singular it was that two such rooms as these should be cut off, as it were, from the remainder of the building, and left to moulder and neglect!

What circumstances could have given cause for so unusual a proceeding?

What had taken place within those walls?

In this manner she sat perfectly still for several moments.

She was aroused suddenly by a brilliant flash of light.

At first she knew not what had caused it, it came and went so suddenly.

But directly afterwards she heard a loud rumbling sound.

With a sudden splash the rain beat against the ancient windows, the lightning flashed once more, and the thunder rolled.

The threatened storm had broken out at last.

Surely if anything could add to the terror and gloominess those rooms produced, this terrific storm would have that effect.

Edgworth Bess trembled and turned pale.

She had been wishing a little while ago for some sound to break the monotony of the silence; but she did not desire such a dreadful sound as this.

The rain poured against the windows in a ceaseless stream, and in between the pauses of the thunder the rushing of the rain as it descended to the earth could be distinctly heard.

She felt more than half inclined to return with all speed to her usual apartment, and summon all her domestics around her; but, ashamed of this symptom of weakness and fear, she banished the thought, and resolved, in spite of the elemental strife, to prosecute her researches to the utmost.

From the very first the conviction had seized upon her mind that, as there was a secret mode of entering these disused apartments, so there must be another secret mode of leaving them, and this was a point she was most anxious to clear up.

The room above had been left by means of a passage beneath the hearthstone, and therefore it formed a strong reason for commencing a search for a secret exit in this part of the room.

Going to the hearthstone, she walked upon it in the same manner as she had done upon the one above.

But, to her disappointment, it remained perfectly firm, and did not move in the least.

Unsatisfied, however, she put down the lamp, and, taking hold of one of the fire-irons, knocked upon the stone.

An unmistakably hollow sound was then produced.

"It is here," she murmured—"the discovery is made. But how am I to raise this stone? it appears to be so securely fixed in its setting."

This was a difficult problem; but, encouraged by the success she had formerly met with, she set about making the attempt.

In the first place she looked closely all round the setting, in the hope of finding some place where she could insert the fire-iron, and use it as a lever.

While thus engaged she noticed a nail with a large flat head that stuck up a little above the level of the flooring, as though it had not been sufficiently knocked in.

Guessing in a moment that this might have some connection with the stone, she pressed upon it.

To her disappointment, no result was produced.

She was about to come to the conclusion that this was an ordinary nail and nothing more, when, by accident, she tried to pull it up.

To her surprise, it yielded, and at the same time one end of the hearthstone rose slowly.

Continuing to pull upwards, she found the nail, or rather that which looked like one, came up readily, and in the same proportion the end of the hearthstone rose also.

She was afraid at first to let go, lest the stone should fall.

But she found that the mechanism with which it was connected had been so constructed that the stone remained in its place.

By pressing upon the head of the nail, however, it was gently lowered.

She continued to pull upwards, until the hearthstone was nearly perpendicular.

She had now no difficulty in understanding how it was she had discovered the secret exit from the room above.

By some accident or other—perhaps simply from the effects of time—the mechanism had become deranged, and the stone had consequently got loose in its setting.

Here all appeared perfect, and after a brief hesitation, Edgworth Bess commenced the descent of a flight of steps precisely similar to the others.

There was this difference, however, that they were more uneven and rugged, more moist and slippery, and the air that seemed to come rushing up was so cold as to send a chill through all her blood.

The atmosphere had also a damp, peculiar, earthlike smell, like that which may be found in some long-disused vault.

Undeterred, however, by all these disagreeables, Edgworth Bess, shielding the flame of the lamp with her hand, slowly and carefully descended the circular flight of steps.

As she went lower and lower, however, so did the coldness increase.

But the air was less dense than in the chambers above, and the lamp burned more steadily, though the draught every now and then almost extinguished it.

The lamp was indeed her chief cause of solicitude, and occupied the most of her attention.

She was in dread lest a sudden gust of wind should put it out.

Her position then would be terrible in the extreme.

Her nerves would never enable her to stand against it, for she was unprovided with the means of procuring another light.

CHAPTER DCCXVII.

EDGORTH BESS MAKES A FEARFUL DISCOVERY IN THE DUNGEON BENEATH THE OLD MANOR HOUSE.

To be left in utter darkness in such a place as that was a thought too horrible to bear contemplation.

It would be hard indeed to grope the way back to the upper chamber, and no matter how loud or how shrill the voice might be, yet it would fail to reach the ears of any of the inmates of the Manor House.

Those mysterious, closed, disused apartments were quite separated and cut off from the other portions of the building, and scarcely any sound made within them would penetrate their walls.

Every now and then Edgworth Bess would pause upon the steps and tremble, for the flame of the lamp would flicker in a most alarming manner.

Then, when it once more became steady, she would descend a few more steps.

And in this manner she continued, in a state of the utmost dread, until the bottom of the flight was reached.

Here she paused, and as she found the draught was by no means so strong here as it was upon the stairs, she raised the lamp high above her head, so as to diffuse its beams as much as possible, and thereby obtain some idea of the nature of the place she was in.

Most chill and repulsive was its aspect—nothing could be conceived more dismal.

Before her stretched out a long and apparently interminable passage, the sides of which were formed of solid masses of stone, and the roof was rudely vaulted by the same material.

Everywhere the stonework was reeking with moisture, which seemed to exude in drops, as if from pores.

Large drops collected on the roof, and then, when they became too heavy for cohesion, dropped upon the damp earthen flooring, in which in many places were noisome pools of stagnant water.

Everywhere it was completely soddened with wet.

Generally the walls were perfectly black, but in some places they were coated with a strange-looking substance resembling nitre, and reflecting many of the beams that fell from the lamp.

All this was dismal and cheerless enough to deter anyone from prosecuting their investigations any further, for not only was the floor treacherous and slimy, but on all sides could be seen strange-looking, loathsome reptiles, hastening along in an ungainly fashion, scared by the unexpected sight of a light.

It was these loathsome-looking and perhaps venomous reptiles that made Edgworth Bess for a time hesitate and hold back.

But very soon a feeling of anger at this want of courage came over her, and she resolutely stepped forward, picking her way as carefully as she could.

It was evident that many, many years had elapsed since a human foot had trodden that dark, horrid place.

At every step her feet sank deeply into the mire, but yet she struggled on, determined to ascertain, if possible, to what place the passage led, and what was the nature of its outlet.

It seemed to her that she walked on in this manner for a long distance.

In reality, it was but a few hundred yards.

Suddenly she paused, and looked with straining eyes before her.

Hitherto the sides of the passage had been uniformly of solid stone, but now, just a little further in advance, she saw an indentation in the masonry, the shape of which suggested a door.

Towards this she at once made her way, her curiosity stronger now than ever.

It was a door, she quickly found, low and narrow, but apparently of great strength; yet, upon a closer examination, the wood of which it was composed was mildewed and decayed, and the iron bosses that studded it in every direction had almost rusted away.

The only fastening that she could perceive consisted of a ponderous iron bar placed horizontally across the centre of it.

Should she put forth her strength, and try whether she could remove that bar and gain admittance to the place beyond?

She answered the question in the affirmative, for on the present occasion she would have to complete her investigations; she would never again have the least inclination to penetrate to this subterranean place.

Her first attempt to lift the bar was a perfect failure, and she considered that this was owing to its weight.

A second glance, however, undeceived her in this respect.

She saw that it turned upon its centre like a pivot, and was secured into a staple by a small bolt of iron.

This bolt was thickly incrustated with rust, and it cost much labour to withdraw it; but when it was done, it was easy to turn the bar round, and the mere act of doing this caused the door to creak open a little way.

But such a fetid smell came pouring out into the passage that Edgworth Bess was compelled to retreat before it.

Whatever place it might be with which the door communicated, the air in it was terribly impure, and certainly inimical to human life.

After awhile, however, as it mingled with the comparatively pure air in the passage, it became less offensive, and Edgworth Bess again ventured to draw near.

Pushing the door further open, she stood upon the threshold, and grasping the lamp in her hand, looked in.

All, however, was dark and indistinct.

She could only make out that it was some kind of vaulted chamber.

Reluctantly she entered, and it was only the strong desire she felt to clear up all these mysteries that gave her strength to proceed.

There was a loud scuffling noise in this vaulted chamber as soon as she entered it, which greatly terrified her, and almost compelled her to retreat.

Luckily she discovered the cause of it just in time.

She had disturbed an immense multitude of rats, which were hurrying across the damp flooring, searching for their hiding-places.

This was a sound that soon ceased, and having reached, as near as she could guess, the middle of the chamber, Edgworth Bess paused, and again looked around her.

Something white and glistening upon the floor near to the door first attracted her attention, and she walked towards it, in order to ascertain what it was.

A half-stilled shriek of horror came from her lips, and, after one brief glance, she averted her eyes from the dreadful spectacle.

Before her, lying down side by side upon the ground, and tightly clasped in each other's embrace, were two mouldering skeletons.

There was not left a single vestige of anything save the bones, and from the manner in which these were disposed, it was hard to say whether that death-grasp was a friendly or a foe-like one.

With such a scene as that, the imagination could easily run riot and suggest a thousand strange ideas.

Multitudes of ideas would come thronging up, all of which would be alike difficult, if not impossible, of solution.

How came those two skeletons in such a place?

Why were they confined in that dungeon, for such it evidently was?

Were they two friends—two lovers, perchance more dear to each other than all the world beside, who, for some reason or other, had been confined there, and allowed to perish by some fearful, lingering death?

Or could they be two deadly enemies, who, meeting in that place, had grappled with each other and struggled and fought for mastery?

Death might have overtaken both almost at the same moment, and the firm grasp with which they held each other during life had remained in death.

Either of these would account for the position of the two skeletons, and it would be hard to decide which was right.

When the first shock of horror and disgust was over, Edgworth Bess again bent her gaze upon the frightful spectacle.

Revolting as it was, she could not help experiencing a certain kind of fascinated interest.

She noticed, however, that there were no weapons lying near.

It did not seem as though the combatants—if combatants they were—had had either sword, or dagger, or fire-arm to assist them in their fight.

And this was all that could be gleaned.

Even as she watched a great change came over those sad remains.

Had not the door of the dungeon been opened they might have remained intact for a considerable length of time.

But the effect of the fresh air upon them was such, that they began to crumble, and to lose their adherence one to the other.

Thus, while she gazed, they all sank together into one confused, inextricable mass, no longer presenting the appearance that they did at first.

It was not likely that this dungeon would afford any other object of curiosity or fearful interest, and yet Edgworth Bess searched it as closely as she was able.

In one part of the dungeon, in a corner not far from the door, was a kind of rude stone shelf.

It was some height from the ground, but yet not so high as to prevent her from reaching it.

On this small shelf, which, at the most, was not more than a foot square, lay some small, dark, dusky-looking object.

It was rather surprising that Edgworth Bess should have caught sight of it. It would have escaped a search less minute, and it only shows how rigidly she looked about her.

Her eye fell upon it, however, more by chance than anything else, and she stood gazing at it for some moments, wondering what it could be, and yet hesitating to put forth her hand to ascertain, lest some horrible discovery should be awaiting her.

This irresolution did not continue long.

Making a sudden effort, she stretched forth her hand and seized the mysterious-looking object.

But she was so nervous, and her feelings had been so much affected by what she had beheld, that her fingers relaxed, and with a faint cry she allowed it to fall to the ground.

But she was thoroughly ashamed of her fears, and stooped down immediately.

It seemed as though some rather solid substance had been wrapped up in a piece of cloth, probably a portion of a garment.

In its fall this outer covering had been somewhat deranged, and therefore, in order to ascertain what it was, all Edgworth Bess had to do was to take hold of this piece of cloth by one of the corners, and lift it up.

She did so.

CHAPTER DCCXVIII.

EDGWORTH BESS MEETS WITH AN UNLOOKED-FOR MISFORTUNE.

ALTHOUGH she held her breath, and felt full of excitement, nothing of an alarming character had been disclosed.

She saw only what looked like a packet of letters or papers, tightly tied into a square parcel.

The papers—especially the outer sheets—had quite lost their original colour, and were now a peculiar-looking yellowish brown.

Seeing what the object was, Edgworth Bess no longer hesitated to pick it up.

The papers were all damp and mildewed, and apparently so much decayed, that the least touch would cause them to fall to pieces.

She looked at the packet anxiously enough, wondering of what it could consist, and she turned it over and over in her hand.

On one occasion she fancied she saw something that looked like writing, but it was so faded and blurred as to be almost undistinguishable.

But she strained her eyes and brought the light of the lamp closer towards it.

She indulged in the not unreasonable hope, that in those papers would be found some record or account of what had taken place in the cell.

Only portions of the writing could be made out; but she was exceedingly well pleased when able, letter by letter, to spell out a single word.

The first sentence ran thus:—

"I have written this in the hope that it may fall——"

Then there was a blank, or what appeared to be such, though, doubtless, words were there but undecipherable.

The next words were:—

"No ink, no pen. As a substitute for the first I have used blood, and for the second a small piece of pointed stick that I——"

Then followed another blank.

What she had just read, however, seemed pretty conclusively to show that the paper contained an account of some strange events, and the straggling style of the writing, and the faded, peculiar-looking characters were accounted for.

There was some more writing on the outer sheet, but the only other sentence she could make out was:—

"I solemnly declare that all this that I have written with so much pain and difficulty is quite true; it is a faithful history of all those circumstances that——"

There was no more.

From the bulk of the parcel it was pretty clear that a perusal of the whole manuscript would occupy a considerable time.

Therefore it was not likely she would begin then.

Nevertheless, Edgworth Bess could not resist the impulse of turning up the corners of some of the leaves.

She considered herself well repaid for doing so, as she discovered that the inner sheets were not so discoloured, and that the writing upon them was much more distinct and plain.

Wrapping it up again in the piece of cloth in which it had been originally contained, she placed it in her pocket, determined to take an early opportunity of mastering its contents.

This done, she turned to leave the cell, though she could not take her departure until she had given one last lingering look at the two skeletons, though had she seen them at first as they were now, she could scarcely have told that the remains were those of two persons.

But her attention was attracted by something bright and glittering on the ground before her.

She bent forward and looked scrutinizingly, and saw that there were many more similar glittering points.

The very next moment she guessed what they were.

They were rats who had been disturbed at her entrance, and now they were crouching against the wall, watching her with their brilliant eyes.

They seemed to her as though they were meditating a spring upon her.

She had a natural horror of these animals, and shuddered.

Recovering her calmness as well as she was able, she gave one spring forward, and passed out of the door of the dungeon.

Once in the passage, she felt a sensation of perfect relief.

That coolness and courage which had enabled her to carry on the adventure so far returned to her.

Yet she paused in no little irresolution.

Should she be satisfied with what she had already done, and return?

She had already been absent for a long time, and there might be only just enough oil left in the reservoir in the lamp to last her while she retraced her steps.

There would be abundant opportunities of searching the place thoroughly.

But yet, in spite of all, she felt that when once she had quitted that gloomy place she should never be able to overcome her repugnance to entering it again.

No. 152.—BLUESKIN.

Probably, as she had traversed the passage so far, it could not extend many yards further.

At any rate, she resolved to push on for a little while and ascertain.

At frequent intervals she shuddered from head to foot, and a strange feeling, which she could scarcely comprehend, settled slowly about her heart.

It was as though there was some inward monitor endeavouring to tell her that there was danger in the path she was pursuing.

Hitherto she had escaped unscathed, but who could tell what dangers there might be further on.

So strong at last did this impression grow upon her that she wavered in her course, and nearly turned back.

But considering this to be nothing but a weakness, and wishing to retain perfect command over herself, she walked resolutely on.

She was well aware that if she once admitted fears into her mind they would soon rush in, so swiftly as to render her powerless and helpless, and deprive her of all presence of mind.

Therefore, she struggled on, though by this time, owing to the dampness and chilliness of the place, her limbs were almost numbed.

Before going much further, however, she was rejoiced to find that the walls no longer presented so humid an appearance as they had done, and the ground beneath her feet was firmer and drier.

For a moment or so she was unable to find any reason for this, but suddenly she noticed that the ground was gradually rising.

The air became colder and purer, and more like the air on the face of the earth.

This encouraged her to hasten her steps, and to proceed with a greater degree of confidence.

She fully expected that she should find at no great distance off, some outlet from this subterranean passage, and if so, what reason for congratulation she would have.

How much more preferable would be the route she was now taking to the one which led through those long-closed apartments?

Soon after this, and without her receiving the least warning, the lamp suddenly went out.

She tried in vain to fan the red smouldering wick into a blaze.

It gradually and gradually grew darker, until it became invisible.

Then the darkness was terrible.

A loud shriek escaped her lips at this unlucky accident, and her footsteps were immediately arrested.

It was a wonder that she did not swoon with terror.

Fortunately, however, she retained command over herself, and, clasping her hands over her forehead, she strove to think which would be the best thing for her to do.

The path back was treacherous and full of danger, besides, without a light, she would never dare to face its horrors.

Then, as to the path before her, she knew not what its character might be, or to what pass it might lead.

While she was thinking thus, the cold air continued to blow freshly upon her, and in a little while this circumstance revived her hopes.

"Surely," she murmured, "the outlet cannot be far off. I seem now as though I could smell flowers and trees at no great distance. Surely I have only to step forward slowly and cautiously, and then all will be well."

Although she arrived at this conclusion, she found it very difficult indeed to act upon it.

She shrank instinctively from walking into the darkness; her imagination conjured up a thousand groundless dangers in her path.

She stretched out her arms at full length, and stepped forward with extreme care, not removing one foot until she had found a firm resting-place for the other, and in consequence of this slow method of progression the length of the passage was apparently increased.

A few minutes afterwards, however—although it seemed to her an hour—her feet came in contact with something lying in her path, and she had stopped, wondering what the obstruction could be.

Happening to glance upwards, however, she perceived above her head a faint glimmering of light, and yet light it could scarcely be called—it was only a species of darkness less dense than that which filled the passage.

She guessed then that she had reached the foot of a flight of steps, and that the outlet she so wished to find was above her.

This conjecture was confirmed by feeling that the cold air blew down upon the top of her head.

Feeling for the wall, she placed her hands against it, and began to ascend.

The steps were steep and spiral, and at last the top was reached.

Before her was what appeared to be some rude planking, roughly joined together—so roughly, that between each piece there was an interval through which she could have thrust her finger.

This was the source from which the pure air had come, and, placing her lips close to these interstices, she seemed to drink it in eagerly.

Straining her eyes, and looking through the narrow aperture as well as she was able, she fancied that she could see before her some portion of the garden or ground surrounding the old Manor House.

Having made this discovery, she passed her hands rapidly everywhere over the woodwork.

But, to her intense disappointment, she failed to find anything resembling the fastening of a door.

Surely, after all that trouble, it would not be that she should find herself unable to emerge.

No, no—ten thousand times no—she would shriek and cry aloud until assistance came, provided that she found that she was unable to liberate herself.

From the feel of the woodwork, however, she concluded that it was not only thin and old, but rotten, and that a very slight exercise of strength—such strength as she herself possessed—would probably be sufficient to break it down.

At any rate, she resolved to try.

Placing her shoulder against it, she pressed with all her might.

She was rewarded by a cracking and splitting of the wood in every direction, and the next moment, as the strain was continued, one of the planks fell bodily before her with a crash.

Without a moment's loss of time she passed through, and then found that she was standing in a kind of summer-house or harbour.

Yet it was a place which, to the best of her recollection, she had never seen before, and as the interior of it was light when compared to the darkness of the passage, she was able to look well about it and note its general appearance.

It had a neglected, dilapidated aspect, and she was not long in coming to the conclusion that from some reason or other it had been long disused.

Advancing to the door, however, she looked out and saw in front the irregular mass of building known as the Manor House, and her heart bounded with joy as she beheld it.

Here, she thought, was the termination of her adventure—the safe and happy termination of it—for all she had to do was to cross the spacious garden and enter.

But even then, at that precise moment, the feeling that she had once or twice before experienced came over her heart, and this time with redoubled force.

She felt an extraordinary and unaccountable disinclination to cross the threshold of the summer-house.

She seemed to feel, without knowing why, that while she stood there she was in safety, but that as soon as she emerged into the garden there would be danger.

Surely, however, this could be no more than a foolish mental fancy, and as such she dismissed it from her thoughts.

Yet it required an effort of the will to step boldly forth.

But she did so.

No sooner had she passed some rather tall shrubs that grew near the spot than she heard a rustling among the branches behind her.

In her present state of mind this sound was an alarming one, and, with a half-uttered cry, she bounded onward, being anxious to reach the house without loss of time.

But her alarm and terror much increased, for she heard the unmistakable sound of footsteps in pursuit, and of voices speaking in undertones.

She tried to shriek and cry for help.

But her voice failed her.

She tried to fly.

But all strength seemed suddenly to desert her limbs.

Yet she struggled onward, until, coming to some slight obstruction, she stumbled and fell down.

Then, before she could rise, she felt herself roughly seized by some one, and a shawl or some such article was passed rapidly over her face and secured at the back of her head, at once preventing her from uttering a loud cry, or of seeing by whom she had been thus attacked.

CHAPTER DCCXII.

STEGGS ARRIVES AT THE MANOR HOUSE JUST A LITTLE TOO LATE.

It was on the very night when Edgworth Bess had all these strange adventures that Steggs, having failed so far in his attempts to overtake or capture Jonathan Wild, had resolved once more to pay her a visit, and set her mind at rest on those points in which she would be in most suspense.

It was late, however, before he arrived.

Yet he did not scruple to arouse the servants.

Upon inquiry, he learned, to the best of their belief, their mistress had not retired to rest, but was sitting in the turret chamber.

"I must see her at once," said Steggs. "Let her know that I am here. Lead on, and I will follow."

The servant preceded him up the stairs, and, having reached the door, knocked gently at it.

No response was returned.

Again and again she knocked, and then the girl said:

"I fancy she must have retired to rest—I cannot make her hear."

"Open the door, then, a little way, and look in."

The interior of the room was profoundly dark, but as the servant carried a lamp she was able to see that it was vacant.

"She is not here," said Steggs, as he glanced around. "Well, I will wait until morning—but stop, what's the meaning of that?"

The displaced hearthstone had attracted his notice, and he hurried towards it.

Ejaculations of astonishment came from his lips, and from the lips of the girls as well, who was well-nigh ready to faint with fright.

Steggs snatched the lamp out of her trembling hand, and, holding it down, endeavoured to make out the nature of the opening in the flooring.

He discovered immediately the little flight of steps, and by marks upon them he could tell that some one had recently descended.

Amazed at so extraordinary a sight, and scarcely knowing what to think of it, Steggs stood for a time immovable.

At last, turning to the girl, he said:

"Make haste; go to your mistress's chamber and see if she is there in safety—be quick!"

The girl hurried off, and quickly returned with a face as pale as ashes.

"She is not in her room," she replied, "and has not been to-night—everything is just as I left it."

Steggs felt his heart give a sudden bound.

Some terrible event had happened, he felt sure of it.

He had arrived only just a little too late.

The appearance of this open secret passage perplexed him exceedingly, for, of course, he had no reason to suppose the truth—namely, that Edgworth Bess had discovered it by accident, and, animated by a spirit of adventure, had descended to explore it.

His resolve was quickly made.

"Get assistance," he cried, addressing the girl—"arouse the household—tell them your mistress is missing. Let them follow me down here. I will go first and see!"

He commenced the descent of the steps even while he spoke.

He reached the bottom without difficulty or delay, and by the various marks upon the ground, he was able to follow in the precise track Edgworth Bess had made.

All over the floor the dust lay very thickly, where it had accumulated during many a long year, and in this her steps had sunk, leaving an impress almost as clear and well defined as snowflakes would.

When he reached the top of the second flight of stairs, his wonder greatly increased.

She had evidently gone that way, yet what earthly motive could she have had for so extraordinary a proceeding?

Steggs, however, did not stop to think much, but, finding beyond all doubt that she had gone that way, descended the steps with as much speed as was consonant with safety.

Then the dismal, dark passage that we have already at full length described, was reached.

Viewing the noisomeness of the place, he could scarcely credit that she had proceeded further.

The black, slimy mud, however, showed incontestably that she had wandered in that direction, and, what was more, no trace could be seen of returning footsteps.

Holding the light down, and following these, scarcely giving a glance at the strange objects around him, Steggs hastened on until the dungeon door was reached.

In here he went, and he could see that she had wandered several times around the gloomy place.

He saw a confused mass of human bones lying near the door.

He touched them with his foot, and they crumbled into dust.

It was easy to see that she had left the dungeon and continued her path along the passage, and with increased speed he followed.

Then up those steps leading to the dilapidated summer-house he bounded, nor did he pause until he found himself standing in the garden.

Here, however, all was perfectly still and silent.

He raised his voice and called upon her.

But no sound was returned.

His cries, nevertheless, were strong enough to attract the notice of those who were in the house, and instead of descending by the secret passage, they now came thronging out at the front entrance.

"Lights," Steggs cried—"let us have lights, and search! Be quick, for I fear some evil has befallen your mistress!"

Hastily procuring lanterns, the servants hurried towards him, marvelling by what means he could have reached there.

To them his appearance in the garden must have seemed not a little extraordinary and mysterious.

As for Steggs himself, so engrossed was he with dread that some evil had befallen Edgworth Bess, that he never gave the matter a single thought.

When the lights were brought, almost the first thing that attracted their notice was many marks, evidently made by heavy footsteps.

Branches of the shrubs were torn and displaced in many places, and at length they reached a spot where some kind of struggle had evidently taken place.

"I feared this," cried Steggs, finding that his worst forebodings were fully realised—"I feared this. I have arrived too late—she is gone!"

Notwithstanding these ejaculations, the servants searched about them with the lanterns, and presently an ejaculation from one caused all the others to run towards him.

"Some one has gone this way," cried the man. "Look, here are the footprints of two persons!"

Over this soft garden-bed, large heavy footmarks could be seen, but no trace of Edgworth Bess.

"Follow them," said Steggs, almost distracted with grief and terror—"follow them with all speed!"

They did, and found they led to the wall bounding the garden.

On the other side was the high-road, and this was hard and firm, showing no trace whatever.

So here the clue was entirely lost.

There was ample evidence to show that Edgworth Bess had been carried off.

Some persons or other had abducted her.

This was a painful and dreadful conclusion to arrive at. But there was no escaping the conviction, and Steggs literally groaned aloud.

He was undecided how to act.

Should he, by himself, or with such aid as the servants could give him, commence an immediate pursuit in the hope of coming up with her?

Alas! he feared it would be of slight avail.

Evidently, some time had elapsed, and now the villains would be far enough off.

Some greater power than he possessed would be necessary to overtake her.

But there was a yet more disagreeable conviction in Steggs's mind—yet one that he strove as much as possible to blind himself to.

This was, that Edgworth Bess had been once more seized by Jonathan Wild.

He dared not allow the idea to remain in his mind for a moment.

As quickly as he could, he came to a decision.

"I will ride at once to the Lord Chancellor's," he muttered; "it may be that I shall find him at his country residence; if I do, there will be slight delay, if I don't I must push on towards London."

The horse he had brought was thoroughly fatigued, and so he chose the fleetest there was remaining in the stable.

It was a high-spirited, full-blooded creature, and required no ordinary skill in handling.

"Be careful," said the groom, as Steggs seated himself in the saddle, "he is a regular brute, he is and no mistake, but he can go like the wind."

The man released the horse's head while he spoke, and certainly the manner in which he bounded forward almost justified what he had said.

The speed was truly terrific.

Yet he kept evenly in the middle of the road.

Swiftly as he went, yet the progress made seemed slight or none at all, and every now and then the spur would be applied, although the creature then was going at what might truly be called a headlong pace.

And in this furious passion he rode on until the country house of the Lord Chancellor was reached.

To his vexation and disappointment, he learned he was not there, but in London.

He had no resource but to continue his journey, and without even a moment's further delay than was absolutely necessary, he started off.

The rain began to fall, the thunder to roll, and the lightning to flash.

The storm that had already produced great havoc was sweeping on, and he had ridden into the midst of it.

The half-maddened horse that he bestrode was alarmed beyond measure by the vivid flashes of lightning and the terrific crashes of the thunder.

But, heedless of all, keeping only one object in view, Steggs continued his terrific race.

The rain poured down in perfect torrents, and soaked him through and through to the skin.

But such was the excitement of his feelings that he knew it not.

Suddenly, however, there came a stop and a blank—recollection and sense were suddenly annihilated.

CHAPTER DCCXX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD HAVE AN INTERVIEW WITH STEGGS, AND LEARN THE DISASTER THAT HAS BEFALLEN EDGWORTH BESS.

How the accident happened can scarcely be told.

From some slight cause or other—stepping upon a loose stone probably—the horse stumbled, slipped, and fell.

In his fall he carried his rider with him, and such was the tremendous rate he had been going at, that, without power to save himself, Steggs was flung over the creature's head, and fell with a terrific crash upon the roadway.

Luckily, there happened to be persons sheltering near who saw that something was amiss, and hastened to his assistance.

The horse, scrambling desperately to his feet, bounded off like a mad creature, and was quickly lost to sight.

Steggs was discovered to be quite insensible, if not dead.

A brief discussion took place among those who found him as to what should be done.

At last, however, it was unanimously agreed that a hurdle should be pulled up out of a field, the stranger placed upon it, and carried by them, with all speed, to the nearest inn.

As we have related in a former chapter, this was done, and, by a strange coincidence, the next inn was the one where Blueskin and Jack Sheppard had made their temporary halt.

We have told how they recognised Steggs, and how they wondered what had brought him there.

It will be recollected also that Jack Sheppard's heart was in a moment filled with a foreboding of great danger.

Both were anxious to learn something from their ally, and, in the hope of obtaining an opportunity, they had asked for beds at the inn, and had been accommodated.

When passing upstairs, they had asked, apparently in a casual manner, which was the room into which the insensible stranger had been placed.

It was pointed out at once, and, with an indifferent remark, they passed on.

They were pleased to find the chamber into which they were shown was very close to it, and as soon as they were alone the two friends congratulated themselves upon their good fortune.

"Now, if we wait a little while," said Blueskin, "we shall know all."

"I hope so."

"That is, if Steggs recovers his consciousness. Perhaps he is not hurt so badly, after all."

Some time elapsed; then, finding all around was perfectly still, they went to the door, and, opening it, stood and listened.

No people appeared to be astir, and so, without the least hesitation, they crossed the passage, and entered the room that had been pointed out to them.

A dim light was burning in it, and they could hear some one slumbering heavily.

Going up to the bed, they saw Steggs lying outside of it with his head bandaged up, and a considerable portion of his face concealed.

Yet they were able to recognise him, and to feel quite sure respecting his identity.

"How sound he sleeps!" said Blueskin, in a whisper.

"What are we to do?"

"Wake him," said Jack.

"But suppose the doctor should—as is very likely—have administered some sleeping potion to him, we may then be doing much harm. I propose rather, that we should sit down and wait here patiently until he awakes of his own accord."

"But suppose some one should enter?"

"Why, then we must conceal ourselves."

Although literally burning with impatience, Jack felt that there was no other course that could be pursued that was half so reasonable.

The slumbers in which the senses of Steggs were wrapped was to all appearance just such a one as would follow the administration of a narcotic.

In perfect silence, many hours passed away.

The surgeon, in leaving, told the landlord and his wife that his patient's sleep would last some time, and that he was on no account to be disturbed.

The hurt, he said, although it had produced insensibility, was not by any means a serious one, and probably, when he awoke, he would feel little inconvenience from it.

When they were quite weary with watching, a slight movement on the bed attracted the attention of Jack and Blueskin, and they at once hastened towards it.

Just as they arrived, Steggs opened his eyes widely, and looked wonderingly about him.

He stared hard into their countenances.

But at present his intellects were in a very confused state, for he did not recognise them.

He closed his eyes again, as the two friends thought, to slumber, but in reality it was to endeavour to recall his scattered thoughts.

He was puzzled and bewildered at finding himself in such a strange place, and therefore he tried to think what was the last thing he could recollect.

It was not long before the accident occurred to him.

Although his fall had been so sudden, and the insensibility had succeeded it so quickly that he could scarcely remember anything about it, yet he knew he had met with an accident that had delayed him, and again he opened his eyes.

This time Blueskin spoke.

"Don't start, Steggs, or utter any ejaculation. You are safe and well, and we are with you."

"Blueskin and Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes—yes. But don't, on any account, pronounce that name; if you must speak of him at all, say Jack simply."

"But how is it we have met?" asked Steggs.

"That matters not—the story is not important; you shall know it presently. Tell us why it was you were riding at such a furious pace through that tremendous storm? What urgent matter was occupying your thoughts?"

A groan was the only response, and he started up into a sitting posture.

"Edgworth Bess!" he gasped.

"What," asked Jack, eagerly and excitedly—"what of her?"

"Hush!" said Blueskin—"pray be silent, or we shall be overheard!"

"I have terrible news to tell you," continued Steggs, who had by this time fairly recovered the use of all his faculties—"terrible news, as you will say!"

"What—what? Don't keep us lingering in suspense!"

"I will not. But to-night I made my way to the old Manor House, intending to tell Edgworth Bess that up to the present I had failed in my attempts to capture that diabolical villain, Jonathan Wild."

Jack Sheppard interrupted him with an angry exclamation.

"I was going to tell her that in order to ease her mind and free her from suspense; I was going to tell her, too, that up to the present time no accident had befallen either of you."

"Well—well, why do you not go on?"

"I am telling you as fast as I can. But when I arrived, I found that she had disappeared—I was just too late."

"Disappeared?"

"Yes, in a manner most strange and remarkable; the whole occurrence seems to me more like some incoherent dream than reality."

"Tell us—tell us! Don't omit one particular!"

Steggs complied.

He narrated at full length how he had descended through the subterranean passages, and how he had at last emerged into the garden, where, as it seemed to him, she had been seized and carried off.

"I knew it," said Jack, wringing his hands despairingly—"I knew it! I felt certain when I saw you brought in insensible and still that some misfortune had happened to her, and that you were flying for assistance!"

"Yes, you are right. By myself I felt I could do little; but I knew the Lord Chancellor was greatly interested in her, and I knew what tremendous power he could use if he thought proper; I was going to lay a statement of the whole case before him—that, no doubt, is our most likely means of recovering her."

"It is a most disastrous circumstance," said Blueskin, "view it in which way we will. Have you been able to ascertain by whom this had been done?"

Steggs was silent.

"There is no need to ask that question!" cried Jack Sheppard—"the answer is one that is already present to your heart, as it is to mine! It is Jonathan Wild who has wrought all our misery, and now, you see, he has not done! This is a portion, beyond a doubt, of some elaborate scheme of revenge that he has got up, and that poor girl will be the victim!"

"Let us hope for the best," said Steggs. "At any rate, it is not worth while for us to waste any time here in discussion—we must act, not speak!"

"But can you rise? Have you recovered sufficiently from your hurt?"

"I must rise," was the answer, "whether I have or not. I can tell from my feelings that it would not injure me half so much as to remain here in suspense."

"Where should you go?"

"To London, to the Lord Chancellor's, and enlist his aid."

"A good plan, and while you are doing that we will be acting independently ourselves."

"In what way?"

"Describe to us the position of the Manor House, and we will go there. We will search everywhere around, and perhaps shall be successful in discovering a clue."

"But will it not be dangerous to expose yourselves so much?"

"We will use all the precautions we can," was the answer. "In the first place, we will disguise ourselves, and then you must remember that it is such a long time since we did anything to bring ourselves under the notice of the police officers that we are well-nigh forgotten, especially as they are so much occupied in their chase after Jonathan Wild. It is when he is captured that we shall probably be in the most danger."

"Well, well, as you will," said Steggs, slipping from the bed. "My head feels strangely yet; but that feeling will doubtless soon go off. Where is my horse—do you know anything of him?"

"No, I do not—I have not seen him or heard a word."

"Well, I must have a horse from somewhere, and, now I think of it, it is quite possible that you, by going direct to the spot, may learn something important—the clue can hardly be said to have grown cold at present."

"That is exactly my opinion."

"And speed is necessary," said Jack—"the utmost speed—every moment's delay is of more importance than can be expressed. Jonathan Wild has her, I feel convinced."

No answer was made to this assertion, simply because his hearers both shared in the conviction.

"He is a terrible and desperate man; he must feel that he has now almost reached the end of his career. He has seen how everything has failed, and how Tyburn tree is staring him in the face. His state must be of the utmost desperation, and such being the case, who can tell what barbarity or atrocity he may not perpetrate, although knowing that his death must quickly follow, simply from the desire to glut his revenge upon us?"

"I fully share your fears, Jack," cried Steggs. "Let me advise you not to lose another moment in carrying out your purpose. I need not tell you to be vigilant or untiring; I know you will, and as for me, rest assured that I shall, with as little delay as possible, proceed to the Lord Chancellor, and when he takes up the matter, Jonathan's capture must follow, as a matter of course."

"One would think so—one would think so," was the reply.

"I feel quite sure of it."

"But," said Jack Sheppard, "if his capture is only effected after he has wreaked his vengeance on that poor girl it will be but a paltry satisfaction indeed to us then."

"It will—it will. We must hope for the best."

"Come, then," said Steggs, "assist me to descend the stairs. I don't feel competent alone, and I have such a dreadful feeling of weakness upon me."

"And we must arouse the people of the inn," said Blueskin. "They will be surprised, beyond a doubt."

The landlord was astonished; but as Steggs paid him in a most liberal fashion for what had been done he was tolerably content.

Upon inquiry, Steggs found that his horse was gone, and had not since been heard of.

"I must have one," he said, addressing the landlord. "If you have a horse, and a good one, I will purchase it, if not, you must obtain one for me without further loss of time."

CHAPTER DCCXXI.

STEGGS REACHES THE LORD CHANCELLOR'S IN SAFETY, AND PROMPT AND ENERGETIC MEASURES ARE TAKEN TO CAPTURE JONATHAN WILD.

"I HAVE," said the landlord, "one that will suit you admirably!"

"Good. I will purchase it. There need be no time lost about a bargain—bring him round at once!"

"And take some brandy with you," said Blueskin; "you are almost sure to feel exhausted and weak before you have gone far, and a stimulant will do much towards reviving you."

This advice was followed.

The horse was brought round and purchased, and Steggs, with some difficulty, was assisted into the saddle.

"Farewell," he said—"farewell, for a short time only. If I have my strength left you will soon see me again."

And as he spoke, he touched his horse with the spurs, and started off at a headlong gallop along the road.

As the surgeon had said, the hurt was by no means an important one, and the only sensation Steggs felt was one of weakness.

This proceeded more than anything else from the fact that the first thing the surgeon did to his patient was to bleed him.

In those days the lancet was considered to be a sovereign cure for all complaints, and was freely resorted to.

Consequently, every now and then, Steggs would experience a frightful sensation of weakness.

His brain would spin round, and such a mist would float before his eyes that he would be unable to see anything.

The giddiness, too, that seized upon him made it exceedingly difficult for him to retain his seat in the saddle.

But his mind was so fully occupied with one idea, and he was so fully impressed with the importance of the errand he was going upon, that it enabled him to overcome those sensations, which otherwise might have grown strong enough to keep him back altogether.

The journey he had to perform was a long one.

But it was performed in safety.

By the time he arrived within sight of London, however, his strength was all but spent.

From time to time he applied himself to the brandy, and although the spirit at first refreshed him exceedingly, and revived his failing energies, yet, in a short time, by repeated doses, it lost its effect.

At the last moment he began to grow apprehensive as to whether he should be able to reach the Lord Chancellor's residence.

When he drew near to the metropolis it was daylight.

Although the hour was early, many people were abroad, and those who saw him turned to look upon him with an inquiring eye.

His head was strangely and somewhat hideously bandaged up.

The rapid motion had caused the hurt to begin to bleed again, so that the linen was stained crimson in many places.

His face, also, was ghastly pale, resembling in all respects that of a corpse.

To his great joy, about half an hour afterwards, he reined up in front of the Lord Chancellor's residence.

Dismounting he found to be a difficult process.

His legs appeared to be as heavy as lead, and the muscles in them to be wholly beyond his control.

In getting down, he slipped and fell upon the roadway.

But a stranger passing by assisted him to rise.

"My good man," he said, "you appear to be in a very terrible state, and not at all fit to be journeying like this. How is it?"

"I am not fit," said Steggs, faintly, "but the end of my journey is now reached. Many—many thanks for your assistance! Would you still further increase the obligation by helping me to ascend those steps, and by knocking loudly at the door?"

The man to whom these words were addressed stared in the utmost surprise.

"Don't refuse me," said Steggs, noticing his behaviour, "the business I have come upon is most important."

The man hesitated a second; then, taking hold of Steggs, he assisted him to mount the steps, and knocked loudly at the door, as he had been requested.

The Lord Chancellor's mansion had a most imposing appearance, and the man who had come so opportunely to Steggs's assistance ascended them with a kind of awe.

No sooner had he knocked than he appeared to repent of the temerity of such a proceeding, so he hastily ran down the steps again, and crossed the road, determined to be out of the reach of the doorkeeper's vengeance.

Certainly the footman who responded to the summons looked rather aghast when he saw such a horrible-looking object standing on the threshold.

Steggs had to support himself by clutching the doorpost.

"Tell his lordship I am here," he gasped—"be quick! Tell him, too, the business is most urgent! I am Steggs; tell him my name, and he will see me."

The footman knew Steggs well enough, though at first he had not recognised him.

He knew, also, that the Lord Chancellor had some private business transactions with him, therefore he did not scruple to deliver the message that had been given him.

According to expectation, his lordship at once desired that Steggs might be sent into him.

He was not a little astonished and alarmed when he witnessed his condition.

He was full of regret as well, for he had known Steggs long enough to be aware of his very good qualities and his fidelity.

In as few words as possible, Steggs made the Lord Chancellor aware of what had taken place at the Manor House.

At first his lordship was incredulous.

It seemed out of all character that anyone should have the audaciousness to perform such an act.

"My lord," said Steggs, feebly, "there is only one man who would have thought of or attempted to carry out such a project, and that man is Jonathan Wild!"

"But he has half the police of London on his track."

"No matter," said Steggs; "I feel as well assured that he has done this as I should if I had actually witnessed it."

His lordship smiled.

"I should be inclined to attribute it to some other person—it seems out of all question that Jonathan Wild, circumstanced as he is, should have attempted such a thing. He must know what would be the consequences of such an act."

"Just so," said Steggs, "and that is precisely why he would do it."

"How so?"

"He knows that his life is forfeited already, and that no matter what enormity he may commit, no more can be done to him than is contemplated at present. He knows the worst: the most that can be done to him is to hang him."

"It may be so," said the Chancellor, musingly—"at any rate, we will have the affair thoroughly investigated. As for Jonathan Wild, it is a disgrace to the whole country to think that he has remained so long uncaptured. I will see that fresh men are sent after him, and that all the rewards offered for him shall be doubled, so that we shall be doing two things at the same time. If I find that he has been concerned in this abduction, no mercy shall be shown him."

"He expects none," said Steggs, "and therefore he is truly desperate."

"Well, well—at any rate, we may make up our minds that he has reached the end of his tether at last—his race is over—he is doomed."

"I trust you will succeed," said Steggs. "I have had hate to nerve me and to urge me on, yet, you see, I have failed; there are others, too, who have joined in the pursuit from the same feelings, and they have also accomplished nothing."

"It is strange indeed," replied the Chancellor—"I cannot understand how it is that he can baffle you all."

"We have been searching for him in the wrong place, my lord—that's the secret of the matter; we ought to have been watching round the Manor House instead of riding miles away from it. I can see my error now; but it is too late."

"Well, don't regret it; things have now come to a crisis. Calm yourself as well as you can; I will give my instructions immediately, and see that they are carried out. You retire, and obtain the rest and assistance that you must urgently need; the sooner you recover the better."

"I am well aware of that, my lord."

"And Jonathan Wild," continued the Lord Chancellor, "shall find that there is a limit even to his daring—he shall be made to know that he cannot brave me with impunity. I will cause such a concentration of men around him that if he had a thousand lives he would perish! Now go, and leave the rest to me."

Steggs obeyed unhesitatingly, for the advice given him was good, and he was fully impressed with the knowledge that the sooner he recovered his usual health the better it would be in all respects.

As for the Lord Chancellor's promises, he had every possible faith in them.

He knew how much he had become attached to the poor orphan during the time she had been beneath his roof, and how deeply he sympathised with her on account of the persecutions to which she had been subjected by Jonathan Wild.

No sooner had Steggs departed than his lordship summoned his secretary, and issued the necessary instructions.

"Mind," he said, with an impressive voice, "I must have this done! I have said it—now attend!"

The secretary retired, and within a short time afterwards those bills that were out offering rewards for Jonathan Wild were replaced by others in which the amount was doubled.

Rewards also were offered for the apprehension of the persons who had carried off Edgworth Bess, and the police authorities received an intimation of such a powerful kind that it set them all on the alert.

Stimulated by this, and by the prospect of obtaining such a large reward, and anxious, too, for their own credit, that it should no longer be said Jonathan Wild could set them at defiance, the police officers, to the number of about thirty, collected into a troop, half of them going in the direction of the old Manor House, and half towards the place where Jonathan Wild had last been heard of.

Surely that bold, bad man and his no-better son would have trembled with dread and apprehension could they but have known what resolute measures were being taken against them.

They would have given up all those schemes of vengeance which had filled their minds, and would, with the least possible delay, have taken effectual steps for leaving England at once and for ever.

Surely such a combination could not be set entirely at defiance.

Although they had failed so many times, and Jonathan had had so many miraculous escapes, yet now it was scarcely possible for them to fail again.

CHAPTER DCCXXII

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SET OUT FOR THE OLD MANOR HOUSE, TO ENDEAVOUR TO RECOVER EDGWORTH BESS.

No words of ours—no description, however laboured, could convey to the reader any idea of the effect that this disastrous intelligence produced upon Jack Sheppard.

It may be compared in its results to a hard blow upon the brain that would have annihilated all sensation.

And then, after a time, that numbed feeling would pass away, and would be succeeded by the most intolerable and racking pain.

Just so it was with Jack.

When he first heard the dire intelligence that Steggs communicated, his mind was stunned, and, as it were, half deadened.

But in a short time afterwards, as reflection gradually came back, and as he was able to think over all the circumstances, his feelings were indeed terrible in the extreme.

He was wrought up to the highest pitch of frenzy and excitement, nor was his companion, Blueskin, much calmer.

Jack had almost lost all control over himself, and Blueskin saw and felt that the only means by which they might both, to some extent, regain their lost composure, was by mounting their steeds without delay, and galloping off in the direction of the Manor House.

This they at once set about.

The reckoning was paid, the horses brought out, and they mounted.

From Steggs they had received a most accurate description of the Manor House, and had been instructed as to the nearest and best way to it, so that they started off along the highway with great confidence.

Feeling only their own impatience, the horses, although going at a tremendous speed, seemed to be no more than crawling over the ground, and so they whipped and spurred them savagely.

Nor would they allow them to slacken their speed even for an instant, no matter what obstacles were in the way.

The poor creatures were not even allowed a moment's breathing time upon ascending a steep hill.

The consequence was, that in a short time they were utterly knocked up.

At last they became both insensible to the effects of both spur and whip.

They had no longer the power to proceed at a faster rate than a walk.

Great was the vexation and disappointment of both when this unwelcome and unlooked-for discovery was made.

"It's no good repining," said Blueskin. "The fault is ours, and ours only. We have suffered ourselves to be too much led away by our impatience. If we had acted with common caution and discretion, the horses would have held out much longer."

But Jack Sheppard could not look at the occurrence in so calm and philosophical a light.

He was fuller than ever with angry impatience.

"What precious moments we are losing now," he said; "who can tell what the poor girl may be suffering at this moment? Some means of progression must be found. What shall we do?"

"Make the best of it," was the reply. "Chafing and fretting will do no good."

"I know that, Blueskin, and I am glad that you are with me."

"Let us take our horses at such speed as they can make along this road until we come to an inn, or some other place where we can obtain fresh horses. Although ours are now so frightfully knocked up, yet, after a day or two's rest, they will be as right as ever."

"They are of good quality, I know," said Jack: "we have tested them severely."

"We have."

"Well, what were you going to say?"

"Simply this: I believe I have money enough left to enable me to exchange these two we have for two others that would be fresh and vigorous."

"Then let it be done," said Jack. "We should then be able to make better progress; I cannot be calm without my horse is going at the top of his speed."

"We must go gently for a while, at all events," said Blueskin, "and while we are going, we can talk over this accident—if accident we may call it—and come to a conclusion."

"What can we say? What conclusion can we arrive at?"

"I don't know; but if you will remember, we have had no conversation yet upon the subject; at the inn we had no opportunity, and since we left it we have been galloping so fast that talking has been out of the question."

"So it has—so it has."

"Well, then, do you still feel sure that Jonathan Wild is the author of this wrong?"

"I feel quite certain of it."

"Nor have I the least doubt myself. And now let us consider what might be his motive."

"Revenge," said Jack, quickly.

"Most likely; but what kind of revenge? It strikes me, from the position he is now in, that Wild would endeavour to make his revenge subservient to his interests."

"I scarcely understand you!"

"Well, then, it is in this way. He must feel that he cannot carry on much longer. As he is, he must feel that he is in a net, and that the meshes are growing tighter and tighter."

"What is your idea, then?"

"Why, supposing that he has seized and captured Edgworth Bess, as we suppose, I don't think that he would attempt any harm of any description against her."

"Why not—why not?"

"Because he would feel assured that by so doing he would only be precipitating his own doom."

"But would he care for that?"

"I think he would, when he could see that he had means in his hands of averting it."

"Averting it?"

"Yes; he might think so. Suppose he should have seized Edgworth Bess as a kind of hostage, he would keep her somewhere quite secure but unharmed, and he would endeavour to make terms for her restoration. Do you begin to see now?"

"I think I do."

"You must remember, Jack, that in times past I knew much of Jonathan, and was able to tell just how he would reason upon any subject, and that's what makes me more confident that what I have just stated is correct."

"It may be so," said Jack, thoughtfully, "and yet, on the other hand—"

"It may not; therefore, let us look the worst in the face, and be prepared accordingly."

"That's what I should prefer."

"And so should I, by all means. But, then, supposing for a moment that he has taken Edgworth Bess to some secure and secret place, and that he sent forth a message in some way to the effect that if he was paid a certain sum of money and allowed a chance of making his escape, or upon conditions that the sentence against him was commuted to banishment from England for ever, he would deliver her up unhurt; but, on the other hand, should they refuse, as his position was so bad that it could not be made worse, he would, in the event of the refusal, put her to death?"

"I see—I see."

"Well, now, in the event of something of this kind coming to pass, in what way should you feel disposed to act?"

"I cannot reply to that question offhand," said Jack—"it is one that would require a great deal of consideration."

"But yet you would do much to have Edgworth Bess restored in safety?"

"I would—I would."

"But could you forego all your schemes and hopes of revenge upon the man who has caused all of us such life-long misery?—could you be content to feel that he had escaped scot-free after perpetrating all those offences?"

"I could not—I could not," said Jack, bitterly; "nothing but his death upon the scaffold will ever satisfy me."

"Well, then, in that case we must decide one way or the other. I fancy that if you were compelled to sacrifice either the life of Edgworth Bess or your revenge, and that you were compelled to do either one or the other, you would not hesitate."

"I should not," said Jack; "but yet I think I should try first whether I could not succeed by other means. I could never bear the thought of yielding in such a way to him."

"It would be galling, of course. But look! If I mistake not, yonder is a public-house. I hope we shall be able to find the accommodation at it that we require."

The sight of this resting-place seemed to put fresh vigour into Jack Sheppard, and into the horses too, for they mended their pace slightly.

"As we continue to ride along," said Blueskin, "we can think over all these things in our minds, and so be prepared to come to a decision, should the necessity arise."

"Yes, you are right there; but if Jonathan Wild has really carried off Edgworth Bess, I shall try first of all whether I cannot capture him, and so render any deep-laid plans that he may have laid of no avail."

"But do you not feel less apprehensive about the personal safety of Edgworth Bess than you did a little while ago?"

"I confess I do, and for that alone I owe you many thanks."

"Don't mention it."

"I can see," continued Jack, "that if Jonathan has her in his power he would have everything to lose and nothing to gain by taking her life. He will try, first of all, what he can accomplish in the way of stratagem."

"He will. And look, Jack—there's the inn. It looks a large one, and, by the trough in front of the door, and the bundle of straw that I can see hanging yonder, I should say it is very probable we shall be able to obtain a couple of horses there."

In this hope they pushed on.

When they arrived, they saw the landlord standing in front of the house, and near him was another man, who was leading a horse by the halter.

He said something to the landlord, and then, taking a firmer grasp of the rope, began to run the horse, running by the side of him.

Then he returned to his former position, and the conversation was continued.

"That horse is for sale, I feel pretty sure," said Blueskin. "Come, come, Jack—luck is going to befriend us after all."

At this moment they stopped in front of the inn, and the landlord, seeing they were customers, hastened towards them.

"We don't want to stop," said Jack, "but our horses, as you see, are quite knocked up. We have ridden them a great many miles, at a rapid rate, without stopping. We want to know whether you can furnish us with two others of good quality in exchange. Our business is most urgent—every moment is of the greatest importance."

Hearing this, the landlord thought he should be able to do a good thing in two ways.

He might buy the horse which had just been offered to him at a low price, and part with him again to these strangers at a considerable advance.

This thought struck him in a moment, and he smiled and rubbed his hands quite pleasantly.

"I have no doubt I can accommodate you, gentlemen; but as it will take a minute or two, be good enough to dismount and walk indoors—I will be with you immediately."

"Come," said Blueskin—"we are both hot and thirsty, and a draught of ale will revive us both. Come."

They entered the inn, and the landlord completed his purchase.

Having done so, he called Jack and Blueskin to him, and then showed them the horse he had just bought, and another that he fetched from the stable.

They were neither of them very handsome, but they seemed capable of making good speed, and, what was more, they also seemed possessed of considerable powers of endurance.

Blueskin was not long in making the purchase, and in a very short space of time Jack Sheppard and himself were riding at a rattling speed along the road towards the old Manor House.

CHAPTER DCCXXIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARRIVE AT THE OLD MANOR HOUSE, AND FIND THAT IN ONE RESPECT AT LEAST THEY WERE COMPLETELY MISTAKEN.

CONSIDERABLY more than half the distance from the inn to the old Manor House was already accomplished, and as they were mounted upon two good steeds, there was every prospect of their arriving within a short time.

No more conversation was exchanged between them, for their rate of travelling made it impossible.

But both were thinking busily over the whole affair, so as to be in perfect readiness when the time of action came.

They were also undecided as to their exact method of procedure upon arriving at the Manor House.

Should they commence their investigations at the summer-house, or should they enter the building itself?

The more Jack thought over this, the more inclined he felt to come to the latter determination, and presently, checking his horse, he put the question to his comrade:

"Does it not strike you as being singular," he said, "that she should have left her chamber in so mysterious a way, and, without any apparent object, have descended into those mysterious passages?"

"It does seem strange," replied Blueskin.

"It is so strange, that I can scarcely believe it at all," continued Jack. "I have quite another idea upon the subject."

"Why?"

"I am inclined to think that by some strange means or other Jonathan Wild may have become acquainted with the fact that there was a secret passage leading from the disused summer-house into the mansion itself."

Blueskin started.

"I had not thought of that before, Jack," he exclaimed, "but now it comes upon me with the full force of a conviction. That must be it. And that Jonathan Wild should be aware of the existence of such a place is not at all surprising."

"Indeed! Why not?"

"Can you forget how many dealings he has had with Abel Donnull, and what opportunities he has had of looking everywhere about him? You ought to know well that Jonathan never goes anywhere with his eyes shut. He at some time or other either found it out, or else was told of it."

"Then, in that case," said Jack, "he would avail himself of this knowledge, traverse those secret passages, enter the room, and carry off Edgworth Bess in the dead of night."

"Depend upon it that's it," said Blueskin, "and now that enables me to decide something I have been in doubt about."

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SEARCHING FOR EDGWORTH BESS.]

"What is that?"

"Whether we should present ourselves at the Manor House, and begin our search in the room where Edgworth Bess was last seen. It is now imperatively necessary that we should do so."

"It is indeed; and as we have come to this conclusion, let us push on again at a gallop. Surely we have not much further to go."

Accordingly, their horses were once more urged onward, nor did they slacken speed again until they reached the summit of a hill."

"That must be the place!" said Jack Sheppard, with a cry of satisfaction, and pointing in advance. "It corresponds exactly with the description that Steggs gave."

No. 153.—BLUESKIN.

"It does—it does!"

"Oh, yes, I feel sure that we are right. It is a noble, pleasant-looking building."

"Yes, I can remember it well in the happy days gone by; but it is so long ago, that I had almost forgotten. Now all comes back to me again."

"And how strange those trees look yonder," said Jack, still pointing. "They seem almost as if they were growing on a hill."

"They have that appearance," said Blueskin. "There is a steep hill there, and so steep, and so thickly covered with vegetation of all kinds, that it is scarcely possible to penetrate it. I remember now that in former times the poachers made it their head-quarters."

Strangely enough, the hill to which Jack pointed was the very one that Jonathan Wild and his son had reached, as we have described in a former chapter, and in the caverns beneath which they had had such singular adventures.

"Come," said Blueskin, "there is no more to be seen; and as we are to enter the house, the more speedy we are in our proceedings the better, as we may look for the appearance of the police officers almost every moment."

"True."

At a rapid gallop they made their way to the ancient edifice.

They stopped abruptly at the chief entrance, and flung themselves from their horses.

Only the servants were there, and Jack said:

"We have come direct from London to inquire into the disappearance of your mistress. Show us at once the room where she was left last."

It did not occur to them for a moment to question either Jack or Blueskin as to their authority, but, in a moment, complied with their request.

They were conducted upstairs to the turret chamber.

A strange room for Edgworth Bess to occupy; but neither Jack nor Blueskin wondered at it, for Steggs had informed them of her motive.

It was that she might watch for their approach.

Nothing in the room had been disturbed.

It had been judged best that every object should be left just in the state they found it.

Although they searched narrowly around, neither Jack nor Blueskin found anything in the chamber itself to justify the theory they had formed.

There were no evidences of violence anywhere.

Then, having obtained lights, they began to descend the staircase.

They reached the bottom in a few moments, and entered a spacious, disused room.

Here their lights were not of much service, for it was the fair and glorious daylight without; and although the windows of the room were thickly incrustated with the dirt and dust of many years, yet, through the darkened panes, sufficient illumination came to enable them to see well all around.

It was at this time that Blueskin discovered that everywhere they went they left clear and surely-defined footmarks behind them.

He communicated the fact to his companion.

"Look, Jack," he said, "there's where Edgworth Bess has gone, certainly enough. You can see every foot-print quite plainly. We have made a mistake, for, as you see, there are no other footprints near."

Jack paused at once.

He could scarcely realise the truth of this.

"Look," continued Blueskin, walking on before him, "every footprint has been firmly and regularly taken. Depend upon it she was not forced along this way; she's gone voluntarily. Certainly no one else has accompanied her. Approach and satisfy yourself."

Jack did approach, and examined the footmarks narrowly.

Then he was forced to come to the conclusion that he had made a mistake.

"No," he said, "we were wrong there, certainly; and being wrong, how can we tell that we are not greatly in error in our other conclusions?"

"We may be," said Blueskin; "and yet I think not. Perhaps Steggs was aware of all this, although he did not mention it."

"But how extraordinary it is," cried Jack, "that she should have left her chamber in such a manner, and taken so peculiar a route. What object could she have?"

"That puzzles me," said Blueskin, "but I trust we shall be able to find it out some time. At present, however, it is quite clear that we can only continue in our present course, and watch her footmarks narrowly."

This was quite evident, and they passed through the disused room, and down the staircase to the subterranean passage.

In the soft mud the footprints could be more easily distinguished, and by the side of them could be seen those that had been made by Steggs.

In this way the whole of the passage was traversed.

The dungeon was examined, and her presence there seemed more inexplicable than all the rest.

Then, coming at last to the flight of steps at the other end, they ascended, and found themselves in the old summer-house.

"Some force has been used to break down this partition," said Jack. "Can it be possible that she has done it?"

"I don't know; it almost defies conjecture."

"True. It does not look very firm. Perhaps a touch was all that was necessary to remove it."

"It is as rotten as tinder," was the reply. "A child could have forced its way through."

They looked on the floor of the summer-house, hoping to find other footmarks.

But were disappointed.

From time to time a quantity of dry leaves had been blown by the wind into the place, and had piled themselves to a great depth upon the floor.

And on these yielding objects no impression of a footprint could be traced.

Outside, however, they again saw the footprints, but they were mingled up with others.

Then they came to the spot that Steggs had described to them, and, upon examination, they came to his conclusion—namely, that a struggle had taken place there.

"We were quite wrong," said Blueskin, "in our ideas respecting Jonathan Wild. We have gained nothing by our search so far."

"True," said Jack, in a tone of regret. "We have nothing more now to guide us than we had at first. Why she should have quitted so strangely I know not; but I am afraid we must conclude that she found her way into the garden, and then was seen by her enemy, pounced upon, struggled with, and captured."

"Yes, and he must have raised her in his arms," added Blueskin, "for you see we can trace her footsteps no further."

"No; but he had a companion with him. Do you see that?"

"Yes, his son George, beyond a doubt."

The footprints were followed to the wall, and then, of course, as Steggs had stated, all further trace was lost.

The hard, well-travelled road afforded them not the slightest clue.

"We are here," said Jack, at last, "with one consolation, and with one certain knowledge: they have brought her so far, but which way they may have turned is impossible to guess. We will let chance direct us, and keep going round in a circle, increasing the circumference of it every time. Perhaps, before we have gone far, we may fall in with the track again."

"It is most likely," said Blueskin; "and the plan you have proposed is the very best that could be followed. That's how good hounds will do when they have lost the scent of the fox; they will return to the last place, and then wheel round and round in circles until they come upon it again."

"And so will we," said Jack; "and let us hope that before long our anxiety will be at an end, and that we shall succeed in wresting her from the villain's power."

"I hope so," said Blueskin. "First of all, however, we will fetch our horses from where we left them, and then commence our investigations."

This was done, and once more mounting, the two friends commenced what certainly looked like their hopeless task.

CHAPTER DCCXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON MEET WITH A FRESH SURPRISE IN THE CAVERNS.

WE now revert to the proceedings of Jonathan Wild and his son, who, as will be remembered, we last left in that singular-looking cavern.

The deep-laid and cold-blooded attempt that the robbers—if such they were—had made upon their lives had signally failed.

The tables had been completely turned, and they had fallen into the snare they had laid for others.

At Wild junior's suggestion, the men, although presenting no signs of life, had been carefully bound with some rope that had been found in one corner.

This being done, they fully believed that they were perfectly secure, and had no further interruption to apprehend.

"Come," said Wild junior, "we will not waste any time; let us commence at once to make a thorough search around. It will be impossible for us to get too well acquainted with the intricacies of these caverns."

To this Jonathan at once assented, though it was plain, from the manner in which he spoke and moved, that much of his old vigour had departed.

It was almost in a mechanical way that he followed in the footsteps of his son.

A small fissure in the side of the cavern quickly attracted their attention, and George Wild at once proceeded to rigidly examine it.

It was both high and wide enough to allow him to enter it.

But before he had gone three paces he was compelled to pause.

To all appearance there was no further passage.

It was merely an indentation in the rock and nothing more.

He perceived, however, that near the ground there was a low arch, yet sufficiently large to allow anyone to crawl under it easily.

He at once set the example of doing this, and disappeared from Jonathan's gaze almost instantly.

"Come here, guv'nor," he cried, a moment afterwards—"come here, it's all right, and I think you will be surprised at what you see."

Jonathan crawled under the archway, and found that its length did not exceed a couple of feet.

Assuming a standing position, he then found himself in a small-sized cavern or chamber.

The height, however, seemed prodigious, and, doubtless through some small opening in the roof, a small portion of the light of day penetrated, and rendered all objects in its interior visible.

"This is what I call a nice, snug little place, guv'nor," said George, "and I'll tell you how we can make it of great service to us."

"How?"

"Why, we will pick up those fellows that we have left in the large cavern outside, and push them one by one under the arch."

"I see."

"Then when we have disposed of them all," continued George, "we will get a large fragment of rock and roll it close up to the arch, or, if possible, wedge it in so that there can be no possibility of them coming out."

"And after all," added Jonathan, "we have no certain knowledge that they are dead; they may be only stupefied from the effects of the drug."

"I hardly think it, guv'nor; but yet it is best to be on the sure side. I can't help fancying that they intended to put an end to us at once by poison."

"Or," said Jonathan, "they may have intended to drug us first, and when we were perfectly helpless, to have deprived us of our lives in some other fashion."

"Well, if we carry out this suggestion of mine, it will not matter—either way we shall be making sure."

"So we shall—so we shall."

"Will you help me, then?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Back then to the other cavern, and let us begin without any further loss of time."

George Wild himself led the way to the outer cavern, saying as he did so:

"You remain just here, guv'nor, and as I push them through, you take hold of them and drag them aside."

This was done, and a considerable space of time was thus occupied.

But at length the last member of that strange, secret band, was carried by George Wild to the orifice in the rock, and then pushed through into the inner cavern.

Jonathan felt rather nervous about remaining in his present position.

His alarm was perfectly groundless, but yet he had his suspicions of his son's fidelity, and not without good reason.

In the present instance, George showed no symptoms of an intention to play him false, although the speed with which Jonathan made his way from the inner to the outer cavern rather astonished him.

"Why, guv'nor," he said, "what in the world is the matter?"

"Matter?"

"Yes."

"Nothing at all."

"Well, curse me if I didn't think all those fellows had come to life again, and that you had bolted out to escape them."

"No—no, George," said Jonathan, with a sickly kind of smile, "it was nothing of that sort, and yet——"

"Yet what?"

"I confess I didn't feel very comfortable staying there, and I was heartily glad when the job was over."

"Well, well, we have nearly done; but, guv'nor."

"What?"

"You must help me to roll that large stone yonder; if we can manage to get it here, its weight will be so great that those within, even if they should be in a position to make the attempt, would never be able to remove it."

"It is too large, George."

"No, no—not a bit; put out your strength, guv'nor, and we shall move it."

It was a very large fragment of rock to which George Wild alluded, and it was no wonder that Jonathan should have some misgivings as to the possibility of moving it.

Wild junior, however, having made up his mind, put forth his utmost strength, and the stone was rolled over.

The progress made was very slow, and the labour required, immense.

But they persevered, and eventually succeeded in accomplishing their object.

The last roll was given to the stone, and then, as they had hoped and anticipated, it wedged itself tightly into the fissure of the rock in such a manner as to defy removal from either side.

"Well, now we have done so much," said George, "I think we can afford to rest awhile and recover our breath a little."

"I am very sorry," was the reply.

"You seem quite down-hearted, guv'nor, but I'm sure you ought not. Success awaits us—I can feel a presentiment to that effect."

"I wish I could feel as I used to in days gone by," said Jonathan, in tones of deep regret, "but somehow I seem already to be half dead."

"Nonsense."

"It is a fact, and, strive against the feeling as I may, it obtains the mastery over me. I cannot conquer it."

"But you will do, guv'nor," said George, in a hopeful voice. "I don't wonder at your feeling the effects of all that you have gone through since your escape from Nowgate; but by this one bold stroke that we are about to make we shall secure wealth and perfect immunity for the past."

"I hope so, George—I hope so; but I have my doubts."

"Then discard them. Live on and hope to the last. I believe yet that fortune will so far favour us as to enable us to obtain a full revenge upon all our enemies."

"We shall see, George—we shall see, but——"

"But what?"

"We have failed so very often, that, as I tell you, I have lost all confidence."

"Pooh—pooh! you are a little out of sorts; but a change will soon be manifest; the success that I am sure awaits us will quite restore you to yourself, and make you feel as you felt of old."

Jonathan was silent.

He sat down upon one of the rude seats in the cavern, and buried his face in his hands.

Wild junior was weary with all his exertions, and therefore he sat down also.

"A little rest won't hurt us, guv'nor; but we want something to drink."

"Yes, brandy; but where are we to obtain it?"

"I don't know, for we shall be all the time in doubt and dread as to whether it was genuine or not."

"We should—we should!"

There was again a deep silence in that strange-looking, subterranean cavern.

Dark thoughts were flitting through the brains of both.

George Wild was looking forward with confidence and security to the results of the step that they were about to take.

To him, the whole thing seemed simple in the extreme, and to bear upon it the unmistakable impress of success.

All that was requisite now was to turn the subject over carefully in their minds, and devise some particular mode of action that would be most likely to bring about the ends they desired.

Jonathan, on the contrary, seemed to have lost all heart for the enterprise.

The thoughts that were passing through his mind were of an entirely different nature.

They were gloomy in the highest degree.

The disagreeable conviction pressed upon him and continued to grow in force that the end of his mortal career was approaching, and that his doom would soon be sealed.

It was rather strange that he should have had this impression, considering the favourable aspect that things wore.

It seemed as though he had some inward monitor that warned him of the approach of danger long before it could be either seen or expected.

When we consider the state of anxiety and suspense he had been in ever since the time of his first capture, and the severe injuries to which he had been subjected, who could wonder that the effects should show themselves even in such an iron constitution as he possessed?

He was, in fact, at that time weary of his life, and could death have come upon him in some sudden annihilating form he would have been rejoiced.

As it was, he had not the courage to contemplate death.

The subject was one from which he resolutely averted his eyes.

And yet they kept all the time turning to it.

When he asked himself what he had to live for he was perforce compelled to answer "Nothing," and yet, with the strange perversity of human nature, he clung to life as though it was the most desirable of all possessions.

And in this manner some time elapsed.

Being each wrapped in a deep reverie, one did not notice the abstraction of the other.

It is hard to say how long they might have remained accuopying just these positions; but suddenly a sound came upon their ears, that brought them face to face with the realities of the present simultaneously, and, as if governed by one impulse, both Jonathan Wild and his son sprang to their feet and listened.

At some distance off, but coming from what direction they could scarcely tell, they could hear the hoarse murmur of voices, the trampling of footsteps, indicating the approach of many persons, who were at no pains to keep their presence a secret.

CHAPTER DCCXXV

GEORGE WILD HITS UPON AN EXCELLENT EXPEDIENT FOR DISPERSING HIS FOES, AND PUTS IT INTO EXECUTION.

NOTHING probably could have startled Wild and his son more than this unexpected occurrence.

It was not wonderful that at first they should jump immediately to the conclusion that those they heard were no other than police officers.

In that case their situation would be perilous in the extreme.

One thing, however, was quite certain: let those who were approaching be whom they might, they were certainly no friends, but enemies.

There was only one mode by which the two Wilds could greet them, and that was a hostile one.

"Guv'nor," said Wild junior, "we are attacked, and if we can do nothing else, we will sell our lives dearly! Stand by me, and we will dare them to do their worst!"

"But a great many are coming," rejoined Jonathan. "How can we hope to contend against so many?"

"We must do the best we can."

"But opposition is madness!"

"Would you, then, give in—surrender without striking a blow?"

"No, certainly not. Such a thing never entered into my thoughts at all."

"What do you mean, then? Quick—let us decide what we are to do, or they will be upon us!"

"Let us hide!"

"Hide? But where?"

"Anywhere."

"We ought to have examined this place more closely."

"But surely there are indentations in the rock where we may conceal ourselves?"

"A good thought," said George. "We will, then, watch the progress of events; we can but come to a fight after all."

"Come, then, quick—quick, or we shall be seen!"

"This way," said George. "I can see a place that will suit us admirably."

He hastened across the cavern as he spoke, towards what looked like a means of communication with some inner chamber.

This indeed was what it was, and scarcely had they gained it and squeezed themselves into it, than a confused and tumultuous throng of persons entered the cavern.

The very first glance that Wild and his son gave at these new-comers sufficed to dispel a very great deal of their apprehension.

They were evidently not police officers—they were satisfied of that at the very first glance.

Nor did it take them any longer to come to a conclusion that they formed some portion of the band which had taken up its quarters in the caverns.

In their general aspect there was a close resemblance to the others, whose treachery had fallen so heavily upon their own heads.

George did not venture to speak, but just pressed Jonathan on the arm.

He understood at once what was meant by the pressure.

The question now was how they should act in the present emergency.

The men who had entered numbered in all twelve or fourteen.

In a contest the odds would be rather too great to afford Jonathan and his son the least chance of success, however desperate they might be.

It was possible, however, that they might escape unseen.

"I told you there was something amiss," said one of the men, who had just entered the cavern—"I knew it—I felt sure of it."

"But what—but what?"

"That's just what puzzles me to find out. Where is our captain, and where are all his followers?"

The men glanced round and saw that the cavern was perfectly empty.

"This seems very strange," said another voice—"it passes belief. Are you sure that you never left your post at the entrance, and that no one has passed out?"

"I am ready to take oath to it any moment."

Upon hearing this, the men all shrank close together.

Some indefinable fear attacked them all at the same moment.

"Tell us again, Jim," said another—"tell us again all that has taken place while we have been absent."

The man thus called upon entered into a minute description of the manner in which Jonathan Wild and his son had made their appearance, and how they had been greeted by the band.

He stated that he had watched the two strangers and all the rest pass down the passage into the cavern, and that since then he had been sitting at the entrance keeping guard.

He then described how one of their number had arrived late, and had also entered.

His surprise was then excited by the fact that no one had been sent to relieve him at his post.

Such an occurrence was quite unusual, and the longer he stayed the more puzzled he became.

He had listened once or twice very intently, but had failed to catch a single sound.

"I don't know how it was, mates," he said, "I had no particular cause for it, but I felt all the time quite confident that something was going wrong—that there was something amiss, and now, then, let me ask you what has become of the captain and all the rest?"

"And of the two strangers also?" said another voice.

"Yes, just so. You know as well as I do that this cavern would not be wholly deserted as it is now except under very special circumstances; but, then, how was it that no one came to take my place at the entrance? You know how strict the captain always is, and why should he have omitted his usual precautions on this occasion?"

"I don't know," said one; "it may be, from some cause or other, he has thought fit to go into some other portion of the caverns."

"Well, it may be, and yet who knows what may have happened?"

"I can't think anything very dreadful," was the reply.

"What could two men do against so many?"

The first speaker shook his head.

"Well, in such a case as this," cried one, who had not hitherto spoken, "should we not be justified in ringing the bell?"

"I don't know. Perhaps we should be interfering with some of the captain's plans."

"By all means let it be tried," cried the one who had acted as sentinel. "I feel so certain in my own mind that something terrible has taken place that I am willing to take the entire responsibility of giving that important summons—so here goes!"

"But stay," said another—"don't be rash."

The sentinel, who had seized hold of a rope that was hanging at one side of the cavern, paused.

"You know the rules about that bell. We have all been expressly forbidden to touch it, except, indeed, that something terrible should occur—such as a total defeat, or the discovery of our place of refuge, or something of that sort."

"I know all about that," said the sentinel; "but still where is the captain, and where are all the rest?"

"It is very strange."

"Strange indeed!" And rather than remain in this suspense, I tell you I will ring the bell, and never mind the consequences—I tell you again I will take them all upon myself."

While speaking, this man tugged at the rope violently, and then a loud clanging peal arose that seemed to fill up every nook and corner in the caverns.

The sound was so loud and so continuous as to become almost deafening.

"There—there," cried several voices—"that will do—that will do!"

"I think it will," said the sentinel; "and now then, if the captain or any of his men are here, we shall see them very shortly make their appearance—no matter how they are engaged, that signal will bring them."

"You are right enough there."

"Well, then," cried the sentinel, "stand still for a few moments and listen."

He was obeyed, and these rough-looking lawless men stood in various picturesque attitudes, with an expression of great expectation upon their countenances.

That expression soon changed its character to one of apprehension.

The last echoes of the loud-clanging bell died away, but the deep silence that then prevailed was unbroken by any sound indicative of persons approaching.

There was nothing to show them that the captain had heard the signal, or that he was responding to it.

More and more alarmed did their countenances appear.

The one who had rung the bell still stood with the rope in his hand, and with his face as white as ashes.

"I told you something had happened," he ventured at last to say, in a faint whisper. "I knew something had happened, and now, you see, I was perfectly right."

Closer and closer the men drew to each other, and it became quite evident that the fear they had at first felt was becoming more and more unequivocal.

According to the rules and laws that had been laid down, they knew for certain that if the captain or any member of the band had heard the ringing of the alarm bell, they would, without an instant's delay—no matter how they might have been engaged—have made their way towards the spot from which the sounds proceeded—namely, the large cavern in which they generally assembled.

Now, however, the silence was perfect.

There was only one mode of exit from the cavern, all the others having been carefully blocked up so as to guard against the perils of intrusion.

The one that had been left open had been closely watched by the sentinel, and he had declared no one had come forth.

Where, then, were all the rest? and where were the two strangers?

How was it that no response was made to the peal upon the bell?

These questions they asked themselves over and over again without being able to make any answer to them.

And the longer they stood the more the silence seemed to oppress them—the more alarmed they became.

From their hiding-place, Jonathan and Wild junior were able to observe all these proceedings, and the latter, with his usual readiness of thought, perceived how easily the circumstance might be turned to their advantage.

The men were already in such a state of suspense and fear, that the least thing at all unusual would startle them.

The disappearance of the captain and his band could not but look to them as being something supernatural.

Therefore, how easy would it be to work upon their superstitious terrors.

George Wild saw all his advantage in a moment, and touched Jonathan in a peculiar way, to shew that he intended to make some demonstration.

Then, quickly placing both hands in a peculiar fashion over his mouth, George Wild uttered a sound that would be difficult indeed to describe.

It was neither a howl, nor a shriek, nor a groan, but a horrible cry that had in it the component parts of all three.

In the huge vaulted cavern the sound rang out with great effect, and borrowed many strange intonations.

Upon hearing it, all the men standing in the centre of the cavern started and rushed precipitately against each other.

The sentinel released his hold upon the bell-rope.

George was so well pleased with the result of this first cry that he determined to repeat it.

He did so, and the effect was prodigious.

Shrieking and crying out with unqualified terror, dreading they knew not what, and entirely the slaves to superstitious fears, the throng of persons made a sudden and simultaneous rush to the narrow entrance by which they had gained access to the cavern.

CHAPTER DCCXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON ARE MADE PRISONERS IN THE CAVERN BY THE BAND OF ROBBERS.

SCRAMBLING, fighting, howling, yelling, they all strove to force themselves through the aperture, and as they became wedged into a perfect mass, blocking up the passage, further progress was impossible.

Seeing what excellent effect had been already produced, George Wild thought he would favour them with a parting groan, if so it was called.

Therefore again were the old caverns filled with this hideous cry.

It was more prolonged than at first.

But when the many echoes had subsided, not so much as a retreating footstep could be heard.

George Wild laughed lightly.

He was pleased at the success of his manoeuvres.

"Good again, guv'nor!" he cried—"good again! What a parcel of owdards they are, to be sure! We have got rid of them beautifully."

"But they will come back," said Jonathan. "They are sure to sew up their courage and return. Perhaps they will be accompanied by others."

"No matter," said George; "they are now so much under the influence of their own fears that they will be scarcely able to get free. If they return, I shall be able to terrify them again."

"Not so easily as at first, though," said Jonathan.

"Well, perhaps not, but I am by no means sure they will return yet."

"It is best to be prepared."

"I quite agree with you there, so see that your pistols are ready for immediate service, and I will do the like."

The weapons were examined and put in order.

When this was done they ventured to emerge from their hiding-place.

They walked quietly to the opening through which the terrified band had passed.

Here they stood and listened.

But not the faintest sound broke the deep silence.

"I believe we have scared them off," said George Wild. "I believe they are so terrified they have gone for good."

"I fear not."

"But that point must be ascertained, guv'nor; and I'll tell you another thing."

"What's that?"

"It is necessary that we should become the sole possessors of this place, and that we should have at our command the means of entering and leaving readily."

"But how is it to be done?"

"That I can't tell at present, but we shall soon know more. Follow me, guv'nor; we will creep along this passage and ascertain just where they are."

"Be careful."

"I will, depend upon it. Come, I feel sure there is no danger."

George Wild entered the passage, followed by Jonathan.

The darkness was intense, and therefore they groped their way forward very slowly.

They knew well, however, that there were no obstacles or dangers in the path, although the passage wound about in a serpentine fashion.

The further they advanced, however, the more necessity there was for caution, though still at present they could hear nothing.

At length, however, they perceived in the distance before them a very faint light—so faint that it could scarcely have been seen had not the darkness been so intense.

"They have got the place open," said George; "that light proves it. In their haste and terror, I should not wonder if they have not deserted the place."

Hoping that this might prove to be the case, Jonathan followed in his son's footsteps.

The light soon increased in brightness, until they were able to perceive the little aperture in the ground above.

When within about five yards of it, they paused, for the murmur of voices could at length be heard.

"They are outside," said George, in a faint whisper. "How on earth can we get rid of them? It must be done somehow."

"Hush—hush!"

He listened.

But beyond a continuous murmuring sound, they could not make out anything.

"I should think," said George, "that if I was to rise stealthily and discharge a couple of pistols among them as they stand together, that would be a finishing touch to their discomfiture. Here goes to try it."

Without waiting to hear what Jonathan had to say upon this subject, he hastily advanced, and by means of the rude pieces of wood that were knocked into the wall at the extremity of the passage, he raised himself up to the opening above.

Then, as soon as his head appeared above the surface, he fired a couple of pistols in rapid succession.

He did not stay to take any precise aim, but contented himself by discharging them at the crowd of people he could see standing a little way off.

They immediately dispersed, and George, without waiting to see more, dropped down again into the passage.

"There, guv'nor," he said, "I think we have done that nicely; at any rate, we will wait a little while and see."

There was a moment's silence, and then Jonathan exclaimed:

"I feel sure that you have done a very foolish thing, George."

"How so?"

"You have sealed our destruction."

"Speak out—say plainly what you think."

"Why, these men will now feel certain that some living enemies of theirs are concealed in the caverns, and therefore they will determine to put an end to our lives."

"They may determine whatever they like," said George, "but how about doing it?"

"They will succeed," said Jonathan. "How easy, for instance, it would be to roll something over the opening in the ground above. If they did such a thing, how should we escape?"

"I never thought of that, guv'nor," ejaculated George, suddenly. "That's a serious danger indeed! I shouldn't wonder if they don't try something of the sort."

"I fully expect it."

"Then they sha'n't do it if I can help it!" exclaimed George. "Just lend me your pistols, and reload these. I will go up once more, and, at all risks, have a peep at what is going on."

George exchanged the pistols rapidly, and then again mounted, though he did not venture to expose his head without due caution.

Then he saw first of all that two men were lying down on the grass as if dead, while another was in a sitting posture, and evidently severely wounded.

The others, however, had vanished, and George projected his head still more, in the hope of being able to catch a glimpse of them, and wondering what they were about.

Nothing could be seen, however, and he was about to emerge, when he heard a sudden, violent crashing among the underwood that was growing near.

Then there emerged into the open space the remainder of the band who had made their way into the cavern.

On their shoulders they carried the trunk of a huge tree.

The length was not great, but the circumference was considerable.

No sooner did George see them than he at once guessed what they were about to do.

The trunk of the tree that they had procured they doubtless intended to thrust down violently through the hole communicating with the passage.

A more effectual mode of stopping it up could scarcely have been devised.

The mere weight of the piece of timber would be sufficient to wedge it so tightly into the hole in the ground as almost to defy all efforts at removal.

Certainly the only means by which such removal could hope to be expected was by requisite tools for making an excavation, and a great amount of labour.

"It will never do to allow them to carry that plan out," George muttered to himself, and as he spoke he brought a pistol to a level.

The men, unaware of their danger, came walking on in a direct line.

Wild junior's finger encircled the trigger.

One touch would suffice to cause the weapon to explode.

That touch he was about to give, when all at once he was struck with a second thought.

He lowered the weapon.

"Good," he said—"good."

These words were applied to the character of the thought that had just occurred to him.

Letting go his hold, he dropped down at once to the floor of the cavern, intending, apparently, to allow the men above to carry out their project without offering to them the least show of resistance.

Such a course of action as this seemed extraordinary in the highest degree—nay, even suicidal.

When he was above, he had the opportunity, by one discharge of his pistol, of discomfiting at least one of his foes.

Another weapon was handy, and could have been discharged almost without any perceptible interval of time.

It was from no doubt as to his own capabilities of taking a correct aim that made George pause.

He knew he could make certain of hitting his mark, and if the men were struck they would fall of course, and the trunk of the tree, being thus suddenly deprived of their support, would fall so heavily upon the shoulders of the rest as to force them down.

We have said that the piece of timber was very heavy, and therefore they could not all escape the consequences of such a fall unhurt.

These details are mentioned just to exhibit how strange it was that Wild junior should throw away such an excellent chance as this appeared to be.

What cunning scheme was it that had so suddenly entered his brain?

We shall see shortly.

The men above, finding they met with no sort of interruption, advanced rapidly to the hole in the ground, intending to effect their purpose with the least possible delay.

Jonathan Wild heard their footsteps above, but of course had no idea of what they were about.

He questioned George as soon as he dropped down.

But he was immediately admonished to be silent, and he obeyed.

Then, with a tremendous crash, accompanied with a great crumbling and rush of earth, the trunk of the tree was thrust down.

In an instant that faint, dim light that had filled the subterranean passage was extinguished.

The most intense darkness now prevailed, and Jonathan, taken so completely by surprise, uttered a shout of astonishment.

He fancied, above the noise made by the descending wood, he could hear voices above uttering cries of triumph.

But whether this was fancy or reality, he was so stunned and bewildered by the unexpected nature of the events that had occurred, that he could not decide.

After that, a most remarkable silence prevailed, for George Wild neither moved nor spoke, and all communication with the upper world appeared to be effectually cut off.

It was Jonathan Wild who broke the silence.

"George—George!" he said, in a suppressed voice.

"Yes, guv'nor?"

"What has happened?"

"Don't you understand?"

"Scarcely."

"Oh! I forgot! You didn't see what those rascals were about. However, I'll tell you what I saw."

"Go on, then."

"I looked out, and perceived that the remainder of the band were carrying on their shoulders the trunk of a huge tree, and as soon as I saw it I guessed what was their intention. It was to thrust it down in that fashion, and so completely make us prisoners."

"You knew that?" said Jonathan, in a voice hoarse with rage.

"Yes, guv'nor, of course I did! But don't excite yourself. What's the matter?"

"Matter?" cried Jonathan, more furiously than before. "Fool! dolt! idiot that you were! Why did you not apprise me of my danger earlier, or do something to prevent them from carrying such a project into execution!"

CHAPTER DCCXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD BECOMES ALARMED AT HIS SON'S BEHAVIOUR.

"Don't excite yourself, guv'nor," said George again, speaking in the calmest possible tones.

"Are you mad?"

"Not a bit."

"You must be!"

"Why?"

"If not, you would surely not have acted as you have. Curses upon you! How do you think we are to escape from this infernal place?"

"Leave that to me, guv'nor," was the confident reply. "Don't you put yourself out of the way, because there is no sort of occasion whatever."

"But did you not have the opportunity of slaying some of those men when you saw them advancing?"

"I most certainly had."

"Then why did you not avail yourself of it?"

"Because a second and a better thought occurred to me."

"What is it, then?"

"Don't be impatient, guv'nor, and you shall hear all about it. I have scarcely had time to ponder over it myself yet."

"You must be mad!"

"No, no—quite the other way, guv'nor! Let us go back to the cavern, and when we get there I think you will agree with me that everything has turned out for the best."

Wondering how this could possibly be, Jonathan Wild complied.

As may easily be imagined, the confident demeanour of his son was not without producing a due effect upon him.

He knew full well, from former experience, that he was fertile in expedients, and that his brain was cunning enough to devise plans that would be hard indeed to overreach or destroy.

That feeling of anger and alarm which had at first excited him may therefore be said to have passed away.

So far from being in the least degree uneasy respecting his position, his mind was occupied in wondering what scheme it was that George had thought of.

In his impatience to know what this could be, he hurried back along the passage, being extremely desirous to gain the cavern as quickly as possible, and so have an end put to his suspense.

"Now—now, George," he exclaimed, as soon as they emerged into the large cavernous apartment, "now we are here, just tell me what your idea is."

"You are in a great hurry, guv'nor, but I don't wonder at your anxiety. A few words from me will, however, put matters quite right."

"Let me hear them, then, for I confess my feelings just now are anything but of a pleasant character."

"No doubt, guv'nor—no doubt. Well, then, in the first place, I told you when I saw those men coming I quite made up my mind to fire at them, and prevent them from fastening us in, but very luckily a thought struck me in time."

"And it is that thought that I am anxious to hear."

"I know it."

"Why not speak, then?"

"Because it is something I must approach by degrees. I cannot tell you straight at once—I must bring you round to it by a series of conclusions."

Jonathan uttered a growl of impatience.

"Well, then, I all at once recollected that I had heard the men say that in former times there had been various means of exit and entrance to these caverns, but that, by order of their leader, all had been stopped up save one."

"Yes, yes—I heard that as well."

"Then I thought as well that those men above, now that they had been fired upon, would inevitably arrive at the conclusion that human beings were here, and certainly persons who were unfriendly to them—in fact, they would guess that we were the two strangers that had been described."

"Well—well, but what has that to do with it?"

"You will see in a moment."

"Speak, then, and be quick."

"Knowing the other exits to be blocked up, they would think that an easy way of getting out of their present difficulty, and of putting an end to us as well, would be by blocking up that hole in the manner they have done."

"And a very reasonable idea it appears to be," said Jonathan. "I should think it just calculated to answer that end."

"Well, guv'nor, the most important thing for us to bear in mind is this: that the more secret we can keep our proceedings the better."

"True; but it does not seem to me that we are doing it; on the contrary, by our usual good luck, we are creating a regular disturbance around us."

"That's just what I thought, and just what I was fearful of," said George, "and although I might have prevented those men from blocking up the hole, yet the deaths of so many persons would inevitably have attracted suspicion to the spot. We should be searched for, and, if in the cavern, probably found."

"Well—well."

"Now, then, guv'nor, as your mind is somewhat prepared, I may as well tell you just what my thought was."

"I wish you would."

"Then it was simply this: If those men were permitted to block up the passage securely, and were not interfered with at all they would very justly and reasonably conclude that we could never tell any tales respecting them, and that we could never injure them any more."

"Well—well."

"For this reason alone they would be willing to go quietly away. I don't think they would ever feel inclined to return, and certainly will never re-enter these caverns for the purpose of exploring them. The disappearance of their leader and the rest of their comrades in such a silent and inexplicable manner must seem to them like the work of magic."

"So it must."

"Well, then, can't you see that all this will be calculated to keep our retreat quiet? Those men, doubtless, are now elated with their triumph; they will go off, taking their wounded comrades with them, and there will be no extraordinary appearances visible anywhere around the spot."

"No, I suppose not."

"Well, then, you see how nicely I have managed matters?"

"I'll be d—d if I do!" roared Jonathan. "You forget—you forget!"

"Bravo!"

"Why do you cry bravo?"

Jonathan retreated a step as he asked the question.

"You needn't think I'm going mad, guv'nor!"

Jonathan looked at him distrustfully.

"I'm all right. I cried bravo because I was pleased to see some portion of your ancient spirit was returning to you—that was all. You spoke just then exactly as you did of old!"

"Bah!"

"It is no such unimportant matter!"

"But explain," roared Jonathan—"explain! You have looked only at one side of the case—you have suffered us to be made prisoners in this wretched place! How on earth are we to grub that tree up again?"

"I don't intend to do anything of the kind, or to make even the attempt!"

"Then what on earth do you mean to do?"

"Ah! now, guv'nor, you are coming to the point, and if you had asked me that question before I should have told you offhand."

"Well—well? I am anxious to hear."

"You ought to have a little more confidence in me. You don't think I should overlook such an important matter as that? But it came over my mind with the full force of conviction that it would be perfectly easy for us to discover one of the disused exits from this cavern, and, with a slight amount of labour, re-open it, and then have a point to emerge at far removed from that by which we had entered, and which was known to and used by the band."

"I begin to see," said Jonathan. "That strikes me as being a good idea."

"Oh, does it?"

"It has one drawback, however."

"Indeed! What is that?"

"Why, it strikes me very forcibly that it will be a much more difficult matter to open up one of those places than you imagine."

"Well I don't. I noticed when I was fetching the rope that there were some long pieces of iron against the wall; I didn't stop to examine them, but, at the first glance, I must say they looked very much like crow-bars."

"Then, if that's the case," said Jonathan, "we shall be able to go to work in good earnest."

"Of course we shall, and, as we have lost time enough already, let us make a commencement at once."

"With all my heart!"

"Come on, then, for, although you may not think it, I am as thoroughly sick of this place as you are, and yet, after all, it seems likely to turn out greatly to our benefit and advantage."

"So it does, and that's what reconciles me to it."

George went to one of the corners of the cavern, and quickly produced a couple of long, strong crowbars.

"There, guv'nor," he said, "just take that and feel it, and tell me whether you don't think that if we are armed with such things as these we shall be able to make our way out?"

"I think so; but let us try."

"That's the best thing; and, as we have nothing but chance to guide us, suppose we leave the cavern by that opening yonder, and see where it takes us to?"

As he spoke, George pointed to a natural opening in the rock, that looked as though it either formed a means of communication with some other cavern, or as though it was a small arched passage.

In either case, it certainly led out from the cavern they were in, and therefore, without hesitation, they plunged into its dark, shadowy recesses.

A few steps served to bring them to its extremity, and then they found themselves in a cavern greatly resembling that which they had left.

This they crossed in a straight line, and, reaching the opposite side, searched about for another indentation.

Having found one, they pushed on, and quickly entered the third cavern.

The succession of these places did not at all surprise them—in fact, they had been led to expect it, for the men had expressly stated that the hills were filled with such-like hollow places.

"Come along, guv'nor," cried George, in a voice of exultation, "we shall find our way out to the open air before long, rely upon it!"

CHAPTER DCCXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON FIND THEIR SCHEME PROGRESSES FAVOURABLY.

GEORGE WILD walked forward with a confident step.

He had every hope of being able to carry out his scheme successfully.

A long, winding passage next attracted his attention, and, from its general appearance, he felt convinced that it would lead him to one of the closed-up points of exit.

In many places this passage was so low and so narrow that they could scarcely force their way through it.

In others it would widen, and rise in height until it would partake of something of the appearance of a cavern.

"Guv'nor," said George, "we are all right—I feel sure of it."

"I hope so."

"Can't you feel how fresh the air is?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, does not that prove that we are coming to an opening?"

"I suppose it does. But yet, did not the men say that all such places had been closed?"

"Yes, they did say so; but they did not state that they were so closely filled up as to prevent the fresh air from entering a little?"

"You are right."

"Of course I am, and with these capital crowbars I would wager my life I could force my way out."

Jonathan said no more, but pressed on close behind his son.

As they advanced the passage grew much larger, and presently, to their very great satisfaction, they perceived a faint light before them.

In size and appearance, it resembled a faint star more than anything else; but the resemblance was quickly lost.

So great was Wild junior's impatience that he could not wait to walk, but set on to run.

This pace quickly brought him to the end of the passage.

"Hurrah, guv'nor!" he ejaculated. "We are in luck's way and no mistake!"

"What is it?"

"Come closer, and I will show you."

"I see."

"And what do you think of that?"

[THE CAPTURE OF EDGEMOUTH BLUESKIN BY JONATHAN WILD AND HIS MEN.]

It was plain enough to be seen that this exit from the cavern had been blocked up by a huge piece of rock having been brought and rolled up against it.

This was not done so well as to exclude all light, and that was how it was the passage came to be continually supplied with fresh air.

"Now, guv'nor," said George, "we've got a toughish job before us, but it must be accomplished. Bend your shoulders to it, and then it will be the sooner over."

While speaking, George commenced an attack upon the piece of rock with his crowbar.

He was well seconded by Jonathan, who perceived at once that this afforded the likeliest chance of making an escape from what was, to all intents and purposes, their prison-house.

But the large piece of rock had been wedged in with No. 154.—BLUESKIN.

greater tightness than George Wild at all anticipated, and, to his disappointment, he discovered that, after labouring till his arms ached, scarcely any perceptible difference was effected.

"We must do it, guv'nor," he said, as he wiped the perspiration from his brow. "Just you try for a few minutes while I rest, and then I will return to it with new strength."

Jonathan complied, but quickly paused from fatigue.

George Wild then advanced, and, using his crowbar in a more legitimate manner than he had done before, he was pleased to find that he was making progress.

Hitherto, he had dashed away in a most furious manner, without producing an impression.

Now he used the crowbar as a lever, and, inch by inch, the huge piece of stone retreated before him.

At length he moved it out so far that Jonathan Wild's impatience would not allow him to remain idle any longer, so he came to his son's assistance.

Between them the stone was quickly removed, until at length one final rush sent it clear away.

Jonathan was about to emerge at once.

But his son restrained him.

"No, no, gov'nor," he said—"be cautious! You don't know who may be on the look-out somewhere near. Wait a little while, and then we will take a peep."

The stone that had been dislodged rolled over once, and then, coming to the declivity of the hill, went turning over and over with ever-increasing speed, crashing and tearing its way through the underwood, until at last, with a perceptible shock, it stopped at the bottom, half burying itself in the earth.

The only sound that broke the silence was the twittering of many birds, and, reassured by this, George Wild at length ventured to show his face outside.

His eyes rolled quickly and keenly over the whole landscape, but he failed to see anything of an alarming nature.

"Come, gov'nor," he said, "here we are, quite right at last, as I told you we should be! We have achieved a complete triumph!"

The prospect obtainable from the opening in the rock was a most extensive and delightful one.

As far as ever the eye could reach, nothing but lovely green fields and trees could be perceived, except in one place, where a building of large proportions could be seen.

In appearance it was very picturesque, and had certainly been built for very many years.

No sooner did Jonathan Wild catch sight of its grey walls and curious pointed roofs, than he uttered an ejaculation of satisfaction.

"What's the matter, gov'nor?"

"You see that place yonder?"

"That house?"

"Yes, if you like to call it so."

"Well, what of it?"

"That's the very place we so wish to reach—that's the place where we shall be sure to find her."

"Well, then, we will say all things have turned out most convenient for us, gov'nor."

"They have—they have indeed!"

"You see how necessary it is to have me to arrange affairs a little. Why, here we are, just on the side of the hill that's nearest to the Manor House. What could be better?"

"Things look promising," said Jonathan, with a brightening visage. "But do not let us be so incautious as to remain here."

"I can't see anyone about."

"No, nor do I, and yet some prying eye may be gazing upon us."

"True, gov'nor—night is the time for us."

"It is; and until then we will keep ourselves secluded in the caverns."

"So we will. Come in, gov'nor. For my part, I am tired to death, and should be glad of a few hours' rest, and now I think we have a fair opportunity of taking it."

"Yes; and yet, upon second thoughts, there is something else I should like to do."

"What's that?"

"Could we not manage to creep cautiously through this underwood without danger of being seen?"

"Where do you want to go?"

"To the other entrance to the caverns."

"The one that was stopped up a little while ago?"

"Yes."

"But what can be your motive for going there?"

"Why, the men who attacked us may be lurking near. At any rate, it is important for us to ascertain whether they have left."

"So it is. Come on! I didn't think of it."

"Nor did I until I spoke, and I'll tell you another thing we have forgotten."

"Our horses?"

"Yes."

"I was just thinking about them when you spoke. It will be necessary for us to learn where they are."

"Certainly it will! We can do nothing without them, and they are too precious to be lost."

"I am sadly afraid they are lost already."

"Why so?"

"If those men have gone, rely upon it they have taken our horses with them."

"I hope not."

"So do I. But we must find out. If we have lost them, we should be in a poor way of escaping if rapid flight should be necessary."

Both Jonathan and his son were exceedingly anxious respecting their steeds; and no wonder, for, in all probability, they would be of immense advantage to them in case they should be attacked.

Therefore, without further parley, they crept through the brushwood, taking a direction that would bring them round to the other side of the hill.

All their movements were characterised by the utmost caution.

Still, as they proceeded, they observed nothing of an alarming character.

The whole place for miles round seemed to be deserted.

They had only a vague idea of whereabouts the inclosure was where they had first been confronted by the robbers.

Yet, by persevering, they hoped to find it.

Suddenly, when near the bottom of the hill, George clutched Jonathan tightly by the arm, and compelled him to come to a sudden standstill.

"Hush—hush!" he exclaimed.

"What's the matter?"

"Listen, and then, if I am not mistaken, you will hear the murmuring of voices."

Jonathan was still immediately.

He strained his sense of hearing to the utmost.

Then, very faintly indeed, could be distinguished a low murmuring sound.

It required a quick ear to separate it from the rustling noise made by the wind among the tree-tops.

But all at once some word was spoken in a louder tone of voice than the rest.

Such being the case, neither Jonathan nor his son ventured to speak to each other, but contented themselves with exchanging significant glances.

While they remained at their present distance it was quite out of the question for them to be able to overhear what was said.

It might, however, be extremely important that they should be made acquainted with the conversation of the robbers, and therefore, after a brief pause, George Wild made an expressive gesture to Jonathan, and then began crawling forward with great secrecy and caution.

Then, before Jonathan knew what he was about to do, and although he trembled for the consequences, and dreaded a discovery, yet he followed in his son's footsteps.

The noise made by them in their progress was very slight, and while they continued this carefully it was scarcely possible that the robbers could hear their approach.

Presently they came to a place where the trees grew more thinly, and, fearing to be seen, Wild junior judged it prudent to stop.

Turning round, he perceived that Jonathan was pointing in a certain direction, and, without a word, he followed with his eye the direction of his finger.

CHAPTER DCCXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON RECOVER POSSESSION OF THEIR HORSES, AND MAKE EVERY PREPARATION FOR THE RECEPTION OF THEIR PRISONER.

GEORGE WILD then saw, though rather indistinctly, the figures of several men standing together in a group.

Judging by the movements that they made, the discussion that was going on between them was of a very animated nature; but, although both Wild and his son leaned forward and strained their hearing to the utmost, they could do no more than catch a word here and there.

While they were debating within their own minds what should be their next step, their cogitations were put a stop to by a sudden movement on the part of the men they had been watching.

Apparently they had been debating some point among themselves, and at last, after a good deal of discussion, had managed to arrive at a conclusion.

At any rate, they all moved rapidly away, and soon the trampling of their footsteps and the rustling of the brushwood became inaudible.

"I think they've gone," said George—"I really think they've gone!"

"I hope so; but such a thing seems almost too good to be possible."

"It does; but I'll tell you how I'll find out, guv'nor."

"How?"

"If you'll help me a little, I will climb up this tree—look, it's a very tall one, and full of branches. From that point of elevation I shall, no doubt, be able to catch a sight of them."

"Let us try," said Jonathan.

By his aid, Wild junior easily enough got up into the tree, and when once he was fairly among the branches there was no difficulty in mounting higher.

George ascended with great rapidity and agility.

Then, pausing in his ascent, he looked around him.

So thickly wooded, however, was the whole face of the country that he began to fear that he should be unable to see the men any more.

Yet, of course, there were open patches here and there, and if they should happen to cross one of them all would be well.

Judging by their character, however, it was not at all likely that they would thus expose themselves.

In all probability, they would be exceedingly careful to avoid any open place.

The more George thought about this the more certain he felt that this would be the case.

Yet, as he was up in the tree, he determined to give it a fair trial, and did not descend until a considerable time had elapsed.

"I have not been able to catch a single glimpse of them!" he exclaimed, in a tone of vexation, as soon as he reached the earth. "We must keep our eyes and ears open; we cannot make any mistake on the side of being careful."

To this Jonathan assented, and George said:

"Now, guv'nor, what we have next to look for are the horses."

"Just so."

"Well, then, first of all, we will discover if we can find the blocked-up entrance to the cavern. I have no doubt the horses are stabled somewhere near that spot."

This was a very reasonable conclusion indeed to arrive at, and encouraged by the hope that in this respect at least they should not be disappointed, the two villains took their way with a more confident step through the brushwood.

The open space was gained at last, and then, as a matter of course, the blocked-up entrance was quickly found.

Taking this as a centre point, they kept going round and round in larger circles, searching closely everywhere, and prying into every nook.

Their patience was at length rewarded by the discovery of a kind of hovel, built against the slope of the hill.

A more primitive-looking place could scarcely be imagined.

The walls and roof were roughly formed of various branches of trees, placed together with some skill, and daubed over with clay.

"They're in there for a hundred pounds!" said George.

"If the robbers have not removed them."

"Yes, of course, provided they have not; but look here, they are safe and sound enough."

George had entered the stable—for such was the use made of the building—while he spoke.

The two horses were there, both looking all the better for the rest they had had and the food that had been supplied to them.

"Well, now then, guv'nor," exclaimed George, "what are we to do?"

"Do you mean with the horses?"

"Yes."

"It is a point for consideration."

"So I think."

"Shall we leave them here?"

"They may be quite safe."

"They may; and yet, on the other hand, although the robbers have not taken them at present, yet they may purpose doing so."

"That's very likely. I can scarcely conceive that they would be so foolish as to abandon them. At any rate, if sold, they would fetch a trifle of money."

"Surely they will."

"My advice is to take them with us round to the other side of the hill; I have no doubt we shall manage to make a stable of some kind for them."

"Of course we shall."

"Come on, then, at once, lest they should take it into their heads to return."

This point being settled, the horses were led out without any further delay.

George took one by the bridle and Jonathan the other.

In this manner, they retraced their steps.

On their way they neither saw nor heard anything of the robbers they had seen conferring together, nor indeed did they catch a glimpse of any human being.

At last the opening in the hillside was reached, and, with all convenient speed, the horses were led inside.

Fortunate for them, the entrance to the passage was of considerable size, so that the horses were able to enter easily.

Then, beyond them, was a rude kind of apartment—not very large certainly, but yet large enough to answer the purposes of a stable.

Here, then, the horses were left, Jonathan and his son going outside and occupying themselves with gathering a quantity of grass, which was the only food they were able to offer them.

All these proceedings occupied a considerable time, and when they were at an end it was found that the day was considerably advanced.

"We shall not have much time for a rest, guv'nor," said George, "and yet I am so fearfully weary that I know not what to do."

"So am I."

"Let us rest, then, at once; here will do as well as anywhere."

"No," said Jonathan.

"Why not?"

"Let us make all our preparations first."

"What else is there to do?"

"Why, supposing we succeed in making our capture."

"Yes—yes."

"What shall we do with her? We ought to have some place all ready for her reception."

"So we ought, guv'nor—that's a very important thing that remains to be done."

"Then you think we had better set about it at once?"

"Yes, by all means; we shall rest much better when that's done."

"Then let us penetrate some distance further into the caverns."

"Yes, we want to find some small, secure chamber in which we can place her, and where she can remain until we have seen what turn events take."

"Exactly; and we shall succeed—I feel sure of it."

"I hope so."

"There is something like a conviction in my mind—a presentiment, or whatever you like to call it—that to-night we shall meet with a complete success."

"That's a pleasant feeling to begin with. I trust that you will not be deceived."

Some time elapsed before they were able to find a place that just suited their requirements.

At length, and quite by chance, they found a small opening in the rock, just large enough to allow anyone to pass through easily.

There was a passage of about ten feet in length, and then, after having passed along this, they emerged into a small chamber in the rock—that is, small as regards its area, but the height was something stupendous.

In shape, this chamber was almost circular, and of a diameter of twelve or fourteen feet.

How many feet high it was, however, no one could estimate.

CHAPTER DCCXXX.

Looking up, the eye saw nothing but a faint, gauzy mist hovering above.

A soft and gentle light was diffused all over the place.

No doubt its source was some opening in the roof, or else a series of small crevices.

While standing on the floor of the cavern, however, it was impossible to say from what source the light came, because of the inability of the eye to pierce the vapour that appeared to hang midway between the ground and the roof.

"Could any place be better than this, gov'nor?" said George, looking round him, and speaking in tones of the utmost satisfaction.

"I like it much," was the reply, "but it will be necessary for us to examine closely before we decide upon it."

"True; there must be no recesses, or hiding-places, or secret passages in the sides; if so, we shall lose her."

"Yes, you may depend upon that. I know her spirit, and she would not neglect any opening for escape."

"We can soon settle that point if we begin a careful investigation."

"Very true. I will tell you what my opinion is, gov'nor."

"What?"

"That if we find any little indentation, no matter how small, it will be best to block it up with large fragments of rock; you see there are plenty about, and by the aid of our crowbars we can wedge them in so tightly that her strength would be totally incompetent to remove them."

"That would be a good precautionary measure," was the reply, "and we will adopt it."

The very pains and trouble that Jonathan Wild and his son were at in making this cavern suitable for their purpose only shows how strong the conviction was in their minds that they should be able to succeed in their undertaking.

In such a place it was scarcely likely that they should fail to find numerous crevices and fissures in the walls.

Without stopping to consider or ascertain whither these might lead, the plan proposed was universally adopted.

As fast as they came to one, huge pieces of rock were rolled along the floor, and wedged in as tightly as their tools and strength would permit.

As may be supposed, this labour consumed a very great deal of time, and when they had ended, it was almost time for them to set out upon their expedition.

Yet when they had concluded their task and looked all around them to view what they had done, a feeling of satisfaction pervaded both their hearts.

The time and labour they had expended, they felt quite certain, had not been thrown away.

Now all was in readiness for the carrying out of their scheme.

The only thing that remained for them to do was to effect the capture.

When this was once done they felt quite easy in their mind as to the result.

In these caverns it was almost impossible for them to be found.

Moreover, they had an excellent opportunity of making themselves familiar with all their intricacies.

This they resolved not to omit, for in the case of an attack, this knowledge might afford them the means of preserving their lives and liberty when otherwise they would be lost.

But as everything was now done, and all preparations made, and as their prospects in the future looked tolerably bright, Jonathan and his son gladly laid themselves down and essayed to sleep.

It was long, however, before slumber would descend upon their eyelids, for their brains were busy with many thoughts.

For once, their usual precaution of one watching while the other slept was omitted.

This was partly because of the fatigue that both experienced, and partly from the consciousness that they should be in no danger of an interruption.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON TAKE UP THEIR QUARTERS IN THE DESERTED SUMMER-HOUSE, AND MEET WITH A PLEASANT SURPRISE.

HAVING once sank off to sleep, it was not likely that either Wild or his son would awake quickly.

How long they may have slumbered they had no idea.

But George was the first to open his eyes.

For a minute or two he was confused and bewildered, being totally unable to think where he was.

Recollection coming back to him, he uttered a loud shout, and awoke Jonathan Wild at once.

"Up—up!" he cried. "I am afraid we have slept too late—look, the place is pitch dark!"

Such was the case.

The soft and gentle light that we have mentioned no longer filled the cavern, and the conclusion to be drawn from this was that night had descended upon the earth.

Both were in such a fever of impatience upon making this discovery, that they could not pause even to obtain a light, which they had the means of readily doing.

Confident in their ability to grope their way through the darkness, they endeavoured to reach the mouth of the passage.

In their progress they met with one or two contusions, but these were unheeded, and they continued to press eagerly forward.

Their great delight may be imagined when, upon coming within a short distance of the opening, they were able to perceive a faint grey light.

In a minute or two afterwards they emerged, and found that much of their apprehension had been groundless.

Night had come, it is true, but yet by many signs they could tell that it had only recently closed in; twilight, indeed, could scarcely have been said to have wholly departed, and the reason why that little chamber in the rock appeared so dark was that even at noontide the illumination was by no means bright.

Like the dungeons of Newgate, it was dark in them long after the sun had risen every morning.

"We won't go just yet, gov'nor," said George. "I am glad to find that we are no later."

"It is a satisfaction certainly; but why not start at once?"

"It is too early," said George; "if we are not exceedingly careful we shall be seen."

"Well, then, we may as well wait here and keep a good look-out."

No objection was made to this, and therefore they seated themselves upon the ground near the entrance to the caverns.

A night better suited to their purpose could scarcely have been found.

Dark heavy clouds came rolling up, that quickly spread themselves all over the sky, so that the darkness became in a little while unusually intense.

Every now and then, drops of rain would begin to fall, the precursors of that storm that we have already had occasion to mention more than once.

Some little debate took place as to whether they should encumber themselves with their horses.

But at length it was agreed that it would be safer to take them.

Accordingly, they were once more led out into the open air, and taken carefully down the somewhat steep sides of the hill.

The quantity of wood that grew everywhere around was highly favorable to Wild and his son, as it gave them such a good chance of concealing themselves.

Their progress, indeed, could be easily kept quite a secret, even though people were within a short distance of them.

But, from the intense silence that prevailed, and from the rough, disagreeable aspect of the weather, they concluded that there was not much probability of any persons being abroad.

The distance from the caverns to the old Manor House was much greater than it appeared to be, and, owing to their unfamiliarity with the neighbourhood, they went once or twice considerably out of their way.

At length they came to the stone wall surrounding the estate—that stone wall which divided the grounds from the high-road, and which we have already described.

Here they agreed to pause, because on the opposite side of the road was a small coppice or plantation in which they would be able to leave their horses without danger of their being seen, and yet they could easily regain them if necessary.

This done, they climbed over the wall by mutually assisting each other, for its height was by no means great.

Dropping down upon the soft mould, they assumed crouching attitudes, and crossed the garden.

Almost the first thing they discovered was a small summer-house that, from its neglected and ruined state, had evidently been long disused and deserted.

Such being the case, it was of all others the place for them to secrete themselves.

Accordingly, without the least hesitation, they took up their quarters within it.

From this summer-house a view of the mansion itself could be obtained.

Several widows were beaming with light, showing that the inmates were still astir.

Up to this moment neither Jonathan nor his son had exactly arranged how they should act.

One reason why they had left this point open was because they believed it could be better discussed upon the spot than elsewhere.

In order to make calculations or arrangements, it was necessary for them to have some kind of idea of the nature of the place they were in.

Their first point, however, had been gained.

They had managed to enter the grounds and to conceal themselves, as they firmly believed they had not been seen by a single human being.

Owing to the excellent nature of the place in which they had ensconced themselves, they believed they might remain there several days, if necessary, without being seen.

During that length of time there would surely occur some opportunity when Edgworth Bess would be wandering in the grounds alone.

That opportunity they resolved to seize upon, and when once they had made her a prisoner, to gallop off with all speed to the caverns.

In the event of failing, there still remained to them the resource of entering the Manor House itself.

This they rather shrank from, because of the immense risk it would necessarily entail.

Still, if they could not succeed in capturing her in the grounds, they resolved to set the risk at defiance, and capture her in her own room.

Having come to this decision, they settled themselves down as quietly in the deserted summer-house as they could.

It was hardly to be expected that Edgworth Bess would be roaming in the grounds at such a late hour as that, and on such a tempestuous night.

Early in the morning they might stand a chance, and they could easily remain concealed until then.

"I'll tell you what it is, guv'nor," said George, "you go to sleep, and sleep for a little while; then I'll wake you, and go to sleep myself, for at present I don't feel half so vigorous and lively as I ought."

"Agreed," said Jonathan. "I am very weary. If anything occurs, you will be sure to wake me?"

"Certainly."

"Then I will sleep."

Jonathan laid himself down at full length upon the damp and moss-grown seat in the summer-house, and, despite the hardness of his couch, he was so fatigued, and his eyes so heavy with slumber, that he dropped off into a deep sleep at once.

George allowed him to remain thus until he began to show symptoms of uneasiness.

Then, in order that he should not make any sound, and to prevent all possibility of danger arising therefrom, he awoke him.

Jonathan grumbled for a time at being thus disturbed out of his sleep.

But George scarcely troubled himself to reply.

He had kept his eyes open only by a very strong effort, for the silence and darkness of the place were highly provocative of repose.

Impressing upon Jonathan the necessity of extreme cautiousness and alertness, George allowed himself to drop off to sleep.

A considerable time then passed.

Jonathan had seated himself in a tolerably comfortable attitude, and every now and then would fall off into a kind of doze, from which he only awoke with difficulty.

In this strange, unconscious state he remained for upwards of an hour.

Then a faint and unusual sound came upon his ears.

He roused himself completely.

He listened again.

In the intense silence, he could just distinguish a footstep, but where it came from he had no idea.

The sound seemed to reach him from all sides.

One thing, however, was certain, it grew louder.

He shook George violently and awoke him.

"Listen—listen!" he said; "but don't speak or move!"

The sound of the footstep could now be more distinctly heard than ever, and George at once turned his face to the back of the summer-house, for he felt confident that was the direction from which the sound came.

He was confirmed in this supposition by hearing the footstep pause, and then ensued a faint cracking of the boards.

He touched Jonathan lightly on the shoulder, and then walked out of the summer-house on tiptoe.

Jonathan followed him.

There was a kind of shrubbery just outside, and in this the two villains concealed themselves.

In a hasty and impressive whisper, George Wild then spoke:

"Hush—hush, guv'nor! Something important awaits us, I feel certain! Watch—watch! Surely we shall see something strange!"

The crackling noise now became much more distinct.

The reader, from what has gone before, will have no difficulty in deciding what that noise was, and by whom it was produced.

The footstep Wild and his son had heard approaching was that of Edgworth Bess, and she was now engaged in the effort to liberate herself from her strange place of imprisonment—if such it may be termed.

That it could be Edgworth Bess at this late hour of the night Jonathan Wild and his son never for a moment thought.

Yet it behoved them to take accurate notice of everything that went forward.

In one respect, it seemed clear that they had made a mistake.

They believed the summer-house to be entirely deserted.

But now there was ample evidence to show some one was about to enter it.

With a sudden sound, the woodwork divided.

Edgworth Bess then found herself in the summer-house.

She advanced to the door and looked out, as we have already described.

Owing to the darkness, however, neither Jonathan nor his son could see her distinctly.

They could only tell that there was a moving mass of something, looking more like a human form than aught else.

Then she advanced with the intention of making her way with all speed to the Manor House.

When she emerged on to the gravel path, Wild junior saw her more plainly, and he strained his eyes to their utmost extent.

At first he was disposed to disbelieve what he saw.

Nearer and nearer came the figure until it was close to him.

It passed by, and in passing he caught a better glimpse of the whole face and form.

He could scarcely restrain an exclamation.

But luckily for his own interests, he had sufficient command over himself.

Then turning to Jonathan, he said, in a faint whisper:

"I see her—I see her—yonder she goes. Quick—quick, and we shall capture her easily!"

CHAPTER DCCXXXI.

JONATHAN AND HIS SON SUCCEED IN MAKING EDGORTH BESS THEIR PRISONER, AND CONVEY HER TO THE CAVERNS.

A SLIGHT rustling of the bushes in the shrubbery followed these words.

The sound was unavoidable.

Yet George Wild, when he heard it, gnashed his teeth with rage.

It reached the ears of Edgorth Bess.

Terrified at she knew not what, she darted off wildly and swiftly.

There was only one idea in her mind, and that was to reach the Manor House as quickly as possible.

Finding that they had been discovered, Jonathan and his son commenced an immediate pursuit.

It was necessary for them now to strain every nerve.

If they did not capture their prisoner on this occasion, they would scarcely have another chance.

Knowing what the consequences of failure would be caused them to put forth all their strength and energy.

In her blind haste and great desire to escape the two men that were pursuing her, Edgorth Bess paid no attention to the path that lay before her feet.

Consequently she struck against the root of a tree that projected slightly from the earth, and owing to the rapid rate she was going at, she was flung with great violence to the ground.

She struggled to her feet.

But before she could renew her race, a heavy cloak was thrown over her that deprived her at once of breath and of power to shriek for aid.

So well was the cloak muffled round her that it put a stop to her struggles immediately, and not until she was on the point of suffocation did her captors remove it.

The delight and exultation of the two villains knew no bounds, to think they should have succeeded so easily and so quickly—it seemed incredible.

There was no doubt about the reality of the event that had just occurred.

There they were in the dark and silent garden, and between them they held the girl they had been so anxious to take prisoner.

"Now, guv'nor," George cried, "quick! The sooner we are out of this place the better. I feel as though I could shout aloud for very joy."

"Don't be so foolish!" growled Jonathan. "We have succeeded—let that knowledge content you and keep you quiet."

"Very good. I'll carry her for a little way, guv'nor, then you can relieve me of the load. Between us we shall soon carry her to the place where we have left our horses."

"We shall."

They moved forward rapidly, and by carrying out the suggestion thus made much time was saved.

There was a little delay and difficulty in getting over the wall.

But at last that task was accomplished.

Jonathan Wild then crouched down in its shade with the prisoner, and remained there while his son hastened to the little plantation where the horses had been left.

George was absent on this errand only a few moments, yet it seemed a long time of anxiety to Jonathan, who kept straining his ears and listening, fearing that he should hear something of a pursuit.

To his great relief, he at length saw his son appear.

The horses were brought close.

Edgorth Bess was lifted on to one of them, and George mounted behind her.

By passing his arm round her waist and clasping her tightly to him, he was able to keep her perfectly secure.

Jonathan mounted, and in another moment they were going at full gallop towards their destination.

The dangers in their path were of no mean description.

But that was not a time to shrink from trifles.

They were both aware how necessary it was that they should gain the friendly shelter of the cavern with as little loss of time as possible.

Partly from fright, and partly from the cloak having been wrapped so tightly around her, Edgorth Bess had swooned, and at present gave no signs of returning animation.

This was a state of things with which George Wild was by no means disposed to quarrel, since it saved him a vast amount of trouble.

As far as ever it was practicable, they rode at full speed among the trees, although they received several sharp blows from low-lying branches while doing so.

When the trees grew so thickly together that further progress in this manner was impossible, they dismounted.

The remainder of the distance to the mouth of the cavern was then performed in the same manner as they had crossed the garden.

That is to say, they took it in turns to carry their captive in their arms.

The ascent was very steep, and by the time they reached the cavern entrance both Wild and his son were so fatigued that they felt they could scarcely have carried her a dozen yards further.

With all convenient speed the horses were led through the narrow aperture, and Edgorth Bess placed down upon the damp ground.

This change of position served to restore her to her senses.

She moved slightly, and then opened her eyes.

As may be expected, her brain was for a long time in a state of hopeless confusion.

So many strange adventures had befallen her on that night that it was hard to say where they had ceased, or whether the whole was not a dream, or whether she was dreaming still.

While she was endeavouring to resume a proper command over herself, Jonathan Wild addressed a few unimportant words to his son.

At the sound of his much-dreaded voice she uttered a low, hysterical cry, and then again relapsed into utter unconsciousness.

The horses having been attended to, a light was procured, and Edgorth Bess carried into the small chamber which was destined for her reception.

Finding her still insensible, here they left her lying on the ground as before.

The entrance to the dungeon was closed up by means of a huge stone.

Wild and his son seated themselves near.

They were determined not to allow their prisoner any chance of escape.

"We will rest till morning, guv'nor," said George; "but we will take it in turns to sleep. We have got our prize now, and we shall be very greatly to blame if we lose it."

"We shall indeed," said Jonathan. "If she slips through my fingers again I shall be out of all patience."

"Nay—never talk like that, guv'nor; it's not worth while to despond when everything around us wears so bright an aspect. Why, what more could you expect? Who would have believed that she would have fallen into our hands so easily and so quickly?"

"It does seem indeed surprising," returned Jonathan. "Fortune is favouring us greatly—that's the simple explanation of the matter."

"I trust, then, that she will continue to do so, and not turn the tables upon us."

"So do I."

"But let us rest now—let us rest. We will defer all our future plans and arrangements until to-morrow. We shall have an interview with our prisoner then, and shall be able to judge something from her manner and reception of us."

This was at once agreed to, and their original plan was carried out.

Edgorth Bess remained in a partial or total state of insensibility until early morning.

Then she slowly recovered her senses, and by dint of much thought and difficulty, managed to form a tolerably good idea of her precise position.

She remembered how she had been suddenly seized, and then there was an indistinct recollection of having heard the hateful voice of Jonathan Wild.

She looked all around her, and found herself in a strange cavernous apartment, the bare appearance of which was enough to strike terror into her heart.

All around, the walls looked dark and frowning, and in many places pieces jutted over that threatened every moment to fall upon her and crush her.

Then far up above—how far she could not by any possibility guess—could be seen the faint light of early day.

No doubt, on the summit of the hill it was bright and glorious sunshine.

But only a dubious twilight filled her gloomy dungeon.

Yes, she was once more a prisoner in the hands of Jonathan Wild.

She had again fallen completely in his power, and this time she knew that there was no hope to expect.

Having once realised this dreadful knowledge, she sank down upon one of the pieces of rock on the floor of the cavern, and clasping her hands over her face, wept long and bitterly.

How much she blamed herself for what had taken place.

Had she restrained her curiosity, or had she taken the precaution not to venture out into the grounds during darkness, this calamity would not have happened.

This blaming herself for her actions, however, did not the slightest good.

She was there now a prisoner, and, beyond a doubt, so well confined, that all the efforts that she might make to escape, would be completely futile.

How long she may have remained in this dejected attitude she knew not.

But her tears continued to flow, and her heart to swell, until she feared it would really break.

It was no wonder that she should give way to an extremity of grief at finding herself in such a position as this.

Had she been the prisoner of any other person than Jonathan Wild she could have felt tolerably content.

But she knew the desperate nature of his position.

She knew as well the fiend-like nature of his heart, and felt certain that he would stop at no atrocity, if by that means he could accomplish his revenge.

That she might be the object of his insane vengeance seemed only too probable, for it was not likely that Jonathan's elaborate and particular motives for making her a prisoner should occur to her mind.

At last her tears refused to flow, and then, in a grief that was all the more terrible on that account, she rose to her feet and made a tour of her dungeon.

She looked at all the walls, but found no opening—no place that afforded her the slightest hope of escape.

She saw how carefully the different fissures had been wedged up by masses of rock, and her heart sank within her.

Every pains had, beyond a doubt, been taken to prevent her recovering her liberty.

High up overhead, no doubt, there was some opening large enough to allow her to pass through.

But how was it possible that she could climb up to such a great height?

No, that thought was quite out of the question, and when again she sunk down upon the piece of rock and bowed her head upon her shoulders in abject grief, it was with the perfect conviction that she was wholly and utterly in the power of Jonathan Wild and his son, and that she of herself could do nothing to extricate herself from it.

While as for her friends, they might remain in ignorance of her fate or whereabouts until too late to save her.

CHAPTER DCCXXXII.

GEORGE WILD AND JONATHAN MAKE KNOWN THEIR INTENTIONS TO EDGORTH BESS.

THE sad reflections of Edgorth Bess were broken in upon by a strange sound, which at first puzzled her exceedingly.

She changed her position, and rose up to her full height.

She listened half in terror, half in expectation.

It seemed almost as though some portion of the cavern was giving way and falling to the ground.

The real cause was that Jonathan and his son were engaged in rolling away the huge piece of rock that they had used to block up the entrance.

Almost immediately afterwards they entered the dungeon, and when Edgorth Bess caught sight of the forms of her hated persecutors, she hastily retreated, and crouched down behind a huge stone that would, she thought, prove some sort of a bulwark between herself and her foes.

This movement was noticed by Jonathan and his son with a derisive grin.

With a countenance blanched by fear, with her heart beating so dreadfully that she could scarcely breathe, and with her lips apart, Edgorth Bess gazed at them apprehensively, watching every movement that they made, and every change in their countenances.

For some moments neither George nor Jonathan spoke.

They kept their eyes riveted upon the form of their prisoner.

Evidently they enjoyed the state of confusion and dismay that she was in.

Perhaps they were waiting for her to speak first.

But if this was the case they were disappointed.

Had her liberty depended upon it, it is questionable whether Edgorth Bess would have been able to pronounce a single word.

"Now, then," said Wild junior, at length, "don't look so precious frightened! Don't you know who we are? What have you to be afraid of?"

Edgorth Bess made no reply.

"Don't you want to know why you are here? Do you not wish to learn what it is that we intend to do with you, eh? Why the devil don't you speak?"

Still a silence.

"You are obstinate," said Jonathan Wild, speaking for the first time.

At the sound of his voice Edgorth Bess shuddered from head to foot, and, if such a thing was possible, her face turned just a little paler than it was before.

"It doesn't matter," he continued, in the same harsh, grating tones, "you can listen, I am certain, and as for your own speeches, they don't matter; perhaps all you would have to say would be to implore us to release you!"

"Let me do the talking, guv'nor," said George. "I can come to the point better. Now then, just listen to me, will you, and pay attention. Can you hear what I say?"

Dreading some fresh violence, and anxious if possible to conciliate her foes, Edgorth Bess nodded her head.

"Oh, well, that's something," replied George. "Now, as you can hear and understand, just listen to this little explanation."

"I'll tell her," said Jonathan.

"No—no, guv'nor, I will."

"Go on, then, and be quick."

"You know who we are," commenced George, "and I don't mind confessing to you that we are in a most perilous position; we have had many narrow escapes of our lives; but we live yet, and fortune is now, I hope, turning in our favour."

"Not so much introduction," said Jonathan.

"Hold your row, guv'nor," was the rough rejoinder.

Then in a calmer tone of voice, he continued:

"When the guv'nor and myself found how badly off we were, we were obliged to come to some decision as to our future conduct, and therefore we proposed to leave England—that is, if you would permit us."

Edgorth Bess stared at him in blank amazement.

Her astonishment even enabled her to overcome her fear, and therefore she ejaculated:

"If I would allow you?"

"Yes, certainly. I am glad you have found your tongue at last, because that will make the conversation more easy and the result more satisfactory to both of us. As I said, we have made up our minds to leave England, if you will let us."

"I am at a loss to understand you."

"Then I will soon make my meaning clear. We would go without asking your leave and licence if we only had the means, but we have not. Now do you begin to understand?"

"I do not—I am puzzled."

"Well, then, you have at last succeeded to your wealth—you have made many powerful friends, who would doubtless do anything you ask them. Is it not so?"

"Perhaps it is."

"I am sure it is; and now I will be more explicit, and tell you why it is we want your permission to leave. The police are abroad in strong numbers—so strong that we can scarcely pass through them—and for another reason, we have no money."

"But what has that to do with me?" asked Edgworth Bess, more boldly. "Why have you taken me a prisoner in this way? Let me tell you that this act will most certainly bring down destruction upon your heads."

"No it won't," said George, decidedly—"quite the reverse. It was our last and only hope of safety, and I'll take good care that it does not fail us."

Edgworth Bess was more puzzled still.

"There are two things we require you to do," continued George. "You can please yourself whether you do them or not; but understand clearly, that the consequence of refusal will be death."

"What are your requisitions? Anything that is in reason I will grant."

"Now, that's what I call exceedingly satisfactory," said George, in tones of complacent satisfaction. "What do you say, guv'nor?"

"Tell her what the conditions are," was the gruff response.

"Well, then," said George, "the first is that you use your influence with your powerful friends to allow us the opportunity of making our escape from England. A hint has only to be dropped in the proper quarter, and then the whole thing would be easy enough. We would leave England, and never return to it again."

Hearing these words, the heart of Edgworth Bess beat high with hope.

She could scarcely believe in the reality of the words she had just listened to.

"That's the first condition," said George. "What do you say to it?"

"I will comply with it gladly—willingly," she answered. "Whether I have or not the power you suppose I have I cannot tell, but I will do everything that lies in my power."

"Good," said George. "No more is required. I feel sure, if you are willing, the matter can be settled in a moment. Now, then, for the other condition."

"And if I comply with both," said Edgworth Bess, "shall I be set at liberty?"

"You will; and what's more, you will never again be troubled by us, as we will leave England, and never return to it again."

"Let me know it, then," said Edgworth Bess, eagerly and hopefully.

"Why, the fact is, we are badly in want of money. We have none, and you have plenty—much more, indeed, than you could spend or than you can know what to do with; so surrender to us a portion of that wealth, to make it worth our while to leave England, and then we are off at once."

Edgworth Bess clasped her hands together.

"I comply," she said—"I comply, gladly and willingly. You need not have used these harsh measures towards me. If you had addressed yourself to me, I should have gladly granted your requests."

George drew a long breath.

"We did not know that," he said. "However, it will be all the same. You will have nothing to complain of in your imprisonment if you only remain in the humour you now are."

"I shall not change, rest assured of it."

"Well, then, all I can say is, that I am very glad, and you will quickly be at liberty."

"But the amount," said Jonathan—"you have not told her the amount."

"Well, I suppose it does not much signify. However, we intend to be perfectly reasonable and moderate. All we require is fifteen thousand pounds!"

"Fifteen thou—" gasped Edgworth Bess.

"Sand pounds!" said George, emphatically, finishing the sentence for her.

"Oh, it's enormous—outrageous!" she ejaculated. "I imagined that you were in earnest when you said that your desires were moderate."

"And are they not?"

"How can you call them so since the amount you ask for must be half my fortune?"

"Pooh, pooh!—nothing of the kind! In comparison to your total wealth it is a mere trifle; you would never miss it, and surely it would not be worth your while to sacrifice your life for such an amount!"

"Yes," said Jonathan, "look at it in that light. Your life is entirely in our hands. We suppose it to be worth fifteen thousand pounds, and that's the least price we shall take for it! If you think it is too much, why, we will slay you at once, without remorse!"

He produced a pistol as he spoke, and deliberately cocked it.

Such a bloodthirsty expression at the same time pervaded his countenance that Edgworth Bess shrank close down to the floor in her alarm.

"No—no!" she said. "Mercy—mercy! Do not slay me!"

"Well, then, in a word, do you consent to give us the amount we ask? Quick—quick!—your answer! Either way—I care not!"

He brought the pistol carefully to a level—so carefully that Edgworth Bess, whose eyes were fixed upon it by a kind of dreadful fascination, fancied she could see right down the barrel as far as the bright bullet that was in it.

"Yes," said George—"be quick! Your life or fifteen thousand pounds! We are ready to take either, so be quick and say which you will part with!"

Edgworth Bess again felt unable to answer.

This time it was because of the thousands and thousands of thoughts that seemed to come all at once thronging into her brain.

The loud, angry tones of Jonathan Wild falling again upon her ear aroused her from her reverie, if we may so term it.

"Let me think," she said—"give me a short time to reflect, and you shall have my answer."

"Good," said George—"that's a very reasonable request, and to show you that we think so, we will grant it at once. We will leave you, because we feel sure that a little reflection will show you how foolish it would be on your part to sacrifice your life for so paltry a sum as fifteen thousand pounds."

He turned round as he spoke, to leave the cavern, and was followed moodily and sullenly by Jonathan.

It was a great relief to Edgworth Bess when she saw their forms disappear in the narrow passage.

Immediately afterwards she heard the heavy stone again rolled into its place.

But she did not see George Wild clap Jonathan enthusiastically upon the shoulder, nor hear him say:

"All's well, guv'nor—all's well! Rely upon it, when we go to ask her for her answer, it will be as reasonable as we can wish. Was it not a good thought, guv'nor?—an excellent thought, and better than all foolish ideas about revenge and such-like. Life before all say I."

CHAPTER DCCXXXIII.

EDGWORTH BESS MAKES AN EFFORT TO ESCAPE, AND IS FOILED IN THE MOMENT OF SUCCESS.

EDGWORTH BESS had asked for time to think over the proposal that had been made to her by Wild junior, but it was more with the view of getting rid of her persecutors for a time than for the genuine purpose of reflection.

The importance of her situation, however, soon pressed itself upon her notice.

It was necessary to come to a decision.

George Wild had placed the question before her in the simplest and plainest manner.

She had to choose between parting with fifteen thousand pounds or her life.

Would she not estimate that priceless possession at a higher sum?

Would not there be others, too, who would do so?

Surely, yes.

Had she been so situated as to have no one else to please or consult except herself—had she been in the position to say, "Go—leave England, and take the wealth you ask for with you," she would most certainly have said these words.

Fortunately, she had not that power, or the two villains would have escaped that punishment which was so justly due to their crimes.

[EDGWORTH BESS IS RECAPTURED BY JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON.]

Even now she hesitated whether to make the application which was demanded of her.

What would those friends of hers—those friends who in the hour of adversity had shown themselves so worthy of the name—what would they be likely to say under such circumstances?

She was well acquainted with the details of all the plans that they had laid.

Not one particular had escaped her, for Steggs had judged it best to confide all in her.

Would they not be justly incensed if she by any act interfered with those schemes, upon the fruition of which they had, as one may say, staked their existences?

Truly was she in great perplexity.

Then, from her friends, she would turn to a consideration of her own position.

She was a prisoner.

No. 155.—BLUESKIN.

Hopelessly a prisoner.

No strength of hers, no skill would enable her to escape from that stronghold of Nature's own making.

Her heart completely sank within her bosom whenever her eye rested on the massive rocky walls.

They had threatened her life.

Threatened in a manner that showed that they were frightfully in earnest.

She knew them both well.

She knew their natures to be such that if angered by her obstinacy, as they would call it, they would, without the slightest scruple of compunction, put her to a cruel death.

With such an alternative as that before her, would it not be better to sacrifice all she had?

Would she not be blamed for not having in the first place set the highest value upon her life?

She thought so, and came to a decision. Then she felt calmer.

It would perhaps be better for all if Jonathan Wild quietly left the country.

A great danger would then be removed from Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

"Yes—yes," she murmured—"I will comply with their demands, extortionate as they are, and if it lies in my power, they shall go, and then I trust we shall hear of them no more, and that I shall begin to realise the meaning of the word happiness."

Not for one moment the question flitted across her mind would Jonathan and his son keep their word—after they had once left England would they return to it—would they again apply to her and so drain her of her wealth in order to purchase their forbearance?

Considering the character of the two villains, this was by no means improbable.

But Edgworth Bess dismissed the thought.

It was too terrible to be dwelt upon.

Sufficient surely was it, under present circumstances, that she should look at present danger and leave that which was in the distance until it absolutely forced itself upon her notice.

Her captors showed no desire to hasten her in her decision, and at length she rose, and, by the better light that then prevailed, began to make a closer examination of the singular circular cavern in which she was kept prisoner.

But she saw nothing that had escaped her on her former inspection, and after having paced its narrow limits several times she sat down, with an oppressed spirit, upon the fragment of rock which had already served her for a seat.

Here she remained for a long time—how long, she could form no just idea, for she had no means by which she might judge of the flight of time.

Suddenly she heard again the rumbling sound produced by the removal of the mass of rock that blocked up the passage.

This time she was at no loss to understand the meaning of the sound as she had been on the former occasion.

The moment she heard it she started to her feet.

A wild hope darted into her mind.

She might escape.

She might avail herself of the opportunity to dart past her foes, and among the intricacies of the caverns she might elude their pursuit.

At any rate, she had everything to gain and nothing to lose by making such an attempt.

Therefore she resolved to try it.

It was well perhaps that she had no time for further reflection, otherwise she might have abandoned the idea so hastily formed.

The stone having been at last removed, Wild and his son advanced along the passage.

Edgworth Bess stood waiting for them to make their appearance.

Her heart was beating at a fearful rate.

She pressed close to the wall, and as her two captors entered the cavern hastily they did not perceive her.

Finding the way clear, she darted along without a moment's hesitation.

Fear lent speed to her feet.

So suddenly was this act performed, that Jonathan and his son were completely taken by surprise.

They were too late to prevent her escape.

Horrible execrations escaped their lips, and then they commenced an immediate pursuit.

They could hear her faint footfalls on the rocky floor before them—they could hear the rustling of her dress.

Nothing but the idea that she was flying for her life would have enabled Edgworth Bess to rush onward along a path with which she was totally unfamiliar, and which was in some places plunged in the most complete darkness.

But this latter circumstance was in her favour, for it gave her the opportunity of getting out of the way of her foes altogether, which would have been impossible in the daylight.

The fearful imprecations which escaped their lips fell plainly upon her ears, and increased her terror.

She would now have their anger to appease in case she should be so unfortunate as to be recaptured.

And, alas! that event seemed only too likely to take place.

They were certainly gaining upon her.

Not only could they run better, but they possessed the additional advantage of familiarity with the ground beneath their feet.

Then suddenly Edgworth Bess perceived before her a faint beam of light.

This told her that she must be nearing an opening of some kind—that she must be approaching the outer world.

This was a fresh incentive to exertion.

Again she bounded forward, and in such a manner as to distance her foes completely.

They knew well enough the cause of this, and they redoubled their endeavours to come up with her.

But on, on she flew—on with the frantic speed of despair.

Brighter and brighter—larger and larger grew the light.

There could now be no doubt about the nature of it.

One of the exits of the cavern was before her.

Could she only pass through it.

Could she only gain the open air beyond?

Then, and then indeed would she hope that she might regain her liberty altogether.

Some friendly persons might be close at hand.

Or some chance pedestrian would surely throw around her the shield of his protection.

But as she neared the wished-for spot she felt her strength failing her.

Her limbs trembled beneath her.

Her eyes grew dizzy.

Her brain went round and round.

Her exhausted lungs refused to perform their functions.

Yet, in spite of all, she struggled on.

Struggled on with strange sounds ringing like death knells in her ears, and with strange objects floating before her eyes.

But she could feel the fresh air blow upon her heated brow, showing her how close she was to freedom, for so, in the confusion of her intellects, she considered getting clear of the caverns to be.

She strained every nerve—every muscle, and yet she trembled, staggered, reeled, and almost fell.

By an extraordinary effort she regained her feet, but it was only to stumble the next moment afterwards, and then she fell helplessly upon the hard ground of the cavern, with her body half in and half out of the entrance.

A shout of triumph rang in her ears, and the next moment her foes pounced upon her.

They need not have been so rough or violent, however.

She was perfectly helpless, and could no more rise than she could fly.

The angry passions of both Wild and his son were, however, fully aroused, and they could not be subdued all in a moment.

George raised his hand in an attitude to strike.

But Jonathan restrained him.

"Hold!" he said. "Do you know what you are about?"

"Curse her!" was the angry answer. "I have a great mind to—"

"Be quiet! We have captured her again, and that will be sufficient."

"But I can't take it so calmly."

"Bah! You don't understand."

"Understand what?"

"Why, after this, she will be more in our power than ever; or, rather, she will feel herself to be, which is just about the same thing."

With an inarticulate growl, George stooped down and raised Edgworth Bess in his arms.

She shuddered visibly as he did so, and guessing the cause of her repugnance, he pressed her all the closer to him.

But Edgworth Bess was so thoroughly prostrated as to be incapable of making any resistance.

She indeed was only just conscious, and that was all.

Muttering curses, Wild junior carried her again into the cavern.

Jonathan followed him.

Then, having reached it, he deposited her rather roughly upon the ground.

"Come, guv'nor," he said, turning round, "let us leave her for a time. When we return she will doubtless be more reasonable."

With these words, he left.

The heavy stone was rolled into its place again.

Then all was still.

CHAPTER DCCXXXIV

FORTUNE TURNS UNEXPECTEDLY AGAINST JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON.

EDGORTH BESS was then left to recover her senses as best she could, and, as she was dreadfully fatigued, a long time elapsed before she showed any signs of returning to her senses.

At length, however, she rose painfully to her feet, and, clasping her hands over her face, wept long and bitterly.

The disappointment she had just experienced was almost more than she could bear.

Her ears, too, were all the time upon the stretch, for there was nothing she dreaded so much just then as the approach of Jonathan Wild and his son.

She could easily guess that their rage would be much excited by her attempt at escape, and how to conciliate them she knew not.

But the two villains remained perfectly quiet for several hours, the fact being that they were resting themselves by a long sleep.

At length the stone was again rolled away, and they entered the cavern.

"None of your tricks," growled Jonathan. "You can't escape, and you may get yourself injured; so beware!"

Edgorth Bess shrank back until she reached the wall of the cavern, and then leaned against it, so overcome with terror as to be on the point of swooning again.

"Come," said George, who noticed her condition, "we don't want to be severe with you. It was only natural you should attempt to escape. Now you've tried it, and found it no good; so just say whether you intend to comply with our demands or not."

"I will—I will!" said Edgorth Bess, hastily. "Anything you like to propose I will consent to!"

"Well, now," said Wild junior, "that's what I call being reasonable, and you will find that I sha'n't take any advantage of you in such a case. You shall just write a letter to the person from whom you receive your money, and then leave the rest to us."

"I will willingly," said Edgorth Bess. "But where can I obtain writing materials?"

"I have them here," said George. "I have come quite prepared."

He fumbled in his pocket for some time, and at length produced a thick pocket-book, doubtless the proceeds of some robbery or other.

He turned over the leaves impatiently, looking for a blank one, and, having found what he sought, he drew out the pencil, and sucked the lead for some time, so as to soften it.

"There," he said, "that will do. Bear on heavily, to make the writing distinct."

Edgorth Bess took the articles proffered to her, and said:

"Now, what shall I write?"

"These words," said George—"write them down as I speak."

Edgorth Bess prepared to obey.

"I have been taken prisoner by Jonathan Wild, who demands ransom for me. The conditions are, that he and his son are allowed the opportunity of leaving England un molested, and that the sum of fifteen thousand pounds be paid to them. To this I have given my consent, and I trust you will not hesitate to adopt these the only means of freeing me from my dreadful state of confinement."

"In case of a refusal, they have sworn to take my life, and I do not doubt they will be as good as their word."

"The reply to this letter must be sent to King Charles's Statue, Charing Cross, and if any treachery is attempted my life will pay the forfeit."

"Now sign it," said George, "and just say to whom I am to take it."

"The Lord Chancellor," was the response.

George made a wry face.

"Is it from him that you receive your supplies of money?"

"It is—everything comes from him."

"Then I have no resource but to submit," said George.

"However, the result shall be tried, and, until we know, you will remain here a prisoner, but yet in safety and unhurt. Come, guv'nor—we will commence this business at once."

With these words, the two villains left the circular cavern, and Edgorth Bess once more remained a solitary prisoner.

"I have my doubts," said George to Jonathan, after the stone had been rolled into its place—"I have my doubts; but this is a bold stake that we are playing for, and we must try if we can win. If it had been to anyone but the Lord Chancellor, I should have had better hopes."

"Don't despair now," said Jonathan. "I think the reason is because you have obtained the letter so easily."

"Well, perhaps so. At any rate, I will try; and now, guv'nor, I'll tell you what we must do."

"What?"

"I will take this letter, and, if possible, obtain the money. Don't frown or look suspicious. For once in my life, I promise to be fair and straightforward with you. You can remain here on guard over the prisoner."

At first, Jonathan was disposed to quarrel with this arrangement; but George was firm, and, as usual, carried his point.

Evening being now about to set in, he commenced his preparations for departure.

His horse was saddled, and he led him out of the opening in the rock, having first ascertained that there was no one in sight.

Jonathan watched him for a little while—in fact, until his form was hidden among the trees.

Then he turned back into the cavern.

Scarcely had he done so than he was startled by the loud report of firearms.

His cheeks blanched and he trembled from head to foot as he heard the sound.

It was strange that such an effect should be produced upon him.

But the fact was, for a full moment he remained as though suddenly deprived of life.

The blood seemed to stagnate round his heart.

Then he heard a hasty foot outside, and immediately afterwards Wild junior rushed, or rather staggered, in.

"Quick—quick!" he said. "Roll the stone to the opening—close it up—our foes are upon us!"

"What has happened, George?"

"D—n me if I hardly know!" was the angry reply; "but suddenly I found myself surrounded by a whole troop of police officers, who called upon me to surrender. I refused, of course, and managed to escape them, but they fired a volley, and I am sure I carry at least three of the bullets in my body. Oh, curses!"

A howl of agony escaped him at this juncture.

He was evidently badly wounded, for he sank down like a stone to the floor.

The sound of hurried footsteps could now be heard without, mingled with the crashing of branches.

"They come," said George—they come! "Why do you not block up the entrance? Quick—quick!"

There were plenty of loose fragments of rock lying about, which seemed at some time or other to have fallen from the roof of the cavern, and selecting one of these, Jonathan worked with might and main to roll it towards the aperture.

"I would help you if I could, guv'nor," said George; "but, curse me, I am done for this time! It's all over with me—I can feel I am wounded to the death."

A succession of hideous groans came from his lips after pronouncing these words.

Great indeed was the effect produced upon Jonathan Wild by this announcement.

In his hard and rugged heart there was one tender place left, and that was the affection he had for his villainous son.

The intelligence that he had received a mortal wound was almost too much for him, and it seemed as though he was deprived of all strength.

But George again urged him to exertion.

The officers could now be heard very close at hand indeed.

Straining every nerve and muscle, Jonathan rolled the huge block of stone over and over until at last, with a crash, it wedged itself into the orifice.

"That's better, guv'nor," said George, faintly—"that's better! Fight it out to the last—don't give in to them! Fight—fight! We can command this place against a hundred!"

In his excitement he had partly raised himself from the ground.

But now his arm gave way beneath him, and he sank down heavily again.

Jonathan was full of grief.

"Don't mind me, guv'nor," said George—"don't mind me! Get all the weapons ready; I will lie here and load them while you fire!"

"But what's the good," said Jonathan, "if you are mortally wounded—what's the good? I may as well die too."

"Not a bit of it, guv'nor—not a bit of it! Besides, if we can only manage to disperse the officers, or even to drive them back for a short time, we may escape. Remember, there are several means of exit from these caverns, and I may not be so badly hurt as I at first thought."

He groaned again, however, while he spoke, and so seemed to give the lie to the words he had just uttered.

He pressed his hand tightly to his side.

But, nevertheless, the crimson tide came slowly oozing through his fingers.

His face grew whiter and whiter, and it was plain that his strength was going fast.

Jonathan had almost lost all heart.

But, taking up his pistols, he stood near the opening in the rock, ready to fire upon the officers, should a chance of doing so present itself.

CHAPTER DCCXXXV.

JONATHAN WILD IS HARDLY PRESSED BY HIS FOES, BUT RESOLVES UPON REVENGE.

THE presence of the officers near the cavern will, of course, be readily understood.

They were those who had been especially sent out upon the duty of capturing Jonathan Wild and his son.

The intimation they had received was an all-powerful one.

They knew that if they failed to accomplish their object the consequences would be very serious to them in more ways than one.

Besides, the amount of the rewards having been doubled was a great incentive to exertion, and, for once in a way, it must be said that they did their best.

But, then, for one thing, the whole of the force had been picked over and the best men selected for this important duty.

They had commenced their investigations at the old Manor House, and had gradually extended them until they reached the hills in which the caverns were situated.

From inquiries they had made of many persons, they learned of the existence of these strange cavernous places, and that they were believed to be the haunt of a band of robbers.

Being in possession of such information, it was only reasonable that they should jump to the conclusion that this was where Jonathan Wild had concealed himself.

At any rate, this seemed far more likely than any other place they had heard of, and therefore they resolved to make a search in that direction.

Even if they failed to find those they sought, they believed they should at least succeed in dispersing the robbers who had taken up their quarters there.

While forcing their way through the dense vegetation that clothed the sides of the hill, they heard some one approaching, and, at a word from their leader, became in a moment perfectly still.

They waited and listened, and found that this person, whoever he might be, was gradually advancing towards them.

At last he was caught sight of, and instantly recognised as George Wild.

They rushed forward and endeavoured to seize him.

They called upon him to surrender, but without effect.

With a suddenness of movement, for which they were not prepared, George Wild turned round and fled.

A volley was sent after him, and, from the manner in which he staggered when hit, and the cry that issued from his lips, they knew well enough that he had been wounded.

It was only necessary for them to follow him up.

They were convinced they had got upon the right track at last, and their spirits rose accordingly.

Yet, in spite of his injuries, such was the speed that George Wild made that he quickly got out of both sight and hearing.

But this was chiefly because he had already become familiar with the ground.

The officers therefore laboured under a disadvantage in this respect, and, moreover, some time was lost in taking accurate note of which way he went.

The act of tracking him was not a very difficult one, however, for all the way he went, George left behind him a distinct mark of blood that could be followed up with comparative ease and rapidity.

They saw him pass through the hole in the side of the hill, but were not in time to prevent Jonathan from wedging in the piece of rock.

The officers, however, now felt that one sharp rush would probably do the business, and therefore, summoning up all their energies, they made a desperate attack upon the opening.

Despite its weight, the rock was moved from its position.

But no sooner was this done than they were rewarded with a couple of bullets that did immediate execution.

"Don't shrink," said the chief officer—"don't shrink! If you do, you will be picked off one by one! Rush forward before they have time to re-load!"

But Jonathan in the meanwhile had received from his son two more loaded pistols, and instantly discharged them, and with such good effect that two more police officers fell to the ground.

It anything could be calculated to enrage them more than another, this was, and they uttered loud and angry cries.

Jonathan, however, fought valiantly.

"We must retreat, George," he said, in a faint whisper—"we must retreat; we can hold this point no longer."

"Go, then, guv'nor—go. Make the best use of your legs you can, and leave me here; it's no good for me to make the attempt."

"It is—it is," said Jonathan. "I will not abandon you thus. Come! There, now, will not that be better?"

While speaking, he stooped down, and, with an extraordinary exertion of strength—a strength that was probably lent to him by the desperation of his situation—he lifted up his son in his arms, and carried him along the passage.

Considering the heavy burden he carried, the speed he made was wonderful.

But he knew that much depended upon the first start, and he hoped, amid the intricacies of the caverns, to baffle his pursuers.

Some little delay took place while the officers all made their way past the fragments of rock, but as soon as they were altogether in a body, they made a rush along the passage in the direction of the sounds of footsteps they could hear.

Coming up to a point where the caverns branched off in three directions, Jonathan paused, and drew a pistol from his belt.

The officers were close behind him, and as the passage was very narrow, they completely blocked it up.

He fired, and the loud cry that followed told that the bullet had done fearful execution.

He drew another pistol, and fired again, then turned down one of the passages.

His calculation was that those two shots would produce a slight delay, and that before the officers could recover themselves from it, he should have got so far as to be out of their earshot.

It was then more likely that they should take the wrong turning than the right one.

This calculation was proved to be correct.

The officers did take the wrong turning, for the sounds of their footsteps and voices grew fainter and fainter.

Then, with a heavy half-sigh, half-groan, he allowed the body of his son to slip to the ground.

For the last few moments he had found him growing heavier and heavier as he held him, and growing colder and colder every instant.

"George," he cried,—"George, tell me how you feel now! Are you better? Speak—speak quickly!"

A painful, gurgling sound was the only reply.

Jonathan shrieked out in his despair.

"George," he cried,—"George, one more word! Speak to me again!"

It was evident that Wild junior endeavoured to comply with this request, but he could not.

The rattling sound in his throat grew more and more painful to listen to.

Jonathan knew what it was, though he strove to cheat himself into disbelief.

It was the death rattle that he heard.

His son George was dying. Speech was already gone, and the last words that he would ever utter had passed his lips.

The loud cry to which Jonathan had given vent had reached the ears of the police officers, and made them aware of his position.

Their hasty footsteps could now be heard hastening towards him, and as he gazed in the direction, his face assumed the ferocious aspect of a beast of prey.

With a convulsive shuddering of the limbs, a gasp for breath, and a contortion of his whole frame, George Wild expired.

As soon as he knew that all was over, Jonathan sprang to his feet.

A fire seemed then to be raging in his brain.

Reason, reflection, and every other feeling had gone—he was conscious only of one thing, and that was that his son was dead, and had perished at the hands of the police officers.

An insane diabolical desire for vengeance then took possession of him.

"Revenge!" he murmured, hoarsely. "I will be revenged upon all—all! I will not die yet until I have been revenged, and most of all shall they suffer for George's death! Curses—curses on them all!"

He hastily reloaded his weapons, and then he turned to fly, for the officers were getting very close to him indeed.

It grieved him to leave his son lying where he was for the police officers to find him.

But it was impossible to do otherwise, and, moreover, this would doubtless prove some check to their progress.

His hideous countenance now assumed an expression of greater ferocity than ever.

One glance at it would have been sufficient to show that he was meditating a crime of more than usual enormity, but yet a crime for which he seemed to thirst.

"Blood—blood!" he cried. "I will have blood—nothing but that will calm the fury of my soul!"

He turned round hastily and darted along a narrow passage, the direction of which he well knew.

His speed was great, and it took him but a few moments to reach its extremity.

Then thrusting his weapons into his belt so as to have his hands at liberty, he stooped down and began to roll away a large stone.

It was a stone that he had removed on more than one occasion.

It was the one that guarded the entrance to the cavern where Edgworth Bess was confined.

His object may now be defined.

It was easy to guess who would be the first object of his insane revenge.

In her helpless, defenceless condition in that cavern, with the officers some distance off, how could she escape the dreadful death that Jonathan Wild fully intended for her, and which he would not scruple for a moment to inflict?

CHAPTER DCCXXXVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARRIVE UPON THE SCENE OF ACTION AT THE OPPORTUNE MOMENT.

As soon as the opening was left free, Jonathan drew from his pocket a long dagger-like knife.

He ran his thumb along the edge as if to try its keenness.

Then with a nod apparently of satisfaction he went creeping in.

His motions much resembled those of a tiger.

Edgworth Bess no sooner caught sight of him when he entered the little circular cavern than she uttered a loud and fearful shriek—a cry that resounded through all the caverns.

"Curse you!" cried Jonathan, hoarse with rage. "You should die, if it was only for that sound. Yes, die—die! I have sworn to be revenged!"

He rushed forward, with the knife uplifted.

The poor girl saw her danger, and shrieked again.

"Help—help!" she cried—"help—help!"

Jonathan laughed exultingly.

"Cry for help," he said, "as much as you like, but none will come. We are here—here by ourselves; and your death is certain."

He sprang after and missed her only by a hair's breadth.

Edgworth Bess endeavoured to gain the opening leading from the cavern.

But Jonathan, with the speed of thought, divined her intention, and intercepted her.

"Now," he cried—"now—now I have you!"

He gave a bound forward, and he felt his hand rest upon her shoulder.

But at that moment there came a flash, followed by a loud report.

The knife fell from the nerveless grasp of Jonathan Wild, and he fell down in a huddled-up heap upon the floor of the cavern.

The shot was, in truth, a most opportune one.

But from whence had it come?

In order to explain this, it will be necessary to go back a little.

We must revert to the proceedings of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

It will be remembered that they had decided how they were to act, and had commenced their search with great energy and promptitude.

In going round in the manner they had determined, they came at length to that small open space on the hill-side where Jonathan and his son first had an encounter with the robbers.

Here they found signs of a struggle having recently taken place, and anything that looked like violence or bloodshed they immediately connected with the objects of their pursuit.

It was not long before they found the hole in the ground that had been so effectually stopped up by thrusting the trunk of a tree down it.

This was something that caused them a great deal of speculation; and it is very doubtful whether, aided by their own resources, they would have been able to come to a decision.

But while they were conversing with each other upon the subject, a low moaning sound attracted their attention.

They listened, and discovered the point from which the sound proceeded.

They hastened towards it, and discovered, lying concealed among the bushes, the body of a man.

He was evidently badly wounded—so badly, that at a glance Blueskin and Jack Sheppard saw they could do nothing for his assistance.

"Water—water!" he gasped. "If you have any kindness or compassion for me, bring me a little water, for I burn—I burn!"

"There's sure to be water near," said Jack Sheppard. "Wait a moment, and I will bring some if I can."

The man closed his eyes, and waited patiently.

Jack quickly found a little running stream, but for a moment was puzzled how he was to convey any to the wounded man.

He could only think of his hat, so, pulling it off, he dipped it into the stream, and so carried a small portion.

For this the man was profuse in terms of thankfulness, and Blueskin, wishing to put his gratitude to the test, asked him if he could explain the meaning of what they saw.

He answered in the affirmative, and made them acquainted with all those facts that the reader knows already, so that there is not the least necessity for repeating them here.

They listened with mingled surprise and delight.

At last they believed they had found what they were searching for.

Soon after giving this account, the man fell back, and, with a deep groan, expired.

He had told them that there were many ways of entering and leaving the caverns—that the hill was, in fact, completely hollowed out, and resembled a huge honeycomb.

"We are on the right track, depend upon it," said Blueskin. "Jonathan has taken up his quarters in these caverns, and, having done so, how easy it would be for him to carry off Edgworth Bess and confine her here!"

"Yes—that's it, no doubt."

"Come, then—we will commence our search at once, and try to find some other mode of entering."

So saying, they moved forward.

But before they had gone a dozen paces, Jack stumbled against something, and almost fell.

He could not see the nature of the obstruction, owing to the length of the grass.

"What's that?" he cried. "It feels to me almost like rope."

He stooped down, and found that he was correct.

A large coil of rope was lying on the ground.

"This may be a lucky discovery for us," said Blueskin. "At any rate, we will take it. We have no idea what these caverns are like, and a rope may be of the greatest utility. Doubtless it has been dropped or placed here by some of the robbers."

This was a very probable supposition indeed.

Blueskin picked up the rope, and slung it over his shoulder, and then commenced the ascent of the hill.

Upon gaining the summit, they heard the volley that was fired by the police officers at Wild junior.

They cautiously looked down, and quickly ascertained what had taken place.

"Come," said Blueskin, "fortune is favouring us. If we can only manage to get into these caverns by some other route, we may be able to intercept the villains in their flight. If they found us behind them and the officers in front, they, beyond a doubt, will surrender."

They watched the progress of the officers for some moments, and then, finding how resolute an attack they made, began to look about them for some means of entering the caverns.

While so engaged, they perceived in the ground before them an opening large enough to allow a man's body to pass through easily.

They hailed this discovery with a cry of delight.

"Depend upon it," cried Blueskin, "this is one of the entrances of which that man spoke."

Stooping down, they crawled cautiously to the edge of the orifice and looked down.

But the darkness was so intense that they could see nothing, nor could they form any idea of the depth of it.

"This rope will be the very thing," said Jack. "How lucky I found it! By the aid of it, we shall certainly be able to descend."

"We shall, indeed. Secure one end round the trunk of the tree, and then we will lower the other, and slip down with all speed."

This was done, and just as the preparations were completed a loud shriek came upon their ears.

No sooner did he hear it than Jack was almost frantic.

"That's Edgworth Bess," he exclaimed. "I am sure that's her voice. Perhaps Jonathan is murdering her! Quick—quick! Lend me the rope! At all risks, I will descend!"

With frantic speed he flung the coil of rope down the pit-like aperture.

Then, seizing hold of the rope with his hands, slipped down it at great speed.

He never stopped to reflect upon the danger he might be running, nor did he inquire of himself whether it was likely that the rope was long enough to reach to the bottom.

He only knew that Edgworth Bess was in great danger, and that, probably, a little promptitude of action on his part would save her.

It was Jack, then, who fired the bullet in the right moment.

In the dim sort of twilight that filled the cavern he saw the form of his old enemy Jonathan Wild, and perceived that he held a knife in his hand, and was about to strike.

On the impulse of the moment, then, he drew a pistol, and fired almost, it might be said, without taking any aim.

But yet, as it is often the case under such circumstances, the shot was a most effective one.

Scarcely had its reverberating echoes died away, than he stood upon the floor of the cavern.

Quick as thought he bounded forward to where Edgworth Bess had sunk upon the ground, and almost breathless with agitation, he raised her head and endeavoured to make her acquainted with his presence.

Blueskin was not much slower in his movements, and quickly slipped down the rope into the cavern.

CHAPTER DCCXXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD STRUGGLES HARD TO ESCAPE FROM HIS PURSUERS, AND MEETS WITH A SEVERE ACCIDENT.

JONATHAN WILD had been struck by Jack Sheppard's bullet, it is true, but, then, he quickly found that he was more frightened than hurt.

He saw Blueskin descending the rope, and knew there would be no hope for him unless he was very quickly on his feet again.

He was now quite driven to desperation, and therefore he made a headlong kind of rush from the cavern.

But before he quite plunged into the little narrow passage, he drew a pistol from his belt, and fired in the direction where he knew Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess to be.

He hoped the shot would take effect upon one or both of them.

Without waiting to know if such was the case, however, he turned swiftly round, and, considering his condition, ran very rapidly indeed.

He stopped short, however, as though by some extraordinary contrivance his progress had been suddenly arrested.

The fact was, he could hear the officers approaching in the direction he was going.

Looking about him, he saw another opening in the rock.

It was one that he had not as yet explored, and he had no very clear idea as to where it led.

But knowing that most of these passages ran one into the other, he did not hesitate to plunge down it.

Blueskin no sooner saw Jonathan disappear than he commenced an immediate pursuit after him.

He heard the officers approaching, and cried:

"This way—this way! Follow me, and we shall have him!"

He turned down the passage as he spoke, the officers following quickly in his footsteps.

They could hear Jonathan Wild running on before them, and strained every nerve to follow him.

Yet, despite all their efforts, he kept the lead.

Suddenly, however, there came upon their ears a strange rushing sound, accompanied by a shrill scream of agony.

Then an instant silence, and a dull, heavy crash.

"He has fallen," shouted Blueskin, excitedly—"he has fallen! Lights—lights, and take care how you advance!"

The passage was profoundly dark, and the officers, dreading something they knew not what, stopped as if by one accord, and produced their lanterns.

As there were several of them, a tolerable amount of illumination was shed around.

The passage was very narrow and very low.

"Advance cautiously," said Blueskin. "There must be some hole down which, in his blind speed, he has fallen."

This was proved to be the true solution of what had happened.

All at once the party of officers found themselves upon the brink of a precipice.

The passage terminated abruptly at the very edge of a kind of subterranean cliff.

In spite of themselves, they shuddered.

The bare thought of running along in the darkness with headlong speed, and then suddenly rushing over the brink of such a precipice was terrible to think of.

"Hark," said Blueskin—"hark!"

A faint groaning sound now came to their ears from below.

"He's there," said Blueskin—"hurt, and not killed. How deep is this pit?"

"Very deep, I fancy," said the officer, and, as he spoke, he picked up a small piece of stone, and tossed it in.

There was a clattering sound as the fragment of rock rebounded from one side of the pit to the other, and then, with a clear, sharp sound, it struck against the bottom.

"It is deep," said the officer, shivering. "He must be bruised to a mass. I wonder how it is that he is still alive!"

A consultation then took place as to what should be done next.

Certainly it was their duty to descend, and make Jonathan Wild their prisoner.

His bodily condition had nothing to do with them.

If dead, why, his body must be recovered, so the debate was quickly put an end to.

"A rope is wanted," said the officer. "But where on earth are we to find it?"

Blueskin in a moment directed them to the one by which he had gained admission to the caverns, and a couple of men were immediately despatched to fetch it.

As they had to go to the top of the hill, some time necessarily elapsed before they returned.

As much time as possible, however, was saved, for while some went above others went beneath, and, as soon as the rope was untied from the trunk of the tree, it was allowed to fall down.

Upon going to the edge of the pit again, it soon became evident that there was no place there to which the rope could be attached.

But Blueskin said:

"If you all grasp it tightly, you will be able to support the weight of one man easily."

One end of the rope was lowered, and the men held fast by the other.

There would doubtless have been a little consultation as to who should descend first, but Blueskin prevented it by suddenly stepping over the edge.

The chief officer was by no means pleased with this proceeding, and began to inquire who Blueskin was.

No one could tell him anything about it, however.

It was by no means a pleasant task to descend by that rope, yet Blueskin did not mind that in the least.

He quickly reached the end, and then clung tightly with his hands.

He felt about below him with his feet, but could feel nothing of the bottom.

"Hullo!" he cried, shouting to those above.

The officer appeared over the brink with a lantern.

"Can you let me down any lower?" asked Blueskin.

"A foot or two perhaps."

"Try it then. I can't feel the bottom."

The rope was lowered a little, but the bottom seemed as far off as ever.

It might have been perfectly safe to have dropped from such a distance.

But then Blueskin had no clear idea as to the actual depth of the pit, and he naturally shrank from it.

"The rope is too short," he cried, "it will not reach to the bottom. Draw me up again quickly."

The officers worked with a will, and soon drew him to the top.

He climbed over the edge, and then lay down upon the ground much exhausted.

"A long rope ladder or something of that kind must be obtained," he said, "and one very much longer than that piece of rope."

"I suppose there is no other resource?" said the chief officer.

"None whatever. Let some one be dispatched for it, and let some others remain here at the brink of the pit on guard."

This was at once agreed to.

"Excuse me," said the chief officer, addressing himself to Blueskin, "but this place is so confoundingly dark that I cannot see your face, and I don't know to whom I am addressing myself."

"Don't trouble yourself on that account," said Blueskin, "there is no need; let it be sufficient to say that I am here by the special command of the Lord Chancellor, who sent me to see how you performed your duty, and who will be guided greatly by the report that I shall make, and I may as well tell you at once that I shall not omit to inform him of the very energetic and skilful manner in which you have conducted the pursuit up to the present moment."

CHAPTER DCCXXXVIII.

THE OFFICERS MEET WITH A VERY GREAT SURPRISE UPON REACHING THE BOTTOM OF THE PIT.

The officer made quite a deep and respectful bow upon receipt of this announcement.

"Certainly, sir—certainly," he said. "I am very much obliged to you indeed, and of course you will excuse me for making the inquiry I did."

"Yes, of course; it was quite right and natural on your part. However, respecting this rope ladder, had you not better see to it at once, for the sooner Jonathan is got out of the pit the better?"

"You are quite right, sir; I will see to it at once; but a considerable delay must of necessity take place."

"I fear so; but, at the same time, it will be wise not to leave this spot, for Jonathan Wild is a man of so many resources, that there is no saying what he might do."

"But it's my opinion, sir," said the chief officer, "that he is now past doing anything but groan. No one could survive such a terrific fall as that. No; we may safely consider him our prisoner now. He will be no more trouble to us or anyone else."

"I hope not," said Blueskin.

The rope ladder was sent for, and the remainder of the officers assembled round the mouth of the pit.

Here Blueskin left them to return to the cave where he believed Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess to be.

He arrived just in time to find them leaving it.

The shot that Jonathan had fired was a useless one, though the bullet had passed close to both.

Edgworth Bess was not only much overcome by her sudden and unexpected deliverance, but also by finding herself at last in company with her two old friends and protectors.

In a few words Blueskin made Jack acquainted with what had befallen Jonathan Wild, and then he said:

"Now, Jack, we cannot be too cautious. Remember how terrible is the nature of our position. Let us return to the Manor House with all speed. There, I believe, we can remain in safety until we can decide what we shall do in the future. Jonathan Wild is now past doing any injury to anyone, so we may safely leave him. We will watch the course of events. Poor wretch, I wish he was out of his misery."

Jack did but acquiesce entirely in what his companion had said.

Without the least molestation or difficulty, they made their way to the Manor House, where the servants were all glad enough to see their mistress return.

By Blueskin's advice, a messenger was at once despatched to the Lord Chancellor, letting him know that she had escaped.

It was indeed a happy meeting between these three persons who had been so long separated from each other.

Edgworth Bess showed that change in her position had not by any means effected a corresponding change in her disposition.

She was just the same then as she always was—only delighted to think that she was able to be of effectual assistance to her old protectors.

It was agreed on all sides, however, that the consultation for their future proceedings should be postponed for a short time—until, in fact, Jonathan Wild's fate should be decided.

The officer was unable to obtain what he wanted nearer than London, and consequently had to ride all the way there for it.

Then no rope ladder could be found long enough, but several were obtained and joined together.

With this load he returned to the caverns.

But in those days travelling was a very different thing to what it is now, and consequently nearly twenty-four hours elapsed before the rope was in readiness to be used.

"Come," said the officer, "down with it. We shall have the trouble of bringing up his dead body, and no more; it is impossible for him to have remained there in such a mangled condition as he was. Have you not heard him groaning lately, or moving?"

"No; for many hours all has been as silent as the grave. Depend upon it, he's dead."

The rope ladder was held securely by the bulk of the officers, and the one in command, after some little hesitation, began to descend.

It was very much easier to descend by this ladder than it was to go down by a rope merely, and in a short time he had the satisfaction of feeling his feet touch the bottom.

The ladder was plenty long enough and to spare, for it lay coiled up in a great heap on the ground.

The officer then unhooked his lantern from his belt, and flashed the light around him.

The bottom of the pit was very much larger than the top—in fact, the appearance of the place seemed to be that of a huge inverted funnel.

He expected, of course, to find the body of Jonathan in an instant.

But he did not.

Therefore, in some anxiety, he continued to flash the light round about in various directions.

Still there was nothing to be seen, except a few drops of blood here and there.

With a very uncomfortable feeling in his breast, the officer rapidly searched all the bottom of the pit, and then shouted aloud to those above.

"He's gone," he cried—"disappeared by some means or other."

This unexpected intelligence was received with such a shock of surprise by those above, that it was a great wonder they did not let go their hold upon the ladder.

The officer was scarcely less alarmed, and he looked about him nervously.

It was a strange position to be in at the bottom of the pit, and all manner of superstitious thoughts, to which he had been hitherto a stranger, came crowding into his mind.

"Quick!" he bawled to his men above—"be quick, will you? Fasten the ladder in some way, and come down. He cannot be far off; but, far or near, we must find him."

Surprise now gave place to curiosity in the breasts of the officers above, and therefore with some ingenuity they secured the rope ladder, and one by one descended.

As they all carried lanterns, the interior of the pit was well illuminated, and it was again rigidly examined.

It took only a moment, however, for them to come unhesitatingly to the conclusion that Jonathan Wild was not there.

"He must have crawled into some nook," said the chief officer—"he cannot have done anything else. So badly wounded as he is, he could not possibly escape."

And now it could be seen that there were several little archways near to the ground, that were just about large enough to allow a man to crawl beneath them.

These arches were one by one examined, and at last the chief officer cried:

"Ah! we are on the right track at last. Look! there's blood on the stone—he has gone this way."

The officers all crowded round him, and then, in a loud voice, he cried:

"Jonathan Wild, we know you to be there, and we know you to be badly wounded. Surrender, then, at once, and we will do you no further injury; but if you resist, the consequences of that resistance be upon your own head!"

No response whatever was made to this speech, and the officer looked around him rather puzzled and bewildered.

"He may have crawled a good way off, sir," said one, "or he may have got a little way in and died."

CHAPTER DCCXXXIX.

THE POLICE OFFICERS CONTINUE THEIR UNAVAILING SEARCH AFTER JONATHAN WILD.

EITHER of these were very probable suppositions, and, by way of testing them, the chief officer drew his sword, and cautiously thrust it under the archway.

He moved it about in various directions, but found no opposition to it, except such as the sides of the little passage gave.

He continued to thrust it in further and further, until the full length of his arm was reached.

Still he met with no obstruction.

"Come," he said, "there's no help for it. We must crawl through this place, and see where it leads. Which of you will volunteer for the duty?"

The officers all shrunk back.

Not one of them liked the idea of entering that place, which was only just about large enough for their bodies.

They would be, in a manner of speaking, wedged in a tube, and, for aught they knew, Jonathan might be lying at a distance off ready with his pistol in his hand.

If he fired he could not fail to hit his mark.

Finding none of his men willing, the chief officer said:

"I am ashamed of you; but I will show you an example."

He sank down on his hands and knees as he spoke, and rapidly crawled under the archway.

His men, now really ashamed of themselves, followed him with all speed.

After going a few yards the officer, to his very great satisfaction, found that the passage changed its character.

It became both higher and broader, so that in a short time he was able to walk erectly along it.

He flashed the light of the lantern all about him.

He could see and hear nothing of Jonathan Wild.

That after having been wounded, and after such a frightful fall as that, he should have been able to crawl away seemed absolutely incredible.

But then, from what we know of Jonathan Wild's nature, we may conclude that he would fight to the very last gasp.

Then the officer came to a halt, for he found the passage branched off in two different directions, and he was at a loss which one to take.

He would have remained for some time in uncertainty had he not caught sight of a spot of blood that decided him.

"Come," he said, "we shall have him soon! This is the way!"

But the officer found before long that the fresh air was blowing upon his face, and, continuing his progress still further and further, he presently found himself standing at one side of the hill.

From this it was pretty evident that Jonathan had had strength to crawl out, and where he might be just at that precise moment of time would be hard indeed to say.

The officers quickly formed themselves around their leader, and looked inquiringly into his countenance, wondering what they were to do next.

It was dark, though dawn might be expected to come ere long, and therefore they were unable to see about them.

"Curse him!" said the officer. "I never dreamt that he would be so much trouble as this. I made sure that we had captured him. Look about, all of you, with your lanterns, and as soon as you find the least trace of blood let me know—it's the only chance we have."

The officers saw this at once, but for a long time their search was unavailing.

Either Jonathan Wild's wound had not bled much, or else he had bound it up securely.

[THE POLICE OFFICERS SEARCHING FOR JONATHAN WILD.]

All at once, they uttered a loud shout.

Their chief rushed towards them.

"Look," said one, pointing to a large dock leaf; "there's a spot of blood, and it seems to me as though it had been very lately made."

"Yes, he's passed this way," said the chief officer, "and not long ago. Persevere, my lads, and we shall have him, after all, and then we shall be well paid for all our trouble."

That was the last spot of blood they found, however; and when day dawned, and they were able to see about them better, they seemed further off the capture of Jonathan Wild than they had yet been.

This was in good truth a most vexatious circumstance for all concerned, as, not without reason, they had considered the pursuit to be virtually over.

One great cause for their rage was that they believed No. 156.—BLUESKIN.

Jonathan Wild was determined to do them out of the reward.

He might make up his mind to crawl into some obscure place and there die.

He might lie there undiscovered for years and years, and, of course, until his body was produced they could not claim the reward that was offered for his apprehension.

It was just such a trick as Jonathan was likely to perform; indeed, he would do anything to escape the hangman's rope.

In the morning, however, when it grew broad daylight, the officers spread themselves out and searched with great energy and perseverance.

They were determined not to lose him if they could possibly help it.

All their searching and inquiring was in vain, however

Had Jonathan Wild been suddenly spirited away, his disappearance could not have been more complete and inscrutable.

The nature of the country around, however, was admirably adapted for concealment.

The trees were numerous and grew thickly together, and between them all there was a great quantity of various kinds of tangled underwood, amid which a man might lie concealed, and almost bid defiance to the closest searching.

As hour after hour passed away, and the sun rose higher and higher in the heavens without bringing them any nearer, that they could see, to the conclusion of their task, the officers' spirits deserted them, and they no longer searched with that energy that had previously characterised their movements.

Indeed, it would be hard to conceive anything more disheartening.

Their disappointment was all the greater because they had made so perfectly certain of success.

As for the chief officer, he was furious with rage, and wished, from the bottom of his heart, that the pit had only been deep enough to put an end to Jonathan Wild's life.

Then the sun began to go down and twilight to creep over the face of nature.

Night was again coming on, and if, after all that long day's search, aided by the light of the sun, they had failed to accomplish their purpose, how could they hope for any better success in the darkness?

"We must give up for the present," said the chief officer, in tones of the deepest chagrin. "It cannot be helped, but we must rest ourselves; and when we are not so tired as we are now we may be able to meet with success."

This seemed very doubtful.

The officers were all worn out with hard work and want of sleep.

Many hours had elapsed since they had closed their eyes last, and therefore, although most anxious to apprehend Jonathan Wild, yet they gladly enough obeyed their superior's mandate to desist for a short time.

CHAPTER DCCLX.

DESCRIBES THE MANNER IN WHICH JONATHAN WILD EFFECTED HIS ESCAPE FROM THE CAVERNS.

WHEN Jonathan Wild, flying madly along the dark cavernous passage, suddenly found that there was no longer any resting-place for his feet, he failed to realise the full extent of his tremendous position.

The first shock of his fall deprived him for an instant of his senses, and yet not before he had time to utter that fearful yell that let his pursuers know that some accident had happened to him.

The change was so sudden and so great that it was hard indeed to realise it.

One moment he had been flying at full speed, and even distancing his pursuers—had been in what might be called in full possession of all his physical energies, and the next he was lying at the bottom of that abyss a bruised and mangled mass, unable to stir hand or foot.

The pain he suffered was most excruciating, and it was in good truth a thousand wonders that the fall did not produce immediate death.

Yet there was the dreadful consciousness over him that he must be there until his foes found some safer means of getting down to him.

Then he would fall into their hands perfectly helpless.

It was a dreadful feeling for him to have, and, in spite of his pain, he gnashed his teeth with rage and disappointment, while muttered curses escaped his lips.

Then the rope was sent for, as we have described.

His intellects were then too much confused for him to understand all that was going on above.

Yet he was able to form some idea.

Every minute, however, he continued to revive, until at last he began to think that he was not hurt by any means so seriously as he had in the first instance imagined.

Then again he heard voices.

The rope was lowered, and Blueskin descended.

He heard him speak, and recognised him in a moment, although the officers had failed to do so.

That, then, he thought was his fate.

He was to lie there like some bruised and wounded reptile until his enemy should reach his side and make him prisoner without resistance.

He strained his eyes, and through the darkness fancied he could see the dusky form descending, and so firmly was he impressed with this idea that he wished ardently that he had at least one of his pistols left loaded.

If he had possessed one he most certainly would have fired.

To reload he considered was out of the question.

As yet he had not tried to move, and dreaded to make the attempt.

He had seen others fall from great heights on more than one occasion, and he knew that it often happened that while they lay in that position in which they had fallen they were comparatively free from pain.

But as soon as they moved, the anguish caused was intolerable.

Still continuing to look up, he felt quite certain that he could see Blueskin coming down.

Closer and closer he came, until his feet were within a few inches of him—twelve at the most.

And then he stopped.

Had Blueskin known how near the rope was to the bottom he would at all risks have let go, and then the capture of Wild would have been certain.

But that knowledge, of course, he could not obtain.

The risk was too great to think of dropping to an unknown depth, and therefore he gave the signal to be drawn up again.

It was wonderful what a reviving effect this had upon Jonathan Wild.

He began to think that, after all, he was going to be allowed the opportunity of making his escape.

Providing he only summoned up his courage for the effort, a chance was now afforded him, for he rightly enough guessed that some time would elapse before his foes would be able to make another descent.

He strained his ears to the utmost, hoping to catch what was said, as soon as Blueskin reached the top again, and he succeeded in ascertaining that it was their intention to dispatch one of their number to London for a rope ladder.

Then indeed did Jonathan's heart begin to beat with hope.

No one knew better than he how long it would take to send to London and come back.

What a long time he would be unmolested by his foes.

What a chance for him to attempt to make his escape.

Yes, that was the word that was now more prominently before his mind than any other, and, despite the extreme dread he had of making any movement, he slowly began to crawl away from the spot where he had fallen.

Judging from the general aspect of the caverns, he concluded that there must be some means or other of escaping from the place down which he had fallen.

It never once occurred to him that it might be a pit, as it really was.

He thought it merely a sudden alteration in the elevation, and that the character of the caverns would be unchanged.

Above all was he delighted to find that the act of crawling forward did not increase his pain, and this fact was of a most reassuring nature, since it went far towards convincing him that his injuries were by no means so great as he at first thought them.

Creeping onwards, too, he found that the ground beneath his feet was not hard and rocky, but soft and moist, and this had broken the force of his fall to a very great extent.

He had nothing but his sense of feeling to guide him.

But chance favoured him so far as to take him direct to a small arch that appeared to be the entrance to the passage.

Here he paused a little while, and as he did so he felt the fresh air blowing strongly and freely upon his face, and this caused the blood to circulate with great speed through his veins.

"I shall yet be free," he muttered to himself—"free to wreak my revenge upon my foes, although I have met with so serious a check. I am maimed and crippled, no doubt, yet if I can only accomplish the purpose of my life I care not. When my revenge is complete, death may come as soon as it thinks proper. And I will have revenge, too!" he added, with more vehemence of manner—"revenge for the death of my son George! Yes—yes, they shall suffer for it!"

He then began to draw himself along the passage.

At first the sharp points descending from the roof tore his clothes and flesh, but after going a few paces the aspect of the passage changed entirely.

It was both high and wide.

Creeping on slowly and yet steadily, Jonathan Wild at length reached the open air, and having done so, he fell forward at full length, completely exhausted.

He must have relapsed into a state of insensibility, as for a long time he was unconscious not only of all that was going on around him, but what had last happened.

Pain restored him to his senses, however, and then such dreadful curses came from his cracked and bleeding lips as would have made the most depraved shudder with horror.

Then, like some wounded snake, he began to creep away from the entrance of the cavern among the thick brushwood that was around.

Painfully and slowly he forced his way until he had placed a considerable distance between himself and the side of the hill.

Every now and then he was compelled to rest, and each time when he started it was more feebly and slowly.

His strength was all but spent.

At last, by dint of terrible exertions, the edge of a road was reached.

Before him flowed a little clear, sparkling brook, and, with a cry of delight, he rolled himself completely over into it, and allowed the water to flow over him from head to foot.

CHAPTER DCCXLI.

JONATHAN WILD MEETS UNEXPECTEDLY WITH SUBSTANTIAL ASSISTANCE.

THE water was intensely cold, and consequently produced a numbing effect upon him.

In one moment he was free from that distracting, smarting pain that had before driven him almost mad.

His throat was parched, and his mouth burning, and so he drank in huge draughts of the clear, running water.

Then, just raising his head sufficiently above the level of the stream to breathe, he still allowed the remaining portion of his body to be immersed.

His teeth chattered with the cold; but he bore it with indifference.

In comparison to the pain of his wound it was as nothing.

How long he may have remained thus he could scarcely tell; but all at once he was brought back to a better idea of his position by hearing a rattling sound produced by the approach of some vehicle along the road.

Even this he listened to at first with indifference.

But soon he began to be aware that it might be of the utmost importance to him.

"It's on two wheels," he said, with chattering teeth, "and drawn by one horse. I wonder who it can be?—not any of my foes, surely? No, no—they would not come in such a guise as that."

He raised himself rather higher out of the stream, and, looking down the dusty road, he saw, at a great distance off, a kind of light cart on two wheels, drawn by a powerful, bony-looking horse, which was travelling at a rapid rate.

In the vehicle—which otherwise appeared to be empty—was a man of rather large proportions.

Jonathan looked at the cart wistfully.

"If my pistols were only loaded," he thought, "I might shoot that wretch and take possession of that horse and cart; I should then have something like a chance of getting away from my foes; but I am not able. Curse him—curse him!"

Jonathan Wild looked upon everyone as an enemy.

He was at war with the whole human race, and there could be no disputing the fact that it would have given him an intense amount of pleasure if he could by any means have wrought the death of the man who was approaching, although he had never seen him in his life before, and had certainly done him no injury.

As the cart came nearer, other thoughts were flitting through Wild's mind.

By the expression of his face, it could have been told that he was coming to a decision, and about to adopt a particular line of conduct.

When the cart had got tolerably close to him, he raised himself a little out of the water and groaned faintly, yet loud enough to enable the man in the cart to hear it distinctly.

Then he groaned again.

The horse heard it, for the animal swerved suddenly to the other side of the road.

"Help," cried Jonathan, feebly—"help me for the love of humanity!"

The man in the cart looked about him for a moment before he could make out just where the sound came from.

Then he saw the form of some one struggling in the ditch by the roadside.

He was a compassionate man, for in a moment he stopped the cart, and, jumping down, hastened to the side of the brook.

"What is it?" he asked. "How came you there?"

"Help," said Wild—"help me to get out! I am almost exhausted!"

Without more ado, the stranger seized him by the hands and drew him out of the water.

When he was able to take a good view of the person he had succoured, he was by no means pleased with what he had done.

"You've met with an accident, I suppose?" he said, rather gruffly.

"I have," moaned Wild—"a dreadful accident! I have been within the merest trifle of losing my life. You see I yet live; and yet perhaps it would have been better if I had died, for I question whether I shall be able to straighten myself again."

"How did it happen?"

"Why, you see, sir, I was travelling along on horseback; it was a restive creature, yet I have always been able to manage it pretty well; but it was startled at something—I know not what—and threw me off. I ought to have disengaged myself from the stirrups, but did not; my foot caught in one of them, and I have been dragged a long way along the road; I have been kicked and trodden on, too, so that I am suffering from a complication of injuries. At last, I got my foot at liberty, and then rolled over into that stream, out of which I have not had strength to get."

This was about as plausible an account of himself as Jonathan Wild could have given, and certainly such an accident as he described would be likely to produce effects similar to those the stranger beheld.

"Help me—have mercy upon me!" said Wild. "I am in a dreadful state, and yet I was riding on an errand of life and death! I don't like to ask you for such a thing, or to trouble you; I should have preferred that you had volunteered: yet if you would let me ride in your cart a little way—"

"But how do you know whether I am going your way or not?" asked the stranger, who did not seem inclined to render any further assistance to Jonathan.

"I guess you are," said Wild, "from the direction you are taking. Where are you bound to?"

"Sedgfield."

"Sedgfield?" said Jonathan, pretending to consider. "Yes, that will do. I am going further on than that; but there I could, no doubt, obtain such assistance as my hurts require."

"Oh, no doubt you can!" was the gruff reply.

"Then, good sir, help me in your vehicle; let me lie at the bottom of it. I shall be ever thankful to you, and I wish I had the means of rewarding you as I should like."

Jonathan grinned ferociously, for he thought just then the reward he would have liked to bestow was a bullet or a stab with a knife.

Although he kept his calmness so well, yet inwardly he was cursing the man for his churlish uncharitable-ness.

Such a demand as this was one that scarcely anyone could refuse to comply with, and therefore, in spite of a manifest unwillingness, the stranger stated his intention of giving Wild a ride.

Jonathan was profuse in the expression of his gratitude.

With much difficulty, he was lifted up into the cart, and, scrambling over the side, sank down quite helpless and exhausted upon the bottom of it.

"I fear I am dying," he groaned—"yes, yes—I fear I am dying! Water—water! Have you any water?"

"Water be blowed!" said the man, as gruffly as before. "It strikes me you've had too much of it, and that's what's the matter with you. Here—try this, and I hope it'll do you good, for I don't want a dead body in my cart, I can promise you!"

CHAPTER DCCXLII.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS THAT THE OFFICERS ARE MUCH CLOSER UPON HIS TRACK THAN HE IMAGINES.

WHILE speaking, the stranger produced from his pocket a black bottle.

Jonathan seized it with avidity, and, placing it to his lips, drank heartily of its contents.

He found the liquid to be brandy, and he was accustomed to partake of it in surprising quantities.

The stranger was astonished when he found how long Jonathan kept the bottle to his lips.

At length his patience being exhausted, he snatched it away, and Jonathan sank back in the cart, and gasped once or twice for breath.

"I do believe you would have gone on drinking that brandy till it finished you," said the stranger. "You had enough at once to kill anybody. Pray how do you feel?"

"Better," said Wild, and there was such a marked change in the manner in which he pronounced this word that the stranger fairly started back in surprise.

"Yes," said Wild, "I feel much better. New life seems to circulate in all my veins. Thanks—many thanks for your kindness! I shall be able to reach Sedgfield now."

"Well, it is to be hoped you will. Are you all ready?"

"Yes," cried Jonathan.

"Then we'll make a start."

The man climbed up into the cart, and sat down.

In another moment they were rolling along the high-road at a rattling pace, and every yard that they went Jonathan Wild seemed to improve, for he knew that he was going further and further from his foes.

The jolting of the cart was, however, something fearful, and it required all his stoicism to bear up against it.

In spite of himself, groans would every now and then escape his lips—groans of such a character as would make the stranger start and turn pale.

"Don't make that awful noise," he said, once or twice. "It does not do you any good, I'm sure."

"It's the jolting of the cart," said Jonathan. "It seems as though it would shake me limb from limb. Curse the hand that made it, say I!"

"Well, you seem a nice sort of customer," said the stranger, "whoever you may be. But I suppose that's no business of mine."

"No, it isn't. I am what I have told you, and you can believe me or not, as you think proper."

The stranger whipped his horse.

He was anxious to reach Sedgfield as quickly as possible.

The more he saw of his strange companion the less he liked him, and the more anxious he was to get rid of him out of the cart.

For some time a complete silence reigned between them.

Jonathan Wild no longer groaned, from which it may be inferred that he was getting used to the jolting.

Suddenly, however, he fancied he heard, over and above the horrible rattling of the cart, another sound that struck dismay to his heart.

Slowly and painfully, he raised himself up sufficiently to look over the back of the cart.

He was careful to show only the top of his head, and then looked carefully down the road.

In the distance he could see a cloud of dust, and he could hear the clatter of horses' hoofs.

Without waiting for further consideration, he jumped in a moment to the conclusion that they were police officers who were approaching.

What was to be done?

He sank down to the bottom of the cart in despair.

So overcome was he by this unexpected incident that he did not seem to have the heart left to make another movement.

But the love of life and the desire to preserve his liberty came strongly over him, and, again raising his head, he looked over the back of the cart.

To his delight, the officers—if such they were—were no longer in sight.

A turn in the road hid them from his view.

"Stop—stop!" said Jonathan to the man who was driving—"stop—stop, I say! Oh, curses!"

"What's the matter?"

"Let me out—let me out!" said Jonathan. "I can go no further! The jolting of your cart is beyond all endurance! Let me get down! I must remain on the roadside, although my business is so very—very urgent!"

The man wanted no urging whatever—he was quite glad to get rid of his unwelcome companion, and therefore stopped the horse at once.

"I will help you down," he said, "and I hope you will soon be better."

"I'm afraid," said Jonathan—"I'm afraid death is coming! Yes, death is surely coming!"

The stranger assisted him from the cart, and, by Wild's request, led him to the side of the road.

"There," he said, "I will sit here on this bank till I can recover myself a little. There's one favour, however, that you can do for me."

"What is it?"

"It's not far to Sedgfield now, is it?"

"Not more than four miles."

"Then drive on rapidly, and, when you get there, make a surgeon acquainted with my condition. Tell him where to find me, and ask him to make haste, or I shall perish by the way."

"Oh, yes—I'll do that with the best heart in the world!" said the stranger.

"Make haste, then—make haste!"

"I am."

Jonathan was excessively anxious for the man to start, as the clattering of horses' hoofs now became frightfully distinct.

The man resumed his seat, and, giving the horse a cut with the whip, started off at fresh speed, and in less than a moment disappeared round another bend in the road.

No sooner was he out of sight than, summoning up all his strength and powers of endurance, Jonathan Wild climbed up the bank, and forced his way through the hedge.

He was only just in time, for his feet had scarcely disappeared when the officers came riding by.

They were police officers—he could see that now plainly enough—not, as he believed, the officers who had attacked him in the caverns, but some that had been sent off in pursuit of him.

They rode on without slackening speed, and Wild drew a long breath of relief at the narrow escape he had had.

"They will question that man in the cart—the chances are a thousand to one that they will do it. I must find some other means of providing for my safety. Oh, curse these wounds! But for them I could get away easily!"

With more strength than would have been believed possible, Jonathan crawled rapidly across the field on the other side of the hedge, and made his way into another beyond.

This was slightly elevated, so he took advantage of the fact to look towards the road.

To his surprise, then, he saw in the distance the cart in which he had been riding.

It was again at a standstill, and the officers were clustered around.

Of course he could not make out a single word that was said, yet, from the gestures that were made, he had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the officers were hearing a full account of him and his late proceedings.

With dreadful curses coming from his lips, he remained there watching them, wondering what course they would pursue.

At length he saw the man in the cart turn round.

He was accompanied by the officers.

"I know what he's going to do," said Jonathan—"know it as well as if I heard them speak. He's going to show them just the spot where I got out of the cart. They will soon be upon me. What—oh, what shall I do in order to escape?"

CHAPTER DCCXLIII.

JONATHAN WILD IS MORTIFIED TO FIND THAT HIS CUNNING HIDING-PLACE IS DISCOVERED.

DESPAIRINGLY Jonathan cast his eyes around him, looking for some place of refuge, and hoping to find it.

Yet, in his maimed state, unable to move quickly, how was he to conceal himself in such a place as he was then?

All around him he could see nothing but smooth green meadows, where it would be impossible for anyone to hide.

At the first glance almost he saw he would be detected.

His foes would swarm around him—seize him in many places, before he had the least chance of making any resistance.

He could see no hiding-place at all, and yet, animated wholly by the desire to get as far from his enemies as he could, he continued to crawl painfully onward.

Then all at once he came to a sheet of water of tolerable extent.

He had not seen it earlier, because on all sides the ground shelved down precipitously to it.

So calm and beautiful the water looked—so clear and bright, that Jonathan felt an almost irresistible impulse stealing over him to plunge into its cool depths, and there remain until his life was at an end.

Yet, although he had nothing to live for, he could not make up his mind to encounter death.

He shook his head slowly, and the thought of suicide was dismissed.

But he remembered the adventure he had had a little while ago, and that put a fresh thought into his mind.

He noticed that in many places, and more especially round the edges, there were large tufts of reeds growing in this pool, the tops of which rose up a considerable height above the surface.

They were very dense, too—so dense that no one could see through them.

The thought then occurred to Jonathan—could he gently lower himself into the water, and contrive to reach one of these tufts of reeds?

If so, he could cling to them, and so keep his face out of the water, while the remainder of his body was immersed.

Surely the officers would never think of looking for him there.

They might search all round the pool, and yet not find him.

The more he thought of this plan the better was the opinion he formed of it, and, without further hesitation, he proceeded to carry it into execution.

Choosing that portion of the bank that was closest to the largest tuft of reeds, Jonathan slowly committed himself to the water.

He waded in as far as he could, and just when the water reached his throat he was within arm's-length of the tuft of reeds.

With little difficulty, then, he managed to crawl in among them.

They were slimy and disagreeable to the touch, and caused a loathing sensation to come over him.

But he mastered it, and grew reconciled to his position, for he believed it would be the means of saving him from his foes.

The reeds closed quickly round him.

In the water, they seemed as lithe and supple as so many snakes.

To his heated imagination it really seemed as though they twined themselves around his body, and so supported him.

His face alone remained above the level of the water, and he was careful to draw all around it the reeds in such a manner that he could not catch a glimpse of the water beyond.

He knew that while this was the case it would be quite impossible for his enemies to see him, as the tops of the reeds rose high above him.

Not long after he had taken up this situation, he heard the trampling of feet and the sound of many voices.

"It's very odd," he heard some one say, in a loud voice—"very odd indeed! Surely you must have made a mistake? You have not taken us to the right place, or else he was not so bad as you describe."

"Well, I don't know about that," said another voice in reply, and Jonathan could tell at once it was the man who was speaking. "I am quite certain I brought you to the right place, however; but whether he was only shamming to be very bad, or whether he really was so, is more than I can take upon myself to say."

"Well, it's most extraordinary where he can be," said the officer. "From the description you gave me, I feel certain he is Jonathan Wild."

"It seems as though he had melted into air," said the stranger. "I never was so surprised in my life. I quite expected to find him sitting down on the bank just where I left him."

"He's lurking about somewhere," said the officer—"perhaps under our very noses. I shouldn't wonder if he isn't listening to every word we are saying at the present moment."

"But how could that be? There's nowhere here where a man could hide, I'm sure."

The officer looked about him.

"He might be in the pool," he said.

"Well, he might, if he's drowned himself; and now you speak of it, it was in the water where I first found him."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; he was lying down almost covered over by the water—that is, in a little brook you may have noticed running by the side of the road. He told me a long tale about being thrown from his horse, and so forth; so I pulled him out of the stream, for he pretended to be unable to get out of it himself."

"Well, I can't make it out," said the officer. "We can't drag the pool, that's certain, nor go all over it; but we can take a careful look all round."

At these words, Jonathan's heart sank within him.

Surely, he thought, the officers, in searching round, would find some trace of his footsteps upon the bank.

He could hear them walk all round the edge of the water, and at length he heard the one who had previously spoken say:

"Well, I don't believe he's in the pool. There's no marks anywhere round it, and the water is so clear that I could almost see him if he was at the bottom."

Jonathan's courage rose again.

But it soon sank down deeper and deeper than ever.

"Look at those great tufts of reeds," said the stranger. "Why, he might get among those, and hide himself easily."

Oh, what a vindictive feeling came over Jonathan Wild at that moment!

What exquisite pleasure it would have given him could he have inflicted some most painful, lingering death upon the man who had just discovered his hiding-place!

He was, then, quite powerless, and all he could do was to remain perfectly still, and to trust to his good luck to remain undiscovered.

"Well, he might be among them," said the officer, "and yet it seems to me to be hardly likely. I wonder how we can find out? If we had a boat, now, it would be easy."

"But we have not one," said the stranger, "and so you must adopt some other expedient. Why not get boldly into the water, and swim round?"

"For a very good reason, my friend—I don't know how to swim, and am not sorry for it, for I should not fancy the job."

"Can any of your men swim?"

"I doubt it; if they could they would be sure to deny it, for they know Jonathan Wild too well to feel inclined to go swimming among the reeds looking for him. If they found him, they would make the discovery in anything but a pleasant manner."

"Then I'll tell you what to do," said the stranger. "Get your pistols, and fire a few volleys at the reeds. If he is there, we shall soon find out."

"A good thought," said the officer—"a very good thought indeed!"

CHAPTER DCCXLIV.

THE POLICE OFFICERS FIRE AT THE TUFTS OF REEDS UPON THE SURFACE OF THE POOL.

Is it possible to describe the feelings of Jonathan Wild upon hearing these words pronounced?

He could scarcely have described them himself, though he was conscious that, above all other things, there was the intense desire to wreak his vengeance in some manner upon the man who had made this last suggestion.

If he had known earlier what turn events would have taken, Jonathan would certainly have put it out of his power to make any suggestions at all.

The officer, however, was highly delighted with the notion, for now he made quite sure that if Wild was hiding anywhere there he should be able to capture him.

In a few words, which he took care to speak in a loud tone of voice, he informed his men what he wished them to do.

"Stand close to the edge," he said, "and fire upon the different tufts in succession. Send good volleys at each one, so that if he is there we may make sure of him."

The men were quite as much delighted with this notion as their leader, and would have fired there and then had he not interposed and prevented them.

"Wait a moment," he said, "while I call upon him and give him the chance of surrendering. If he takes no notice of our words, then the consequences will be upon his own head."

Having thus spoken, the officer turned round, and, in a much louder and more commanding voice, he cried:

"Jonathan Wild, we believe you to be secreted somewhere near this place, and we call upon you to come forth and surrender yourself to us. If you refuse, we shall fire successively at the different tufts of reeds until we have riddled them with bullets, so that if you are killed or injured, the consequences will be entirely upon your own head. I will give you two minutes for consideration, and then, if you refuse to surrender, we shall fire!"

The officer took out his watch, and waited two minutes.

During the whole of that time the deepest silence prevailed.

The men all stood with their pistols ready in their grasp, looking quite feverish with expectation.

The time having expired, the officer cried:

"Jonathan Wild, do you surrender? Will you come forth?"

There was no answer.

"You see that tuft of reeds?" the officer cried. "Take that first. Make ready, present, fire!"

Situated as he was, with reeds drawn so closely around his face, Jonathan was quite unable to tell whether the tuft at which they were about to fire was or was not the one in which he was concealed.

But he had made up his mind not to surrender at present, and as soon as the officer told his men to make ready, he gently lowered himself in the water until his head was about two feet below the surface.

The water made a strange singing in his ears, but yet clear above that sound he heard the discharge of the pistols.

The next moment he suffered himself to rise, as he knew that for the time he was safe.

Yet he came up very carefully of course.

Had he made the least splash with the water, or if he had moved the reeds ever so little, the officers would have made such a rigid examination of that part that escape would have been impossible.

He was now very anxious to ascertain whether the tuft in which he was concealed was the one that had been fired at, because, in the event of such being the case, he would be able to remain there safely above water while the remainder of the volleys were fired.

So far as he could tell, however, upon coming to the surface, the reeds around had not been broken or disturbed in the least.

He listened intently for the next words that should fall from the lips of the officer.

Again he heard him cry, "Make ready," and as before he sank down, rising again as soon as the volley was discharged, and remaining for breath above the surface during the time it took the men to reload.

This was repeated very many times, and so skilful was he in his movements, that not only did he escape all injury from the very many bullets that were fired, but positively made no movement that would tend to discover his hiding-place.

A great many shots had been fired without producing the least result, so not unnaturally the officers got rather tired of the sport.

It seemed like positive waste of ammunition, and they began to be apprehensive lest, when the time should come when they would need it, they would run short.

A speech to this effect was made, and then the firing ceased.

The tufts of reeds had been pretty well peppered by the bullets, and the officer said:

"We will fire no more. I believe it will be useless. I thought from the first as soon as he remained silent that we had made a mistake and that he was not hidden there—he could never be mad enough to run such a risk."

"Yet in his obstinacy to do us out of the money," said one, "he may have remained there and suffered himself to be fired at, and for all we know, may be dead."

"That's not very likely," said the officer. "If he's killed it is a chance shot that's slain him. I believe that all this time we've been looking in the wrong place. Come on—let us search around."

The officers withdrew, and Jonathan once more began to breathe with tolerable freedom.

The sound of their footsteps and voices died away upon his ear, and then he began to ask himself the anxious question whether he should seek safety by remaining where he was, or whether he should change his quarters.

After some deliberation he decided upon the former course, and in this he showed his wisdom.

Hours and hours passed, and since they left the edge of the pool Jonathan had heard nothing of his foes.

Yet he was fearful to emerge.

"I will remain till night," was his determination. "When it is dark I shall have such a good chance of getting away, and I positively believe that this water is about the best treatment that my wounds could receive."

In this respect Jonathan Wild was not far wrong.

Except the bullet wound that Jack Sheppard had inflicted upon him, all his other hurts were mere scratches and contusions, though some of these were severe.

Yet water checked the flow of blood and subdued the pain.

He doubted not that by the time night came he should find himself greatly improved.

And so in this hope the long weary hours wore themselves away until darkness came.

He had much difficulty in preventing himself from falling off to sleep, even though in that strange position, and it was only the knowledge that certain death would be the result that kept him awake.

He was absolutely famished as well.

Yet where to satisfy his hunger he had not the least idea.

Nor, indeed, was he able to decide upon the nature of his proceedings.

Where should he go?"

How should he act, supposing that he should escape from the pool in safety?

These were questions that he put to himself over and over again, and yet without being able to form any satisfactory reply.

The officers, he felt tolerably certain, had given up the pursuit of him in that direction in despair, and therefore it was with considerable confidence that he determined to leave the water.

CHAPTER DCCXLV.

JONATHAN WILD CONTINUES HIS STRUGGLES TO ESCAPE FROM THE POLICE OFFICERS.

As soon as ever he attempted to gain the shore, he found an unexpected obstacle in his way.

The long reeds or flags which had afforded him such effectual concealment had in some strange manner twined themselves round and round his body, so that when he attempted to move he found that they held him fast.

At first this gave him only slight uneasiness, for he believed a smart pull was only necessary in order to disengage himself.

He made the effort.

But failed.

This brought another fact to his knowledge—namely, that owing to his immersion in the cold water for so long he had almost lost the use of his limbs.

His weakness was excessive, and the want of food would of course help to produce this result.

Such a discovery as this was alarming in the extreme to make, and a damp, cold perspiration broke out upon his forehead.

Had he reached the end of his mortal career?

Was this, after all, to be his death?

Had he escaped from the police officers only to die a lingering death among the rushes in that pool?

The bare thought was terrible in the extreme, and Jonathan struggled hard again to free himself.

But in vain.

His body and legs were so entangled in the reeds that it seemed almost hopeless to attempt to disengage them.

Above all, he found that he was each moment growing weaker and weaker, so that his chances of liberating himself were even less than they had been at first.

Jonathan floundered about for some time like some huge fish, and then paused from sheer exhaustion.

Some experiment must be tried.

But what?

The first thing was to recover his calmness and coolness, and his strength as well as much as possible.

This was no easy task to do under such circumstances, for the fancy had got hold of him that the clinging reeds were pulling him down lower and lower into the water.

He put out one hand and tried to remove a few of the reeds from round his body.

He could succeed with perfect ease.

But when he let go of them in order to remove others, they returned again to their old position.

Gradually one idea settled into his mind.

He felt confident there was only one means by which he could hope to get free.

That was to put all his strength and energy into one sudden spring, and trust to that to free him.

That effort must be made with the whole of his strength, so he remained patiently waiting some time longer.

"Oh, if I only had brandy or something to warm and revive me," he murmured, "I could then make certain of success."

He had nothing of this kind, however, about his person, and the wish for it was useless.

Perhaps half an hour elapsed before Jonathan made what he determined should be his final effort to get free.

If he failed then, he would give up all hopes of saving his life.

He would resign himself to his fate.

Drawing up his legs, and parting the reeds before him with both arms, he gave one sudden and violent plunge forward.

To his great joy, he found the reeds slowly uncoiling and slipping from him.

Again he made a bound.

Then another and another, and with the exception of a few portions clinging round his feet he was quite free of the dangerous rushes.

He rested for awhile, then freed himself from these and waded to the shore.

The night was a light one, and in the sky the moon was shining brightly.

A more unfavourable night for his escape there could not possibly be.

He looked around him on all sides carefully before he ventured to make another movement.

Then, reassured by the silence and the absence of all moving things, he made a rapid dart across the meadow.

Before he had got half-way to the opposite side, however, his legs failed him.

All his strength seemed suddenly to depart, and he fell down heavily upon the grass.

For some moments he could not even move.

Then he shook the water from his soaked apparel as well as he was able, and crawled away to a little distance further, in order to reach a dry place.

The exertions he had made in the pool in order to gain the land had much enfeebled him, and, moreover, there was in his breast a dreadful feeling arising from hunger.

At that moment he felt as though he could have eaten anything.

So ravenous was he that with his fingers he dug up little roots out of the turf and ate them greedily.

They were cold and moist, and although not affording much nutriment, seemed to appease the pangs of hunger.

Above all other things was the consciousness in his mind that it would be certain death for him to remain where he then was.

No matter how exhausted and feeble he felt, he must struggle on to some better place of shelter.

Creeping forward over the grass almost like a snake, and stopping at every few yards to rest, Jonathan at length succeeded in gaining the hedge.

Through this with much difficulty he made his way.

Then, looking before him, he saw what appeared to be a large plantation or wood.

The trees grew exceedingly close together, and in the moonlight presented a black appearance.

Oh! how eagerly and wistfully did Jonathan Wild fix his eyes upon that spot.

Could he once get beneath the shadow of those trees—could he only crawl to some dark recess, he should then feel himself secure, and be able to lie down and sleep.

Never before had he felt such a heaviness in all his limbs—such an aching of his eyelids.

It seemed beyond his strength to keep them open.

The sight of a place of shelter at such a short distance was enough to nerve him to make another effort, and accordingly, with a slow, painful movement, he dragged himself towards the little wood.

Every painful movement that he made brought him at least a few inches nearer to his destination, and from this reflection he derived ample consolation.

At frequent intervals his heart would beat rapidly with intense dread, for he fancied that in the distance he could hear the sounds made by the approach of his pursuers.

Then with great anger he would find that he had allowed his terrors or his fancies to deceive him, and again he crawled towards the wood.

At last a cry of joy came from his lips.

The shelter of the trees was reached, and he struggled onward with a better spirit.

In between the trees the brushwood grew very thickly—so thickly that it was no easy matter to force a passage through it.

But Jonathan succeeded, and came at length to a small open space almost destitute of vegetation—one of those barren spots that are often found in woods of considerable extent.

Could he but get across this to the dense underwood beyond, all would be well—he would lie down and sleep.

This, indeed, cost him a painful effort, and he would never have succeeded in his purpose but for the knowledge that it would be almost certain death or discovery to remain there.

Yet, could any eye have observed his actions, it would have been perceived that every movement he made was slower and more feeble than the preceding one, until at last, after several vain attempts to creep forward another pace, he fell down at full length, quite insensible, and fell within about a couple of feet of the bushes that fringed the open space.

CHAPTER DCXLVI.

JONATHAN WILD IS DISCOVERED IN THE PLANTATION BY BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD.

THE intelligence that, after all, Jonathan Wild had managed to effect his escape from the caverns threw quite a damp upon the joy that Jack Sheppard felt in once more meeting with Edgworth Bess.

Blueskin, too, was full of vexation, for the result was in direct opposition to his expectations.

He had firmly believed—and, indeed, who would have thought differently?—that Jonathan Wild, lying at the bottom of that abyss, could not possibly elude his pursuers.

Yet he had done so, and, what was more, he had not left a single trace behind him.

George Wild, however, was quite dead.

The intelligence of his fate was forwarded to the proper authorities, and the chase resumed after Jonathan.

"You see, Jack," said Blueskin, "it is in vain for us to leave this task to the accomplishment of police officers—they could not be nearer to success than they have been, and yet, you see, he has slipped through their fingers."

"It is so," said Jack. "We must join in the pursuit again."

"You are right—that's my determination."

"Not only shall we be doing our duty to ourselves, but to many others, by hunting him down. Come—I am ready to start at once."

"And so am I; but yet we must have a little thought respecting our proceedings. The police officers, I know, look upon me not only with some suspicion, but with jealousy as well."

"No doubt—no doubt."

"But we must be very careful, Jack, for it would be discouraging in the extreme if either of us got into trouble on Jonathan's account."

"It would."

"Well, then, what we do must be done independently and without the knowledge of the officers."

"I am quite willing that such should be the course adopted," said Jack.

This being agreed to, all discussion of their future plans was left in abeyance, and, having obtained their horses, they once more commenced their pursuit of their old enemy.

There was one great disadvantage that they laboured under, which was, they had no idea of the direction Jonathan Wild had taken.

They could do no more than trust to chance to lead them right.

While hastening forward, Blueskin suddenly heard a shout, and he at once pulled up.

Afterwards he wished he had not done so, for it seemed that the cry came from the lips of the chief officer.

"Mr.—a—a—excuse me, but I have not the pleasure of knowing your name," he said.

"Nor is it important that you should—I have many reasons for keeping that to myself. Why did you call me? I am on urgent business."

"Well, sir," said the officer, with great respect, "I judged from your manner that you were riding off towards London. Of course you have heard of our failure, and no one is more vexed than myself. I merely wished to request you not to throw any more blame upon me than you are obliged, especially as I have received certain information of his whereabouts, and am now about to get my men together and proceed to the spot at once."

"You may depend upon me," said Blueskin, "for, after all, you were no more to blame than I was. Without a rope ladder, it was impossible to descend into that pit."

"It was—it was, and I am rejoiced to find that you take so reasonable a view of the transaction."

"Oh, don't mention it; but, in order that your statement may appear to be true, tell me whereabouts it is that you expect to find Jonathan, and what is the information you have received."

The officer then proceeded to relate some facts with which the reader is already acquainted.

He stated how the officer in command of another body of police had seen Jonathan, chased him for some distance, and finally lost sight of him.

"You see, sir," added the officer, "they didn't know, as we do, in what an exhausted condition he must be. We know that he is quite incapable of making any resistance or getting very far. He was much to blame for giving up so easily. However, it will be all for the best, since the credit of capturing him will belong to me."

"I hope so," said Blueskin, who then made particular inquiries as to the exact spot where Jonathan had been seen.

That was readily given, and again he rode off.

During his brief conversation, Jack Sheppard had continued to ride on.

He by no means wished to come face to face with the officer, even although the night was drawing on and it was already dusk.

He kept his horse only at a walking pace, however, so that Blueskin, when he started, rapidly overtook him.

They continued on the road to London for some little distance, and while doing so, Blueskin acquainted Jack with the facts that had just come to his knowledge.

They then turned off towards Sedgfield.

"There's something like a presentiment in my breast," said Jack, "that before very long we shall succeed in our efforts. Come on—spur your horse hard, for I am all impatience to reach the place you have described."

At the rattling pace they went, this took but a short time.

The roadside was examined, the field searched, and at last the pool was found.

This place had been so well described that it was not possible to mistake it.

Its edge was quickly searched, although they knew the officers had performed this duty themselves.

"Look!" said Jack. "What's that?"

He pointed, as he spoke, to a green-looking mass outside of the pool.

They hastened towards it, and found it to consist of a few long, green, slimy reeds.

They were some that Jonathan Wild had disengaged himself from when just at the edge of the water.

"This looks strange," said Blueskin. "Surely he could not have been hiding here while the officers were firing."

"It seems impossible," said Jack. "But do you perceive how wet the grass is here? And if you will notice, there are marks of footsteps, too."

"Well, then, let us assume that he did hide in this pool, and that he has left it. Let us look around us for the place where he would be most likely to conceal himself. Depend upon it, he would not have the strength to get very far."

They looked around them while they spoke, and the first object upon which their eyes rested was the little wood.

"That's the place," said Jack, "and if he has only managed to gain its shelter, we shall have a very difficult job indeed to unearth him."

The edge of the wood was very quickly reached, and they arrived at it only a very short time after Jonathan had entered.

There was nothing they could see, however, that would serve them as any clue to the route he had taken.

"There's only one thing we can do," said Blueskin, "and that is, to draw our swords and tramp resolutely everywhere about among this brushwood. It may take a long time, but we shall be rewarded in the end, for I feel certain he is here."

"So do I."

"Well, then, let us commence, and we may succeed even quicker than we anticipate."

Dismounting from their steeds and drawing their swords, Blueskin and Jack at once commenced a very active search.

They continued for a couple of hours, and then paused to rest.

Up to that moment they had found nothing.

While resting on the trunk of a fallen tree, looking carefully all around them, Jack perceived something fluttering upon a branch of a prickly shrub.

Without a word, he hastened off towards it, and, taking hold of the fragment, examined it more attentively.

Curiosity made Blueskin rise and follow him.

"Look here," said Jack—"this shows we are on the right track. If this is not a portion of his coat, I am much mistaken."

[THE DISCOVERY OF JONATHAN WILD.]

Blueskin examined the piece of cloth as well, and then exclaimed:

"Yes, yes—I feel almost sure of it. Forward, Jack—we shall find him yet!"

They plunged forward through the bushes, and in a few moments afterwards emerged into that open, barren spot we have already mentioned.

Ere they had gone many paces, both uttered a simultaneous shout.

They stopped instantly.

Before them, lying down at full length on the ground, and with the moonbeams falling brightly upon him, was the form of Jonathan Wild.

So surprised were they at this sudden discovery, and at his motionless attitude, that for a minute or two they neither moved nor spoke.

No. 157.—BLUESKIN.

It was then Jack who said, in a faint whisper:

"Is he dead?"

"I think not," said Blueskin; "yet how still he is lying there!"

He crept forward cautiously while he spoke, and, going round to one side, managed to obtain a view of Jonathan's face.

It was so bruised and scratched that it was almost unrecognisable.

Yet one glance showed them that he was not dead, but only sleeping.

"He's worn out—exhausted by his efforts," said Jack; "and who could wonder at it? Now, then, how are we to proceed?"

"That's a difficult question, Jack, and we must take some time to consider it. For my own part, I scarcely know what to say."

"Nor I. It is quite certain, however, that we must have no hand in his capture; if we do, we must come forward to give an account of our proceedings, and then that will be fatal to us."

"It will. It seems to me that there is only one course left open to us."

"And what may that be?"

"For us both to remain here and watch over him. We will not remove our eyes from him for a single moment, and when he awakes we will contrive to keep him continually in sight."

"That might easily be done," said Blueskin; "and, what's more, I believe it will not be long before the officers make their appearance here. The one who spoke to us is anxious in the extreme to redeem his credit by making a capture, and therefore he will not rest until he has searched this plantation thoroughly from end to end."

"And if he is quick," said Jack, "he will arrive before Jonathan recovers from his slumbers. Suppose we climb up into that tree, and wait there; we shall then be able to command a good view around, and be in no danger of discovery ourselves."

"I don't think we can do better," said Blueskin, "and the sooner the officers come the better."

CHAPTER DCCXLVII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS MAKE THEIR APPEARANCE IN THE PLANTATION.

FOR some time Jonathan slumbered heavily.

But at last he began to show symptoms of great restlessness and uneasiness.

Those frightful dreams that always visited him whenever he closed his eyes, and which made sleep a curse and a dread to him, again began to torment him.

He writhed and fought about as though in deadly conflict with some powerful foe, and cries and shouts came from his lips.

Yet in his wildest dreams it is questionable whether Jonathan Wild thought of anything that was worse than reality.

Little did he think that all his movements were being watched by Blueskin, and, above all others, by Jack Sheppard.

The latter he fondly and truly believed had long since met with the fate that he had designed for him.

His cries and shouts at length became unendurable, and Jack Sheppard said:

"I can't remain here and listen to such awful sounds. Let me descend—I will wake him."

"No, no—think of nothing of the kind. Let him be where he is."

"I can't."

In a moment Jack Sheppard swung himself lightly from the tree.

Even as his feet touched the ground, Jonathan Wild awoke.

His eyes were glaring fearfully, and the cold perspiration of intense fear was on his forehead.

He started to his feet with a wild, shrieking cry, and then all at once he stopped, and stood as though changed to stone.

Was he dreaming still? or did he see before him an apparition?

He glanced around.

On all sides he could see the trees and other objects.

He looked up at the sky, and saw the moon and the stars.

No, he was not dreaming, and it was in truth an apparition that stood before him.

He retreated a step, and then, in a wild, shrieking voice, he spoke.

"Off—off!" he said. "Begone—begone! Do not torment me any further, or you will drive me completely mad! I know you now, Jack Sheppard—I know why you have come! This is the second time that I have seen your form! My end is drawing near. I feel it—I know it! Mercy! Leave me—leave me! Do not approach me! Begone, I say!"

To tell the honest truth, Jack Sheppard was quite as much startled as even Jonathan Wild was himself.

At the first moment he could not understand the meaning of his conduct.

Then all at once it flashed into his mind that Jonathan was labouring under the impression that what he saw before him was an apparition.

It was easy enough for him to fall into such a delusion as this, and Jack stepped forward with the intention of disabusing him of it.

That onward movement was, however, to Jonathan Wild fraught with a thousand terrors.

By a fearful effort he broke the spell that chained him to the spot on which he stood, and, with wild, awful shrieks thrilling from his lips, he dashed headlong through the trees, forgetting, in his excitement and insane fear, all about his previous fatigue.

Nor did he look either to the right or to the left, or attempt to avoid the various obstacles that were in his path.

He plunged blindly, madly on.

The thorns tore his flesh and his apparel, and he stumbled once or twice over some impediment in his path.

Then, with full force, he rushed against a thick, low-lying branch of a tree that shot out horizontally from the trunk.

It was just such a height from the ground that it caught him full upon the forehead.

There was a sickening, crashing sound, and he fell backwards as if shot.

In the meanwhile, Blueskin had descended from the tree, and followed in the footsteps of his companion.

He was just in time to see Jonathan fall to the ground like a stunned ox.

Before he had time to make any remark upon the subject, loud cries and shouts came upon his ears, mingled with the trampling of many feet.

"The officers!" he cried. "They have heard Jonathan's shrieks, and are hastening in this direction! In a few minutes at the most they will find him."

"But they must not find us," said Jack.

"No—no, not by any means! Quick—up this tree, and the chances are a thousand to one against our being found!"

The tree closest to them afforded every facility for climbing, and in much less time than would have been considered possible, Blueskin and Jack were safely ensconced among its topmost branches.

Yet the position they had taken up was such a one as to enable them to command a view of all that was going on below, and they waited in no slight suspense to see what would happen next.

The trampling among the bushes grew more and more distinct.

The officers were making their way to the right spot with tolerable certainty.

Jonathan, insensible to all that was going on around him, knew nothing of this fresh danger, and, judging by appearances, it was pretty certain that he would fall an easy prey into the hands of his enemies.

At last, after giving them so much trouble, they would be able to put out their hands and seize him.

First of all, however, we must refer for a moment or two to the proceedings of the officers who were approaching.

After having accosted Blueskin in the manner we have already described, the chief officer, with all convenient speed, got his men together, and rode off to the place that had been described.

They arrived shortly after Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

Unlike our friends, however, they took the word of their companions that the pool and all around it had been searched thoroughly.

"You looked in the wrong place," said the chief officer, as he raised himself in the stirrups and looked around.

"While you were searching there he was hiding in some other place."

"But where—where?"

"Well, that's the question, I know. But can you see that plantation yonder?"

"Yes, I see it now, though I didn't notice it before."

"Well, then, rely upon it that's the place where Jonathan Wild has chosen to conceal himself. I feel quite certain that if he had strength to crawl so far as there, he would not be able to go a step further, so that, in all probability, he will be there still. At any rate, we will search it thoroughly, and not give up until we have tramped over every square yard of it."

Judging by looking around, it had indeed some probability that the plantation would be chosen by Jonathan Wild as a hiding-place.

With the exception of that one mass of trees, the remainder of the country, as far as the eye could reach, was uniformly composed of meadow land, so that concealment anywhere upon it was quite out of the question.

The officers accordingly, without going near the pool, rode straight to the plantation, where they dismounted, and left one of their number in charge of the horses.

Then, plunging at once among the trees, they commenced their search.

Before they had gone far, however, those loud cries to which Jonathan had given utterance reached their ears.

The cries came from a distance they could tell, for they were faint.

Yet there was no mistaking their character, nor the direction from which they came.

"Haste—haste!" said the chief officer. "We have found him at last! Ten to one some one is attempting to take him prisoner, and a furious struggle is the consequence! Quick—quick, and we shall be there in time!"

The chief officer himself set the example of rushing forward at full speed through the trees, and, guided only by the sound, they hastened towards the spot where Jonathan Wild was.

But all at once the sounds that they had heard came to a termination.

But, being able to fix upon their source with tolerable certainty, they hastened forward, labouring under the greatest possible excitement.

CHAPTER DCCXLVIII.

JONATHAN WILD IS CAPTURED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS, AND CARRIED TO LONDON IN A CART.

The chief police officer still kept the lead.

But all at once he stopped and uttered a loud shout.

The effect of this was to bring his men very quickly around him.

Then they all saw, lying down in that strange attitude where he had fallen, the man they so wished to overtake, and whose capture had given them so much trouble.

With another cry, this time of exultation, the chief officer seized hold of him.

He was the first to place his hands upon his prisoner.

"He has met with an ugly blow," he said, gazing at his face, down which the blood was trickling. "He is quite insensible, so now, my lads, get some rope and bind him securely. Then, when he comes to himself, he won't have a chance of doing any mischief."

This command was readily obeyed; and while his men were binding Jonathan Wild securely with ropes and placing handcuffs upon his wrists, the chief officer began to wonder what was the meaning of the strange condition in which he found his prisoner.

Why were those cries uttered? and by whom had that blow been dealt that had produced his insensibility?

These were unanswerable questions, and he looked all around him without being able to see anything at all unusual.

He was interrupted in his ruminations by the intelligence that Jonathan Wild was fast bound.

He dismissed his thoughts at once.

Jonathan Wild was his prisoner, and it did not matter for anything else.

"Now, then," he cried, "we will get him to London in the shortest possible space of time. We cannot be too speedy in our movements."

"But how is it to be done?"

This question was a puzzler, for Jonathan's condition looked to be very serious indeed.

The officers were most solicitous indeed to preserve his life.

They knew that they would not gain so much credit by taking his body to Newgate, and, moreover, they would be deprived of the money that would be paid upon his execution, and which was always known to them as blood money.

"If we could only get a cart," said one, "and a good horse in it—that would be the best way of taking him. The remainder could then form a guard round it, so that there could be no possibility of an escape."

"An escape?" ejaculated the chief police officer. "No, he shall never escape from me—I will take good care of that, for until I see him safe inside Newgate and get my receipt, I will never remove my eyes from him, no matter what there is to be seen."

From the resolute manner in which the chief officer spoke, there could be no question but that he fully intended to keep his word.

"I agree to the cart," he said. "Go, some of you, and obtain one. If you can't get one nearer, go to Sedgfield—you will be sure to get one there. In the meanwhile we will follow on in the best way we can."

This being agreed to, one of the men immediately started off to fetch the cart.

Under the direction of their chief, the others employed themselves in making a rude bier of the various branches of trees that were around; and having succeeded in doing this, they placed the still insensible body of Jonathan Wild upon it.

At a necessarily slow pace they then retraced their steps, and made their way out of the plantation.

The officer in command kept his word literally, for although he did not actually assist in carrying the rude bier, yet he walked by the side of it, with his hand on his prisoner's arm and with his eyes fixed upon his face.

How long Jonathan's insensibility might continue they knew not, but from the manner in which they looked upon him it was rather evident that they dreaded this event, although he was now in such a maimed and mangled condition.

Blueskin and Jack watched the little procession until they could see it no longer.

Then, waiting a short time, they as silently as possible descended the tree, and guided by the rustling of the branches before them, they made their way out of the plantation.

The officers changed frequently in carrying the bier for Jonathan was no light weight.

When the outskirts of the plantation were reached there was a general pause.

"We will carry him as far as the road," said the chief officer, "and rely upon it by the time we have done that we shall hear the cart coming along the road."

After a brief rest they again set forward.

The plantation was only separated from the road by a couple of fields, but these fields were of very large extent, and therefore some time was necessarily consumed in crossing them.

As soon as the officers had left the cover of the wood, Blueskin and Jack paused at the edge and watched them.

"It will be some time, perhaps, before the cart arrives," said Jack. "In the meanwhile, let us regain possession of our horses; we shall then be prepared for any emergency."

"Good. They are somewhere close at hand."

The horses were easily found and captured, and then, leading them by the bridle, the two friends again advanced to the border of the plantation.

By the time they reached it they saw that the police officers had gained the high-road, and were waiting there for the cart to approach.

"Now, Blueskin," said Jack, "in spite of all the risk and danger—no matter how great—I am determined to follow that procession to London. I will see Jonathan carried into Newgate."

"And so will I," said Blueskin. "I care nothing for danger now. I will be close at hand, and take care, if he escapes the officers, he does not escape me."

"He doesn't seem in a very good way for making his escape," said Jack. "I believe they have him secure this time; they ought to have, he fell into their clutches easily enough."

"If it comes to that, it's you who ought to claim the reward."

Just at that moment they heard the rattling of the cart as it came along the high-road from Sedgfield.

It was drawn by one of the best and fastest horses that could be procured.

Not without some difficulty, Jonathan's body was lifted up by the officers and placed in it.

The chief and three more got into the cart, so that the strictest watch could be kept.

One of them, of course, held the reins.

The other officers clustered round the cart in a dense throng, and then, considering all things, the procession moved on at a smart pace towards London.

When they were far enough in advance, Blueskin and Jack quitted their place of concealment.

"Come," said the latter, "we may venture, I think, to keep pretty close to them; their eyes and all their faculties will be bent upon their prisoner, and they will not be at all likely to pay any attention to our approach."

This was exceedingly likely.

"It will be best to keep tolerably close," said Blueskin. "If the distance to London was only trifling it would not so much matter; but they will be compelled to pause once or twice at least, upon the road, and those are the times when the greatest vigilance must be made use of."

"Yes, when he recovers his senses, and realises his position, Jonathan will know that those halts will give him the best chance, and you may rely upon it, he will not hesitate to avail himself of them to the utmost."

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard gained the high-road, and, although their progress was swift and the clatter of their horses' feet considerable, yet the police officers in advance never once troubled themselves so far as to turn their heads round and look to see who it was on the high-road behind them.

CHAPTER DCCXLIX.

JONATHAN WILD AWAKES TO A KNOWLEDGE OF HIS TRUE POSITION, AND IS FILLED WITH DESPAIR.

The chief officer was anxious to push on as far as he could without coming to a halt.

Like Blueskin, he had great dread of this event, for, helpless and overcome as the prisoner appeared to be, yet he could not blind himself to the knowledge that he would have a much better chance of making his escape than he would while they were in motion.

The only thing they could do, however, was to keep a good watch upon him whether in motion or not.

He determined that there should be no stopping to sleep during the whole of the journey, although it might probably occupy twelve hours or more, even supposing that they were tolerably lucky in procuring relays of horses.

At the first roadside inn they came to, the inquiry was at once made for fresh horses, and it so happened that they could be accommodated with them.

A very brief delay took place, for a fresh horse was quickly placed in the shafts of the cart, and each officer removed the trappings of the steed he had been riding.

The cessation of movement, however, restored Jonathan Wild to consciousness, and, in a dreamy, confused fashion, he opened one eye, and looked about him.

The other was quite swelled up and closed, in consequence of the violent blow he had received from the branch of the tree.

His intellects were wandering, and some moments elapsed before he comprehended his position.

The knowledge first came upon him when he attempted to move his hands, and raise himself so as to look around.

He discovered that they were tied securely, and that his feet were tied as well.

Handcuffs, too, were on his wrists.

Then a dismal, horrible yell broke from his lips, and, as it came upon the ears of the officers with great suddenness, they were all startled.

The yell was followed by a succession of those awful imprecations for which Jonathan Wild was so famous.

He called down every possible curse he could upon the heads of his captors.

Although he was tied so tightly, he rolled himself over in the cart, and dashed about in quite a furious manner; and so great was his passion that foam actually gathered upon his lips.

"Come—come, Mr. Wild," said the chief officer, "it is not worth while for you to knock yourself about in this manner. The worst's over, so you had better put up with it."

Jonathan favoured him with another string of curses, but made no other reply.

"Very well," said the chief officer, "do just as you like; I don't want to control your actions in the least, only I can just tell you you are not going the right way to work with us, if you wish to have things made as smooth and pleasant as possible."

Again Jonathan raved and cursed, and endeavoured to fling himself over the side of the cart.

This was impossible, and, at a signal from their leader, two police officers jumped in, and, placing themselves at each side of the prisoner, held him down in such a manner as to prevent him from moving a limb.

By this time they were all in readiness to start, and so the signal to go forward was given.

Jonathan Wild soon made the discovery that he had stern and earnest men to deal with, and therefore he abruptly ceased his insane behaviour.

It was wonderful to see how suddenly he changed from the highest pitch of madness to complete calmness.

"Look out!" said the chief officer, who occupied his old position by the side of the cart—"look out!—he means something; be on your guard!"

Jonathan ground his teeth together with an audible sound.

But, as he lay in the cart, with his brain whirling round and round, he endeavoured, by closing his eyes, to regain command over his mind.

Some time elapsed before he succeeded.

Then he endeavoured to realise his exact position.

That brought back to his recollection something that he had already forgotten.

The cold perspiration started out all over him, and he shivered from head to foot, like one in an ague.

His cheeks grew white with terror, and he was unable to keep his eyes closed any longer.

He glared apprehensively around him.

He remembered all at once that he had been confronted by what he felt certain was the spectre of Jack Sheppard.

Twice he had seen it, and such an appearance could bode no good to him.

Perhaps before his last moment came he would see him again.

It was a great relief to Jonathan to roll his eyes around and note, one by one, the various countenances of his captors.

The form he so much dreaded was not among them.

Then he knew that he was on his way to Newgate.

How close he might be to that huge prison he was unable to form any idea, and as for asking his captors the distance, that was ridiculous.

For aught he knew, London might be close at hand.

Surely, finding himself in such a desperate position as this, one would think that all hopes of escape would fade completely from his mind.

But such was not the case.

Bruised and mangled as he was in body, and enfeebled and terrified in spirit as he was, yet Jonathan clung to life.

His brain seemed to ache and throb, and yet he endeavoured to elaborate some cunning stratagem by which he might release himself from the custody of the police officers.

He might have known that, even had he succeeded in his attempt, his success would have been but of short duration.

In his present condition, he could not possibly fly far.

He would be overtaken and recaptured easily.

Yet for all that, he kept pondering over his position.

He knew that if he did not effect his escape while riding along his death would be certain.

Once in the prison of Newgate, he felt certain that no efforts of his, however strong or well-directed, would enable him to force his way out.

His stay there would be short, and he would only be allowed to come forth in order to be led to execution.

Already, in imagination, he could see the scaffold at Tyburn rising up before him, and he turned half sick at the prospect.

Although he lay so still, the officers on the other side of him did not relax their vigilance in the least.

It is true, they did not hold him so tightly as they did when they were compelled to keep him down; but they only shifted their grasp in such a manner that they could tighten it instantly, should occasion arise.

At the next halting-place they were not so fortunate as at the first.

No fresh horses could be obtained, and those they rode were already so knocked up that a rest of a couple of hours at the least was imperative.

Thus, then, what the chief officer so justly dreaded came to pass at last.

After some consultation, it was agreed that Jonathan Wild should not be removed from the cart.

The shafts were propped up, and the horse taken out.

The two officers remained by his side, and the one in command still retained his old position.

Jonathan was thus very closely guarded.

None of the officers were permitted to enter the inn; but they all had some refreshment brought out to them.

Jonathan watched them hungrily for some time, wondering whether they would offer anything to him.

Finding they did not, the pangs of hunger compelled him to speak.

"Do you intend to starve me?" he said, hoarsely and huskily. "I have not tasted food or water for more hours than I can remember! I ask you again, do you intend to starve me?"

"Not by any means," said the chief officer; "but you must control your appetite until I get you safe inside Newgate. I wish you were there with all my heart. When once you are there, secure in your cell, you may make as good a meal as you please."

Jonathan ground his teeth again.

"Are you so inhuman—so savage as to refuse me even a drop of anything to drink? Is not that exceeding your duty? Would you have me die on the road? No, no—I am sure you would not; you would lose your blood money then!"

"I don't mind giving you something to drink, Mr. Wild," said the chief officer. "I am sorry to see you in your present condition; yet, you have only yourself to blame for it. Why did you not give in at first?"

Jonathan was silent.

"If you promise to be calm and quiet, I will attend to your requests; if you are violent, the consequences will only recoil upon yourself; as on another occasion, I should turn a deaf ear to your appeals."

Jonathan still remained silent.

By the officer's direction, a huge jug of water was brought and held to the prisoner's lips.

He growled with dissatisfaction when he saw what the liquid was.

But he was so parched and burning with thirst that he was glad of even water, and so he drank eagerly.

"There," said the chief officer, "that's all I can do for you. You must wait till we get to Newgate; luckily, that will not be long first."

Without a word, Jonathan sank back into his old position, nor did he move again.

The two hours expired.

The horses were brought forth, and again their journey was resumed.

Still Jonathan Wild lay at the bottom of the cart, looking more like a dead body than a living man.

The fact was, he had fallen into a kind of swoon or stupor that was produced by a variety of causes, among which may be mentioned want of food and rest, loss of blood, and the many terrible adventures through which he had lately passed.

All these conspired to deprive him of his energy.

CHAPTER DCCL.

NEWGATE IS AT LAST REACHED, AND JONATHAN WILD IS CONFINED SECURELY IN ONE OF THE STRONGEST CELLS.

In this state of semi-stupefaction Jonathan Wild continued during the remainder of the journey.

He knew perfectly well where he was—knew that he was drawing nearer and nearer to his doom.

And yet he found himself without the power to raise even so much as his finger to prevent it.

All the time, however, the officers, fearing some treachery, kept a wary eye upon him.

With good reason they distrusted this seeming quietude.

They did not believe their prisoner to be so bad as he really was.

His eyes remained fast closed, and he never uttered a single word during the remainder of the time.

At last, to the infinite satisfaction of the chief officer and all his subordinates, London was reached.

It was early morning when they arrived, and but few people were visible in the streets.

Therefore they were able to make their way with good speed to their destination.

Those few pedestrians who, by chance or necessity, were abroad so early in the morning cast curious and inquiring eyes upon the strange-looking procession as it made its way along at such a rapid rate.

Some, even guessing its destination, started to run, and the majority of these followed the cart until it halted before the little door at Newgate.

The stoppage of the cart seemed on this occasion to act upon Jonathan something like an electric shock.

Before his captors could prevent him, he started up suddenly into a sitting posture.

He saw then where he was.

He knew that in another minute at the most he should be beneath the roof of the gloomy building, and that after that there would be no hope for him whatever.

This knowledge made him furious, and without thinking of the consequences, he commenced an insane struggle with the officers.

Although they were strong men, and two to one, and in full possession of all their physical powers, while he was bound, yet, incredible as it may seem, he managed to fling himself over the side of the cart.

He fell down heavily upon the paving stones, and lay there without power to move again.

"Quick—seize him," cried the chief officer—"seize him, all of you, and carry him in!"

In the meanwhile a tremendous summons for admission had been given at the door.

It awoke the man on the lock, who, peering through the iron bars, was filled with wonder at the sight he saw before him.

With trembling haste, he thrust the key into the lock, and flung the door wide open, while, at the same time, he pulled a knob that communicated with a bell in the Governor's private apartment in the prison.

This was a little arrangement that had been made by Mr. Noakes's successor, a man, he it said, well suited for the office which he held, and one not at all likely to abuse it.

His regulations had been very strict, and he had given particular instructions that, whenever anything of an unusual character occurred, the man on the lock was instantly to apprise him of it by ringing the bell.

Still struggling slightly, Jonathan Wild was carried up the steep flight of stone steps into the vestibule.

Then he was laid upon the ground.

The door was secured the moment the last officer had entered.

"The Governor will be here in a moment," said the man on the lock; "I have already summoned him."

Even as he spoke the words, the door was flung open and the new Governor appeared.

"What is it?" he asked, in sharp, quick tones of authority—"what has happened?"

"I have brought you a celebrated prisoner, Mr. Kendrick," said the chief officer—"one that we have been trying hard to catch, and one that we have at last!"

"Do you mean Jonathan Wild?"

"No other. Advance—here he is!"

With great curiosity, the new Governor approached.

He was exceedingly anxious to have a good look at the ex-thief-taker.

But when he saw what a terrible condition he was in—so bruised, and cut, and mangled—he averted his eyes in horror.

"Now, Mr. Kendrick, if you will write out a receipt and give it me I will be off at once, for I can tell you that I am heartily tired of my job. My share of the work is done so far; but I would not advise you to permit him to escape from your custody; if you do——"

"You have no need to caution me," said the Governor, rather coolly—"he will not escape. I would answer for his safe custody with my life!"

"Well, that's all right. I have done with him now, and my responsibility is at an end. Give me the receipt—that's all that I require."

The receipt was duly written out and handed to him, and the chief officer and the rest took their departure from the prison.

The turnkeys were then summoned, and Jonathan Wild was picked up just as he was, and carried along the gloomy corridors to the strongest cell in all the prison.

Then the cords were removed, and a heavy set of irons riveted upon the prisoner—the heaviest that had been made, and, if tradition speaks truly, the very same set of fetters that are now hung up over the doors of the present building of Newgate, but which are fast rusting away from exposure to the weather.

To the band of iron that went round his waist was attached a chain of massive links, which was secured to a staple embedded deeply in the mortar between the blocks of stone.

The handcuffs were then removed and the cord taken off.

Jonathan was secure enough now.

The Governor was determined that Jonathan Wild should have no chance of escape.

He singled out four men, and ordered them to share the cell with the prisoner, and to watch his every movement closely.

He told them they would be relieved from their duty every two hours.

Although he was such a notorious villain, and quite unworthy of any kind treatment whatever, attempts were made to improve the prisoner's condition and make him more comfortable.

Warm food was also brought to him.

But his strength was already so frightfully reduced that he could scarcely raise it to his lips.

The mass of iron upon him literally weighed him down.

He was in a sitting position, and, if his life had depended upon it, he could not at that time have raised himself upright.

The effect of the soup that had been given him was soon perceptible, and as he grew stronger so did his rage return.

Again he broke forth into the most horrible curses and ravings, levelling his imprecations at all persons and all objects.

The men in the cell, accustomed as they were to seeing the worst side of humanity, looked at one another in speechless dread, and wondered how it was the building did not fall and crush such a blasphemous wretch beneath it.

Glad indeed were they when, at the expiration of two hours, four other men were sent, who took their places.

Jonathan, perceiving the change, again broke out into his curses.

"Let him be for awhile," said one; "he will soon grow tired of that sort of thing. He knows he is safe now; nothing can save him."

In the meanwhile the Governor, with all speed, sent off a messenger to the Secretary of State, informing him of the important capture that had been made, and requesting that immediate attention should be given to it.

In less than a couple of hours afterwards a proper order for Jonathan Wild's execution was forwarded.

He was appointed to die at Tyburn at mid-day on the Monday following.

Of course, having been already tried and condemned, there was no necessity for any fresh trial, nor, indeed, for a fresh warrant; it was merely endorsed according to the usual form.

Having received this document, the Governor at once proceeded to the cell of the prisoner.

He read it to him, made him acquainted with its particulars, and bade him prepare himself for that death which would so soon overtake him.

But Jonathan's only reply was horrible cursings, and the Governor, aghast and disgusted, backed out of the cell, determined to visit him no more.

Faithful to the intention they had expressed, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard followed the course of the procession.

During most of the time they kept it in sight, halting when they halted, and accommodating their speed to those before them.

Upon nearing London, they grew somewhat anxious on their own account, and muffled themselves up as closely as they could in their riding-cloaks.

It required no trifling amount of courage to approach so near to the building of Newgate as they did.

Yet they would not have felt content had they not done so.

From a distance, they watched the stoppage of the cart.

They saw the struggle that took place, and beheld Jonathan hurl himself over the side.

They were prepared then to take part in the chase, should he succeed in getting away.

But they soon saw that the officers were upon him almost immediately.

And then he was carried into the building.

When the ponderous gates were closed there was a moment's silence, and then Jack said:

"That, then, at last, is over."

"Yes," said Blueskin, solemnly, "he is there, and good care will be taken of him—he will never come forth except to his death."

"We have that to witness," said Jack Sheppard, gloomily. "I shall care not. The aim of my existence will have been achieved, and after that, it matters little what becomes of me."

CHAPTER DCCLI.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES AN INEFFECTUAL ATTEMPT TO BRIBE HIS JAILERS.

AFTER the Governor had left the cell a gloomy stupor seemed to enshroud the senses of Jonathan Wild.

All that violence of manner which he had displayed suddenly disappeared, and, placing his elbows on his knees, he buried his face in his hands.

Who shall say what awful thoughts were then passing through his mind?

There was the consciousness upon him that the end of his career had been reached—nothing now remained for him but death—the grim phantom we have all to to meet.

But to Jonathan its aspect was terrific—death upon the scaffold was to him fraught with ten thousand horrors.

And, worst of all, there was no escape from it.

He could not flatter himself that circumstances would arise that would enable him to avoid his fate.

The precautions that had been taken by the Governor placed such a thing out of the question.

Those four men sitting there so silently, and watching him so intently, would never allow him the least opportunity.

Once, for a moment—and only for a moment—he thought some good might be done by bribing them.

No one knew better than himself that all the Newgate officials were by no means averse to having their palms tickled.

And had not Jonathan the means of bribing them to a very heavy amount?

There was the large amount of gold that had been buried in a spot that he could readily describe.

Would not that large sum tempt them?

It would almost seem so; but then his ruminations were interrupted by the opening of the cell door, and four more men entered, who relieved the others of their duty.

This continual change of guard gave him, then, no chance; before he would have time to make any impression, those men to whom he had been addressing himself would be replaced by others.

A gloomy despair then slowly settled round his heart, excluding even the faintest glimmer of a ray of hope.

He was there—fast confined in Newgate—and there he would have to remain until the sheriffs paid him their last visit.

And, after all, he began to ask himself why should he desire to live? What charms had existence now for him that he should wish to cling to it?

He was forced to answer: None.

But though he might be ready and willing to face death, he should wish to do so in any other way than at Tyburn.

Again he began to think.

If he could not hope to succeed in bribing the jailers to allow him to escape from Newgate, was there not just a chance that he should be able to persuade them to supply him with some drug that would enable him to cheat the hangman?

Yes, surely that was feasible—at any rate, nothing could be lost by trying the experiment.

He looked up, and found that the men were all engaged in watching him attentively.

"Is there any water to be had?" he asked.

One of the men, by way of reply, pointed to a stone pitcher near Jonathan's feet.

He raised it to his lips with an assumption of thankfulness; then, having drank a little, restored it to its place.

He made a wry face.

"That's poor stuff!" he ejaculated.

By his manner, it was evident that he expected this remark would call forth some observation or other.

But he was disappointed.

None came.

The old hateful look began to shine in his eyes.

"Gold," he said, huskily—"gold! There is much gold to be earned if you are inclined."

They shook their heads.

"I tell you there is!"

Still silence.

"Are you dumb?" the prisoner asked, with difficulty keeping down his anger.

"To you we are," answered one. "Our express instructions are to hold no conversation with you whatever, so do not trouble us any further."

Wild ground his teeth.

"I—I have a favour to ask—you shall have gold in return for it. When it comes to your turn to guard me again bring with you a sufficient quantity of laudanum, or any other poison, to take away my life; in return for it, I will tell you where you can dig up such a sum of money as will make all four of you rich men for life."

Again they shook their heads.

But Jonathan was not to be daunted so easily.

He had now a definite purpose before him, and his disposition made him strain every nerve to accomplish it.

By turns, he promised, threatened, appealed to them to grant his request.

But all in vain.

The men were firm—so firm, and so persistently silent that, after a time, Jonathan gave up the attempt in despair, and relapsed into his former despondent attitude.

And so he remained during the remainder of the day—certainly the longest day that he had passed for many months.

He felt almost grateful when he found the shades of evening creeping into the cell, and by degrees hiding his warders from his view.

Rough, coarse food was beside him, together with a small quantity of unwholesome water.

But neither of these he touched.

Just when it was positively dark in the cell, there was the sound of footsteps without and the door was opened.

Then there entered four more men to take the place of those who had watched their allotted time.

And along with them came the ordinary of Newgate.

In the bend of his arm, he carried a small black book, and he advanced with a slow step towards the prisoner.

He addressed to him some words of ordinary consolation.

Jonathan raised his head quickly, and glared furiously upon him.

"Begone," he exclaimed, in a hoarse voice—"begone! I want you not! Leave me to myself!"

The chaplain endeavoured to remain, in the hope of bringing the prisoner to some idea of his terrible position.

But Jonathan became so violent and excited that he was compelled to give up the attempt as a hopeless one.

He withdrew, determined to renew his effort on the following day.

Could anyone have seen Jonathan Wild twenty-four hours ago, and gazed upon him now, they would scarcely have been able to believe that so great a change could take place in anyone in so short a period.

Life appeared gradually to be leaving him.

The reaction of all the horrible excitement he had been labouring under for so long had come at last, after all.

Although we may be reluctant to admit it, considering the enormity of the crimes of which he was guilty, Jonathan Wild was human, and, though possessed of an iron constitution, yet he had so abused it that he could no longer set it at defiance.

Every hour saw him falling more and more into a state of stupor, and in the morning his condition was considered to be so desperate that stimulants were ordered to keep him alive.

But Jonathan, true to a purpose that he had formed, refused to swallow anything that was brought to him, and of course, it was folly to hope that they could force any liquid down his throat.

Jonathan's purpose was that, having failed in his attempts to escape, and having come to the conclusion that it was a thing impossible, he had decided at the last to cheat his foes.

They, beyond all doubt, fondly believed that they would lead him to Tyburn, and that he would there expiate the crimes of which he had been guilty.

That strange, mysterious hag, whose presence always caused Jonathan so much terror, had prophesied that such should be his fate.

And, above all, there was a consciousness within him that, strive as he would, he must come to that death at last.

But three days would have to elapse before the one came appointed for his execution, and his resolution was not to partake of a single mouthful of food or drink one spot of any liquid during that interval.

He fully believed that long before the dreaded Monday came he should be a corpse.

He should be meeting death; but yet, he felt tired of life, and he should die with something like a glow of triumph in his heart at having defeated his enemies at the last moment.

Among the officials of the prison there soon began to be some suspicion of the actual state of affairs, especially the Governor, who guessed what were his intentions.

To expostulate he knew was in vain, and any attempt to persuade him to partake of food he felt convinced would only serve to increase his obstinacy.

He tried other means—and means well calculated to answer the end he had in view.

Choice dishes of various descriptions were brought into the cell, and placed before the prisoner.

Jonathan felt, at last, the sharp pangs of hunger, and the sight of the tempting viands only increased them.

He looked upon them with wolfish eyes, and had great difficulty in keeping his resolution.

But with a firmness and stoicism wonderful to behold, he did keep it.

The food was untouched.

And so a second day passed, and, by the time night came, he was in such a state of deplorable weakness as scarcely to be able to raise his arm in the least.

But the pangs of hunger returned with tenfold violence.

He tried hard to conquer them.

But in vain.

Food was before him, lying temptingly within his reach, and, in spite of all his strenuous efforts, his eyes would constantly be directed towards it.

At last, with a cry like that which some famished animal might be supposed to give, he seized upon a piece of meat, and devoured it eagerly.

In his inmost heart he cursed himself for his weakness.

But he could not on that occasion control his appetite.

All command over himself was gone, and he could do no more than satisfy the present claims of nature.

When the men saw him eat they nodded their heads significantly.

They could guess now what would be the result.

CHAPTER DCCLII.

JONATHAN WILD COMMENCES HIS FATAL JOURNEY TO TYBURN.

ALTHOUGH the quantity of food of which Jonathan had partaken was exceedingly small, yet the effects of it were immediately manifest.

But his rage and despair to think he should be so weak after suffering so long were terrific.

In his mortification, he resolved to end his wretched life there and then, and, with this intent, struck his head violently against the stone wall of the dungeon.

The turnkeys, however, saw this instantly, and at once interfered.

That was a proceeding they could not permit, and, as they were four in number, they were easily able to master the prisoner.

Oh, how he wished for one small quantity of poison!—just enough to rid himself of life, and to enable him to escape the hangman's rope.

He renewed his bribes to the turnkeys, offering them fabulous amounts if they would comply with his demands.

But with common consent they refused.

There was good reason for this, for they knew that the cell was so constructed that the Governor could easily overhear every word that was uttered in it, and it was impossible for them to say at what precise time he would be listening.

The humble efforts of the ordinary to bring the prisoner to contrition were as useless as the first.

But on the Sunday, Jonathan, in common with other prisoners, was marshalled into the chapel.

Then he was placed along with those condemned to die, and had to listen to the funeral sermon, with what different feelings may be guessed.

It was no novelty to him.

In times past, many and many a time he had placed himself beside some unfortunate prisoner, and gloated over the misery that he was enduring.

Now he was in that wretched place, and, looking round, he could not see one eye directed with a pitying glance upon him.

He felt that his own hatred of mankind was fully shared in by the human race.

He was like one accursed, and when the time came for him to die, there would not be one who would regret his fate.

From that time not another word escaped from Jonathan's lips.

When the service was over, he suffered himself to be led back to the cell.

But he kept his lips and teeth resolutely pressed, as though determined that no sound should escape them.

The chaplain came again, and this time he had at least a patient listener.

Jonathan, with his arms folded, leaned back against the wall, and, with his lips closed, remained in that attitude of dogged defiance during the whole of the time the ordinary addressed him.

It was an unthankful office that functionary had to perform.

But yet he acquitted himself of it admirably.

He was afraid, however, from the appearance of the prisoner, that, although the words he uttered fell upon his outward ear, yet they did not penetrate to his understanding.

Then once more light faded out of the cell, and, as it did so, Jonathan could not help being reminded that it was the very last time he would witness day change into night.

A few short hours now had only to elapse before the time came for his execution.

Now that the prospect was so close—now that death literally stared him in the face, he began to exhibit tokens of extreme agitation.

Despite the great weight of his fetters and his own weakness, he continued to roll about incessantly.

He never once during that night closed his eyes in sleep.

To his disordered fancy it seemed as though St. Paul's Church did nothing else but strike.

The hours flew by like so many minutes.

With the first beams of light came a visit to the cell.

Breakfast was brought and placed before him.

But he refused to eat.

Then the ordinary came again, and Jonathan turned aside his head, maintaining the same dogged silence as before.

After that there was the usual visit of the sheriffs, into whose custody the prisoner was given.

Then he was unchained from the wall, and led to the pinioning-room.

Here the remainder of his fetters were removed by the blacksmith.

Jonathan shuddered.

There was a movement among those surrounding him, and he knew the cause.

The executioner was approaching him.

He shuddered again when he felt himself touched upon the arm.

Mechanically he placed himself in such a position that he could be pinioned easily.

The roaring and yelling of the huge crowd without could now be heard with great distinctness, and Jonathan trembled at the sound.

He knew he should quail at the sight of so many faces all bent sternly and angrily upon him.

In good truth, however, he was more like a man in a dream, than in full possession of all his mental faculties, and he suffered himself to be led hither and thither just as those who had him in their custody desired.

Moreover, the whole of the interior of the prison of Newgate was perfectly familiar to him, and so it was with a kind of instinct that he made his way in any required direction.

Upon reaching the yard he did not look up, though he felt grateful for the fresh air that blew upon his face.

He marched on between the turnkeys.

He knew he was going to the cart.

But he did not look at it.

With some difficulty he was placed inside it, and then, helpless and inert, he sank down in a sitting position upon the coffin.

The ordinary as usual placed himself by his side, and the hangman perched himself in the front and grasped the reins.

All was then in perfect readiness for the procession to start.

Great preparations had been made by the authorities to preserve the prisoner from the violence of the mob.

So great was the popular feeling against Wild, that it was apprehended he would never be permitted to reach Tyburn alive.

The people would take the law into their own hands, and nothing but his death would appease them.

This, however, it was determined to prevent if possible.

A strong force both of police and military had been mustered, the greater portion of whom had taken up a position in front of the prison.

The remainder were in the yard from which the procession was to start, and as many had been crowded in as was possible.

At a given signal the huge doors were thrown open, and no sooner did they move than one tremendous yell arose from the mob outside—a yell that seemed to burst spontaneously from every throat, and which must have echoed far and wide over the City of London.

Most unmistakably was that yell one of execration, and when he heard it, Jonathan Wild crouched down and tried with might and main to get completely out of sight.

He justly feared the anger of the incensed mob, and looked around him with more interest than he had yet done.

A feeling of relief came over him when he saw how well he was surrounded by police officers and soldiers, and he began to think there might even be a worse death than that which the law had designed for him.

To be torn to pieces by a brutal and infuriated mob was a fate from which everyone would naturally shrink.

Slowly the cart moved out under the archway.

The soldiers still kept close guard around it, and it was only the more distant spectators in the crowd who could obtain a view of the wretched prisoner.

But for all that, they continued to yell and roar with the full power of their throats.

The immense mass surged up against the gates, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that the soldiers could maintain their position.

Such a crowd as that had never before assembled in London.

Far and wide in every direction the people were packed as closely together as was possible.

Every window was crowded with faces, and every housetop contained a prodigious number of persons all gazing intently on the scene below.

And all up the Old Bailey, and down Snow Hill, and far away up Holborn in the direction of Tyburn the crowd was just as dense.

Well might fears be apprehended of the result of the gathering of such a concourse of people.

At the slowest possible rate the cart moved forward, and it was pretty clear if the journey to Tyburn was accomplished at all it would take a very long period.

The people behind, however, pressed forward continually, and with such united force that it was scarcely possible to withstand it.

Heavy missiles of various descriptions were hurled at the cart.

But few reached it.

The mounted soldiers so closely hemmed it in that no view of it could be obtained, except by those persons who occupied elevated positions.

One huge stone came flying over, however, and dropped upon the ordinary's shoulder.

He uttered a shout and dropped his book.

Jonathan was terrified too, and looked about him anxiously.

They would tear him limb from limb, he thought, if they could only once seize upon him.

"Curse them all, I wish they were in my place to-day and I in theirs! How I should exult in the sacrifice of them all!"

Over this sanguinary idea Jonathan pondered for some time, until indeed the cart stopped in front of the half-way house at St. Giles's.

It was well known that the procession, according to immemorial custom, would halt here, and therefore for many hours an immense crowd of people had assembled around, hoping to catch a sight of the prisoner at this point.

Refreshments were brought out as usual, and the landlord himself appeared upon the threshold with a bowl of punch in his hands.

"Here it is, Jonathan Wild!" he exclaimed. "I knew you would come at last, and when Jack Sheppard told me to take it back and keep it for you, I resolved to obey him. Here it is, drink it, and much good may it do you!"

While speaking, the landlord, holding the bowl of punch in both hands high above his head, walked towards the cart.

Jonathan at first seemed inclined to refuse to touch it.

But after a momentary pause he changed his mind.

CHAPTER DCCLIII.

THE EXECUTION OF JONATHAN WILD.—THE CONCLUSION.

EXTENDING his trembling hands, he took hold of the huge, massive China bowl, and everyone fully expected that he was about to place it to his lips and drink deeply of its contents.

He did place it to his lips indeed, but that was only to throw the landlord still further off his guard, who, not suspecting any injury, came closer still.

Then Jonathan, suddenly raising himself to his full height, and exerting the whole of the strength that yet remained to him, raised the bowl in the air, and dashed it violently, with its almost boiling contents, into the landlord's face.

NO. 158.—BLUESKIN.

There was a crash and a shriek of pain.

Jonathan echoed it by a burst of demoniac laughter, such as in olden times had pealed from his lips after the accomplishment of some barbarity.

He clapped his hands with glee, and the landlord, blinded, scalded, and bleeding profusely in many places, staggered and groped his way back into the inn.

This gratuitous injury excited the feelings of the populace to the highest pitch against him, and a desperate effort was made to get possession of him.

But the soldiers, although equally incensed, stuck firm to their duty, and repelled the advance.

By the order of the sheriffs, the procession was again set in motion, and strict instructions given that all possible speed should be made.

Those worthy men were indeed most anxious that that day's unpleasant proceedings should be brought to a close.

In accordance with this command the whole troop moved slowly on.

The corner of Oxford Road was gained, and for a short time they were able to move onward with less difficulty.

After that last act of cruelty, Jonathan had shrank down in his seat, apparently almost horrified and terrified.

He trembled and shook with fear—not only of the reproach, but of the awful death that was now so close to him.

Then he reached a certain point of the road from which, as he knew full well, a view of the triple tree could be obtained.

He knew it by the loud shout that came from the multitude.

All round the place of execution another crowd was gathered, already colossal in its proportions, but it was destined to be greatly swelled by those who were approaching.

In a short time it happened that further progress was impossible, the throng was so very dense.

Inch by inch the soldiers had to force their way, and every now and then, despite all their best efforts, the procession would come to a standstill.

It was on the occasion of one of these pauses that Jonathan Wild started suddenly, as though he had experienced an electric shock.

A wild, shrieking voice was heard, and directly afterwards a form appeared that Jonathan knew only too well.

In some inexplicable manner, it made its way between the soldiers, and stood in the little open space around the cart.

The form was that of the old hag who had on two preceding occasions prophesied that Jonathan Wild would end his days at Tyburn.

Extreme excitement was now visible in her manner.

She shrieked aloud, and clapped her skinny hands together.

"Man of blood," she exclaimed, in tones that had already become familiar to Wild's ears—"man of blood, the time I told you of has come at last! Was I not a true prophet? Now I shall be revenged! You took the life of one who was nearest and dearest to me—you took it wrongfully, as you know. It was you who murdered him at Tyburn. Now you are going there—you will reach it in a brief space now! There is no escape for you! The rope will be placed around your neck, and you will die as your victim did! I have seen it for a long time in the future—so long that I feared the day would never come. Now it is here at last, and I triumph! Jonathan Wild, farewell! I shall see you when you stand beneath the fatal beam, but my face will be undistinguishable from the others."

Just as she spoke the obstruction to the progress of the procession having been removed, a fresh start was made.

And in the same strange manner as she had appeared, the weird woman vanished.

During the time that she was speaking, Jonathan had gazed upon her like one who was spellbound.

He seemed to wish from the very bottom of his heart that he could remove his gaze or make some movement.

But both were impossible.

Tyburn was now very close at hand indeed, and however slow their further progress might be, it must be reached in a very short space of time.

Again Jonathan fell into that state of sullen apathy which he had on former occasions displayed.

And in this state he continued until the cart was again brought to a standstill.

This time it was within a few paces of the triple tree, around which a strong guard of soldiers had been placed many hours before, and who had had great difficulty in withstanding the tremendous pressure of the crowd.

Their ranks divided to allow the procession to enter the clear space that they had kept, and then once more they closed up, repelling the people with their bayonets.

Another jerk was given to the cart, and then it was brought beneath the fatal beam.

The executioner stood up and suddenly produced a coil of strong rope.

He stood upon the coffin, which was placed crosswise on the cart, and then he became a most conspicuous object.

His appearance was greeted by a universal howl of hatred, for although he was about to rid them of such a monster as Jonathan Wild was, yet the people could not overcome their intense aversion to him.

The executioner, however, only smiled grimly.

He was getting used to all that sort of thing, and knew what value to place upon it.

With considerable dexterity he threw one end of the rope over the horizontal beam, then catching it, he tied a knot so as to form a loop, which he drew tight, and then hung with his full weight upon the rope in order to draw it tight.

Much against his inclination, Jonathan was then compelled to rise to his feet and mount upon the coffin.

Now that the last moment had come he seemed inclined to throw off his passive demeanour, and to make a desperate effort at resistance.

But too many were around him for any such attempt to be in the least degree successful.

Before he was aware of it, his knees were tightly pinioned together, and he was helpless.

Around him as far as ever he could see was nothing but one huge sea of white faces.

All eyes were turned towards him, and every countenance had upon it an expression of the utmost abhorrence.

Then he felt the snake-like fingers of the hangman twining around his throat.

He felt the rope, too, as it was slowly passed round his neck.

At this awful moment he gave a last despairing glance around.

He looked up at the sky, in which the sun was shining brightly, and which wore a truly beautiful aspect, for only a few white, fleecy clouds speckled it.

Then his eyes were turned towards the ground, and by a singular chance they rested upon one face out of that huge throng.

No sooner did they rest upon it than a wild and terrible shriek burst from his lips—a shriek all could tell was wrung from him by some great agony of apprehension.

His eyes dilated with terror, and his whole countenance was truly fearful to gaze upon.

Muttered words came from his lips.

But they were spoken so indistinctly that none could catch their purport.

It is possible, however, that the reader may guess whose face it was that Jonathan had seen at this last awful moment.

It was the countenance of Jack Sheppard, who, carefully wrapped up in a cloak, and with his hat drawn down over his brows, had taken up his post at the place of execution, in accordance with the vow that he had long ago made.

He saw the great enemy of his life—the bane of his whole existence—before him.

Jonathan saw him, too, and his horror may be imagined, for he was fully impressed with the notion that it was a supernatural being he beheld.

No idea was more firmly fixed in his mind than that Jack Sheppard was no more.

Could he but have been made aware that he had escaped him, and was still alive, it would have been another pang added to those he already suffered.

But the preparations were all complete.

The hangman descended clumsily from the rude cart and went towards the horse's head.

The ordinary, who had picked up his book, again stood by the prisoner still occupied in prayer.

It was just then that Wild's eyes were attracted by another face next to the one that had caused him so much fear.

This was Blueskin's.

He recognised it instantly, and he knew that the officers were anxiously in search of him.

It would have been a great revenge if at that moment he could have pointed him out to the police officers and caused his capture.

But it was not to be.

He tried hard, however, to make himself understood.

He wished to point, and tugged at the rope which confined his arms behind his back.

These motions of his, however, were entirely misunderstood by those around him.

He tried to speak—to call out who it was that stood there watching his dying agonies.

But the rope was pressing tightly round his throat—so tightly, indeed, that he imagined it prevented him from speaking.

Then he became aware of a dreadful fact—a fact that completely drove all other thoughts from his mind.

The cart was moving slowly beneath him.

He made the most furious efforts to retain his feet.

He tried to grasp hold of the coffin between his ankles, and struggled with might and main to avert his inexorable doom.

It was in vain, however.

Those struggles only hastened his death.

A sharp cut with the whip was administered to the horse, who gave a sudden bound forward.

The cart was removed entirely, and, with a sudden jerk, Jonathan Wild was suspended from Tyburn Tree.

There were then a few convulsive quiverings of the limbs, a universal spasm of the whole body, and all was still.

Jonathan Wild was dead.

* * * * *

Now that Jonathan Wild has met with the fate he so richly merited, this story naturally reaches its completion.

The enemy of all that was good, and true, and noble, and the friend of every species of vice and villany is no more.

The body having hung for the allotted time, was then cut down and rudely cast into the ill-made coffin prepared for its reception.

It was carried back to the prison, and afterwards hung in chains upon a gibbet.

The people slowly dispersed.

But among the last to leave the spot were Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

All arrangements had been made for their future proceedings, and all they waited for was that the death of Jonathan Wild should be accomplished effectually.

Therefore, as soon as they could get free of the crowd, they mounted the horses that were waiting for them at no great distance, and galloped swiftly away.

To remain longer in England they felt was impossible, every moment of existence there would be fraught with a thousand dangers.

Besides, there was nothing to endear them to the land of their birth, or make them unwilling to quit it.

Elgworth Bess, too, was exceedingly anxious to journey to some foreign land, and therefore, in anticipation of the events that actually occurred, she had made every preparation, and, along with Steggs, had left the Manor House and journeyed to Gravesend, where they had embarked in a small vessel that they had engaged expressly to convey them.

Here they waited for Blueskin and Jack Sheppard to arrive, and this was the point towards which they hastened after the execution of Jonathan Wild.

They arrived in safety, and, alighting from their panting steeds, sprang into the small boat that was waiting for them near the shore, and in a few moments afterwards were on board the bark.

It was a happy meeting between them all, and great anxiety was shown for the anchor to be weighed and the vessel to be fairly got in motion.

It turned out, however, that there was no immediate cause for alarm.

No one guessed that any particular events were taking place on board that vessel, and no attempts were made to molest it.

In a slow, lumbering fashion it made its way down the Thames, and then stood out to sea.

The weather was fair, the wind favourable, and within a short time they came in sight of the shores of France.

They landed at an obscure part, and hastened to gain the interior of the country.

They were now completely safe from all pursuit, and had nothing to apprehend.

Edgworth Bess had around her those friends who had done her such good service, who had freely sacrificed everything on her behalf, and who had on more than one occasion actually saved her life.

It rejoiced her to think that the time had come that she could recompense them in some measure for all that they had done for her.

She was rich—possessed indeed of abundance of wealth, and she lavished it freely upon them.

In what portion of the world it was that they afterwards took up their abode, or whether they moved frequently from place to place, none knew.

By the instructions given, a certain sum of money was forwarded at regular intervals to a bank in Paris, and this amount was regularly fetched by a man of sad and downcast appearance.

That man was Steggs, and he remained with the heiress until his death.

[THE END.]
